Could South Carolina be honorably discharged from this heavy debt and all others that burden her impoverished people, no one would rejoice more than I would. I have, throughout this trial, keenly felt the heavy responsibility resting upon me, *and have endeavored to discharge my duty as a judge with an eye single to the law governing the case.

*263

Better by far that the state should suffer through a proper vindication of the law by her courts than that temporary relief should accrue to the taxpayers through its perversion; and if relief shall come to her people through the judgment of those with whom I have, with much diffidence and great respect, differed, I will be most happy to acknowledge my error when demonstrated before the court of last resort.

I greatly regret that the court has so construed the joint resolution as to eschew and ignore the only question which can settle the issue between the state and the holders of her consolidated bonds, viz., the force and effect of the consolidation act, and has confined itself to the simple inquiry as to the infirmities of the surrendered and canceled vouchers.

It leaves the vexed question of the validity of the bonds in Schedule 6 res integra.

The plaintiffs appealed to this court, when these cases were argued upon the several points made in the court below.

†Messrs. James Conner, Simonton & Barker, C. R. Miles, Lord & Inglesby, and W. H. Brawley, for appellants.

†The Reporter has not been supplied with the arguments of all the counsel engaged on both sides. Those which he has are very able and exhaustive, but are necessarily omitted for want of space, as they are long, and no considerable abridgment of them can be made without doing the learned counsel injustice. They do not seem to be necessary to a full understanding of the points made.—REPORTER.

Messrs. L. F. Youmans, Attorney-General, Henry Meetze and Y. J. Pope, for the state.

September 29th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. For a proper understanding of the questions raised by this appeal, as well as to show how it is that these actions are brought against the state in one of her own tribunals, *it will be necessary to make a brief statement of the legislation which gave rise to the cases.

*264

On the 8th of June, 1877, (16 Stat. 318), the general assembly adopted a joint resolution, which, after reciting that "great uncertainty" existed in the minds of the taxpayers as to the real amount of the valid indebtedness of the state, provided for the appointment of a commission, consisting of three members of the senate and four members of the house of representatives, whose duty, in general terms, it should be to investigate and report upon such indebtedness. This commission, which, for convenience, will be called, as it is usually designated, the bond commission, were, amongst other things, specially directed to inquire and report: First. What was the entire amount of consolidated bonds and certificates of stock which had been issued under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same," approved December 22d, 1873, (15 Stat. 518), which act will be called throughout this opinion the consolidation act. Second. "Whether there is, in the state treasurer's office, on file as vouchers, canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock of the issues described, issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated by the act above recited, to the amount required by said act." These duties involved, therefore, the institution of four inquiries: First. What was the entire amount of consolidation bonds and stocks issued? Second. Whether there were vouchers in the treasurer's office in the shape of canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock for which the consolidation bonds and stocks were issued, to the amount required by the terms of the consolidation act? Third. Whether such vouchers—canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock—had been issued in accordance with law? Fourth. Whether such canceled bonds, &c., were amongst those which were authorized to be consolidated by the terms of the consolidation act? For, it will be remembered, that the bonds, coupons and certificates of stock authorized to be consolidated are specifically mentioned in that act, while others are not mentioned at all; and others again, a very large proportion—nearly all, in fact—of the conversion bonds, are specially *excepted from the operation of the act,

*265

because they were issued "without any authority of law."

In due time the bond commission submitted an elaborate report, accompanied with various schedules—that called No. 6 being intended to represent the consolidation bonds and certificates "affected by vouchers which, in the judgment of the bond commission, were not issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated under the act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same." Thereupon the general assembly, without either affirming or disaffirming the conclusions of the bond commission, so far as the validity of the bonds and stocks mentioned in Schedule No. 6 were concerned, passed a "joint resolution providing a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state and of liquidating and settling the same." March 22d, 1878, 16 Stat. 669. That resolution, in its first section, provides for the establishment of a Court of Claims, which "shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine any case or cases made up or brought to test the validity of any of the consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, or of any of the various classes of them, mentioned in the said report of the bond commission as resting on vouchers not issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated by the act of the general assembly, approved December 22d, 1873, entitled 'An act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same,' and, also, as not issued in accordance with law, and further designated and described in Schedule 6 of said report. In Section 9 it is provided "that the attorney-general and his said associates, with the consent of the creditors of this state, or so many of them as shall be necessary, may make up a case or cases to be heard and determined in said court, in which, if practicable, the state shall be defendant, to test the validity of the said consolidated bonds and coupons and certificates of stock mentioned in said Schedule 6, bringing before the court the various classes of vouchers which, it is alleged in the report of the said commission, impair the validity of the said consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, or any of them." The tenth section directs "that there shall be levied for the current fiscal year a tax sufficient to pay the coupons and interest orders *maturing on the outstanding consolidation bonds and certificates of stock during the said fiscal year." The eleventh directs the payment of such interest on those consolidation bonds and certificates of stock mentioned in Schedule 5 as are subject to no valid objection, and then Section 12 provides for the payment of the interest for that and the preceding fiscal year on the several classes of consolidation bonds and certificates of stock mentioned in Schedule 6, "whenever there shall be a final adjudication as to the validity of the several classes of bonds and certificates of stock in the manner hereinbefore provided, and none other." In pursuance of the provisions of this resolution, the cases which we are now called upon to determine, being actions on coupons of the various classes of bonds mentioned in said Schedule 6, were brought before the Court of Claims, and the majority of that court have rendered their judgment in favor of the state, from which these appeals have been taken to this court, as provided for in the second Section of the said joint resolution.

*266

The judgment of the Court of Claims is based upon a construction of the provisions of the joint resolution constituting it, by which they hold that their jurisdiction is limited to the inquiry, "Were the vouchers—that is, the canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock—issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated by the act of the general assembly, approved December 22d, 1873?" But they carefully avoid the inquiry, as not, in their judgment, within the scope of their jurisdiction, whether, assuming this to be so, the bonds and certificates of stock issued under the provisions of the consolidation act, are, nevertheless, valid or invalid; or, to use their language, whether "the consolidation bonds issued under the act of 1873 are valid or invalid in other respects." It is very clear, from the grounds upon which that court base their conclusions, that they use the words "not in accordance with law," not in the sense that there was no act of the general assembly authorizing the issue of the bonds in question, but that the various provisions of the acts authorizing their issue were not complied with, and for that reason they were not issued "in accordance with law." But, as we shall see, the real question in these cases is, whether there were any acts authorizing the issue, and that *whether the bonds were issued in accordance with the various provisions of such acts, is a question comparatively unimportant. An act may fully authorize the issue of bonds, and yet the bonds may not have been issued in strict conformity to the provisions of such act—"not in accordance with law." Hence, the fundamental inquiry is, has the power to issue the bonds been conferred? not whether such power has been exercised "in accordance with" the various provisions of the law conferring the power.

*267

We think it plain that the object of the resolution was to provide for "a final adjudication" of the vexed question as to what was the real debt of the state, and not simply to institute an inquiry into the consideration of that which purported to be such debt: for it is too plain a principle of law that a negotiable security—to which class it will be seen the bonds in question belong—whether issued by a private individual, a corporation, or a state, may constitute a valid debt, even though originally based upon an insufficient or fraudulent consideration, or upon no consideration at all, to suppose that any one, much less the legislature which passed this resolution, could be ignorant of it. Hence, when the declared object of the legislature, as evidenced by the title of the resolution, was to provide "a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state, and of liquidating and settling the same," we cannot suppose that they intended that the investigation should stop half way, but that it should be complete and thorough—that the debt should be ascertained, and not simply the nature of the consideration upon which it rested. And as this investigation was referred to a judicial tribunal, the necessary inference is that the object was to submit the question to the test of legal principles. But, in addition to this, the express terms of the resolution leave no doubt in our minds as to the real intention. In the first section the Court of Claims is invested with jurisdiction to hear and determine any case brought "to test the validity," not of all the consolidation bonds, &c., but only of such of them as are "mentioned in the said report of the bond commission as resting on vouchers not issued in accordance with law." Now, the validity of these bonds could not be tested by limiting the inquiry, as the Court of Claims have done, to the *question whether the vouchers—the canceled bonds, &c.—were issued in accordance with law; for it may be, as we shall presently see, that such vouchers are liable to all the objections alleged against them in the judgment of the Court of Claims, and yet the consolidation bonds may still be valid debts of the state. It seems to us that the construction which the Court of Claims have placed upon the words "as resting," in the first section of the resolution, is altogether inadmissible, and that those words are used merely for the purpose of indicating a particular class of bonds whose validity is to be tested. For it will be remembered that while the objection urged by the bond commission to much the larger part of the bonds, &c., mentioned in Schedule 6 is because they were issued in exchange for bonds, coupons or stock which, though embraced within those mentioned in the consolidation act, were yet illegally consolidated, because they were not issued in accordance with law, the additional objection is made to others because they were issued in exchange for bonds, coupons or stock which were not embraced within those mentioned in the consolidation act. Hence, in the first section of the resolution provision is made for testing the validity not only of that class of bonds which is subject to the first objection, but also of that class of bonds which is subject to the second as well as the first objection, so as to insure the consideration of both objections. But were there any doubt, the provisions of the ninth section demonstrate that the construction which we have adopted is the correct one. In that section the attorney-general and his associates are directed to make up a case. What for? Not to try the question whether the vouchers upon which the consolidation bonds rest were issued in conformity to the provisions of the several acts authorizing their issue, but "to test the validity of the said consolidated bonds and coupons and certificates of stock mentioned in Schedule 6;" and certainly the additional words contained in that section—"bringing before the court the various classes of vouchers which it is alleged in the report of the said commission impair the validity of the said consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, or any of them"—cannot have the effect of either enlarging or contracting the issue which the cases were made up to *try. The only object of these additional words was to instruct the attorney-general and his associates to see to it that the grounds upon which the consolidation bonds had been assailed in the report of the bond commission should be brought fully before the court which was specially constituted to try the above-stated issue, and perhaps to provide that these vouchers should be competent evidence upon such trial. To make the matter still clearer, the legislature proceeded, in the tenth section, to direct the levy of a tax sufficient to pay the interest on all the consolidation bonds, &c.; and in the twelfth section provided that the interest on the bonds, &c., mentioned in Schedule 6 should be paid "whenever there shall be a final adjudication as to the validity of the said several classes of bonds and certificates of stock in the manner hereinbefore provided and none other." This language would seem to place it beyond dispute that it was intended to invest the Court of Claims with full jurisdiction to make "a final adjudication" (subject only to appeal, as provided in the resolution,) of all questions touching the validity of the consolidation bonds, and that when such adjudication was made no question as to the validity of such bonds should remain open; but if such adjudication was in favor of the bonds, then the interest thereon was to be paid. Now, as under the construction adopted by the Court of Claims some of these questions were left open and undecided, it is very clear to our minds that such construction was not the proper one.

*268

*269

In reviewing the judgment of the Court of Claims two general questions present themselves: First. Are the conclusions announced in that judgment as to the existence of the several infirmities alleged against the several classes of vouchers well founded? Second. If they are well founded, does it follow that the consolidation bonds, &c., resting in whole or in part upon such vouchers, are invalid and not binding obligations of the state? But, from the view which we take of this case, it will only be necessary for us to consider the second question, as the answer to that will be conclusive of the result in the cases now before the court.

But for the fact that a different view has been suggested from a source which we have always been accustomed to treat with *the highest respect, we would have deemed it scarcely necessary to say that in the consideration of this question we are bound to regard the constitution of 1868 as the fundamental law of the state, and that all acts of the general assembly passed since its adoption, not in violation of any of its provisions or those of the constitution of the United States, are just as valid and of the same binding force and effect as any other statute passed at any other period of the history of the state. Any other view would be in violation of the fundamental principles upon which all republican governments rest, and would lead to inextricable confusion, and perhaps to civil commotion and strife. Without undertaking to inquire into the mode and manner by which the constitution of 1868 was adopted, it is enough to say that the people of the state have for years acquiesced in it, and treated it as the fundamental law of the state. The whole machinery of the state government was framed and is now operating under the provisions of that constitution. The very investigation which led to the framing of the cases now before the court was set on foot by a legislature elected in pursuance of its provisions. The Court of Claims, whose decision we are called upon to review, and this court itself, were both organized under and owe their authority to the constitution of 1868. It is manifest, therefore, that we are bound to regard that constitution as the fundamental law of the state, and all acts passed in pursuance of its provisions, as of the same binding force and effect as any that may be found on the statute-book passed prior to the adoption of that constitution. As Taney, C. J., says, in the case of Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 40 [12 L. Ed. 581]: "Judicial power presupposes an established government capable of enacting laws and enforcing their execution, and of appointing judges to expound and administer them. The acceptance of the judicial office is a recognition of the authority of the government from which it is derived; and if the authority of that government is annulled and overthrown, the power of its courts and other officers is annulled with it. And if a state court should enter upon the inquiry proposed in this case, and should come to the conclusion that the government under which it acted had been put aside and displaced by an opposing government [or was an usurpation, as seems to be contended for by *one of the judges of the Court of Claims], it would cease to be a court, and be incapable of pronouncing a judicial decision upon the question it undertook to try. If it decides at all as a court, it necessarily affirms the existence and authority of the government under which it is exercising judicial power."

*270

*271

The legal principles which determine the answer to the question which we are called upon to solve are few in number, and are well established. It is manifest that the question depends upon the inquiry whether the state has, by a valid contract, bound itself to pay the amounts which the consolidation bonds in question purport to secure; for though the action in each of the cases is upon a coupon of one of such bonds, it may be regarded, and, for convenience, will be spoken of in this opinion, as if the action were upon the bond itself—the legal principles involved being alike applicable to an action on a coupon as on a bond. State v. Spartanburg and Union Railroad Company, 8 S. C. 163, recognizing City of Kenosha v. Lamson, 9 Wall. 483 [19 L. Ed. 725], and City of Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 296 [20 L. Ed. 809].

Now, as the Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held that, while they will, as a general rule, regard the construction given by state courts to state legislation and state constitutions as conclusive, such rule is subject to this exception; that where the question involved is not only whether such legislation impairs that which is admitted to be a contract, but whether that which is alleged to be a contract, is, in fact, a contract; (State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop, 16 How. 369 [14 L. Ed. 977]; Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Bla. 436 [17 L. Ed. 173]; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 203 [17 L. Ed. 520]; Township of Pine Grove v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 666 [22 L. Ed. 227]); and as the general assembly, in providing for this investigation, has, in express terms, recognized the right of the parties to invoke the judgment of this tribunal of last resort, it becomes important to examine the question in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

There can be no doubt but that coupon bonds like these under consideration, as well as the coupons thereof, are negotiable securities, and as such, are subject to the same rules of law as govern that class of securities. White v. Vermont R. R. Co., 21 How. 575 [16 L. Ed. 221]; Mercer County v. Hackett, 1 Wall. 83 [17 L. Ed. 548]; Cromwell v. *County of Sac., 96 U. S. 57 [24 L. Ed. 681]; Langston v. S. C. R. R. Co., 2 S. C. 248.

*272

There is as little doubt that states which issue negotiable paper incur the same responsibilities which attach to individuals or corporations in like case. United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. 392 [10 L. Ed. 774]; Murray v. City Council, 96 U. S. 445 [24 L. Ed. 760]; Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall. 666 [19 L. Ed. 169]. As is said in the last-named case, "it must be taken as settled that when the United States becomes a party to what is called commercial paper—by which is meant that class of paper which is transferable by endorsement or delivery, and, between private parties, is exempt in the hands of innocent holders from inquiry into the circumstances under which it was put in circulation—they are bound, in any court to whose jurisdiction they submit, by the same principles that govern individuals in their relations to such paper."

That the plaintiffs in these cases, as well as the holders of the coupons for which the bonds here in question were exchanged, are entitled to be regarded as bona fide holders before maturity, and entitled to all the rights incident thereto, we do not think can be questioned, as there is no proof to the contrary—at the very utmost, only suspicion. The rule upon this subject, as stated by Mr. Justice Swayne in the case of San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 314 [24 L. Ed. 816], upon the authority of 2 Pars. on Bills and Notes, 9, and Pinkerton v. Bailey, 8 Wend. 600, is that "the holder of commercial paper, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is presumed to have taken it under-due for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any objection to which it was liable;" and, as is said by Mr. Justice Field in Cromwell v. County of Sac., 96 U. S. 57–8 [24 L. Ed. 681] in speaking of similar obligations issued by municipal corporations, "they are transferable by delivery, and, when issued by competent authority, pass into the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity, freed from any infirmity in their origin. Whatever fraud the officers authorized to issue them may have committed in disposing of them, or however entire may have been the failure of the consideration promised by parties receiving them, these circumstances will not affect the title of subsequent bona fide purchasers for value before maturity or the liability of the municipalities. As *with other negotiable paper, mere suspicion that there may be a defect of title in its holder, or knowledge of circumstances which would excite suspicion as to his title in the mind of a prudent man, is not sufficient to impair the title of the purchaser. That result will only follow where there has been bad faith on his part. Such is the decision of this court, and substantially its language, in the case of Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110 [17 L. Ed. 857]." This is a very strong case upon the subject. The facts, in brief, were these: Negotiable bonds were stolen from Lardner and sold to Murray, a broker in New York, under circumstances well calculated to excite his suspicion, though there was no proof of any actual guilty knowledge on his part—the complaint against him being that he did not prosecute the inquiry which such circumstances of suspicion naturally suggested. The court, after an elaborate review of the English cases, held that he was not bound to do so; that the possession of negotiable paper is presumptive proof of good title, and the burden of proof is upon him who assails the right claimed by the party in possession, and laid down the rule in very much the same language as that above quoted, declaring it to be settled law, from which there was no disposition to depart.

*273

If, then, the bonds here in question are negotiable securities and the holders thereof are bona fide holders, our next inquiry will be as to the rule governing that class of securities in the hands of such holders. The rule, as stated by one of the most recent writers on this branch of commercial law, is that if such securities are issued by competent authority, they are, in the hands of such holders, unaffected by, and exempt from inquiry into, the circumstances under which they were put into circulation. 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., §§ 1502–3. Now, as corporations or states issuing such paper must necessarily do so through the instrumentality of officers or agents, the only inquiry in such cases is, whether the officer or agent has been entrusted with authority to make and issue the paper, and it is not competent to inquire into his conduct in making the issue. If he has been guilty of irregularities or even frauds in exercising the power with which he has been entrusted, the loss thereby occasioned must fall upon the party who entrusted him with such power, and not upon the *innocent holder, who has taken the paper in the usual course of trade. The rule, as stated in Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. 784, is: "When a corporation has power, under any circumstances, to issue negotiable securities, the decision of this court is that the bona fide holder has a right to presume they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and they are no more liable to be impeached for any infirmity in the hands of such holder than any other commercial paper." And this rule has been re-affirmed in the recent case of San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 314 [24 L. Ed. 816], and again in the still more recent case of County of Macon v. Shores, 97 U. S. 278–9 [24 L. Ed. 889]. In the case of Commissioners of Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 How. 545 [16 L. Ed. 208], it was held that where bonds have been issued by the board of county commissioners, under the authority of an act of the legislature, which prescribed certain conditions upon which the bonds were to be issued, "the purchaser of the bonds had a right to assume that the vote of the county, which was made a condition to the grant of the power, had been obtained, from the fact of the subscription by the board to the stock of the railroad company and the issuing of the bonds. The bonds, on their face, import a compliance with the law under which they were issued. 'This bond,' we quote, 'is issued in part payment of a subscription of $200,000 by the said Knox county to the capital stock, &c., by order of the board of commissioners,' in pursuance of the third section of act, &c. The purchaser was not bound to look further for evidence of a compliance with the conditions to the grant of the power." In the comparatively recent case of Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 490 [23 L. Ed. 579], the foregoing case is characterized as a leading case upon the subject, and is said to have established two propositions. First. "That the issue of the bonds containing a recital that they were issued under and in pursuance of the legislative act, was a sufficient basis for an assumption by the purchaser that the conditions on which the county (in that case) was authorized to issue them had been complied with, and that the purchaser was not bound to look further for evidence of such compliance, though the recital did not affirm it." Second. That "where legislative authority has been given to a municipality, or to its officers, to subscribe for the stock of a railroad company, *and to issue municipal bonds in payment, but only on some precedent condition, such as a popular vote favoring the subscription, and where it may be gathered from the legislative enactment that the officers of the municipality were invested with power to decide whether the condition precedent has been complied with, their recital that it has been, made in the bonds issued by them and held by a bona fide purchaser, is conclusive of the fact and binding upon the municipality." In Coloma v. Eaves, it is said that the first proposition has been re-affirmed in the cases of Moran v. Miami County, 2 Bla. 732 [17 L. Ed. 342]; Mercer County v. Hackett, 1 Wall. 83 [17 L. Ed. 548]; Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. 784 [18 L. Ed. 556]; and in Myer v. Muscatine, 1 Wall. 384 [17 L. Ed. 564], and, though doubted and dissented from by individual judges, has never been overruled. But, so far as the second proposition is concerned, it is said that it "has been so firmly seated in reason and authority that it cannot be shaken." This case has been repeatedly recognized and affirmed in a number of subsequent cases, among which may be mentioned Marcy v. Oswego, 92 U. S. 637 [23 L. Ed. 748]; Humboldt v. Long, 92 U. S. 642 [23 L. Ed. 752]; Commissioners v. Bolles, 94 U. S. 104 [24 L. Ed. 46]; County of Warren v. Marcy, 97 U. S. 96 [24 L. Ed. 977]. That the effect of these decisions is to reaffirm both of the propositions laid down in Knox County v. Aspinwall, is made manifest by what is said in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 493 [23 L. Ed. 579], and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Miller in Humboldt v. Long, 92 U. S. 649 [23 L. Ed. 752]. We think, therefore, that the result of the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States clearly is, that when an act of the legislature authorizes the issue of bonds by a municipal corporation upon certain conditions therein named, and the bonds are issued by the proper officers of such corporation, containing a recital that they are issued under the authority conferred by such act, that such recital is conclusive in favor of a bona fide holder—that all the necessary conditions named in the act have been complied with, as a purchaser is not bound to look beyond the legislative act and the recitals contained in the bonds. As was said in Marcy v. Oswego, 92 U. S. 641 [23 L. Ed. 748], "the subsequent issue of the bonds containing the recital above quoted—that they were issued 'by virtue of, and, in accordance with,' the legislative act, and in 'pursuance of, and *in accordance with, the vote of three-fifths of the legal voters of the township'—was another determination, not only of the result of the popular vote, but that all the facts existed which the statute required in order to justify the issue of the bonds." The case of Weith and Arents v. City of Wilmington, 68 N. C. 24, which seems to be much relied upon by the counsel for the state, does not seem to us to be in conflict with the foregoing views; for in that case there was an absolute lack of power to issue the bonds which were there brought into question, and they were, therefore, properly held to be absolutely void even in the hands of a bona fide holder. The act under which the bonds were issued only authorized their issue in exchange for outstanding valid debts of the state, and as it was conceded that the original bond in exchange for which they were issued was given for money advanced in aid of the rebellion, which class of debts had been declared by the constitution of that state to be absolutely void, there was of course, no authority whatever for the issue of the bonds in question.

*274

*275

*276

It is true that the cases which establish the foregoing principles arose upon bonds issued by municipal corporations; but if, as we have seen, negotiable bonds issued by states are subject to the same rules which govern that class of paper when issued by individuals or corporations, it is difficult to conceive how this can make any difference—and, indeed, it seems to be conceded in the argument on both sides that there is no distinction. The rule grows out of the principles which apply to that class of paper, and is in no wise dependent upon the character of the parties who make or issue such paper.

There is, however a very strong case in which these principles were applied to bonds issued by a state. California v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 15 Cal. 236. In that case certain warrants which had been issued by the proper authorities of the state were paid and deposited in the office of the state treasurer. The warrants were afterwards stolen and presented to the treasurer to be funded under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for paying certain equitable claims against the state." Bonds were issued in exchange for the stolen warrants, the treasurer at the time not knowing that they had been stolen. Sub*sequently discovering this fact, he demanded the surrender of the bonds, and, upon refusal, brought this suit. There was no allegation or proof that the defendants knew the facts showing the fraud. It was held that, the warrants being negotiable paper, the bonds issued in exchange for them were valid debts in the hands of innocent holders, as the defendants were declared to be, in the absence of any proof to the contrary.

*277

The practical question, then, in these cases is, were the bonds in question issued by competent authority? As the bonds purport to be the bonds of a state, and as a state cannot, like an individual, directly make and issue a bond, but must do so through the instrumentality of its officers or agents, who can only act under special authority conferred upon them, the inquiry in these cases is narrowed down to the question whether such authority was conferred upon the officers who issued the bonds in question. This authority, under the constitution of the state, could only be conferred by an act of the general assembly passed in conformity to the provisions of that instrument. Hence, it is not sufficient to show that an act of the general assembly has been passed authorizing the issue of such bonds, but it must also appear that such act is not subject to any constitutional objection. Town of South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260 [24 L. Ed. 154]; Harshman v. Bates County, 92 U. S. 569 [23 L. Ed. 747]. Which, though overruled by the case of Cass County v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 360 [24 L. Ed. 416], as to the point that the act there in question was unconstitutional, may yet be regarded as authority for the proposition that if the act conferring the power to issue the bonds is unconstitutional the issue of such bonds will be without authority, and the bonds, even in the hands of a bona fide holder, will be invalid. So, too, if, by a proper construction of the terms of the act, the authority to issue the bonds is not conferred, the bonds will be invalid in the hands of a bona fide holder. As, for example, in the case of Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676 [19 L. Ed. 1040], where the act authorized the issue of bonds to one railroad corporation and the bonds in question were issued to another corporation, which, though a portion of the first-named corporation, was held to be a distinct and separate corporation; and in the case of Town of East Oakland v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255 [24 L. Ed.

*278

125], where the charter of a railroad *corporation provided that "it shall be lawful for all persons of lawful age, or for the agent of any corporate body to subscribe any amount to the capital stock of said company," and it was held that the words "agent of any corporate body" applied only to private corporations, and did not, therefore, authorize a municipal corporation to subscribe for stock and issue bonds in payment therefor, and such bonds were, therefore, invalid, even in the hands of a bona fide holder.

The bonds, the validity of which we are called upon to inquire into, all purport to be bonds issued under the provisions of the consolidation act in exchange for coupons or other bonds called vouchers, purporting to have been previously issued under various acts of the general assembly, which will hereinafter be more particularly mentioned, and it is conceded that in every instance except one—that of the case of G. M. Walker, cashier—the vouchers were amongst those mentioned in the consolidation act, the bond in the case of Walker, cashier, being admitted to rest in part upon a batch of some $9000 of coupons detached from bonds for relief of the treasury, which are not included in the bonds of that class mentioned in the consolidation act. It is likewise conceded that the consolidation act was not passed "by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each branch of the general assembly," and was not submitted to a vote of the people, as is required by Article 16 of the constitution, adopted January 29th, 1873, (15 Stat. 466,) where after that time the general assembly undertakes "to create any further debt or obligation" on the part of the state. It cannot, therefore, be allowed the effect of creating "any further debt or obligation," and must be regarded as simply a scheme for the re-adjustment of the then existing debt. When, therefore, a question arises as to the validity of any bond which purports to have been issued under the provisions of that act, the inquiries are: 1. Was the debt for which such bond was issued a then existing debt of the state? 2. If so, was such debt amongst those provided for by the terms of the consolidation act? The answer to the first inquiry depends upon the answer to the question whether the "vouchers," which were surrendered upon the issue of the consolidation bonds now in question, were made and issued by competent authority. These *vouchers, in the cases now before the court, consist of coupons of bonds of various classes, which, for convenience, may be designated as bonds for relief of treasury—bonds for funding bills of the bank of the state—bonds for the payment of interest on the public debt, first issue—bonds for redemption of bills receivable—conversion bonds—bonds for payment of interest on the public debt, second issue—land commission bonds of 1869—land commission bonds of 1870. These coupons, as we have seen, were negotiable securities, and hence the only question is whether there was any lawful authority for their issue. Not whether in issuing them the officers charged with that duty complied with all the conditions prescribed in the acts authorizing their issue, or, as it is phrased in the decision of the Court of Claims, whether they were issued "in accordance with law," but was there a law authorizing their issue? The bonds to which these coupons were originally attached bear upon their face the evidence that they were issued in pursuance of certain acts of the general assembly, referring in express terms to such acts. These bonds, together with their coupons, must, therefore, upon the foregoing principles, be regarded as valid debts in the hands of bona fide holders, if the acts so referred to be constitutional and do in fact authorize their issue, even though it may now appear that all the conditions prescribed may not have been complied with, and even though there may have been the grossest frauds perpetrated by the officers and agents of the state in issuing them and putting them into circulation.

*279

It is not and cannot be denied that the acts so referred to do in fact purport to authorize the issue of the bonds, except in the case of the second issue of bonds for the payment of the interest upon the public debt, for which there does not seem to have been the shadow of authority of any kind, and which, therefore, are absolutely void, no matter in whose hands they may be. For, if the act be construed as giving authority for a second issue, there is no conceivable reason why a third or fourth or an indefinite number of issues could not have been made upon the same construction; and, certainly, a construction leading to such a result cannot be the correct one. It is a mistake to suppose that because the consolidation act authorizes the funding of $1,197,000 of *bonds issued under the act of August 26th, 1868, to pay interest upon the public debt, there was, therefore, an over-issue under that act of $197,000. The act does not limit the amount of bonds to be issued to $1,000,000, but simply limits the amount to be raised to that sum, and judging from the prices at which the bonds were then selling, the only matter of surprise is that a much larger amount of bonds had not been issued. If this be so, then the only remaining question is whether these various acts purporting to authorize the issue of bonds are constitutional. Various objections have been raised to their constitutionality, which we will proceed to consider.

*280

The constitutionality of the act entitled "An act to authorize a loan to redeem the obligations known as the bills receivable of the State of South Carolina," ratified August 26th, 1868, (14 Stat. 17,) is assailed upon the following grounds:

1. Because the debt thereby purported to be contracted was not for the purpose of defraying "extraordinary expenditures," and is, therefore, a violation of Article IX., Section 7, of the constitution. This objection is manifestly based upon the idea that the word "extraordinary" is used in that section in its popular sense, whereas it is clear from the context that it is only used in contradistinction to the word "ordinary," as the latter word is used in the sense of current or usual annual expenditures in a preceding section of the same article; for in Section 3 of that article the constitution declares that "The general assembly shall provide an annual tax sufficient to defray the expenses of the state for each year; and whenever it shall happen that such ordinary expenses of the state for any year shall exceed the income of the state for such year, the general assembly shall provide for levying a tax for the ensuing year, sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency of the preceding year, together with the estimated expenses of the ensuing year." After thus providing for the expenses of the state government (of course meaning the government which was then to go into operation under the provisions of the constitution of 1868), designated as "ordinary," in the sense of current annual expenses, the constitution proceeds, in Section 7, to provide that "for the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures, the *state may contract public debts"—that is, for the purpose of defraying all such expenditures as do not fall within the class of ordinary current annual expenses, the state may contract debts. It is a matter of history that upon the reorganization of the state government of 1868, that government found itself not only with an empty treasury, but embarrassed with debts contracted by the government to which it had succeeded, some of which were floating in the shape of bills receivable and bills of the bank of the state, and some funded, upon which there was a large arrearage of past due interest. These debts were manifestly no part of the ordinary current annual expenses of the state government then going into operation, which the constitution required should be provided for by an annual tax, and to obtain the means of providing for such debts, as that government was undoubtedly bound to do, it was absolutely necessary that extraordinary expenditures should be incurred. This objection, therefore, does not appear to us to be well founded.

*281

2. The next ground is that the act in question does not levy a tax annually sufficient to pay the annual interest of the debt, the contracting of which it purports to authorize, and is, therefore, in violation of one of the clauses of Article IX., Section 7, of the constitution. This objection is disposed of by the decision of this court in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 430. Whether that decision be right or wrong, until overruled by competent authority it stands as an authoritative construction of those sections of the constitution which are therein considered, binding not only upon every citizen of the state, but upon every tribunal which undertakes to administer its laws. To say, as has been said, that each judge has a right to determine for himself the proper construction of a clause of the constitution, regardless of the construction which may have been placed upon it by superior authority, amounts to saying that we have no settled law, and that we are living in a state of anarchy. It is quite true that each judge, as well as each of the other officers of the state, takes an oath to observe the constitution; but the constitution is not what he construes it to be, but what it is construed to be by the tribunal invested with the power to determine what is the proper construction. As long as *human language remains imperfect, it is absolutely essential that in every well-regulated community, living under a written constitution, there should be some tribunal of last resort, invested with the power to decide authoritatively upon the true meaning of the terms used in such constitutions. Here the Supreme Court is such tribunal, and when it has determined the proper construction of any particular clause of the constitution, such construction becomes the supreme law of the land, binding alike upon every citizen, every officer and every department of the state government, until it is reversed or altered by proper authority—that is, by a subsequent decision of the same tribunal, or by the Supreme Court of the United States in any of those cases which fall within the jurisdiction of that court. But even were we now to overrule the decision in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, that could not affect the result in the cases now before the court. That decision was rendered August 27th, 1873, and at the very next session of the general assembly the act was passed under which the bonds were issued which are now called in question. These parties, therefore, must be regarded as having acted upon the faith of the law as it was then authoritatively declared to be, and their rights cannot be affected by any subsequent change in the law, whether such change be effected by statute or judicial decision. Such, at least, is declared to be the law by the Supreme Court of the United States, which, as we have seen, claims and exercises the right finally to decide such questions as we are now considering.

*282

The rule, as stated by Taney, C. J. in Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company v. Debolt, 16 How. 432 [14 L. Ed. 997], is as follows: "The sound and true rule is that if the contract, when made, was valid by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all the departments of its government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent act of the legislature or decision of its courts altering the construction of the law." This rule was recognized and affirmed in the same terms in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 206 [17 L. Ed. 520], and to it was added the following language: "The same principle applies where there is a change of judicial decision as to the constitutional power of the legislature to enact the law. To this rule, *thus enlarged, we adhere. It is the law of this court. It rests upon the plainest principles of justice. To hold otherwise would be as unjust as to hold that rights acquired under a statute may be lost by its repeal." This rule was again affirmed in the case of Lee County v. Rogers, 7 Wall. 181 [19 L. Ed. 160], and the question was there said to be not open for re-examination in the Supreme Court of the United States. It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that even were we now to overrule the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, it could not help the case of the state, in view of the rule thus firmly established, whether correctly or not we are not called upon to say, by the tribunal of last resort.

*283

It is argued, however, that the decision in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General is confined to the five bonds there considered, none of which are under consideration here. This, we think, is an entire misconception of the effect of that decision. What is said in that case in regard to confining the remedy there applied for to the particular bonds mentioned in the pleadings, manifestly was not intended to have, and could not have, the effect of confining the operation of the decision of the various constitutional questions there discussed to the five bonds there in issue. A court of justice, when called upon to administer a remedy under a statute which is alleged to be unconstitutional, must first determine whether the statute is liable to the objection urged against it, and, having determined that question, it then proceeds to inquire whether the parties in the case have shown themselves entitled to such remedy. The two inquiries are entirely distinct and separate. Whether the objection urged against the constitutionality of the act is well founded is one thing, and whether the parties in the particular case have shown themselves entitled to the remedy which the act purports to give rise to is quite another thing. The decision of the one question was an authoritative construction of a particular clause of the constitution, which necessarily affects every one, while the decision of the other question could only affect the parties then before the court. The decision of the various constitutional questions raised in the case must necessarily be conclusive whenever the same questions arise in any other case, though the ap*plication of the remedy claimed as following from such decision must be confined to the particular parties who had shown themselves entitled to such remedy.

*284

3. The next ground upon which this act is claimed to be unconstitutional is that bills receivable are bills of credit, and are, therefore, within the prohibition contained in Article I., Section 10, of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no state shall * * * emit bills of credit." Whether bills receivable are bills of credit within the meaning of that clause of the constitution of the United States it is not important for us now to consider, inasmuch as such a question is, in our judgment, wholly immaterial to the inquiry in which we are engaged. It will be observed that the prohibition is against the issue of such bills—not against their payment. If, therefore, these bills are of the character claimed for them, it may be that they would be invalid and worthless as legal obligations in the hands of those who happened to hold them, and that if the question were whether the payment of such bills could be enforced, or whether the officers of the state should be restrained from issuing them, the position taken by the attorney-general would be entitled to great consideration. Such, however, is not the question. It is not, and cannot be, denied that these bills were issued by the proper officers of the state, under an act of the general assembly purporting to confer authority for so doing, and that the state received full value for them. When the state government was reorganized in 1868, they found these bills outstanding, and, even though it should be admitted that they were unconstitutional in form, they nevertheless represented valid and bona fide indebtedness of the state. If the state saw fit, voluntarily, to recognize such indebtedness, even though it stood in a form which affected its legal obligation, and provided for paying it or funding it in a form to which there could be no constitutional objection, we cannot conceive how such an act on the part of the state, in conformity, as it was, to the plainest dictates of common honesty, can be regarded as in violation of the constitution of the United States. So far from emitting or issuing paper supposed to be within the prohibition of that constitution, the state, on the contrary, made provision for the withdrawal of such *paper from circulation, and replacing it with other evidences of indebtedness in a form which would not be amenable to such constitutional objection.

*285

4. The next ground of objection is, that the act in question was not passed by the requisite constitutional majority, by which is meant that the journal of the senate does not show a vote of two-thirds of all of the members in favor of the passage of the act, but only shows a vote of two-thirds of those voting—a quorum of that body. This objection is also disposed of by the decision in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, and it is not necessary to repeat here what we have already said in regard to the effect of that decision. Inasmuch, however, as this seems to be one of the principal grounds of objection to that decision, we may add that it is not without the support of very high authority upon this point. See County of Cass v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 360 [24 L. Ed. 416].

The next act, the constitutionality of which is called in question, is "An act to authorize a state loan to pay interest on the public debt," ratified August 26th, 1868. 14 Stat. 18. This act is assailed upon the first and second grounds upon which the foregoing act was attacked, and it is not deemed necessary to add anything to what we have said above, except to say that while current interest upon the public debt may properly fall within the class of "ordinary" expenses, yet the interest provided for in this act not being the current interest, it cannot be placed in that class, and must, therefore, fall into the class of "extraordinary expenditures;" for it will be remembered that while provision has been made by the act of September 21st, 1866, (13 Stat. 391), as supplemented by the act of December 20th, 1866, (13 Stat. 421), for funding the interest on the public debt up to July 1st, 1867, there would be no provision for the interest which accrued from July 1st, 1867, to November 1st, 1868, the beginning of the first fiscal year of the government as then reorganized, unless the act which we are now considering be regarded as intended to provide for such interest. It is a mistake to suppose that provision was made by taxation for such interest by the appropriation act of March 23d, 1869, (14 Stat. 237), for that act was expressly declared to be an act to make appropriations for the *year commencing in October, 1868, and hence no appropriation made by that act could be regarded as made for the payment of interest accrued prior to October, 1868. Then, too, the very language used in Section 7 of that act —"For the payment of the interest on the public debt, accrued since the same was last funded, five hundred thousand dollars"—shows that such appropriation was not designed to pay interest accrued prior to October, 1868. The interest was first funded—by the acts of 1866, above cited—up to July 1st, 1867; then the interest which accrued between July 1st, 1867, and November 1st, 1868, the commencement of the first fiscal year of the reorganized state government, was provided for by the act now under consideration, and must be regarded as the last funding of interest; and the interest for the year commencing in October, 1868, is provided for by the appropriation act of March 23d, 1869, above cited; while, by the act of March 1st, 1870, (14 Stat. 382), an appropriation is made to pay the interest on the public debt for the year commencing November 1st, 1869; and so on, from year to year, as long as the general assembly saw fit to provide for the payment of interest on the public debt. Nor can any argument be drawn from the fact that the amount authorized to be raised by the act now under consideration largely exceeded the estimate presented by the comptroller-general at the beginning of the regular session of 1868–9, of the amount of interest due on the first of October, 1868, for that was only an estimate, and it might very well have been supposed that such estimate, made so soon after the reorganization of the state government by an officer who had had no previous acquaintance with the operations of the government which had been superseded, would not prove to be correct, and hence the act under consideration might very well give authority to the governor to borrow a sum not exceeding $1,000,000, especially when such authority was qualified by the words, "or so much thereof as he may deem necessary." And it must be remembered that such estimate did not include the interest for the month of October, nor did it include any interest upon such additions to the public debt as had been authorized by acts passed at the preceding extra session.

*286

The next act which we propose to consider is, "An act to close *the operations of the Bank of the State," ratified September 15th, 1868. 14 Stat. 21. The counsel for the state discuss this act as if the bonds issued under its authority created a new debt on the part of the state, and, therefore, contend that its constitutionality must be tested by the provisions of Section 7, Article IX., of the constitution, for they urge the same objections as were urged against the foregoing acts. But the act now in question does not purport to create any new debt. It does not even authorize the borrowing of money to pay an old debt. It simply authorizes the funding of certain obligations for which the state was liable, then outstanding, in the shape of bills of the bank, in the bonds authorized by the act. In other words, instead of authorizing the issue of bonds to raise money to pay outstanding debts, it simply authorizes the change of the form of such indebtedness from bank bills to bonds, and its constitutionality must be tested by the provisions of Section 10, rather than Section 7, of Article IX. of the constitution. Such objections cannot, therefore, be sustained. Another ground of objection, however, is that these bills were not "stock, bonds or other evidences of indebtedness of the state, issued by it," and the act is, for that reason, in violation of the provisions of Section 10, Article IX., of the constitution. It is quite true that these bank bills were not either stocks or bonds of the state, but we are at a loss to conceive how any one can deny, in view of the provisions of the bank charter, that such bills were "evidences of indebtedness," which, though not previously issued directly by the state, were issued by a corporation created by the state, in which it was the sole stockholder, under express authority from the state, for the sole benefit of the state. For the charter expressly provided that "the faith of the state is hereby pledged for the support of the said bank, and to supply any deficiency in the funds specially pledged, and to make good all losses arising from such deficiency." 8 Stat. 24. Of course, it must be remembered that the liability of the state for these bills was incurred under a constitution which did not impose the same limitations upon the power of the general assembly to contract debts as are contained in the constitution of 1868, and the state having, under the previous constitution, incurred a liability, evidenced by these bank bills, *issued by its authority, we see no reason why the present state government, under the present constitution, may not change the form of such liability by converting these "evidences of indebtness" in the shape of bank bills into bonds.

*287

*288

The next act to be considered is "An act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury," approved February 17th, 1869. 14 Stat. 182. This act we regard as liable to two constitutional objections: 1st. It purports to create a debt which was not "for the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures;" and, 2d. The debt therein sought to be created is not "for some single object," and such object is not "distinctly specified therein," and it is, therefore, in violation of two of the clauses of Section 7, Article IX., of the constitution. As we have already seen, provision had previously been made for the redemption of the bills receivable and for the payment of the interest on the public debt then in arrear, and we are not aware of any other expenditures which the general assembly were then called upon to provide for which could properly be classed amongst "extraordinary expenditures," and none such have been suggested to us. The most natural inference is that the object of this act was to raise money to meet the current demands upon the treasury, in anticipation of the collection of the taxes levied for that purpose, and such demands, as we have seen, fall into the class of ordinary expenses, and cannot, therefore, be regarded as "extraordinary expenditures." Again, the debt which this act purports to authorize cannot be said to be "for some single object," nor is such object "distinctly specified therein." Money borrowed "for the relief of the treasury" might and would be applied to as many different objects as there were demands upon the treasury. We think, therefore, that this act clearly violates both clauses of the constitution above referred to, and, upon the principles heretofore announced in this opinion, every bond, together with its coupons, issued under the authority of this act is absolutely void even in the hands of a bona fide holder because issued without any authority whatever, and hence every consolidation bond resting upon such bonds or coupons is, to the extent that it does rest upon such bonds or coupons, not a valid debt of the State of South Carolina.

*289

*The next act which we propose to consider is "An act to provide for the appointment of a land commissioner and to define his powers and duties," approved March 27th, 1869, (14 Stat. 275,) and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 1st, 1870, (14 Stat. 385.) The constitutionality of these acts is assailed: 1. Upon the ground that they relate to more than one subject and such subjects are not expressed in their titles, and they are, therefore, in violation of Section 20, Article II., of the constitution. This objection has already been disposed of by the decision in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, to which may be added the case of San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 312 [24 L. Ed. 816], in which the Supreme Court of the United States put the same construction upon a similar clause in the constitution of the State of Texas. 2. Upon the ground that these acts were not passed by the requisite constitutional majority—that is, by the vote of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the general assembly—but only by the vote of two-thirds of the members voting, being a quorum. This ground has been already considered and disposed of. 3. Another objection, however, is that it does not appear that the vote upon the passage of the first of these two acts now under consideration was entered upon the journal of the house of representatives as is required by Section 7, Article IX., of the constitution, which, in speaking of acts authorizing the contracting of public debts, provides that "no such law shall take effect until it shall have been passed by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each branch of the general assembly, to be recorded, by yeas and nays, on the journals of each house respectively." This provision, it will be observed, is more stringent than that contained in Section 21, Article II., providing that "no bill shall have the force of law until it shall have been read three times, and on three several days, in each house." In the former, the constitution expressly requires, not only that such law shall be passed by a vote of two-thirds of the members, but also that such vote shall "be recorded, by yeas and nays, on the journals of each house," while in the latter the requirement simply is that the bill shall be read three times, and there is no requirement that the fact that it has been so read shall be recorded on the journal. Hence, while it would be entirely *legitimate to infer that an act which has the great seal of the state affixed to it has been signed by the presiding officers of the two houses, approved by the governor, or, in the absence of such approval, certified to by the secretary of state as having become a law by reason of the failure of the governor to return it within the time required by the constitution, deposited in the archives of the state and published among the laws, under the superintendence of the secretary of state, is a valid law, even though the journals may not affirmatively show that the act was read three times, as we have decided in the case of City Council of Charleston v. Grand Lodge of A. F. M., and as has been decided by the Supreme Court of Illinois under a similar clause in the constitution of that state (Supervisors of Schuyler County v. People, 25 Ill. 181,) yet when the constitution expressly requires that the vote upon the passage of a bill shall be entered upon the journal, and the journal does not contain such entry, there is no room for inference, but there is positive proof of the omission of one of the constitutional requirements, and, in such a case, the bill would fail to become a law. Town of South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260 [24 L. Ed. 154], in which the Illinois cases are collected, and from them it will appear that the Supreme Court of that state draws the same distinction that we have done. If, therefore, the objection which we are now considering be well founded in fact, it is well taken. It appears to us, however, from an inspection of the journal of the house of representatives, that there is no foundation in fact for the objection. It is quite true that on page 425 of house journal for the sessions of 1868–69, it does not appear that the vote on the third reading of the original bill was taken by yeas and nays, or that such vote was recorded by yeas and nays on the journal; but it is very obvious that this was not the vote upon the bill as it finally passed, for an inspection of the senate journal for the same session, pages 521–526, will show that the bill which came from the house was entirely remodeled, and the house journal, pages 630–632, shows that the bill, as thus remodeled, was finally passed by a two-thirds vote—yeas 50, nays 15—and that such vote was recorded by yeas and nays on the journal of the house. This we regard as a substantial compliance with the provisions of the constitution, more so, in *fact, than if the journal simply showed the passage of the bill as it originally went from the house by a two-thirds vote and did not show such a vote upon the final passage of the bill after it was amended in the senate, for the vote on the bill as it went from the house would not show the assent of the requisite two-thirds of that body to the provisions which eventually became the law, while the vote upon the bill after it was amended in the senate did show such assent, and this is the real object of that clause of the constitution. It seems to have been the practice of the house of representatives at the time these acts were passed, contrary to what had been previously the practice, to read bills originating in the house three times before they were sent to the senate, whereas under the former practice after a bill had received two readings in the house it was sent to the senate for its consideration, and, if amended in that body, such amendments could be considered when the bill came back to the house for its third reading. But under the other practice, where a bill has been so materially altered in the senate as the one now under consideration seems to have been, it would practically defeat the very object of the constitutional provision now under consideration to hold that a two-thirds vote on the bill, as it went from the house after its third reading there, would satisfy the requirements of such provision. For it might frequently happen, just as it did happen in reference to the very act we are discussing, that its features might be very materially changed in the senate and totally new provisions inserted, which might be passed by a bare majority of a quorum in the house, and the various provisions of the act would not in fact have what this provision of the constitution was intended to secure—the assent of two-thirds of both branches of the general assembly to all the various provisions of the act; so that when the journals show, as they do in reference to the act under consideration, that the bill, as amended, received the assent of the requisite two-thirds of both branches of the general assembly, we think the constitutional requirement was fully complied with.

*290

*291

As to the "Act to provide for the conversion of the state securities," approved March 23d, 1869, (14 Stat. 241,) it not being an act to authorize the borrowing of money or the contracting of *any new debt, but simply providing for a change in the form of that then existing, the question of the validity of the bonds issued under it must be determined by an inquiry into the validity of the securities therein authorized to be converted. So that any bond issued under this act, which was not issued in exchange for some then-existing valid debt of the state, in the form of stocks or bonds, was issued "without any authority of law," and is, therefore, absolutely void, even in the hands of a bona fide holder.

*292

The "Act to authorize the financial agent of the State of South Carolina to pledge state bonds as collateral security, and for other purposes," approved March 26th, 1869, (14 Stat. 258,) will next be considered. It is not pretended that the object of this act was to authorize the issue of any bonds or the contracting of any additional debt, for its sole purpose seems to have been to authorize the financial agent to dispose of the bonds, the issue of which had been previously or should be thereafter authorized, in a particular way. This act, therefore, did not come within the provisions of Article IX., Section 7, of the constitution, and the fact that it was not passed by a two-thirds vote cannot affect its validity. In Article IX., Section 14, the constitution prescribes that "Any debt contracted by the state shall be by loan on state bonds," but how such loans are to be effected is left to the discretion of the general assembly. Whether they shall be by a sale of the bonds, (the most questionable mode, if the words above quoted be given a rigid literal interpretation,) by direct borrowing, as in case of one individual borrowing from his neighbor a thousand dollars, and giving his bond directly to the lender for the amount, (a mode so inconvenient in case of a state as to be almost impracticable,) or by a deposit of the bonds as collateral security for such sums as may from time to time be advanced to the state, as its necessities require, are all matters which are left for the general assembly to determine. We do not see, therefore, how the act now under consideration can be regarded as in conflict with any provision of the constitution.

The last objection which is urged against all the bonds issued under the several acts which we have been considering is, that they were not registered in conformity to the provisions of Sec*tion 14 of Article IX. of the constitution. The language of that section is as follows: "Any debt created by the state shall be by loan on state bonds of amounts not less than fifty dollars each, on interest, payable within twenty years after the final passage of the law authorizing such debt. A correct registry of all such bonds shall be kept by the treasurer, in numerical order, so as always to exhibit the number and amount unpaid, and to whom severally payable." It is very manifest that this provision in regard to the registry of the bonds is a mere direction to the treasurer, and was not designed to be a condition precedent, the performance of which should be necessary to the validity of the bonds. It does not provide that before any bond is issued it shall be registered by the treasurer, but it is clear that the registration is to follow, not precede, the issue of the bonds, and could not, therefore, affect their validity. No other construction is consistent with the language used, for it will be observed that the treasurer is not only required to keep such registry, but he is to keep it "so as always to exhibit the number and amount unpaid." Now, as the mode of keeping the registry must be regarded as quite as imperative as the direction to keep it, it must be manifest that it never was designed that this provision of the constitution should be regarded as essential to the validity of the bonds, for in order to keep such registry "so as always to exhibit the number and amount unpaid," it would, of course, be necessary for the treasurer to make alterations in the registry, from time to time, as one or more of the bonds were paid; and surely it would not be pretended that the failure of that officer to keep the registry in such mode, by making such alterations as from time to time became necessary, would invalidate bonds which otherwise would have been good. The constitution was never designed to afford the means of setting a trap for the holders of the bonds of the state by making their rights dependent upon the performance or non-performance of duty by one of the officers of the state after the bonds had been issued.

*293

Our conclusions, therefore, are:

1. That all the bonds issued under an act entitled "An act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same," are valid obligations of the State of South *Carolina, except as follows: 1st. Such as were issued in exchange for bonds issued under the act entitled "An act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury," or for the coupons of such bonds. 2d. Such as were issued in exchange for the second issue of bonds under an act entitled "An act to authorize a state loan to pay interest on the public debt," or the coupons of such bonds. 3d. Such as were issued in exchange for those conversion bonds which were issued in exchange for either of the two classes of bonds last mentioned, viz., bonds for relief of the treasury and the second issue of bonds to pay interest on the public debt, or in exchange for the coupons of such conversion bonds.

*294

2. If any consolidation bond rests wholly upon any of the three objectionable classes of bonds or coupons just mentioned, then it is wholly void; but if it rests only in part upon such objectionable bonds and coupons, then it is only void to the extent which it does rest upon such objectionable bonds or coupons, and for the balance it is a valid obligation of the state.

3. That the burden of proof is upon the state to show that any particular bond which may be brought into question does rest either in whole or in part upon such objectionable bonds or coupons, and if in part only, then the state must show what part is so affected.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is set aside, and the cases are remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary under the principles herein announced.

WILLARD, C. J. It will be unnecessary to add anything to what has been already said, in the opinion of the court, as to those matters in respect to which there is entire unanimity in the court. I shall confine myself to noticing the leading points, as to which some difference of opinion has arisen in the court.

The first question that will be considered is, whether constitutional authority existed for the issuing of the class of bonds that have been termed the second issue of bonds to pay interest on the public debt. The history of the transaction in question is briefly as follows: An act was passed August 26th, 1868, entitled "An act to authorize a state loan to pay interest on the public debt," *authorizing the governor "to borrow, on the credit of the State of South Carolina, on coupon bonds, within twelve months after the passage of this act, a sum not exceeding $1,000,000, or as much thereof as he may deem necessary to pay interest on the public debt." It appears in evidence that bonds to the nominal amount of $1,000,000 were issued and sold under the authority of this act. It also appears that after such bonds had been so issued, and, as we must assume from the evidence, had become the property of private individuals, it was urged upon the financial board, which consisted of the governor, the attorney-general and the state treasurer, that the bonds would be more salable if in a form that would not make it appear that they were intended for the payment of interest on the public debt. The financial board thereupon assumed authority to retire the outstanding issue by replacing it with bonds prepared under the same act, and bearing the same date as the bonds which had already been issued thereunder, but omitting from their face the objectionable statement that was supposed to prejudice their marketable quality. It appears also that bonds so issued for the sole purpose of replacing such previous issue were sold for original bonds, and were not, in fact, used for the purpose of replacing previous issues. The question is, whether sufficient authority existed in the financial board to create bonds of the class just named that in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, would constitute a valid obligation of the state.

*295

The first question is one of fact, namely, what was the nature of the authority that the financial board thus attempted to exercise? This must be disposed of upon the evidence in the case. It is very clear that what the financial board assumed to do, and all it assumed to do, was to change in point of form as to an immaterial matter, so far as it affected the liability of the state, outstanding obligations of the state. It is not pretended that the board intended to create one dollar of new debt. There is not the slightest evidence that the governor, who was a member of the board intended or had in contemplation as a consequence of the transaction to add to the sum that had already been borrowed under the act already mentioned, a single dollar to be applied according to the purposes of that act, namely,

*296

"to pay interest *on the public debt." The sole object of the transaction, as we are bound from the evidence before us to conclude, was to make an immaterial change in the form of securities evidencing outstanding obligations of the state.

It is not competent to argue that because the action of the board appears to have resulted in the creation of new debt, that that circumstance stamps the nature of the authority attempted to be exercised. In the first place, we are bound from the evidence to assume that there was a distinct abuse of the authority attempted to be vested in him, on the part of the financial agent, who, instead of issuing the new bonds for the exclusive purpose of retiring the first issue, as to part of them at least, used them for the purpose of creating a new debt. We have no right as matter of legal conclusion, in the absence of evidence supporting such a conclusion, to hold that the board intended the wrong accomplished by the abuse of its authority. But even if it had been made to appear that the board intended that the retirement of the old issue should be accomplished by the sale of the new issue in open market, and the application of the proceeds of the sale to retiring the old bonds, that would leave the nature of the authority attempted to be exercised by the board entirely unchanged. It would still be, in its nature and essence, an attempt to change, as to matter of form, only an old obligation. It may be argued that such a method of effecting the change would not be a fair exercise of the power of conversion; that is quite a different question, that need not be passed on here. A power does not change its nature merely because it is abusively exercised. We are here drawing a distinction between two very different classes of powers, both of which are recognized by the constitution, but differ from each other most materially, both as it regards the sanctions necessary to give validity to the exercise of such powers, the mode of their exercise, and the effect of their exercise, both upon the state and third parties dealing with the state. It is of the greatest importance that this distinction should be clearly discerned and held in mind. To possess and exercise authority to bind the state by the terms of an obligation newly created, implies a delegation of authority of a very high order, and generally esteemed of so much importance and delicacy as to *receive the special attention of the framers of the fundamental law, and to be guarded with very careful constitutional restrictions, while to effect a change in the form by which an obligation is evidenced that does not touch its nature or extent, is, when authorized, a mere act of administrative detail.

*297

Let us trace these distinctions into the constitution. Section 7, Article IX., provides as follows: "For the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures the state may contract public debts, but such debts shall be authorized by law for some single object, to be distinctly specified therein, and no such law shall take effect until it shall have been passed by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each branch of the general assembly, to be recorded by yeas and nays in the journal of each house, respectively, and every such law shall levy a tax annually sufficient to pay the annual interest of such debt."

Here is a distinct negation to the state of power under the constitution to create public debts, except where that power is exercised for particular purposes and in a particular way, and it is of course a negation of the authority of any agent of the state to create such debts in a manner inconsistent with the provisions of the constitution.

Section 10 of Article IX. deals with the powers of evidencing existing obligations, including that of changing the forms of such evidence. It provides that no scrip, certificate or other evidence of real indebtedness shall be issued except for the redemption of stocks, bonds or other evidences of debt previously issued, or for such debts as are expressly authorized in the constitution.

In these provisions we have distinctly recognized the two classes of powers—the one capable by rightful exercise of bringing into existence a new specific obligation of the state, and the other of certifying in form a debt already existing. It is perfectly clear that the authority which the board attempted to exercise in the present case is that regulated by Section 10, and not that treated of in Section 7.

Our attention has not been called to any act authorizing the financial board, or the officers composing that board, individually, to issue any bond, certificate or evidence of debt by way of changing the evidence of any antecedent debt of the state. After *a careful examination of the acts I am unable to find any evidence that the governor, attorney-general and the treasurer possessed legal authority to exercise any such power, or even to act as a board under the name of the "financial board." The only authority conferred upon them, so far as I am able to find, is contained in certain sections of acts authorizing the borrowing of money for particular objects. These powers relate exclusively to the particular cases in reference to which they were given. 14 Stat. 17, 18, 182. The only power conferred as it regards the loan for paying interest on the public debt is contained in the fifth section of that act, and is as follows, (14 Stat. 18): "That the bonds authorized by this act shall be sold at the highest market price, and for not less than a sum to be fixed by the governor, attorney-general and the treasurer, who are hereby authorized to appoint, under a commission signed by them, some responsible bank or banker in the city of New York, to be subject to their direction and control, and they are further authorized to pay such sums of money as may be necessary to effect the purposes of this act out of any funds of the state not otherwise appropriated." This power is not in the least analogous to that attempted to be exercised and cannot include it.

*298

The only power at all analogous to that in question was conferred in the particular case of the issue of bonds to redeem the bills receivable of the state and was confined to that object. That act (14 Stat. 17, § 5,) provides "that the bonds authorized by this act shall be sold at the highest market price by the financial agent of the state in the city of New York, and not less than for a sum to be fixed by the governor, attorney-general and treasurer, who shall fix the time of redemption and redeem said bills receivable at the office of the state treasurer, and they are further authorized to pay such sums of money as may be necessary to effect the purposes of this act out of any funds of the state not otherwise appropriated." The powers here conferred on the persons who claimed to constitute the board are confined to the retirement of the bills receivable, and, being thus specially delegated, instead of supporting, contradicts the assumption that they had general powers of that nature, while the fact that no such power was conferred as it regards the class of bonds in *question shows that it was not intended to be granted to be exercised in any form. Such powers as are claimed here nowhere appear granted either expressly or as incidents to other powers granted.

*299

It will not be seriously contended that the governor, attorney-general and treasurer could, either singly or unitedly, assume to change the form of an outstanding obligation of the state, in any respect, without the authority of the legislature therefor. It is apparent that the legislature, whose authority they claimed to exercise, took the same view of this question as that just expressed, for that body passed an act entitled "An act to provide for the conversion of state securities," March 23d, 1869, (14 Stat. 241,) which covered the exercise of the very power in question, namely, that of changing the form of existing obligations. This act allows bonds to be changed into stock and stock into bonds, but does not authorize any other change to be made in any evidence of indebtedness, and altogether ignores the existence of any authority of that description in the hands of the financial board or the officers composing it, though two of them, the governor and the treasurer, have duties to perform under this act.

It must be concluded that the governor, the attorney-general and the treasurer had no such authority, collectively or individually, as would enable them or either of them to put out an obligation for the redemption of an antecedent debt or obligation of this state, or in any way to change the form in which any such debt may be evidenced.

It is necessary to notice a view that has been strenuously urged, namely, that the action of the financial board must be referred to authority contained in the act under which the bonds in question purport to be issued, communicated to the governor, to issue as many bonds as he should at any time judge necessary, for the purpose of borrowing money sufficient to pay the interest on the public debt, provided he did not overstep the limit of the amount to be borrowed, namely, $1,000,000. This proposition has already been answered in part. It is clear that if the governor had such authority he has not attempted to exercise it. It assumes that the governor found that the proceeds of $1,000,000 of bonds was not sufficient to pay the outstanding interest on the *public debt. There is not a particle of evidence that the governor ever arrived at any such conclusion or attempted to act upon it; on the contrary, the evidence shows that the governor was satisfied with the amount issued, and did not intend to give any authority to increase the sum to be borrowed beyond what was intended by the first issue. He attempted to change, in certain respects, the form of the security taken, but did not purpose to borrow more money. This completely disposes of the argument. But, it is apparent, the governor had no such authority.

*300

It is not necessary to contend that after the governor had once made up his mind that a certain sum was necessary he could not afterwards increase that sum; but the proposition that disposes of the question is, that after he had fixed the whole amount to be raised and had actually issued it, the whole intention of the act was carried out, and the authority it conferred spent. All the act contemplated was that the governor should exercise a certain authority, based on his own judgment, of the extent to which that authority should go within a certain general limit. After he had exercised his discretion, and had performed the act intended to be based upon it, what remained to accomplish the full purpose of the act? Possibly if an act conferring authority on a public officer, intended to meet the case of making provision against future contingencies, should be brought in question, its purposes, when rightly understood, might give rise to the conclusion that it was intended as a continuing power. But here the matter to be ascertained by the governor was such as a sum in arithmetic would solve, and no ground is afforded by enlarging the sense of the words used by holding that it was intended that the governor should have a continuing open judgment in the matter.

It is said that the amount that the bonds would bring on public sale was uncertain, and, therefore, the governor could not know until the sale was over how much money would be derived from the proceeds for the payment of interest. But the governor knew how much money had been realized when the further sale was stopped. The completion and termination of the issue, in view of the fact that in his judgment enough money had been raised for the purpose, was an exhaustive exercise of his power *under the act. Had the issue been based on the actual amount needed, it would have been otherwise; but being based on the judgment of the governor as to what was needed, his final conclusion and action under it was a complete satisfaction of the purpose of the statute. The act contains no expression to signify that the act of borrowing or of issuing the bonds should be a continuous act, such as the phrase "from time to time," but authorizes what is described as a single act to be performed.

*301

It is clear that parties having no legislative authority so to do have put in circulation evidences of indebtedness on the part of the state, and the holders of these evidences claim that they cannot be questioned as to their legal validity. A clearer case of the abuse of public authority cannot be stated, nor one that defies more openly all the safeguards placed by the constitution around the creation of public debts.

The next question to be considered is as to the validity of the bonds issued under the act entitled "An act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury," passed February 17th, 1869, (14 Stat. 182.) It is objected to these bonds that the object of borrowing is not sanctioned by the provisions of the constitution on that subject. Article IX., Section 7, is the one that alone afforded authority for the passage of the act. That section provides as follows: "For the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures, the state may contract public debts; but such debts shall be authorized by law for some single object, to be distinctly specified therein." The remaining provisions relate to the requirements for the purpose of giving validity to such an act, and are not in question here.

In the first place, this section must be regarded as a limitation of the power of the legislature to authorize the creation of debt by borrowing, of such a nature as to render any attempt to communicate authority for that purpose inconsistent with its provisions, abortive and inefficacious. Unless this section is powerless, this is its intended function. The use of prohibitory language is not indispensable in a provision of law in order to have that effect. When power is granted for the purpose of bringing into existence specific rights, the mode in which that power is required to be exercised is material to the creation of such rights, and the *provisions are mandatory. State, ex rel. Attorney-General, v. City of Columbia.†† This principle depends on the nature of the powers granted, and is equally applicable to the construction of statutory and constitutional provisions. It follows that the legislature could only validly authorize the creation of public debt when the object was "defraying extraordinary expenditures."

*302

What are, then, to be regarded as extraordinary expenditures? If the verbal force of the expressions employed by the constitution was entitled to be solely considered, we should have to conclude from the third section of Article IX. that "extraordinary expenditures" were such as did not, in their nature, constitute the ordinary and current annual expenses of the state. It may be conceded that this view is included in the true construction of the language employed; but before all that may be embraced in the term "extraordnary expenditures" can be ascertained, a larger and vital principle of construction must be employed—one that is universally recognized among the canons of constitutional construction.

The necessities of a state may render the power of borrowing money indispensable even as to current expenditures, although, as an ordinary rule, the current expenses should be regulated from current income. War, domestic insurrection, pestilence and famine may be instanced as capable of giving rise to such an exigency as would warrant a departure from the safe, general rule of meeting current expenditures with current income. A constitution of government that cannot adjust itself to calamitous circumstances is of no practical value—as worthless as a man that cannot meet disease, or a ship that cannot endure a storm. No principle of construction that has the tendency to divest a constitution of government of the elasticity demanded for the reasonably-anticipated exigencies in human affairs, has the support of either principle or recognized authority. It must, therefore, be concluded that it is not impossible that what would generally be regarded as a current and ordinary expenditure may assume the character of an extraordinary expenditure under the *influence of circumstances affecting the ability of the state to maintain itself.

303

Giving, then, to the act in question the benefit of this large and liberal construction, the question arises whether the act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury can be regarded as passed with a view to meet extraordinary expenditures.

†† See post case No. 762 [State ex rel. Cathcart v. City of Columbia, 12 S. C. 370.]

The contents of the act do not assist in making its object any clearer than it is made by the statement in the title of the act. We must, then, inquire whether funds in relief of the treasury can be regarded as funds devoted to extraordinary expenditures. Clearly they cannot. The act would have undergone no material change in principle had its title been "to provide the means of meeting all demands upon the treasury." Such a title would include ordinary as well as extraordinary expenditures. As ordinary expenses are sure to arise, and extraordinary ones of merely contingent occurrence, such a title would have to be regarded as an indication of an intent to provide means to pay current and ordinary expenses. Such an act would be inconsistent with the constitution, and necessarily void. Thus, if we read the act as it stands, without the light of concurrent events, the inference to be drawn would be against its validity.

It may be a question whether, in view of the provisions of the constitution, a case for determining the actual intent of the legislature could be made out from the knowledge of circumstances that attended the passage of the act; but it is not necessary to consider this question, for the case affords no circumstances which, if admissible, would tend to correct the inference drawn from the language of the title and the body of the act. It is true the state was emerging from a great and exhaustive war, and was seeking to adjust itself to a new and untried constitution of government, was putting in operation new machinery for collecting and applying income, and was with an empty treasury and burdened with debt, but the legislation contemporaneous with the act in question precludes the inference that any exigency existed that would justify the borrowing of money in aid of the current demands upon the treasury.

An elaborate and carefully prepared act, regulating the assessment and collection of taxes, was passed September 15th, 1868.

*304

*Under this act it became the duty of all persons liable to the payment of taxes to make returns on or before October 20th then next ensuing. Each county auditor was required by Section 66 on or before the third Monday of December, 1868, and on the same day of each year thereafter, to transmit to the state auditor a transcript of the real estate of each township in his county. The taxes levied were to be payable on the first day of March thereafter. Sec. 79. The conclusion must be drawn from this act that all the machinery requisite to the assessment and collection of taxes was in existence at the time the act was passed to borrow money for the relief of the treasury, and nothing necessarily prevented the passage of the necessary supply and appropriation bills at or before that date. A supply and appropriation act was passed March 23d, 1869, a few days over a month after the passage of the act to borrow money for the relief of the treasury. The authority for the disbursement from the treasury of all moneys applicable to the payment of current expenses, is contained in the appropriation act just referred to, and by the inspection of the provisions of that act it appears that the matters included were of the class of ordinary expenses of the government. As we have seen, the proceeds derived under the act for the relief of the treasury were applicable to the payment of the appropriations made by this act, and thus we have clear ground for concluding that the object of the act for the relief of the treasury was to provide the means of paying the current and ordinary expenses of the government for the year 1869, and any deficiency that may have occurred for the fiscal year, or part of the year, of 1868.

The constitution (Article IX., Section 3,) requires "that the general assembly should provide for an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state for each year, and whenever it shall happen that such ordinary expenses of the state for any year shall exceed the income of the state for such year, the general assembly shall provide for levying a tax for the ensuing year sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency of the preceding year, together with the estimated expenses of the ensuing year." Here is a source made compulsory for meeting any deficiencies that might have stood from the *fiscal year 1868, as well as the current expenses of 1869. As such an act appears in the statute book, it must be assumed to be sufficient for the purposes contemplated by the constitution. If it be conceded that, if the passage of such act or its enforcement had been rendered impossible, that money might have been borrowed on the idea that expenses usually to be regarded as "ordinary" had become "extraordinary" under the operation of uncontrollable circumstances, still that would not help the validation of the act in question, for it appears by contemporaneous legislation that no such fact existed.

*305

The question, then, resolves itself to this: Could the general assembly, in any year, create a public debt by borrowing for the purpose of anticipating the taxes or other current revenues of that year? To that question only one answer can be given, and that is that such a case is outside of the power to borrow money, and therefore within its implied inhibition.

It will not be necessary to examine the other objections made to this act, as the view considered is regarded as fatal to the validity of the bonds issued under it.

The next question to be considered is, whether the act entitled "An act to reduce the volume of the public debt, and to provide for the payment of the same," passed December 22d, 1873, (15 Stat. 518), and ordinarily known as the consolidation act, is a legislative contract, binding the state and all parties coming in under it, so as to preclude an inquiry into the validity of the securities issued under its provisions. This question resolves itself into two inquiries. First. Whether it was competent for the legislature, by any act, to impart validity to obligations that were rendered invalid under the constitution. Second. Whether the act in question purports to have any such effect. The first of these questions has been fully considered in the leading opinion in this case and needs no further elucidation. The question involving the character and intent of the act will be noticed.

The first section of the act authorizes the treasurer to receive from the holders of bonds of certain specified classes such bonds, and also certain certificates of stock, and directs that he "shall thereupon, in exchange for and in lieu of such bonds and stocks so surrendered, issue to such holders other coupon bonds and *certificates of stock, as they may desire, equal in amount to fifty per centum of the face value of the bonds or certificates of stock so surrendered." A similar provision is made in Section 2 as it regards coupons from such bonds. Section 3 is as follows: "That the bonds and certificates of stock herein authorized to be issued shall bear upon their face the words 'consolidation bonds,' 'certificates of stocks,' and shall also bear upon their face the declaration that the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal is secured by the levy of an annual tax of two (2) mills upon the dollar upon the entire taxable property of the state, which declaration shall be considered a contract entered into between the state and every holder of said bonds and stocks," &c. It must be conceded at once that wherever the holder of one of the valid obligations of the state surrendered the same, and took in lieu thereof the bonds or certificates of stock provided to be issued under this act, at fifty per cent. upon the face value of the obligation surrendered, this clause became a binding legislative contract, based on an adequate consideration, namely, the surrender and relinquishment of one-half of the amount of such valid security, and, as such, the legislature has no power to dispense with it.

*306

But the proposition here to be considered has regard to the surrender of obligations alleged to be unconstitutional and void. This act must be regarded as assuming the validity of all the bonds of the classes enumerated in it as the basis of the issue of new bonds, but not necessarily as declaring such validity. Had such a declaration been made, and not been left to implication, could it conclusively determine the existence of the fact declared? If so, then it would follow that the act must be considered a conclusive legislative contract as it regards all bonds or certificates of stock issued in exchange for the securities named in the first section, at the rate of reduction therein named. The bearing of this proposition is this: a legislative contract, like any other contract, must be upon consideration; and if the existence of that consideration is validily declared by law, the obligation resting on it must stand.

At this point the proposition is advanced that the legislature cannot make a declaration that would have the effect to preclude *inquiry into the constitutional character of its enactments. The application of the limitations of the constitution to the legislation passed under it is made by the courts, and if the nature of the limitation is such that it can only be tested by the existence of facts outside of the recitals of the acts themselves, the courts are bound to look to the existence of such facts as the ground of applying such constitutional limitations. To say, then, that the legislature may, in such a case, by a declaration, preclude the courts from examining the actual state of the facts, is to affirm that this authority and duty of the courts is not absolute under the constitution, but dependent on the will of the legislature—a proposition manifestly false. The consequence is, that neither an express or implied declaration that an obligation otherwise void is valid, can preclude inquiry into the validity of such obligation where it is alleged as a valid consideration for a legislative promise based upon it.

*307

It is, therefore, necessary to inquire whether there was, in fact, any consideration in the case of a party giving up an invalid bond and taking another of less amount. The proposition answers itself. If the obligation was void nothing was given up, and therefore no consideration exists. As the legislature could not validly declare that to be lawful which the constitution pronounced unlawful, and as the act does not declare the validity of all the bonds, for which provision is made in express terms, whatever declaration is read in the act on that subject must be the result of implication, and as the rules of implication are based on the primary idea that that sense which is agreeable to law must be preferred, the most that can be concluded from the act is that it assumed the validity of the unenumerated bonds provided for. This assumption being disputable under the constitution, it placed the holder of the bond in the position of taking the chances of the correctness of the assumption in his favor, but gave him no higher assurance nor ground of certainty. When it is asserted that this legislative assumption gave the holder of a bond a presumptively good title, all the efficacy has been allowed to the statute as affecting him that can be allowed consistently with the constitution, or that construction of the intent of the statute which results from viewing it in the light in *which the constitution has placed it. That presumption is repelled the moment it appears by sufficient evidence that the obligation was, in fact, unconstitutional and void. This principle of construction was applied in Neely v. McFadden, 2 S. C. 169.

*308

An attempt is made to meet the force of this argument by treating the consolidation act as a composition between a debtor and his creditors. It is claimed that the creditors of the state are to be regarded as parties to each transaction with any bondholder of the class provided for. In this way an attempt is made to make out a consideration in favor of A, arising from the fact that B took a less amount than was due to him. The answer to this is that the act exhibits no such character, either in form or substance. As it regards the force of the provisions made, they are, professedly, with each individual holder of a bond, coupon or certificate of stock alone. The test of this is the fact that had but a single person accepted the benefits of the act and complied with its provisions, there is no clause or condition that could have interfered with its entire efficacy as affecting him. It was not made a necessary feature of the scheme that all or any particular part of the persons for whose benefit it was intended should come in under it. Such being the case, it was competent, so far as the form of the transaction is concerned, that it should operate wholly with particular individuals, and should not depend for its validity on its acceptance by any number or class of individuals. If, then, it can, consistently with the language and terms employed, have such operation and effect, it ought to receive that construction, if it be found equally consistent with the spirit and fundamental intention of the act. This brings us to consider what was the true character of the transaction in its substance.

Conceding that if it be found that the act could not operate efficiently according to its intention, except by construing it as intending a compact among all who came in under it of such a nature that its considerations and obligations are mutual, as among all such parties—that in that case it might assume the character contended for—what is there to lead to any such conclusion? And here we may affirm that that is an unnecessary *construction, not called for by the necessities of the case, having only one argument, and that an unsound one, in its favor, namely, that it enables the parties to effect a successful evasion of the constitution and defeat its provisions. In itself, that argument should be ground for avoiding the conclusion to which it points. There is no other argument that has been, and it may confidently be asserted that none can be, adduced to support the view thus contended for. If, for instance, the act had been so framed that it could not take effect until all of a certain class or number came in, this then would be ground to contend that inducements would be offered by those anxious to come in to those opposed to or indifferent to that course to bring about that result, and in that case mutual consideration as among those thus coming in might be supposed. That, however, is not the case. Then, again, if the state had set apart a certain fund or sum of money to be divided up among all who should come in, the distribution of that fund to be at the disposal of the parties coming in, then mutual obligations and considerations among the parties coming by mutual consent upon such fund would be naturally and reasonably assumed; but the transaction did not have that character. The fact that the state offered to pay a sum less than the amount due on such debt does not alter the case, for such a tender could as well be made to A, B and C individually as collectively. It cannot be shown that anything was given up by a creditor that was intended to enure to the benefit of any other; on the contrary, all were treated alike, the same rate of reduction being applied to all, whether their demands were large or small. There is a total failure in the case to show any reason drawn from the nature of the transaction, and the terms and intention of the act to change that simple character that stands out on the face of the act into the more complex and cumbersome one contended for. This conclusion rests upon the simple proposition that one who parted with a good obligation gave a valid consideration to support the legislative contract imported by the terms of the act, while one who gave up a void and worthless bond gave no such consideration. The opposite construction rests upon the inadmissible proposition that A in giving up a worth*less bond was in a worse position by reason of the fact that B had given up a good bond for less than its value.

*309

*310

It is clear, therefore, that there is no legislative contract founded on consideration to support the validity of any bond issued under the consolidation act, when the security for which it was issued was invalid in law.

There is no necessity for considering the limits of the authority of the legislature to ascertain or liquidate an uncertain or doubtful debt, as no such power was exercised in the consolidation act. The act sets out with no declarations that depend for their force on the assent of the parties coming in under it, and it affords no ground for an assumption that anything the act dealt with was regarded as unliquidated or disputable. It is very clear that whatever power the legislature possesses of the class just mentioned, its rightful exercise does not extend to a declaration that that is valid which the constitution declares to be otherwise.

The conclusions to which the court has arrived are not in conflict with anything decided in Morton v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 430. The questions just considered were not raised or considered in that case.

HASKELL, A. J., dissenting. Concurring in the result, so far as it affects other classes of vouchers, I dissent from the reasoning and the conclusion by which the "second issue of bonds to pay interest on the public debt," (August 26th, 1868,) and "bonds for the relief of the treasury," (February 17th, 1869,) are excluded from the operation of the consolidation act.

Some reasons for such dissent will be briefly stated.

The act of August 26th, 1868, 14 Stat. 18, clothed the governor with power to borrow money for the state by issuing bonds, and prescribed two limitations. First, relating to amount; Second, to time. It is not pretended that either of these restrictions was violated; but it is contended that the governor was, by the act, impliedly restrained from making more than a single issue. The act is, itself, very brief, and it is difficult, within the widest scope of its language, to find support for such a proposition.

But however interesting might be questions

*311

as to exhaustion *of power by a single exercise of it, or as to the right of the general assembly, without a two-thirds vote, to extend the time for the exercise of a power conferred in an act creating a public debt, or what disaster might result if the legislative body should authorize the executive to make successive issues of bonds at his discretion, to borrow money to a limited extent —however interesting in themselves—such questions do not properly arise in this case. For, so far as rights arising under the operation of the consolidation act are concerned, such objections are disposed of by the act itself, enacted as it was under the full light of the judicial determinations announced in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co., 4 S. C. 430. The ruling of the court on the point referred to, is thus succinctly stated in the heading to the case as reported: "Where an act to create a public debt, by a loan on bonds of the state, is passed in the mode prescribed by the constitution of the state, but some requirement of the act—as, for instance, that the bonds shall be sold at the highest market price—is not complied with by the officer charged with its execution, it is competent for the legislature by an act, not passed by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each house, to waive the objection and validate the bonds."

The consequence is plain, for the officer is the mere agent of the general assembly, and the principal may waive objections to the irregularities of his agent, and, by recognition or other conduct, as well as by direct ratification, may validate his transactions. The Supreme Court having decided that a two-thirds vote was not necessary, the act of March 20th, 1869, to extend the time to make the issue, is of force. The consolidation act likewise, although not passed by the two-thirds vote, is of full force and effect so far as it has any relation to irregularities on the part of the agents employed by the legislature to issue the bonds therein named. Anterior to the passage of this act the "first" and "second issue" had been completed—the second in part canceling the first, and leaving outstanding from both issues $1,197,000 in bonds. The general assembly recognizes the amount and specifies it, and orders it to be treated as an existing debt of the state, under and by virtue of the act creating the debt, and, waiving any and all objections for irregularities or *lack of authority on the part of its agent, ratifies and confirms his acts. This point involves no constitutional question, for that, whether rightfully or not, was settled when the act was passed, but depends solely upon the law of recognition by the principal of the acts of his agent, and the ratification of them by such recognition. The recognition exceeds mere acquiescence in this case, and amounts to active confirmation, for the legislature rests a new contract upon the bonds thus recognized.

*312

The objection to the other class of bonds "for the relief of the treasury" rests upon constitutional grounds, and as to them the recognition by the general assembly does not, for the same reasons above stated, remove the defect, if such there be.

The first ground is that the loan was not "to defray extraordinary expenditures. Const, Art. IX, § 7.

Money to be expended for the "relief of the treasury" certainly does not come within the "ordinary" expenses as defined by the constitution. That instrument carefully defines the "ordinary," and leaves to the word "extraordinary" every expenditure which does not come within the limits of the former. That is the sole question for the judiciary to consider; for if the expenditure be "extraordinary" in its nature, the general assembly, by the vote required by the constitution, has the power to create a debt by bonds to defray it. And it cannot for a moment be claimed that money for the relief of the treasury comes among "ordinary" expenses, which are otherwise directly provided for by the constitution.

It is quite immaterial that the court is not able to perceive what relief the treasury might require or the reasonableness of the expenditure. Those are matters left to the discretion of the general assembly. Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 45 [12 L. Ed. 581]. But if that were a question within the jurisdiction, some light might be thrown upon it by the ordinance adopted January 29th, 1868, to levy a special tax and for other purposes, among which are drafts upon the treasury, with directions to the general assembly to raise funds, if necessary, to reimburse the treasury.

The other objection is that the debt is not for some single object distinctly specified. In obedience to another provision in the constitution, the "subject," or "object," (for the words are *synonyms in the sense in which they are there employed,) is distinctly stated in the title to the act, which is confined to the "subject" expressed in the title. Art. II., § 20. The act to borrow money to pay the interest on the public debt is subject to the same objection, for its object is contained in the title, but, according to the decision in this case, comprehends, by implication, (1) the interest accruing at a particular time, and (2) interest on a great variety of classes of public indebtedness. I wish no more than the application of the same rule.

*313

The annual tax act seldom specifies more than the general purposes, but leaves the details to the appropriation act; yet the validity of such an act could not for a moment be questioned. The general assembly could, by a simultaneous or subsequent act, have made a detailed application of the money borrowed on the bonds issued by the act in question, and, while the propriety of the application might have been a question, the validity of the original act thus explained would hardly have been assailed by the most litigious mind. But that is a question resting with the legislative body, and not the judicial, and the public must not be made to suffer for what thus rests on discretion, and may be done after as well as before or together with the transaction out of which the contract arises.

For the reasons thus briefly and imperfectly presented, I dissent on the points indicated.

As regards the legal effect of the consolidation act, as a compromise or otherwise, I make no comment, since it has not been in that light discussed by the majority of the court. Nor do I discuss the effect of the various acts which are alleged as acquiescence on the part of the state, reserving to myself the right hereafter to express my views on these points, if, after further reflection, I should deem it necessary or proper.

Judgment set aside.

12 S. C. *314

*(Case No. 761.)

DANIEL HAND v. THE SAVANNAH AND CHARLESTON RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

THE STATE, ex rel. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. THE SAME.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Railroads ⟸156.]

Under "An act to aid in the construction of the Charleston and Savannah railroad," passed by the legislature of South Carolina in 1856, the guaranty of the state was endorsed upon certain bonds of this railroad company issued under the authority of this act. The act provided that as soon as any such bonds shall have been endorsed as aforesaid for the first section of the road as therein specified, "they shall constitute a lien upon said section," including the road-bed, &c., "and the State of South Carolina from the endorsing of the said bonds and by virtue of the same, shall be invested with said lien or mortgage, without a deed from the company for the payment by said company of said bonds, with the interest thereon as the same becomes due." Upon the completion of the second and other succeeding sections of said road, other bonds were to be endorsed by the state, "but upon the terms and conditions hereinbefore provided; and upon the endorsing of the said bonds the State of South Carolina shall be invested with a like mortgage, or lien, without a deed from said company, upon said stock, and upon said first and additional section or sections," &c., "for the payment of said bonds and the accruing interest thereon." And the act further provided that "when the whole of said road shall be completed, the State of South Carolina shall be invested with a lien * * * upon the entire road * * * for the payment of all said bonds, * * * and for the interest accruing on said bonds." Held, that the bonds when endorsed constituted a lien upon the entire road as successively completed, which not merely enured as an indemnity to the state against its guaranty, but vested in the state as well for its own protection as for the better security of the bonds and their coupons into whosoever hands they might fall, and not available to either one of the protected parties to the exclusion of the other. Haskell, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 485; Dec. Dig. ⟸156.]

[2. Railroads ⟸156.]

The fifth section of the same act provided "that the state expressly reserves the right to enact hereafter all such laws as may be deemed necessary to protect the interests of the state, and to secure it against any loss in consequence of the endorsing of bonds under the provisions of this act, but in such a manner as not to impair the vested rights of the stockholders of the company." Held, that the state did not by this section reserve any power to destroy or postpone the lien created by this act to secure the payment of the bonds thereby authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. ⟸156.]

*315

[3. Constitutional Law ⟸162.]

*Hence, a subsequent act, in so far as it attempted to postpone this lien, impaired the obligation of a contract with the holders of these bonds, and was to that extent void.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gibbes v. G. & C. R. Co., 13 S. C. 228, 229, 248.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 471; Dec. Dig. ⟸162.]

4. Hand v. Railroad Company, 5 S. C. 182, and State v. Railroad Company, 8 S. C. 129, explained.

[5. Railroads ⇐156.]

In 1869 another act was passed by the legislature to enable the said railroad company, (which had been sold under a junior mortgage subject to the lien of the act of 1856, and purchased by a new company and its name changed to the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company,) to rebuild its road, which had been partially destroyed during the war. By this act certain bonds were to be issued for money borrowed, and the state in this latter act assuming absolute control over the lien created by the act of 1856, directed that it should be postponed and become a second lien, as soon as the bonds so authorized under the act of 1869 were issued. And by the third section of the act of 1869 certain other bonds guaranteed by the state were to be issued in exchange for past-due coupons of the bonds of 1856, subject however to the provision that the bonds for money borrowed should have precedence of the lien of 1856. Held, that parties funding such coupons were bound by the terms of the act of 1869, and had surrendered all right to claim for such coupons or the bonds received in exchange therefor, the protection of the lien of 1856.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Columbia & G. R. Co. v. Gibbes, 24 S. C. 74.

For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 478, 483–485; Dec. Dig. ⇐156.]

[6. Railroads ⇐171.]

Held further, that by such funding they accepted the postponement of the lien of 1856, as to all bonds and coupons of the same class, owned by them at that time.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co., 17 S. C. 245.

For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 576; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[7. Estoppel ⇐90.]

The doctrine of equitable estoppel discussed and explained, and cases reviewed, and the rules laid down governing estoppel by silence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 362; Verdier v. Port Royal R. Co., Id., 483.

For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 242–244, 248–256; Dec. Dig. ⇐90.]

[8. Corporations ⇐483; Railroads ⇐171.]

Parties holding bonds under the act of 1856 are not estopped from asserting for their securities a prior lien to the lien of 1869, because of their failure to oppose the passage by the legislature of the act of 1869.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1890; Dec. Dig. ⇐483; Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 576; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[9. Corporations ⇐483; Estoppel ⇐92; Railroads ⇐171.]

Holders of 1856 bonds accepting payment of their coupons from the company after the rebuilding of the road, are not thereby estopped from asserting their rights under the act of 1856.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1890; Dec. Dig. ⇐483; Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 262; Dec. Dig. ⇐92; Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 576; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[10. Corporations ⇐483; Railroads ⇐171.]

Nor can it be objected by the corporation or junior encumbrancers that holders of 1856 bonds have made no attempt to obtain payment from the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1890; Dec. Dig. ⇐483; Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 560, 576; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[11. Corporations ⇐483; Railroads ⇐171.]

Nor would equity, in favor of the second lien bonds, require such bondholders to look primarily to the state for payment under its guaranty, upon the ground that they held a double security.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1890; Dec. Dig. ⇐483; Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 576; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[12. Corporations ⇐483; Estoppel ⇐93; Railroads ⇐171.]

The 1856 bond-holders are not estopped from asserting their prior lien, because, knowing of the act of 1869, they, without objection, permitted money raised thereunder to be expended upon the improvement of the mortgaged premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1890; Dec. Dig. ⇐483; Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 264; Dec. Dig. ⇐93; Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 576; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[13. Railroads ⇐156.]

Judgment cannot be rendered against the state upon its guaranty in favor of the holders of the redemption bonds issued under the act of 1869.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 478, 483–485; Dec. Dig. ⇐156.]

[14. Railroads ⇐156.]

Holders of the redemption bonds of 1869 have no lien either under the act of 1856 or the act of 1869, the lien of the latter act securing only the bonds issued for money borrowed; nor can they require the state as their *surety to set up the coupons received in exchange for these guaranteed redemption bonds, as against either the 1856 or 1869 bonds.

*316

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 478, 483–485; Dec. Dig. ⇐156.]

[15. Railroads ⇐171.]

After the passage of the act of 1856 the corporation purchased from H. a body of land, part of which was needed for their road-bed, and gave their bond and mortgage of same date to secure the payment of the purchase money; this was before the completion of the road, or of that section of the road where the land so purchased was situated. Held, that the mortgage to H. had precedence of the lien under the act of 1856.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 554–576; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[16. Railroads ⇐171.]

At the time of the purchase from H. there was then outstanding a mortgage over the entire property of the company, given to certain trustees to secure the payment of bonds issued by the corporation. Held, that the mortgage to H., being for the purchase money, was a preferred lien upon the property covered by it, over the previously-executed mortgage to the trustees.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co., 17 S. C. 277.

For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 561; Dec. Dig. ⇐171.]

[17. Taxation ⇐210.]

Under the act of 1869, the exemption from taxes theretofore granted to said company, was revoked by acceptance of that act, and the company were required to complete their road from Charleston to Savannah by January 1st, 1870, and it was further provided "that no tax shall be assessed or levied upon said road until the same shall have been completed." In March, 1870, the road was completed to such extent that by the use under lease of another railroad company's track for three miles, and by means of a ferry boat belonging to this company, freight and passengers were transported by the company from Charleston to Savannah. Held, that the company were liable to taxation for the year 1870 and all subsequent years. And for the payment of such claim, the state can in court demand a sale of the road.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 335; Dec. Dig. ⟸210.]

[18. Railroads ⟸192.]

Where part of a railroad is in this state and part in another, the court should order a sale of the entire road, so much thereof as lay in the other state being sold subject to the liens existing in that state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 638; Dec. Dig. ⟸192.]

[19. Marshaling Assets and Securities ⟸3.]

[A promise of the state to pay money, being incapable of enforcement by suit, is not a security which can be marshaled.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marshaling Assets and Securities, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. ⟸3.]

[This case is also cited in Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co., 12 S. C. 88; Id., 17 S. C. 219; Id., 21 S. C. 178, as to facts, and in Chalmers v. Turnipseed, 21 S. C. 136; Bailey & Son v. Wells, 68 S. C. 152, 46 S. E. 768, as to the doctrine of estoppel.]

Before Wallace, J., Charleston, March, 1878.

For the previous history of these cases in this court, see, in the following order, 5 S. C. 182, 8 S. C. 207, 6 S. C. 307, and 10 S. C. 406.

These cases having been referred to William Alston Pringle, Esq., as special referee, he filed his report, in which he fully states all the questions of fact involved, and thoroughly discusses the points of law arising thereunder. The following are his conclusions of fact upon the matters determined by this court:

The Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company was incorporated by an act of the general assembly of the State of South Carolina, ratified on the 20th of December, A. D. 1853. 12 Stat. 271. On the 20th of December, A. D. 1856, (12 Stat. 543), the *legislature passed an act, of which the following is a copy. [The act is fully set out in the opinion of the court, and is therefore omitted here.]

*317

Under this act the company issued six per cent. coupon bonds to the amount of $505,000, which were guaranteed by the state, according to the provisions of the act, of which guaranty the following is a copy:

The provisions of the act of assembly, passed December 19th, 1856, having been complied with by virtue of the authority therein contained, the full and complete payment of this bond is guaranteed by the State of South Carolina, and the faith and funds of the said state are hereby pledged to secure the payment of the principal thereof, and of the installments of interest due or to become due thereon.

(Signed) T. J. Pickens, Comptroller-General.

On January 1st, 1858, the company conveyed to I. W. Hayne, Edward Sebring and E. M. Beach, trustees, in trust to secure the payment of seven per cent. interest-bearing bonds, to the amount of $1,000,000, about to be issued, all its then present and future to be acquired property, and all franchises, rights and privileges of the said company, of, in, to or concerning the same. The said bonds were issued and sold to a large amount.

By an act of the general assembly, approved December 21st, 1865, (13 Stat. 368), the state authorized the company to borrow the sum of $500,000 upon a first mortgage of the property of the company, and for this purpose the state postponed the lien of the act of 1856, and directed that it should be a second lien on the said property of the company; provided that the holders of the endorsed bonds of said company, and the judgment creditors of said company, consent and agree, in writing, that their bonds and judgment be postponed, and become liens on said road next after the state lien. But the plan of effecting a loan under this act failed from a number of causes.

By the result of the war the company was reduced to insolvency, the road broken up, the bridges destroyed, great part of *the iron was carried off and lost, and the road was no longer capable of being used.

*318

Under these circumstances the trustees, under the deed of January, 1858, at the suggestion of a number of the creditors representing bonds to the amount of $604,000, secured by that mortgage, proceeded, by virtue of the powers contained in the deed, to foreclose, and on the 20th of November, 1866, the mortgaged premises were sold, subject, nevertheless, to the lien created by the act of assembly of 1856. The advertisement under which the road was sold, stated that the bonds secured by that lien amounted in all to the sum of $505,000, bearing interest at six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually, and having an arrear of interest due and unpaid of about $140,000, and that the principal of the said bonds was due on March 1st, A. D. 1877. At the sale the road, subject to the above-mentioned lien, was purchased by G. W. Williams and others, for themselves and as trustees for their associates, for the sum of $30,000.

On December 21st, 1866, (13 Stat. 438), an act was passed to incorporate the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company. This act, after reciting the charter previously granted to the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, the lien created by the act of 1856 to secure the payment of the bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, the mortgage to I. W. Hayne and others, the insolvency of the company and the foreclosure of the said mortgage, and purchase, by George W. Williams and others, for the use of the holders of the said bonds, granted a new charter to the said purchasers and their associates, by the name of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, with all the usual powers and privileges of railroad companies. The twentieth section of the act expressly provides, "that the company hereby formed shall assume and be held liable for the payment of the six per cent. interest-bearing bonds whereon the guaranty of the state has been endorsed, and the lien of the state is, in every respect, preserved and hereby reaffirmed."

On January 29th, 1867, by a decree entered in the suit of Charleston and Savannah R. R. Co. v. Hayne et al., trustees, et al., which was a suit originally instituted to enjoin the sale of the road by the trustees, under the mortgage of 1858, the sale by *the said trustees was confirmed, and it was ordered inter alia, that the said trustees should execute and deliver to the new corporation, the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, upon their paying and securing the purchase money in the manner therein directed and required, a conveyance of the mortgaged premises, advertised and sold on November 20th, 1866.

*319

The new company was duly organized, took possession of the road, and endeavored to reconstruct the same. They attempted to borrow money for that purpose, but the lien of the act of 1856 defeated such attempt.

The condition of the road in 1869 is thus described by Mr. C. S. Gadsden, the engineer and superintendent of the road, Mr. Fisher, the treasurer of the road, and Mr. Campbell, whose evidence accompanies this report.

The road was in operation in May, 1869, to Coosawhatchie; the remainder of the road, some forty or forty-one miles, was destroyed, that is, all wooden structures, including bridges, were destroyed or useless, half of the iron of the road, for the forty or forty-one miles, was gone, having been carried away either prior to the evacuation of the line or subsequently. The road, beyond Coosawhatchie, was unproductive; the company had no means by which they could make up that portion of the road, without resources outside of the means of the road. At that time it would not have been practicable to make those forty miles available—the only means of raising money was by postponement of the prior lien. The road was first reconstructed as far as Salkehatchie, with money obtained from the hire of all the rolling stock to the South Carolina Railroad Company, for from $8000 to $12,000 per month, on a lease which ended in August, 1866, and as far as Coosawhatchie by iron, or the sale of iron, taken from the rest of the road beyond that point. The road rested at Coosawhatchie for more than a year, from the close of 1867, till May, 1869. The trains ran to Coosawhatchie as soon as the road was completed to that point. The country was broken up and the road made no earnings, except from local traffic, and had no surplus over expenses. The estimated value of the rolling stock at the close of the war was $94,450. Under these circumstances the company had no other means of repairing the road than by *a loan, but they were unable to effect this as long as the lien created by the act of 1856, in favor of the state, was the prior lien. The company, therefore, in 1869, presented a memorial to the legislature, setting forth a statement of the condition of the road, and praying that the state should consent that the company may secure, by a mortgage, to take priority of the state statutory lien, a new loan of $500,000, if so much should be necessary to rebuild and complete the road in the first place; and then, secondly, to pay off the arrears of interest now due on the six per cent. bonds guaranteed by the state.

*320

The legislature referred this memorial to the attorney-general for his opinion as to the right of the state to postpone her lien and subordinate it to the mortgage, to be executed as prayed for by the memorial.

The attorney-general gave his opinion that the state had a right so to postpone the lien of the act of 1856.

Whereupon the legislature, on March 2d, 1869, (14 Stat. 201,) passed an act entitled "An act to enable the Savannah and Charleston railroad Company to complete their road." The act is as follows:

"An act to enable the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company to complete their road.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of South Carolina, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company is authorized and empowered to borrow and raise the sum of not more than five hundred thousand dollars, to be used in extending and rebuilding their road, under the provisions of their charter.

"Sec. 2. That for this purpose the said company is hereby authorized and empowered to issue bonds to the amount of not more than five hundred thousand dollars, payable twenty years after the date thereof, with coupons attached for interest, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

"Sec. 3. That the said company is hereby further authorized and required to fund and redeem the coupons for interest of the bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, guaranteed by the state, now past due, and that may fall due on *or before the first day of September, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, by issuing therefor an equal amount of their bonds, with coupons attached, with interest payable semi-annually, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and the principal to become due in twenty years after the date thereof; and the payment of the said bonds, so to be issued in substitution for interest coupons, shall be guaranteed by the state in the same manner, and as fully as the said original bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company are now guaranteed, subject, however, to the provisions of Section 6 of this act.

*321

"Sec. 4. The bonds hereinbefore authorized for rebuilding said road shall be used exclusively for the building thereof and the outfit of the same. No salary shall be paid to any officer of the said road out of the funds so raised by this act.

"Sec. 5. The said railroad company shall deposit the interest on all their aforesaid bonds, as it becomes due, with the financial agent of the State of South Carolina in the city of New York, and shall notify the creditors of the same by public advertisement in one newspaper in New York, one in Charleston, and one in Savannah; and if said company shall fail to pay the interest on its debt within six months after it shall have become due, or fail to pay or provide for the payment of the principal of its debt within six months after it shall have become due, it shall be the duty of the comptroller-general of the state, and he shall have the power to take immediate possession of said road with all its appurtenances, and lease the same to responsible parties, who shall have control thereof until the general assembly shall, by law, provide for the settlement of the affairs of said company in the interest of all its creditors. The governor of the state is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint two directors to represent the state in the direction of said company.

"Sec. 6. That the present lien of the State of South Carolina on said road shall, upon the issue of the bonds provided for in and by the first section of this act, be postponed and become a second lien; which said second lien shall extend over and cover the whole road, its outfit and real estate, as fully as is already provided for by law. The said road shall be completed by the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy.

*322

*"Sec. 7. This act shall not be of force until the said Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company consent to the amendment of their charter, so that the property of said corporation shall be subject to taxation in conformity with Section 2 of Article XII. of the constitution, and said consent be certified, under the seal of said company, to the comptroller-general and secretary of state. Upon the filing of said consent the said charter shall be deemed and held to be modified in conformity with said section of the constitution; provided, that no tax shall be assessed or levied upon said road until the same shall have been completed."

On July 1st, 1869, the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company issued bonds to the amount of $500,000, under a mortgage to William Aiken, James Robb and G. W. Williams, as trustees, which recited the act of March 2d, 1869, and represented that it was a first mortgage on all the present and future-to-be-acquired property of the said company, not including, however, the chartered franchises, powers and privileges of the said company. This mortgage was duly recorded.

It is in evidence that the application to the legislature for a postponement of the state lien was publicly discussed in the newspapers, and was generally known.

The bonds issued under the mortgage of July 1st, 1869, were negotiated with the contractors who rebuilt the road, and for other purposes connected with renewing the road.

Besides these bonds the company, under the provisions of the third section of the act of March 2d, 1869, issued another class of bonds, to the amount of , for funding and redeeming the coupons for interest of the bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, which fell due before September 1st, 1869. These bonds were guaranteed by the state, and were declared subject to the provisions of the sixth section of the act of 1869, which postponed the lien of the act of 1856, and declared that that lien should be a second lien on the road.

The shareholders of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, at their annual meeting, held on the 8th day of February, 1871, authorized and directed the directors to issue bonds of the company to the amount of $300,000, payable twenty years *after their date, with interest, payable semi-annually, at the rate of eight per centum per annum.

*323

The directors accordingly issued the said bonds, secured by a mortgage to Andrew Simonds, H. H. De Leon and E. Bates, of all the property of the company, its estate, rights, privileges and franchises in this state and Georgia, according to and under the sixth section of the charter of the company. The mortgage deed is dated March 21st, 1871, and is duly recorded.

As to the claims of the estate of G. A. Trenholm and Rev. W. T. Potter.

On March 14th, 1858, the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company purchased from Nathaniel Heyward a tract of land called White Hall, together with adjoining tracts situated in St. Bartholomew's parish, containing in all eight hundred and twenty-two acres. Through the land thus purchased the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company laid out their track and constructed their road, and the track thus laid out is the same now in the possession of and used by the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company. In payment of this purchase, the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company delivered to Mr. Heyward its four separate bonds, three of which were for the payment of $5000 each, and one for the payment of $4800.

And, to secure the payment of these bonds, the company mortgaged to Mr. Heyward the lands thus purchased from him. By subsequent assignments, the said bonds passed into the hands of G. A. Trenholm and the Rev. W. T. Potter. On August 14th, 1866, proceedings were commenced against the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company in the Court of Equity, for the foreclosure of the mortgage by which the bonds were secured.

On November 20th, 1866, all the property of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company was sold, and subsequently all of the said property was conveyed to the new company, the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company. The new company were not made parties to the proceedings commenced against the old company for the foreclosure of the mortgage on the White Hall tract. But on June 17th, 1875, G. A. Trenholm and the Rev. W. T. Potter, the assignees of the bonds secured by the mortgage of White Hall, intervened by petition in the case of *D. Hand v. Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, setting up the mortgage and reciting the proceedings which had been taken, and which had ended in a decree for foreclosure and sale.

*324

As to the claim of the state for taxes.

The sixth section of the act of March 2d, 1869, concludes as follows: The said road shall be completed by January 1st, 1870. The seventh section of the same act concludes as follows: "Provided, that no tax shall be assessed or levied upon the said road until the same shall have been completed."

In the opinion of Mr. Gadsden, the engineer of the road, and of Mr. Campbell, the road has never been completed; the connection with Savannah not being on its own track, the road cannot transport freight and passengers from city to city on its own track.

There is a satisfactory connection with Savannah at the Georgia end, but that connection does not belong to the road; the length of the road from the western bank of the Ashley river to the crossing of the Central Railroad of Georgia, is one hundred and one miles. A bridge across Ashley river was always contemplated.

The first plan was to cross Ashley river at Bee's ferry, and afterwards it was proposed to cross at other points. The road has not yet been completed at either end. The plans and estimates of the company and engineers contemplated a starting from this side of Ashley river, the eastern side, with a bridge over the river. The road has never entered Savannah on its own track. The terminus of the track of the road is three miles from Savannah. There are many estimates for a bridge over the Ashley.

On the part of the state the following facts were submitted:

The Charleston and Savannah Railroad, as originally projected, contemplated a bridge across the Ashley river on the west side of the city of Charleston. The line on which the road was finally built strikes the western bank of the river (which is there about one quarter of a mile wide) at a point just opposite the city itself. The depot, or place for receiving and delivering freight and passengers, was placed on the other side of the river (the eastern) within the limits of the city, and nearly exactly *opposite the terminus of the road, on the western bank. The road bed and track were finished and in condition for transporting freight and passengers before the bridge across the Ashley was constructed. The road, as then built, extended from the point mentioned on the western bank of the Ashley to a point a little more than three miles from the city of Savannah, where it met the line of the Central railroad. Beyond this point the Charleston and Savannah railroad never built any road bed or track. By an arrangement with the Central railroad they used the track and depot of the latter in common, and the Charleston and Savannah railroad ran their trains over this track to the depot, at a point within the corporate limits of Savannah. No bridge across the Ashley ever was built by the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company. A bridge across the river was built shortly prior to the war by a company called the Charleston Bridge Company, at a point above the line of the Charleston and Savannah railroad.

*325

At the beginning of the war the Charleston Bridge Company allowed the railroad to lay a track upon their bridge across the river, but the road itself never either owned or built the bridge.

The Charleston and Savannah railroad was in operation for some time before the bridge across the Ashley was built. Passengers and freight were carried to and fro over the railroad, and delivered and received at the depots already mentioned in Charleston and Savannah. The transportation over the Ashley river was effected in boats provided by the company and belonging to it, without any charge additional to the regular fare and freight over the road.

The track of the road, as laid over the bridge of the Charleston Bridge Company, ran continuously from the west bank of the river across the river on the bridge, and to the depot within the limits of Charleston.

This bridge across the Ashley, and a great part of the railroad itself, were destroyed during the late war, and the Charleston and Savannah' railroad was sold soon after the close of the war, and purchased by certain persons who were afterwards incorporated as the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company.

The bridge cross the Ashley has never been rebuilt.

*326

*The road now is, and has been since March, 1870, in working order, and engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers between Charleston and Savannah.

The railroad company receives and delivers its freight and passengers at its depot in Charleston. The transportation across the river is effected under the care, responsibility and supervision of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, in a large steamboat, the property of the company.

The passengers and freight are placed in the cars of the company on the western bank of the river, and in them transported to a point within the limits of the city of Savannah. In like manner, freight and passengers from Savannah to Charleston are received in Savannah, transported over the road to the end of the track, on the west bank of the Ashley, taken across the river in the company's steamer, and delivered at the depot in Charleston. The railroad company has, from time to time, advertised for through freight and travel, claiming that its connections were complete and its communications thorough.

Up to the year 1875, the arrangements with the Central railroad continued, the Savannah and Charleston railroad using the track and depot of the former. In that year a rupture occurred, owing to an alleged failure on the part of the Savannah and Charleston railroad to meet its engagements, and pay its rent for the use of the track and depot of the Central railroad.

Since that time a connecting line or track has been built from a point just across the point where the Savannah and Charleston railroad meets the Central railroad, to a point within or near the limits of Savannah, connecting with the line of the Atlantic and Gulf railroad; and this line is now rented by the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, who now make use of it for the transportation of freight and passengers. The road bed and track is not the property of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company.

The State of South Carolina, claiming that taxes were due from the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, has levied the following sums upon the road as taxes so due: * * * *

A bill was filed in the United States Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina, in March, 1872, by George N. Mil*ler, a stockholder of the railroad, to enjoin the collection of these taxes. The injunction was refused and the bill dismissed. From the decree of the Circuit Court an appeal has been made to the Supreme Court, and the case is now on the docket.

*327

The referee's conclusions of law were that the lien created by the act of 1856 was not merely for the indemnity of the state, but attached to the bonds themselves, and was a part of the contract with the bondholders; that in the fifth section of this act the state did not reserve any right to interfere with this lien; that the condition of the road could not authorize the state to postpone this lien; that the holders of 1856 bonds were not estopped from asserting their lien, because of their failure to object to the mortgage of 1869 and the sale of bonds thereunder; that the holders of the guaranteed redemption bonds issued under the third section of the act of 1869, by accepting these bonds, have accepted, as to them, the provisions of the act of 1869; that the claims of Trenholm and Potter are a first lien on the land described in the mortgage to Heyward; and that the consent of the railroad company to surrender its exemption from taxation, being in consideration of the postponement of the lien of the act of 1856, which was beyond the power of the legislature and inoperative, that the state was not entitled to her taxes. The report concludes as follows:

"Since writing the report I have been, on July 3d, 1877, served with the copy of a suggestion that the state retires as a party to these proceedings in all questions, except that in relation to the liability of the company for taxes. But if the principles of the report are correct, the retirement of the state will not affect the rights and relations of the other parties to the several actions."

Suggestions of Attorney-General.

And now comes the State of South Carolina, by James Conner, the attorney-general, and gives the court to understand and be informed that the act entitled "An act to protect the interest of state whenever payment of interest now due remains unpaid on bonds issued by any railroad company, and whenever the guaranty of state is endorsed," approved March 7th, 1871, under *and by virtue of which proceedings were filed on the day of , 187 , by the attorney-general of the state, against the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, (In re Hand v. Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company,) has been repealed by act of the general assembly, approved the 23d day of May, 1877, and that the State of South Carolina is no longer a party to the proceedings in the above-entitled cause, or bound thereby, or by the judgment in the said cause, except so far as regards the claim for taxes due the state by said Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, made and filed in the above-entitled cause.

*328

James Conner, Attorney General.

To this report voluminous exceptions were taken by several parties before the court. Upon the report and exceptions, his Honor Judge Wallace rendered the following

Decree:

On hearing the report of W. Alston Pringle, the referee herein, and the argument of counsel, it is ordered that the report be confirmed and stand as the judgment of this court, except as will be herein specifically mentioned. In the judgment of this court, the lien created by the act of 1856 is vested in the state for the benefit of the holders of those bonds and coupons issued by the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, and guaranteed by the state according to the terms of that act, and for the payment of these bonds and coupons. It will not be necessary to inquire how far and in what manner this court might proceed to execute the trust so created, even if the state were not a party to these proceedings. According to the suggestions filed by the attorney-general, the state is a party, at least, as to all questions relating to the liability of the company for taxes and the lien for the same claimed by the state.

Neither will it be necessary to inquire how far the state may be a party for one purpose and not for other purposes.

In this case the state is a party seeking the enforcement of a lien upon the property of a company, confessedly insolvent, for *taxes, the payment of which cannot be had without a sale of the mortgaged property.

*329

The state, therefore, must be considered as a party seeking a sale of the road and other property under the decree of this court, and is a party to this action in such manner and to such an extent as to be bound by the title to be given to the purchaser under its order of sale.

On account of the fact that more than half a million of dollars is represented by each class of the bonds which are respectively claimed to be the first lien, it is probable that no outside purchaser will be found, and it will become necessary for the bondholders to protect their respective interests at the sale.

How can this be done intelligently and effectively by either class of bondholders, unless the question of the priority of their claims has been finally adjudicated by the court of last resort? A part of the road lies in the State of Georgia.

It is not necessary at this time to inquire how much of the property of the company this court can order to be sold. It is sufficient to consider that such a question would cast a cloud upon the title at the sale, and that it is for the interest of all concerned that, when sold, the entire road and all the property of the company should be sold with a clear and unquestioned title to the purchaser.

It is to be presumed that the necessary proceedings will be instituted in the court of the State of Georgia for the adjudication of the rights of parties in the portion of the road lying in that state; and that by the comity of the respective courts, or by the agreement of parties, a time of sale, assented to in each jurisdiction, will be eventually fixed upon.

It is therefore ordered and decreed that all the property of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company included and described in the several deeds and mortgages proved in this case, and all the property of which the said company is seized and possessed, be sold by W. D. Porter, master, at such time and upon such terms and conditions as may hereafter be directed by the further order of this court.

It is further ordered that the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, and all the parties to these proceedings, and all *persons claiming under them, or either of them, be forever barred and foreclosed of all right, title, interest and equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises so sold.

*330

And it is further ordered that out of the proceeds of sale the liens be paid by the said master, in the order and for the amounts (when amounts are set down) recommended in the report of the referee, except as to the claims of W. D. Gillison, Thomas H. Gregorie, the heirs or devisees of Thomas W. Gillison and Frederick R. Blake, in relation to which claims an order in the cause has been signed, bearing date April 24th, 1878, based upon a compromise of said claims by the parties thereto.

It is further ordered that if, after paying the liens according to the orders herein established, there should be a balance in the hands of the said master, the same be held subject to the further order of this court.

It is further ordered that all the parties to these proceedings have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for all necessary papers.

From this decree appeals were taken by the several parties against whose interests it operated; the grounds whereof will appear from the opinion of the court.

[For subsequent opinions, see 13 S. C. 467; 17 S. C. 219.]

Messrs. T. M. Hanckel, W. H. Brawley and I. M. Bryan, for respondents.

Messrs. J. B. Campbell, A. G. Magrath, C. G. Memminger, and Rutledge & Young, for 1869 bondholders.

Mr. L. F. Youmans, Attorney-General, for state.

Mr. E. McCrady, for redemption bondholders.

Messrs. James Conner and A. G. Magrath, for Trenholm & Potter.

September 30th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The nature of the various questions arising in these cases, and the facts bearing upon them, are fully stated *in the report of the referee, and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them. The various questions for decision will be separately stated and considered, and their bearing upon the judgment pointed out.

*331

The first question involves the construction of the act of 1856, (12 Stat. 543,) entitled "An act to aid in the construction of the Charleston and Savannah railroad." The parties who contest such construction are as follows: 1. The Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, a corporation distinct from the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, that has succeeded to the property formerly belonging to the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company by purchase under title derived through a sale for foreclosure of a mortgage made by the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company to certain trustees for the benefit of a specified class of bondholders, and has received from the legislature corporate franchises by that name to maintain and operate the railroad originally conceded to the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company. The new company is a party defendant to each of the suits above entitled, while the former company is not made a party. 2. Certain bond and couponholders, creditors of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, the former corporation, claiming to have liens on the property in suit prior to that under which the defendant corporation claims to have purchased and hold the same. For convenience these creditors will be designated the bond and couponholders of 1856. 3. Certain bondcreditors of the defendant corporation, asserting liens; and, 4. Certain judgment and other creditors of the original corporation claiming to have liens thereon.

The sections of the act of 1856 immediately involved in the present question of construction are the third, fourth and fifth. The object of the act is well stated in the title to be "to aid in the construction of the Charleston and Savannah railroad." The aid offered by this act consisted chiefly in the voluntary offer of the state to become an endorser on certain bonds of said company, intended to be issued for the purpose of finishing the construction of the road by providing and putting down iron rails, chairs and spikes, and providing an equipment for said *road. Certain conditions are annexed to the offer of the state; first, there must be bona fide subscriptions to the capital stock of the company "to an amount sufficient to grade, bridge and prepare for the iron rails fifty-one miles of the said road;" second, "such subscriptions must be shown to the governor of the state to be good and solvent;" third, "at least twenty miles of the road must be fully prepared for putting on the iron rails and equipments, and the governor notified thereof;" and it must appear, by certain evidences, that such section and every part thereof is free from any lien whatsoever other than that created in favor of the state by this act. Upon compliance with the foregoing requirments the governor is directed by Section 1 to "cause to be endorsed, by the comptroller-general, upon the bonds of said company, to an amount not exceeding $5000 per mile of said section, the guarantee of the State of South Carolina, pledging therefor the faith and funds of the state, which bonds shall be payable at such places in the United States as the president of the company may designate, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually, and not having more than twenty years to mature." The second section confines the application of the sums borrowed upon these bonds to certain defined purposes, namely, "for procuring the iron rails, chairs, spikes and equipments for said section of said road, and for putting down said iron rails."

*332

Then follows the third section, which is as follows: "That as soon as any such bonds shall have been endorsed, as aforesaid, for the first section of the road, as aforesaid, they shall constitute a lien upon said sections so prepared as aforesaid, including the roadbed, right of way, grading, bridges and masonry, upon all the stock subscribed for in said company, and upon said iron rails, chairs, spikes and equipments when purchased and delivered; and the State of South Carolina, from the endorsing of the said bonds and by virtue of the same, shall be invested with said lien or mortgage, without a deed from the company for the payment by said company of said bonds, with the interest thereon as the same becomes due."

The fourth section provides: "That when the said company shall have prepared, as aforesaid, a second section, or any addi*tional number of sections, of twenty miles each, of said road, connecting with the section already completed, for the iron rails, chairs, spikes and equipments, as provided in the first section of this act, and the governor shall be notified of the facts, as before provided, he shall in like manner cause to be endorsed for said company like bonds of the said company to an amount not exceeding $5000 per mile for each and every section of twenty miles of said road so prepared as aforesaid; but upon the terms and conditions hereinbefore provided, and upon the endorsing of the said bonds, the State of South Carolina shall be invested with a like mortgage or lien, without a deed from said company upon said stock, and upon said first and additional section or sections of said road so prepared, upon the rails and equipments put or to be put upon the same, for the payment of said bonds and the accruing interest thereon: provided, that if the last section of said road shall be less than twenty miles, bonds of the said company shall be endorsed, as aforesaid, for such section for an amount in proportion to the distance, as provided in this act, but upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects, as required in regard to the bonds to be issued for the other sections of said road. And when the whole of the said road shall be completed the State of South Carolina shall be invested with a lien, without a deed from the company, upon the entire road, including the stock, right of way, grading, bridges, masonry, iron rails, spikes, chairs and the whole superstructure and equipments, and all the property owned by the company as incident to or necessary for its business for the payment of all said bonds, endorsed as aforesaid, as provided in this act, and for the interest accruing on said bonds. And after the governor shall have caused bonds to be endorsed, as provided in the first section of this act, for the first section of the road, it shall not be lawful for said company to give, create or convey to any person or persons, or body corporate whatever, any lien, encumbrance or mortgage of any kind which shall have priority over, or come in conflict with the lien of the state herein secured; and any such lien, encumbrance or mortgage shall be null and void as against said lien or mortgage of the state; and the said lien or *mortgage of the state shall have priority over all other claims existing or to exist against said company."

*333

*334

Section 5 provides "that the state expressly reserves the right to enact hereafter all such laws as may be deemed necessary to protect the interests of the state, and to secure it against any loss in consequence of the endorsing of bonds under the provisions of this act, but in such manner as not to impair the vested rights of the stockholders of the company."

The question now to be considered upon the construction of this statute is whether the lien designed to be secured thereby was intended exclusively as an indemnity for the state in case it should be called upon to pay the bonds so endorsed, or interest upon the same, or whether it was intended as a general security, collateral to the bonds so endorsed, to accompany them into the hands of the contemplated purchasers of such bonds as a means of charging the indebtedness arising upon such bonds, for principal and interest, on the property embraced by such lien as if mortgaged for that purpose.

The direct expressions of the act, in this respect, should be first noticed, and when their primary force is ascertained it will be competent to inquire whether the rules of construction demand that such primary sense should be modified by enlarging or narrowing the same to conform to any peculiar sense for such direct expressions. The language of the act must be considered with reference to three divisions of the subject matter; first, with reference to the first section of twenty miles; second, with reference to the succeeding sections of twenty miles each, and the final section of twenty miles, or a fractional part of that distance; and, third, in reference to the road, as a whole, upon the completion of each part of it. It may here be observed that the act assumes to look to the completion of at least fifty-one miles of the road, by the terms of the conditions imposed, as adequate means to bring that portion of the whole road to the condition stipulated for, prior to the actual endorsement of the bonds, are required to be provided by means of bona fide subscriptions to the capital stock of the road, good and available for that purpose.

It must then be considered that the construction of the whole *road, as a single object, was the intention of the act, and that its division into sections of twenty miles each was solely intended for the convenience of the corporation. From this circumstance it must be concluded that the terms employed to describe the character and intention of the lien, effected on any single section of the road, must be regarded as applicable to the entire lien as affecting the whole road, unless a contrary intent appears in the terms of the act.

*335

The terms used in regard to the first section of twenty miles must be regarded as characteristic of the intentions of the parties as to all the succeeding sections. It is clear that a single indivisible lien on the entire road, when completed, was intended; so that each bond issued, for any part of the work, should have its proportional interest in the whole property subject to the lien. This appears directly from the language of the fourth section, that "when the whole of said road shall be completed the State of South Carolina shall be invested with a lien, without a deed from the company, upon the entire road," &c. It is also a necessary inference, from the general character of the transaction, inasmuch as the value of the road depends upon the union of its parts, and division, for the purposes of security, would impair that value.

The third section declares "that so soon as any such bonds shall have been endorsed, as aforesaid, for the first section of the road, as aforesaid, they will constitute a lien upon said section," &c. Here is the expression of a direct intent that the bonds shall, when endorsed, "constitute" a lien. There can be no mistaking the sense of these terms. If it had been said that a judgment, when recovered, should constitute a lien on certain property, there could be no doubt as to the intention.

The judgment itself would conclusively evidence the existence of such lien, and, therefore, in legal language, would be said to constitute or create such lien. In the same sense the endorsed bond conclusively evidences the existence of such lien, and, with equal propriety, may be said to constitute or create such lien. The word "they" can have no other sense than that of describing the endorsed bonds as that which shall constitute the lien in question. It is important to determine with accuracy whether *this is the true sense of the act, for, if it is, certain consequences tend naturally to follow it, which must be admitted unless precluded by other matters contained in the act. The most important of these consequences is that if the bond constitutes the lien, then in the strictest sense the lien is accessory to the bond, and must follow it into whosoever's hand it goes.

*336

But it is contended that this is inadmissible in view of the language that follows in regard to the first section of the road, and is, in substance, repeated as to the other sections succeeding. This language is as follows: "And the State of South Carolina, upon the endorsing of said bonds, by virtue of the same, shall be invested with said lien or mortgage, without a deed from the company, for the payment by said company of said bonds, with the interest thereon, as the same becomes due." It is contended that this language evidences an intention that the lien should enure exclusively to the benefit of the state to indemnify it against loss by reason of its endorsements of the bonds of the corporation, and that such being its intent, the language quoted above, to the effect that the bond, as endorsed, shall constitute the lien, cannot have that sense, as it would necessarily be contradictory of such exclusive purpose. The argument presents two considerations; first, whether the language on which this argument is based was intended to describe the character and object of the lien, and, second, whether it indicates any such exclusive intention as that ascribed to it. As it regards the first of these inquiries it will be observed that if the clause stood by itself it would be impossible to determine what was the nature of the lien or the character of the property upon which it was intended to take effect. All these particulars had been previously described when defining the effect of the endorsed bonds upon the property of the corporation. That was the part of the section that dealt with the creation of the lien, while the subsequent language only shows in whom the lien shall vest, at what time, and for what purpose.

There were two good and sufficient reasons why, assuming that the declaration that the endorsed bond should constitute a lien has the force and effect already ascribed to it, and is that due to its primary sense, it should be followed by such a pro*vision as that which declares that on a certain event such lien should vest in the state for certain purposes. In the first place the title was in the corporation and not in the state, and it was the clear intention of the act that the lien should arise out of the terms of the act alone, on the happening of the event that called it into existence or constituted it, as expressed by the declaration that it should be a lien or mortgage without a deed from the company. It may not have been necessary, but it was strictly proper that the state should in terms invest itself with that which it assumed to dispose of by its own authority, by a declaration that would have that effect in virtue of the acceptance of the benefits of the act by the corporation. The state cannot effectually grant the lands of A to B, or create a lien on the lands of A in favor of B, except where it is done either with the consent of A or in aid of judicial remedies against him. The naked declaration that in a certain event B should have a lien on the lands of A in an act by which B was bound, by his acceptance, might, by implication, be held self-executing, by transmitting such title or right on the happening of the event contemplated; but that accuracy which is desirable in statutes interfering with rights of property of the citizen was better attained by the adoption of a course which would have been necessary had it been a transaction between private persons intending to confer rights on third persons not parties to the original transaction. The other reason for adopting this form of proceeding, consistently with the idea that the endorsed bonds, in themselves, constituted the lien, is that the bonds, after being endorsed, were to be placed in the hands of the corporation to be disposed of as they might think best under their charter, so that, if finally sold to third parties, there would be an interval of time after the endorsement of the bonds and before such third persons would be in a position, by their purchase, to be invested with such lien. During this period of time the state would be without a lien for its own security, unless such lien was brought into existence at the moment of the endorsement of the bonds and prior to their passing into the hands of purchasers; and, as at that moment the state was the only existing party that could be invested with such lien, the language employed in the act was a reasonable *and proper provision, assuming that the lien was originally intended as well for the bondholders as the state. Then, unless the language under immediate consideration indicates an intention that the state shall have an exclusive lien for its own protection, it must be concluded that the whole provision of Section 3 is harmonious with the declaration that the endorsed bond shall constitute a lien. Having found the form of the transaction to afford nothing in conflict with any construction, it remains to consider whether the language under consideration imports such an intent for the exclusive advantage of the state as that contended for.

*337

*338

This inquiry will not be confined to the particular language in question, but we will inquire whether there is anything in the whole act, or its parts, that forces the conclusion that the state was to derive exclusive advantage from the security taken. If it was clearly manifest that good faith and fair dealing demanded such a construction, that would constitute a pole-star to guide us in this inquiry.

The appellants strive to make such a case by showing that, under transactions that have occurred since the acceptance of the act of 1856 and the issuing of the bonds contemplated thereby, parties have acquired interests, in favor of which good faith demands that a certain construction of the act of 1856 should be upheld. But the same construction should be put upon the act of 1856, at the present time, that would have been appropriate at the moment of its passage, and at that time the considerations of fair dealing, that are so strenuously urged, had no existence.

Does, then, the language vesting the lien in the state, without the mention of any other parties, imply an intention to hold such a lien for its exclusive protection? That such is not a necessary implication is evident from the fact already noticed, that these words have an office giving them full efficacy independently of any such implication. If any such implication as that contended for can be admitted, it must rest on its reasonableness. It is hardly necessary to say that the direct expressions employed do not lead to any such conclusion; for, the fact that the lien was vested, in the first instance, in the state alone, has already been accounted for as necessary under the circumstances of the case, *on the assumption that a security was intended directly for the bondholders. We are required to say that the vesting of the lien in the state means that the state shall have it exclusively, notwithstanding other portions of the same section of the act indicate an intent that it shall enure to the benefit of the bondholder. That part of the section that vests the lien in the state sets forth the object for which the lien was created and vested, namely, a security for the payment of the bonds and interest. Now, in the payment of the bonds and interest, not only the state but the bondholders were interested, and if security is given for the performance of a particular act, why should it not enure to all interested in the performance of the act, whose interests were the subjects of consideration and protection in the transaction that gave origin to the security?

*339

It is not enough to say that the bondholder is not mentioned, and, therefore, must be excluded, for the previous declaration of the section, making the endorsed bond the agent for constituting the lien, fairly includes the bondholder, and now something must be found that as positively excludes him. If, then, a declaration equivalent to an expression of an intent that the bondholder shall have security is followed by a provision, the effect of which is to uphold a lien in the hands of the state until the rights of such bondholder shall come into actual existence, and by which it is further declared that the object of the investing of such lien is the obtaining security for the payment of the bonds, how, then, can such provision operate to exclude the bondholder when payment in its usual sense is an act in which he has an interest? If a private individual had stood in the place of the state, and the terms of the act had been the terms of a private contract, there can be no doubt that as such contract, in effect, created the rights of the bondholders, such as might, on the contingency contemplated, arise, such terms would be held to amount to a declaration of trust in favor of the after-springing rights of the bondholder, and the surety could not be regarded as holding, subject merely to a general equity of subrogation. It would be anomalous if the creator of rights should be freed, by the operation of implication alone, from all concern for their preservation and protection. All the learning that has *been brought to bear in this case has neither illustrated nor suggested any such proposition. But much stress has been laid upon the fact that in the present instance it is a sovereign that is dealing with a subject, and not persons standing on the same footing in terms of equality. That circumstance, it is conceived, makes against instead of in favor of the appellant's arrangement. Had this been a contract between private persons, conceived in the terms of the act, the legal title to the lien would doubtless have vested and remained in the party standing in the place in which the state now stands; but a trust would, doubtless, have arisen in favor of the future bondholder upon the coming into existence of such an interest. The reason why the legal title would remain in such party arises from the nature of instruments for the conveyance of an interest in land. A statute, as an assurance, is not subject to the limitations that affect deeds between individuals. It may create an estate or interest in the lands in futuro as well as in presenti, and in persons not in esse at the passage of the law, as well as those in being and in the direct contemplation of the statute. Equity often raises a trust on the idea that parties having a certain interest were powerless under the forms of law to effectuate directly that interest. Such want of efficiency cannot be predicated of a statute, and, therefore, the necessity of raising and upholding a trust cannot arise, as a better result can be reached by construction without the aid of equitable invention. The foregoing observations properly relate to passive trusts, for active trusts depend upon a different principle, by which the judgment and skill of one may be made available for the benefit of another. Passive trusts are to be regarded as a mere form of assurance to aid defects in the formal methods in use.

*340

There was nothing to prevent the title acquired by the state in the lien or mortgage from passing under the operation of the statute directly to and vesting in the bondholder according to the extent of his interest, and, therefore, there was no inconsistency in creating a lien, attached to a bond, that may pass from hand to hand, and vesting that lien in the state; but it was eminently proper at a time when the interest of the state under such lien was the only existing interest, and a cover to all that should sub*sequently arise out of that transaction. Much stress is laid on the fact that at the time this act was passed the financial credit of the state was such as to preclude the idea that one dealing with the state would desire any further security than that afforded by that credit. There is a difficulty in drawing such an inference consistently with the rules of interpretation, but if it should be successfully drawn it would not be sufficient in itself to change the sense of terms used in a statute in other respects free from doubt. When it is considered that a demand against a state cannot be enforced by any legal means by an individual, it is evident that the inference thus pressed upon is based on a sentiment mainly, if not altogether, and, as such, cannot be brought to the standards of legal measure. It certainly does not draw its whole force from an assumed idea that undoubting confidence in the fact that payment will be made at maturity leads to the disregard of securities, for such security is often afforded by the personal credit of individuals of great and sure wealth and probity, yet that circumstance would not be permitted to create exceptions to the rules and presumptions of law in favor of such persons. The argument must rest in the strength of the sentiment of patriotism, either wholly or to a large extent, and in that case is beyond the class of circumstances upon which the law models its rules and presumptions. It has not been argued that there is any inconsistency in the state as a sovereign and an individual having a mutual interest in a security, nor could that question present itself where such mutuality was created by the sovereign himself. It must be concluded that the language of the third section relating to the first section of the road of twenty miles completed is clear, and that it creates a security intended and available both for the state and the bond and coupon-holders under that section, and that neither of such protected parties can exercise exclusive authority over such security. It remains then to consider the language of the fourth section in its bearing on this question.

*341

The provisions of the third section as it regards the character and object of the lien are substantially repeated in the fourth section, but the clause providing that the endorsed bonds should constitute a lien are omitted.

*342

This omission applies to the sec*tions of twenty miles succeeding the first completed, and to what is finally said in regard to the entire road being chargeable on completion. In all these cases the intention is clearly expressed that the security taken shall be for the payment of the bonds. It is in no case said that it is taken for the special indemnity of the state as endorser. That is undoubtedly implied; but the direct provision is for the payment of the bonds. A provision for the payment of bonds is primarily a security for those holding the bonds. It is always so in equity, and at law when its forms permit it. The foregoing view is consistent with the circumstance that the security was demanded by an endorser or surety for the payment of the bonds in the very event that he desires to have brought about. An inference applied to such a case that the surety would prefer to pay the bonds himself and have recourse to the security for his indemnity, and for that purpose to hold the security for his exclusive benefit, has no foundation in law or fact. It must be concluded that the provisions of the fourth section of the act, in regard to the object of the lien or mortgage stipulated for, are not only consistent with the idea that the bondholder should have the benefit of the security conjointly with the state, but bear that sense upon their face. It is, therefore, competent to refer the language of the fourth section to that of the third for a full understanding of the terms of the statute, and thus to satisfy the rules of construction that demand that all that appertains to a single object or purpose should be harmonized together. Such being the case, no further need of comparing the various provisions of the third and fourth sections of the statute exists, and it must be concluded, so far as it regards these sections, that the bonds issued under and in conformity to that act were entitled to the lien or mortgage created by that act at the issuing of such bonds, and that unless that right has been lost through subsequent events, it still remains perfect. It must also be concluded that this indemnity extends to the holders of detached coupons with like effect as to the holder of the bonds. State v. Spartanburg and Union Railroad Company, 8 S. C. 129.

The next question upon the construction of the act of 1856 arises out of the fifth section of that act, which is as follows: *"That the state expressly reserves the right to enact hereafter all such laws as may be necessary to protect the interests of the state, and to secure it against any loss in consequence of the endorsing of the bonds under the provisions of the act, but in such a manner as not to impair the vested rights of the stockholders of the company." It is contended that the true construction of this section secures to the state unlimited control over the lien created by the previous sections of the act as against the bond and coupon-holders claiming thereunder.

*343

The question that presents itself is, is this a reservation of power as against the bond and coupon-holders? It may be conceded at once that it was competent for the state, in the act creating the lien, to reserve to itself authority to dispose of or destroy the lien at its pleasure; the important question is, has it done so? There are two features of this section that are the key to its construction; first, the declaration of the object of the reservation, namely, to protect the interests of the state as affected by its endorsement of the bonds of the company; and, second, the character of the persons whose vested rights should be regarded as limiting the exercise of the power reserved, namely, the stockholders of the company. These provisions serve to define both the character and the limits of the authority thus reserved. We may well look to the character of these provisions, and endeavor to understand what is implied in them as a means of approaching the direct expressions creating the reservation of power. Presumably the "interests of the state" are those disclosed by the act itself, or such as may be properly connected with the matters to which the act relates. If it means more than this, and reserves the right to deal with all the corporate rights and franchises of the company by general legislation, without limitation as to the object in view, and subject only to the limitation in favor of stockholders, then there is the strongest reason for holding that the reservation is made against the railroad company alone.

If, however, it be considered as a reservation against the rights created under the act, and thus against bond and coupon-holders claiming thereunder, then it cannot be regarded in any other light than that above stated, namely, as intended to operate upon *the interests recognized by the act itself. What are those interests? They may be summed up in these words: The payment of the bonds and coupons. It certainly does not mean that the state may pass a law arbitrarily canceling its obligation as surety on the bond, for this might be done without impairing the vested rights of stockholders of the company as such. There are but two constructions that can be put upon this section, namely, that it does not affect the bondholders, or else it is a reservation of unlimited power as against them, and, in the latter case, it would include the right to cancel the obligation of the state. As far as the company is concerned, it saves the rights of the stockholders; and if it is to be regarded as a reservation of power as against the bondholders, its unlimited character, as such, could be argued from the silence of the act as to their vested rights, while expressly reserving those of the stockholders of the company. It is more reasonable to conclude that it was not intended directly to affect the rights of bond and coupon-holders, rather than that it was intended to remove all the protection that well-ordered governments seek to throw around such rights. We must conclude, then, so far at least as it may either directly or indirectly affect the rights of bondholders, that the language disclosing the object of the reservation confines it to such measures as may be deemed necessary to protect the interests of the state, as it regards the full and fair application of the property on which the lien was imposed to the payment of the bonds and coupons. Under this view the interests of the state and that of the bondholders were identical, and the protection of the one was the protection of the other, and the reservation of power contemplated only the acquisition of the most ample means of carrying out all the provisions of the act as intended by it, and thus was a reservation in favor of rather than against the bondholders. This section, like all others in the act, must receive construction, as well as give it to other parts, so that the act, as a whole, may be reasonable and consistent with itself. The appellant's argument, on the contrary, seems to make this section the arbiter of the construction of the entire act; that all else that the statute contains must bend to it, while it can undergo no modification, however great may be the demands of consistency as arising from *the statute as a whole. This is placing the accessory before the principal, and making the means the point of construction instead of the end. It cannot be doubted that this section was introduced into the act for the purpose of affording the amplest means of accomplishing the object of the statute, and not to cover a possible opportunity to recall or destroy what had been given or created by it. The limits to which a power is subjected by the act creating it, often, no doubt, define the character of the power. Here the limit imposed in favor of stockholders primarily suggest, that the power was intended to affect matters in which the stockholders, as such, might have an interest, that is the corporate rights, property and franchises. To stretch this power beyond this definition is to give it an unlimited authority over other vested rights than those expressly reserved, and such a construction is not admissible without stronger grounds of necessity than such as are presented by the present case. We have been referred to various decisions upon the statutes of other states as bearing on the question, but there is no obscurity in the act sufficient to render it necessary to go beyond its text for its construction. It must be concluded, from the foregoing, that the power reserved was not intended to affect or destroy the vested rights of bond and coupon-holders created under the act in question, and that any subsequent law destroying such vested rights or impairing the securities by which they were held, must be regarded as impairing the obligation of a contract made by said act, and, therefore, void in its operation upon such contract. The construction here put upon the act of 1856 is not in conflict with the decision of this court in Hand v. Railroad Company, 5 S. C. 182. The rights involved in that case were the same as those presented in the present appeals, but the court declined to pass upon such rights, as the case was not in a condition for that decision. It is true that the late Chief Justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "The plaintiff here claims to be subrogated to the rights of the state, and unless he can prevail in his assertion, the foreclosure, for the purpose of providing the means of paying his demand set up in the complaint, could not be ordered;" but the claim to subrogation was the only view of the plaintiff's case that was then pressed before the court.

*344

*345

*346

*That the court did not then intend to hold the plaintiff to this narrow view of his rights, is evident from the last paragraph of the opinion, which says: "We do not intend to define the nature of the issues which may properly arise under the pleadings, or to limit the control of the Circuit Court over the case."

Neither does the present construction of the act of 1856 conflict with anything decided in State v. Railroad, 8 S. C. 129. The question in that case of a general character was, whether in the distribution of assets derived from the sale of corporate property, bondholders having liens under bonds not yet due, could come in equally with the holders of coupons detached from such bonds that were overdue. The Chief Justice, in that case, in commenting on the act of December, 1857, (12 Stat. 612), which contains language in regard to another railroad similar to that, the subject of the present discussion, says: "The mortgage was held by the state, and they ('the bond and coupon-holders') were entitled to no relief through its foreclosure; but by a resort to the equitable doctrine of subrogation, which entitles the creditor to the security which the guarantor took for his own protection." This was simply affirming the only view of construction of the act that was claimed or discussed in that case. The question, whether under that act bondholders had any higher rights than the equity referred to, was not discussed, nor could it well be, as the contest was between bond and coupon-holders, who both stood in the same rank of priority, as far as that question was concerned. The observation of the Chief Justice was illustrative merely, and not necessary to the decision of the case, and cannot be regarded as decided law.

The next question to be considered is, whether the holders of bonds or coupons, who took advantage of the provisions of the act of 1869, (14 Stat. 201), contained in the third section thereof, are estopped from asserting the full measure of rights conferred by the act of 1856. The principal object of the act of 1869 was to enable the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company (the new company) to borrow money to complete the repairs of the road, which was partially destroyed by events connected with the late war.

The third and sixth sections are those with which the present *question is concerned. The third section is as follows: "That the said company is hereby further authorized and required to fund and redeem the coupons for interest of the bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, guaranteed by the state, now past due, and that may fall due on or before the first day of September, 1869, by issuing therefor an equal amount of their bonds, with coupons attached for interest, payable semiannually, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and the principal to become due in twenty years after the date thereof; and the payment of the said bonds, so to be issued in substitution for interest coupons, shall be guaranteed by the state in the same manner and as fully as the said original bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company are now guaranteed, subject, however, to the provisions of Section 6 of the act."

*347

The sixth section here referred to reads as follows: "That the present lien of the State of South Carolina on the said road shall, upon the issue of the bonds provided for in and by the first section of this act, be postponed and become a second lien, which said second lien shall extend over and cover the whole road, its outfit and real estate, as fully as is already provided by law; the said road shall be completed by the first of January, 1870."

The bonds referred to in the sixth section, which are to have a first lien upon the whole road and outfit, are those authorized by the second section of the act to carry out the authority conferred by the first section to borrow money for the purpose of extending and rebuilding the road. Can the persons taking advantage of the provisions of the third section by presenting coupons for interest, issued under the act of 1856, and fundable under this section, be permitted to claim and make available, for the payment of the bond and coupons held by them, the original lien or mortgage created by the act of 1856? To answer the question it is necessary to put a construction upon the provisions of the act of 1869, as bearing on the continuance of the lien created by the act of 1856. It cannot be denied that the act of 1869 is, in effect, an assertion on the part of the legislature of its exclusive control over the lien created by the act of 1856. No attempt has been made in argument to point out any features of this act that will bear the construction of intending to reserve the rights *of bond and coupon-holders under the act of 1856, where they do not choose to accept the provisions of the third section. Indeed, an opinion of the then attorney-general is produced, which appears to have been prepared to inform the legislature, while, as a bill, it was on its passage, that holds the control of the state over the lien created by the act of 1856, to be exclusive and absolute. Two circumstances may be inferred from the opinion, coupled with the language of the act as passed—first, that the question of the exclusive right of the state to control the lien acquired under the act of 1856 was involved in the passage of the act; and, second, that the judgment of the legislature was that such was the nature of the rights of the state, and, as a consequence, it could, at its pleasure, destroy or postpone such lien. With this conclusion in view, it is not difficult to put a construction on the intent and meaning of the third section in its bearing on the effect of refunding. It is too clear for argument or the citation of authorities, that one taking a provision made for himself by a statute, must take upon the condition upon which it was offered. This principle equally applies to express conditions, and such as may be fairly implied from the terms of the statute. The act of 1869 was a contract in its bearing on the rights of all parties who should take its advantages, and, as such, they are precluded by the principles of legal estoppel from averring against their obligation, voluntarily assumed upon a valuable consideration.

*348

The third section, in terms, points to the sixth section as having a controlling influence upon its provisions, and the sixth section asserts, in plain terms, the exclusive and absolute character of the rights of the state, as it regards the ownership of the lien or mortgage created under the act of 1856. If the view just stated be correct, then the coupon-holder, refunding, is in the position of one contracting with another, who claims a certain right to obtain advantages which could not be obtained except upon the concession of such claims, and cannot afterwards dispute such right. In such a case he would be precluded, on strictly legal principles, from asserting such title to be in himself against the terms of his contract.

It may be proper to remark, as bearing on the question, *whether the correct statement of the position of the state and the coupon-holder, refunding, has been made above, that the assertion of the title of the state is accompanied by no circumstance or declaration capable of doing away or diminishing its force, and on which a construction can be placed like that already placed on the act of 1856. In that case language was employed that included the bondholder in the assertion of the title to the lien, while here he is expressly excluded therefrom.

*349

Section 6 expressly assumes to deal with the lien to the exclusion of any right therein on the part of the bond or coupon-holder, and this section must be regarded as, in express terms, entering into and forming part of the contract arising by virtue of the act on the part of the coupon holder funding under the third section. The view here taken having placed the effect of the act of 1869 upon the legal principle of estoppel, as affecting those bound by covenant or contract, it will not be necessary to refer in this connection to the equitable principles of estoppel and the elaborate learning connected with that subject.

The referee, and the court sustaining his conclusions, hold that the effect of the act of 1869 on those funding coupons thereunder, was confined to the coupons so funded, and did not preclude parties having funded coupons from afterwards asserting their original rights as it regards the bond and other coupons not so funded. The correctness of this conclusion will next be considered.

The exact question is, whether one having a bond of the class of 1856, and, also, coupons of the same class, whether detached or otherwise, and funding such of said coupons as have matured under the third section of the act of 1869, can be regarded as having accepted the provisions of that act, as well as it regards such bonds and immature coupons as the coupons that are matured and actually funded.

The bonds and their coupons constitute a single obligation. State v. Railroad, 8 S. C. 163. The coupon merely evidences the obligation collaterally, as it regards one of its incidents. The act of 1869 operates upon the entire obligation, both principal and interest. One who accepts its provisions for one purpose, *necessarily accepts it for all purposes, for its provisions are not capable of severance.

*350

Where one claiming upon an obligation for principal and interest accepts interest under a composition in terms assuming to affect the conditions upon which the same is due, it must be regarded as accepting the terms of composition in their whole scope. This conclusion is so obvious that it does not require authority or illustration. It depends upon the principle that when a contract is one and indivisible, if it takes effect at all, it must do so as to all its parts. This does not preclude the possibility of severing the terms and conditions of a contract, but that depends upon mutuality of consent, while in the present case there is no evidence that the state has assented that the act of 1869 may take effect otherwise than according to its entire scope and purpose. It would follow that one funding coupons under that act must be regarded as bond by its terms as it regards any bonds or coupons held by him at the time of funding of the same class, at least with the coupons funded. The case before us does not enable us to apply this principle to the facts of the case; we can, therefore, only set aside the conclusion of the Circuit Court to the extent that it conflicts with the conclusions just stated, and the exact application of the principle laid down must be made upon a further hearing, on which such evidence may be introduced on that point, as the nature of the case demands.

The next question is, whether the holders of the six per cent. bonds and coupons are estopped, in equity, from asserting the lien created by the act of 1856, in consequence of their failing to actively oppose the passage of the act of 1869. The equitable estoppel, the operation of which is claimed in this instance, is usually allowed on two grounds: 1. Where there is a concealment, studied or negligent, of a material fact, to the prejudice of the party alleging the estoppel. 2. Where there are facts and circumstances implying the consent or acquiescence of the party claimed to be estopped.

It cannot be contended that at the time the act of 1869 was passed there were any facts material to be known by the parties seeking and desiring the passage of that act, and not known to them, but which the holders of the bonds and coupons, issued *under the act of 1856, knew and improperly withheld, to the detriment of the rights of the former. The matter of difference in question turns on the construction of the act of 1856 wholly, apart from the question of estoppel. The facts were all known. The memorialists who asked the passage of the act of 1869, claimed that the bond and coupon-holders, under the act of 1856, had no lien as security on the property of the company, but had recourse on the guarantee of the state alone, and that the state could dispose of the security at its pleasure. This was the matter passed upon by the legislature, and decided in the interest of the state. The concealment of material facts cannot, therefore, be alleged as the ground of estoppel.

*351

If, then, the doctrine of equitable estoppel is applicable to the case, it must be on the ground of presumed consent or acquiescence. If a party having title to property, or a right in respect thereof, permits another to exercise authority over such property, or deal with such right, the latter shall not be subjected to damages by reason thereof, for volenti non fit injuria. This is a well-known legal principle, and, under its operation, a license to use both real and personal property is recognized as existing at law, both by deed or other writing under seal and by parol, and is also presumed from the conduct and relationship of the parties, when not in terms expressed. This principle, in an expanded form, lies at the foundation of the equitable doctrine of estoppel by acquiescence. The grounds upon which equity upholds the action of one who deals with the rights of another in a manner inconsistent with the legal proprietorship, embrace the following particulars:

1. There must be a right, legal or equitable, held by one and exercised by another.

2. Such exercise must have been in good faith, and in the belief of its rightfulness, and its failure must involve the loss of a valuable consideration.

3. The actual proprietor must be chargeable with wrongful conduct, tending to induce such interference with his rights, either by misrepresenting or withholding the truth of some fact, or by conduct warranting a belief of his assent thereto.

Duke of Leeds v. Amherst, 22 E. C. R. 123,

*352

(2 Phill.) In *this case Lord Cottenham says: "If a party having a right stands by and sees another dealing with the property in a manner inconsistent with that right, and makes no objection while the act is in progress, he cannot afterwards complain."

This is a broad and altogether unlimited statement of the proposition, but fairly includes all the grounds above stated. The right involved in that case was that of a tenant in tail to prevent waste. As that case was not brought within the principle in question, a more limited statement of the rule was not called for.

Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166. In that case Chancellor Kent stated the rule in its application to one having title, yet encouraging a purchase from another person who had no title. He says: "When one having title acquiesces knowingly and freely in the disposition of his property for a valuable consideration by a person pretending to have title, and having color of title, he shall be bound by that disposition of the property, and, especially, if he encouraged the parties to deal with each other in such sale and purchase." The terms "knowingly and freely," as here used, exclude all possibility that the party standing by was acting in good faith, and are, in their effect, equivalent to the declaration that the conduct of a party in such cases must be wrongful. The distinction between legal and equitable estoppel must be here borne in mind. The former, when arising from the specific acts or general conduct of parties, proceeds in harmony with their declared or presumed intentions, and is enforced as such in equity as well as at law, while equitable estoppel, in the strict sense, being based on the idea of fraud, proceeds against the intentions of the party, and upon the inferences that the party claiming the estoppel had a right to draw from such conduct. We are dealing altogether with the question of equitable estoppel, which rests on the idea of wrong, and aims to defeat the intention of the wrong-doer rather than to uphold and enforce it. Chancellor Kent further says: "It is deemed an act of fraud for a party conversant all the time of his own rights to suffer another, ignorant of that right, to go on, under that ignorance, and purchase the property or expend money in making improvements upon it;" but he also holds that the party sought to be estopped cannot plead that he was ignorant of his legal rights in the mat*ter. This last position is reconcilable with the statement that precedes it, that fraud is the basis of the equitable doctrine, as the assertion of title, after permitting an act inconsistent with it, through ignorance of such title, would tend to work all the consequences of a fraud on the opposite party, and thus make a case for the interference of equity as clear as if fraud actually lay in the intentions of the party while thus standing by. In that case an injunction was allowed to prevent one having legal title from recovering in ejectment.

*353

Hobbs v. Norton, 1 Vern. 136. In that case a party ignorant of his right to claim an annuity encouraged its purchase of another party, and was held estopped from afterwards setting up his title as against the purchaser. The Lord Keeper held "that it was a negligent thing in him not to inform himself of his own title, that thereby he might have informed the purchaser of it, when he came to inquire of him, and, therefore, decreed Sir George to conform the annuity to Hobbs." Evidently this does not mean that every person ignorant of his legal rights must be deemed negligent, but that, under the facts before him, such negligence appeared. In that case the foundation of the relief granted was the wrong of the legal owner. The case excludes the idea that only actual and intentional fraud is sufficient to authorize such relief; still it is not in conflict with the general principle that fraud is at the basis of the remedy, for an attempt to gain advantage from a wrong is in the nature of fraud, having the same consequences, and often becomes actual fraud.

Hundson v. Cheyney, 2 Vern. 150. In that case, one having title and encouraging the plaintiff to purchase from a third party was held estopped, notwithstanding that ignorance of title was urged as an excuse. It does not appear that the defendant was ignorant of the facts upon which his legal title rested, and it may be assumed that the ignorance alleged was ignorance of the law, which cannot be affirmed.

Raw v. Pote, 2 Vern. 239. In that case the relief was granted, on the ground of actual fraud in encouraging the purchase.

Chamberlain v. Railroad, 92 U. S. 299 [23 L. Ed. 715]. One was held estopped from disputing rights claimed under an act of legislature, where he had actually urged before the legislature the adoption *of the measure secured by such act. The case stands on the same ground of principle with those previously examined.

*354

Chapman v. Chapman, 59 Penn. 214. The rule applied in that case was stated as follows: "Positive acts, tending to mislead one ignorant of the truth, which do mislead him, to his injury, are a good ground of estoppel; and ignorance of title on the part of him who is estopped will not excuse this act." Again: "Silence will postpone a title when one should speak out, when, knowing his own right, he suffers his silence to lull to rest instead of warning of danger; when, to use the language of the books, silence becomes a fraud. * * * He who is led by such silence, ignorantly and innocently, to rest upon his title, believing it to be secure, and to expend money and make improvements upon his property without the timely warning, he should have had to dispel his illusion, will be protected by estoppel against recovery." It was held that marriage was a valuable consideration within the rule as to estoppel.

The distinction here drawn between the wrong accomplished by active participation and that by guilty silence, illustrates the foundation of the equitable doctrine. When one seeks to overthrow the state of things which he has actually brought about, to the prejudice of another, a clear wrong is perpetrated, and it is no excuse that he was ignorant of his title, for that ignorance should prejudice him alone as the result of his fault or misfortune; but its consequences should not be cast off from himself upon another, for each one should bear the consequences of his own fault or misfortune. But, if silence only is alleged, knowledge of his right must be made to appear, for the possession of such knowledge is an essential element of the question of the wrongful character of such silence. The cases already stated sufficiently illustrate all the features of the proposition which they are here adduced to support, and it is unnecessary to make further citations.

Do these principles apply to the conduct of the bond and coupon-holders under the act of 1856? Can they be said to be chargeable with guilty silence, and that the appellants are in their present position through their misconduct?

We are dealing at the present time wholly with a class of indi*viduals between whom, as far as we know, there is no other ground for associating them than such as arises from the fact that they are the holders of instruments for the payment of money of a certain class payable to bearer.

*355

The separate action of the individuals that compose the group is not before us, except in one or two instances, to which the testimony relates. The case does not contain the findings requisite to enable us to say whether any particular individual of this class under consideration has, by his misconduct, subjected himself to the rule of estoppel. As the case stands the only inquiry we can make is, whether the entire class of bond and coupon-holders, under the act of 1856, are estopped by reason of silence, when, as it is contended, they should have given active opposition to the act of 1869. It is not shown that the class in question are chargeable, as a class, with having encouraged the passage of the act. The question that presents itself at this point is very simple, and may be reduced to these simple terms: When one goes to the legislature and asks the passage of an act to take away my rights, am I bound to go there, assuming that I have knowledge of the fact, and oppose such action? Very clearly no such obligation rests upon me. If the judgment of a court cannot prejudice my rights, unless I am a party before it, even if I have actual knowledge of the pendency of the proceedings before it, much less should the proceedings of a legislative body, not primarily clothed with power to divest individual rights, have such binding force against me. The fact that the state was an interested party makes the case still stronger. The state had no right to assume the consent of the bondholders, from the fact that they did not appear in the lobbies of the general assembly in opposition to the measure. It is not to be presumed, and it does not appear, that any case exists where a party has been charged with guilty silence, as it regards a particular transaction, unless present in person or by agent, at the time and place of such transaction, or involved in correspondence connected therewith. It does not appear that the bond or coupon-holders of 1856 occupied this position, and it is for those who allege guilty silence to prove it to be such. Knowing these persons only as a class, we cannot apply to the case any presumption that would *even charge them with knowledge of the pendency of the proceedings before the legislature. In individual instances such knowledge may have been possessed, but it is impossible to hold that their silence was, in itself, evidence of wrong, or in any sense equivalent to fraud.

*356

Neither the state nor the parties who have come in under the act of 1869 can allege ignorance of the legal effect of the act of 1856, for that would amount to ignorance of the law; and if ignorance of one's rights does not protect from estoppel him who actively participates in the transaction, it ought not to help those seeking such relief against others. It is clear that the holders of bonds and coupons of 1856 were not bound to oppose the passage of the act of 1869 in the legislature, but that they are justified in waiting until they could defeat its operation in the courts, and, therefore, they are not estopped on the ground claimed.

The foregoing conclusions establish the proposition that the bond and coupon-holders, under the act of 1856, took a first mortgage or lien upon all the property of the old company intended by that act to be subjected to such mortgage or lien, which the legislature had no right to destroy or postpone, as such an attempt was in violation of the provisions of the constitution of the United States and of this state, forbidding the passage of a law impairing the obligation of a contract, and which lien, as it regards this class of bond and coupon-holders, other than those refunding interest, as before stated, has not been alleged and proven.

Whether individual members of such class have lost the right to claim the enforcement of such lien, has not been determined by the report of the referee nor the decree of the Circuit Court, and cannot be considered here.

Objections have been made to the claims of the bond and coupon-holders under the act of 1856, both as a class and as individuals, that will be considered. It is alleged that coupons of that class have been paid by the defendant corporation, after the road had been rebuilt, with means derived from bonds issued under the act of 1869; and it is claimed that this worked an estoppel as affecting the individuals accepting such payments. The evidence and the findings do not show the fact to which this objection relates. If, however, it is meant by the objection that *payment, accepted by holders of bonds or coupons under the twentieth section of the act of 1866, constitutes an estoppel as to any other bonds or coupons held by the persons accepting such payments, then the objection is without legal force. The act of 1866, (13 Stat. 438), incorporated the defendant corporation for the purpose of exercising the rights and franchises formerly appertaining to the old company, and sold for foreclosure under a mortgage subsequent to the lien of the bonds and coupons of 1856. Section 20 of the act provides "that the company hereby formed shall assume and be held liable for the payment of the six per cent. interest-bearing bonds, whereon the guaranty of the state has been endorsed, and the lien of the state is, in every respect, preserved and hereby reaffirmed." This provision, by virtue of the acceptance by the defendant corporation of the benefits of the act, became a binding obligation on such defendant to pay the coupons and bonds of 1856 at maturity. It was, in effect, the same as a covenant on the part of a purchaser from a mortgagor to pay the mortgage debt, although enlarged in its operation, as such, through the fact that it was made such by a public statute, and not a covenant between parties alone. The act contained nothing inconsistent with the rights of the bond and coupon-holders of 1856, but, on the contrary, expressly reserved the rights in which they were interested. Such bond and coupon-holders, in demanding and receiving interest, took nothing on any express or implied condition of waiving any antecedent right, and, consequently, are neither estopped at law nor in equity. The question whether the ability of the defendant corporation to pay arose from money borrowed under the act of 1869, or, otherwise, is altogether immaterial.

*357

It is objected that it does not appear that the bond and coupon-holders of 1856 have made an attempt to obtain payment of the state, the endorser of their bonds. A demand, without the right to prosecute at law, would be fruitless and a mere ceremony, and, as such, its absence, if established, could not give rise to any equity.

The defendant corporation, under the twentieth section of their charter, assumed to save the state free from liability on its endorsement by contracting to pay such indebtedness, and neither *the defendant nor the classes of creditors that derive their liens under such defendant corporation can claim in equity that the primary duty of payment rests upon the state and not upon the defendant corporation.

*358

It is contended that the bond and coupon-holders of 1856 have a double security, should they be held to have a lien or mortgage under the act of 1856, namely, that lien on the one hand, and the pledge of the faith and funds of the state on the other, and that appellants have only one of their securities, and equity requires the party having a double security to first exhaust that which will not injure the other party protected by the same securities. Although the proposition is in the face of the covenant of the defendant corporation to pay, primarily, yet it will be considered. The promises of the state to pay money, incapable of enforcement by suit, cannot, with any propriety, be regarded as a security within the meaning of the rule of equity invoked. Equity cannot lay hold of and apply such a demand. It would be a much stronger case to hold that one that has a bond secured by a mortgage holds a double security within the sense of the rule of equity, so that a subsequent mortgagee might enjoin proceedings to foreclose the prior mortgage, on the ground that the prior mortgagee was bound first to exhaust his remedy upon the bond, yet such an application of the rule of equity has not been made. Much less can an imperfect personal obligation, that is, one incapable of legal enforcement, constitute such a security in the contemplation of equity.

The view taken of the rights of the bond and coupon-holders renders it unnecessary to examine those objections that raise the question of the right of a trustee to charge his cestui que trust with moneys expended for the preservation of the trust estate. Whatever rights these bond and coupon-holders acquired under the act of 1856 they acquired in their own right at the moment they became such holders, and nothing was left in the state, as it regards that class of liens on which the state could exercise the powers of a trustee.

It is contended that the holders of the bond and coupons of 1856 owed some duty to the bond and coupon-holders of 1869 which has been neglected, and, therefore, they should be barred *and estopped from making their demand. It is said that they stood by and saw the money obtained under the act of 1869 expended for the benefit of the security, with knowledge of all the facts, and gave no notice of their demand. This objection is substantially answered by what has already been said in reference to their silence while the act of 1869 was upon its passage in the legislature. It certainly cannot be contended that when a mortgagor, having borrowed money on a second mortgage for the purpose, undertakes to expend such money on improvements, or even for the preservation of the mortgaged premises, the first mortgagor, with a recorded mortgage, must come forward, either with objection or at least notice of his claims, at the peril of having his security postponed to the junior one.

*359

The right of the bondholders of 1856 was derived under a public statute, of which all were bound to take notice, and stand, as to subsequent encumbrancers, on the same footing as that of a prior recorded mortgage to a subsequent one.

It is contended on behalf of the holders of the bonds issued under the act of 1869 for the redemption of coupons matured upon the bonds of 1856, and which bonds are entitled by that act to a guaranty of payment by the state, that they are entitled to a decree against the state for the amount due from the state on its guaranty. Such a decree would be collateral to the relief demanded in the present action, and, therefore, is not necessarily called for, even if admissible in itself. But the state guaranteed nothing by the act of 1869 beyond authorizing an endorsement of its pledge of payment as surety on the bonds issued in lieu of coupons of bonds that previously held such pledge. Such a guaranty cannot be directly enforced by suit against the state, and, consequently, cannot be enforced in an indirect way as collateral to other issues.

There was no error in the ruling that the bonds issued under the act of 1869, for the redemption of coupons of 1856, were not entitled to any lien on the property of the company. It has already been held that the act of 1869 was, in effect, an assertion on the part of the state of exclusive control over the lien or mortgage created by the act of 1856, and that the holders of bonds and coupons, who accepted the benefit of the act of 1869, assented *to, and are bound by this view of the act of 1856. It would follow that they can claim nothing but what the act of 1869 recognizes by way of security. In that act the state waives its lien under the act of 1856 in behalf of the holders of bonds issued under the first section of that act which does not cover the redemption bond. Consequently the position of the redemption bonds is this: The property of the company is liable, as far as the bonded debt is concerned, in the first instance, for the payment of the bonds and coupons of 1856, where the rights of the holders have not become subsequently impaired; secondly, to the bonds issued under the first section of the act of 1869; thirdly, to indemnify the state upon its guaranty on the bonds and coupons of 1856, and on those issued under the act of 1869, which have upon them the endorsement of the guaranty of the state. This would leave the state bound as surety on the redemption bonds, and holding a third lien, wholly subject to its control for its protection from liability thereunder.

*360

It does not appear that any case was made, or attempted to be made, in the Circuit Court for applying the principles of subrogation as between the state as surety and the holders of the redemption bonds holding the state as surety, and that question cannot be considered as opened by the appeal.

It is clear that the reasoning already applied to the act of 1856 to show that the lien of the state was intended equally for the holders of bonds as for itself, is inapplicable to the act of 1869, which has a manifest intent to the contrary, therefore there is no ground for holding that the lien of the state, reserved by the act of 1869, as it regards the redemption bonds, enured to the benefit of the holders of such bonds, so as to give them an independent right to enforce it.

It is also contended in behalf of the holders of the redemption bonds, that the state, "as surety, has a right and is bound to set up the coupons which have been paid and redeemed by its guaranty of the Savannah and Charleston railroad bonds of 1869, given for these coupons." It is certain that the state could not set up these redeemed coupons as against the bonds issued under the first section of the act of 1869, for that would violate the terms of the security given by that act to the holders of such *bonds. Nor could such an equity be set up against the older legal and equitable right of the holders of the bonds and coupons of 1856, who have not forfeited their rights as such, as that would defeat the rule that where equities are equal the legal right will prevail.

*361

It does not appear that this demand of the holders of the redemption bonds was brought forward until after the Circuit decree was rendered, as no reference to the subject is found in the exceptions to the referee's report, and its first appearance in the case is among the grounds of appeal. It is too late to raise such a new and distinctive equity after decree. This conclusion disposes of the further exception that the state, having failed to set up such redeemed coupons, the holders of the redemption bonds can do so by way of subrogation to the place of the state.

As it regards the claims of the estate of G. A. Trenholm and Rev. W. T. Potter, the views of the referee are approved, so far as he sustains the right of the claimant to enforce the mortgage. It remains to consider whether the conclusions of the referee, as to the relative priority of the liens under the act of 1856, and under the mortgage through which the defendant corporation claims title and the mortgage in question, are correct.

The claims of the estate of Trenholm and Potter arise on bonds secured by a purchase-money mortgage on lands sold to the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company. The subject of this sale was a body of land, only a portion of which was required for the use of the railroad. The purchase of the land was made on the 4th of March, 1858. The date of the bonds and mortgage does not appear, but may be assumed to be the same as that already stated, namely, March 4th, 1858. At the date of this mortgage it is claimed that there were two liens outstanding against the property of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, namely, that created by the act of 1856 in behalf of the state and the holders of securities issued under that act, and the mortgage to secure an issue of bonds, under which the defendant corporation obtained title.

The first question presented is, whether the lien of the act of 1856 can prevail over the mortgage held by the estate of Trenholm and Potter as a first lien on the land so purchased and mortgaged.

*362

This will be considered, first, as it regards the portion of the land so purchased, which was required and used for the immediate purposes of the railroad, as such; and, second, as to that part of the purchased land that was not required for the direct purposes of the railroad. The lien created by the act of 1856 covers "the entire road, including the stock, right of way, grading, bridges, masonry, iron rails, spikes, chairs, and the whole superstructure and equipments, and all the property owned by the company, as incident to or necessary to its business." Act, 1856, § 4.

This lien was to be created and take effect "when the whole of said road shall be completed."

It does not appear at what date the whole road was completed. We are led to infer that the date of the completion of the road was subsequent to that of the execution of the bonds and mortgage of Trenholm and Potter, inasmuch as the object of the transaction was to secure the right of way for the road, and the road could not be completed in conformity with the requirements of the act of 1856 until the right of way had been acquired throughout its full extent. We are at liberty to draw this inference, as it is in support of the decree, which must be presumed right until the contrary is made to appear. Prior to the mortgage, then, the only liens actually created under the act were those that arose on each separate section of the road of twenty miles, at its completion, to the extent required by the act of 1856, and upon the endorsing of the bonds covering that section. The lien given on each section was "upon said section so prepared, as aforesaid, including the road bed, right of way, grading, bridges and masonry upon all the stock subscribed for in said company, and upon said iron rails, chairs, spikes and equipments, when purchased and delivered." This lien does not include the general property of the company. It must be concluded, for the reasons already stated, that the section that includes the land mortgaged was not completed for want of full right of way until after the mortgage was made. The case does not show to what section of the road the purchased land in question belonged, but *that is unimportant under the view here taken. It follows that the mortgage took effect prior to the attaching of the lien, as it regards the land included in and forming the road bed and so much lying contiguous thereto as was reasonable for the purposes of the railroad, the test as to the quantity being whether it could be separated from the railroad franchise without impairing the value and usefulness of the latter. As it regards so much of the mortgaged land as properly appertained to the railroad, as such, a question arises whether the provisions of the act do not operate to create a lien relating back to the date of the passage of the act, as it regards all other liens created or attempted to be created after that date. This question arises under two aspects of the act. The first is that the act provides that no lien shall exist at the time the bonds are so endorsed, other than that created by the act itself, and requires that evidence of the non-existence of such additional lien shall be furnished before the bonds shall be endorsed. It is not necessary to consider whether it was not competent for the legislature to frame the act of 1856 in such a manner that no other lien than that intended by that act could be effectually created after the date of the passage of the act so as to take precedence of the lien created by the act itself, for we will find that the act does not assume to accomplish any such purpose. This is evident from the fact that evidence of the non-existence of liens was required which would not be necessary if the act itself was intended to operate to prevent the possibility of the existence of any such liens. Nor can the purposes of the act be extended, in this respect, beyond the limits of necessary implication, for the reason that it would then interfere with common rights incident to dominion over land.

*363

The other view of the act is, that all parties had notice, by means of the act, of the intention of the legislature that such act should operate to create a lien superior to any other that might exist, and having such notice could not defeat the reasonable intent of the act. The answer to this is, that the act stops short of indicating such a purpose, and can only take effect according to the purposes declared or necessarily to be implied. Besides, the parties selling the land and taking back a mortgage for the purchase money, could not, with certainty, know that the corpo*ration would ever apply for the endorsement of the bonds so as to interfere with a lien for the purchase money. The corporation had the right to apply for the endorsement of the bonds upon the terms stipulated in the act, but were not bound to do so. It, therefore, appears that the object of the statute was not absolutely to create a lien at all events, but to give the corporation voluntary power to bring such lien into operation on certain contingencies under their control. The act being in this respect permissive and not mandatory, there is no ground for saying that the creature of an independent lien by the defendant corporation defeated the intent of the statute, although the subsequent act of taking endorsed bonds, with such lien outstanding, may have tended to produce that effect, but of that none of the parties complain.

*364

The next question is, whether the mortgage of January, 1858, under which the defendant corporation holds title, and which was antecedent in point of time to the purchase money mortgage in question, is entitled to priority over that mortgage.

It cannot be doubted that a railroad corporation may mortgage after-to-be-acquired property. Dunham v. Railroad, 1 Wall. 259 [17 L. Ed. 584]; Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. 117 [16 L. Ed. 436]; Pierce v. Railroad, 24 Wis. 551. So, if it makes a good mortgage of the land, and afterwards purchases personal property, giving a lien thereon for the purchase money, and such personal property becomes attached to the soil, being used for the construction of improvements upon it, the lien of the mortgage of the land prevails over that made for the security of the purchase money of the personal property. Railroad v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. 459 [20 L. Ed. 199]. But to hold that a railroad company may make a mortgage of land to be acquired so as to defeat a purchase-money mortgage of land subsequently acquired, stands on an entirely different footing and cannot be admitted.

The grounds already presented would as well dispose of the question as it relates to the land mortgaged other than that required for the road bed and its appurtenances, but it is not necessary to resort to such reasonings, inasmuch as property held by a railroad company other than for the immediate uses of the railroad, stands on the same footing as lands in the hands of a natural person. Doubtless it might be otherwise when a pecu*liar character has been impressed upon such holdings by the law governing the corporation, but such is not claimed to be the case here.

*365

The Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company having given a purchase money mortgage for the land, no obligation or lien affecting that company or its property can be interposed prior to such purchase-money mortgage. The mortgage of Trenholm and Potter was properly upheld by the decree as a first lien as to such mortgaged property. So far as it regards that portion of the mortgaged land that was requisite for the use of the railroad, as such, the claims of the estate of Trenholm and of Potter must be confined to the fund arising from the sale of the railroad as a whole, and for that purpose there should be an inquiry to ascertain what ratable proportion of the whole fund arising from such sale would properly represent the relative value of that portion of the mortgaged land. The rest of the mortgaged land in question must be sold separately, and the proceeds applied on the foregoing principles.

The next question to be considered is, the right of the state to tax the property of the defendant corporation. The act of 1869 required the road to be completed by the first of January, 1870, and provided "that no tax shall be assessed or levied upon the said road until the same shall have been completed."

It is evident that the intent of the act was that the road should become subject to taxation not later than January 1st, 1870, when it was required to be completed. But the appellants contend that it was not, in fact, completed at that time, and has not yet been completed, and that until so completed taxes cannot be levied under the act. This is virtually claiming that they may disregard one of the provisions of the act and still insist upon the benefit of another, when the two clauses cannot, from their nature, be disconnected from each other. That is to say, that they may claim exemption from taxation on the ground that they have failed to comply with the requirements in regard to the completion of the road. This would be taking advantage of their own wrong. The act cannot be construed as intending any such one-sided advantage.

The referee and the Circuit judge concludes, as matter of fact, *that the road was completed, in the sense contemplated by the act, previous to the imposition of the taxes claimed. This conclusion is based substantially on the idea that it was a substantial completion of the road when the terminus at Charleston was reached, at a point opposite to that city, on the Ashley river, and passengers and freight were transferred across the river by boat to that city, and when, by arrangement with another railroad running into the city of Savannah, it was enabled to run its trains over the track of such road for about three miles into the city of Savannah. It is evident that this arrangement put in exercise the franchise of the defendant corporation to carry passengers and freight, for hire, to its full extent, that is, from the city of Charleston to the city of Savannah. Whether the defendant corporation chose to build and own or lease their right of approach to Savannah is immaterial to the question of completion within the meaning of the act of 1869. Under such circumstances, the exemption claimed by the defendant corporation cannot be sustained by any reasonable construction of the act of 1869. That portion of the decree that sustains the imposition of the taxes, should be affirmed.

*366

It was contended in argument that there was no creditor before the court, as plaintiff, who had the right to demand the sale of the road. The state is clearly such a creditor, and has a complaint demanding a sale of the road for the payment of its debts. Although the state has assumed to modify its original position, that fact is immaterial to the questions presented by the appeal, as it has not relinquished its claims for taxes, nor sought to abandon that part of its complaint that seeks the satisfaction of such taxes out of the property of the defendant corporation.

So much of the decree as orders the sale of the road should be modified by a provision that as to all that part of the permanent property mortgaged that lies within the State of Georgia, such sale must be made subject to such liens as have been, or may hereafter be, established under the laws of that state. In this manner the purchaser will acquire all the right of all parties before the court, and be enabled, if it should become necessary, to prosecute such remedies as may be requisite to become invested with that portion of the permanent property situated within the *jurisdiction of the State of Georgia. The movable property in the hands of the receiver, being fully within the jurisdiction of this court, is not subject to the above modification. Subject to the modifications hereinbefore indicated, the decree of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

*367

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

HASKELL, A. J. I am unable to concur in the construction given to the act of 1856. 12 Stat. 467.

The act is ambulatory in its character and passes over an extended period of time, providing for a succession of progressive events and separate transactions before it establishes the final provision which is to govern the whole as an entirety.

Section 3 is made, by the majority of the court, the key of the construction and to govern the act, but is strictly applicable only to the twenty-mile or fractional division of the road, and the bonds issued for its outfit and completion. For the section is partial in its nature, and antecedent, both in the act and in its legal bearing, to so much of Section 4 as becomes of force on the completion of the whole road, and applies to all the bonds endorsed by the state at any time, issued to effect the completion of the several divisions of the road. Section 4 was part of the contract created under Section 3, and even if, as is held, the lien had vested in the bond, upon its issue for the completion of each fractional division, it so vested subject to the provision of Section 4, and on the completion of the road passed over and vested again in the state, subject to its control under the power reserved in Section 5.

But no such difficulty arises in the view my mind is constrained to take of the act. Section 3 enacts that "the State of South Carolina, upon the endorsing of said bonds, and by virtue of the same, shall be invested with said lien or mortgage," &c. It is immaterial to consider whether "by virtue of the same," refers to the "endorsing" or to the bonds thus endorsed, for, under the view taken, the result would be the same. Section 4 provides that "when the whole of said road shall be completed *the State of South Carolina shall be invested with a lien, without a deed from the company, upon the entire road," &c.

*368

The difference of construction arises upon the meaning of the word "constitute," in the preceding portion of Section 3, by which it is provided "that so soon as any such bonds shall have been endorsed as aforesaid, for the first section of the road as aforesaid, they shall constitute a lien upon said section so prepared as aforesaid," &c.

It is held that this provision, overbearing all other language used in the act, renders the lien accessory to the bond and vests it in the subsequent holder of the bond—the purchaser.

The analogy of a judgment used in the reasoning would be satisfactory if made complete. Thus, if it be enacted that A institute an action, and that the judgment, when entered up in the name of A, shall constitute a lien, and that said lien shall be for the benefit of B, and as soon as established shall vest in B, the cases would be similar. The plain interpretation is, that the judgment held by A would be evidence of the lien, but that the lien itself would be vested in B. "Constitute," in its primary sense, means "cause to stand, set up or establish;" and, in its secondary sense, "compose of, form," which latter is the construction adopted by the majority of the court. And such would be quite admissible were it consistent with the positive language used in other portions of the act, but when it produces inconsistency, the primary meaning, which is entirely in harmony with the rest of the act, should have preference. Adopting, therefore, the word in its primary sense, Section 3 means not that the bonds shall, in themselves, compose or form a lien, but that they shall, by their exclusion and endorsement, establish or be evidence of a lien. In whom that lien shall be vested is thus left open, and is determined by the second provision of Section 3, so far as regards each fraction of the road, and finally as to the whole road by Section 4, whereby the said lien is invested in the state. The bonds are thus the evidence of the creation of the lien which vests according to the statute.

The view that the vesting of the lien in the state was intended as only a temporary provision, of force only so long as the bonds, after endorsement, remained in the hands of the railroad com*pany, is refuted by the purpose and provisions of the act, which authorizes the bonds to be endorsed in parcels proportionate with fractional divisions of the road. The plain object is, (1) to facilitate the completion of the road by sections; (2) to enforce the application of the proceeds of the bonds at the rate per mile fixed by the act; and (3) to insure the completion of the entire road down to the last fraction before the endorsement of the last batch of the bonds. To effect such purposes the bonds would be sold in the order in which the sections were completed in compliance with the act, and, consequently, would all be in the hands of purchasers before the final completion. What, then, could be the sense of a provision like that in Section 4, to vest in the state a lien, the title to endure only so long as the bonds remained in the hands of the railroad company, when ex necessitate, the bonds must go out of such hands before the accrual of the period to which the provision in Section 4 relates, viz., the completion of the entire road. The other reasons advanced to aid in the construction of the act are sufficiently met by the view that the guarantee by the sovereign power is superior to any and all classes of securities, so long as good faith is observed by the government; and that it will be, is always to be presumed. From such point of view it would be a detriment rather than an advantage that bondholders should be compelled to exhaust all legal remedies before they could look to the state for the fulfillment of her pledge, and such anticipation would, in 1856, the time at which the act was passed, have diminished rather than increased the market value of the bonds.

*369

I concur in the other points decided, so far as they do not conflict with the views herein expressed.

Decree affirmed.

---

12 S. C. *370

*(Case No. 762.)

THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, by THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, ex relatione W. R. CATHCART et al., v. THE CITY OF COLUMBIA et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Trial ⟸394.]

The failure of a Circuit judge to state his findings of fact and conclusions of law separately, is not error in the judgment, which may be remedied by appeal.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bouknight v. Brown, 16 S. C. 164; Chapman v. Lipscomb, 18 S. C. 230; Briggs v. Briggs, 24 S. C. 379.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 924; Dec. Dig. ⟸394.]

[2. Municipal Corporations ⟸931.]

Bonds of a municipal corporation, issued with intent to retire, by means of their proceeds, outstanding bonds of a previous issue, having accomplished such purpose, will be held valid in equity, although the statute under whose authority they were issued contained the proviso "that before such issue the city council shall recall and cancel" the bonds so outstanding. Haskell, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1944; Dec. Dig. ⟸931.]

[3. Municipal Corporations ⟸921.]

Bonds of a municipal corporation issued under the authority of an act of the legislature, which provided "that no bond shall be negotiated under the provisions of this act otherwise than by public sale, notice of which," &c., and endorsed with a recital that the provisions of the act in this particular had been complied with, held to be valid obligations of the city, although sold on a day to which the sale had been adjourned from the day of which proper advertisement had been given, and bid in by members of the city council at a price less than a limit fixed by council, and subsequently resold privately at an enhanced price for the benefit of the city. Haskell, A. J., dissented as to those bonds which were privately negotiated for purposes, in his judgment, ultra the objects authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1932; Dec. Dig. ⟸921.]

[4. Municipal Corporations ⟸921.]

The city of Columbia directed her mayor to borrow money to carry on the construction of a city hall and market, and for other purposes necessary for the support of the city government. A loan was effected for $75,000, secured by an issue of $250,000 in bonds, dated August 21st, 1871, deposited as collateral security. Subsequently the legislature passed an act authorizing the city to issue bonds, with a proviso "that before such issue the city council shall recall and cancel the bonds to the amount of $250,000, issued August 21st, 1871, for the erection of city hall and market," and with a further provision that the proceeds of the sale of such new bonds should be applied "first to the payment of any debts heretofore contracted for the construction of the new city hall and the new market," &c. Held, that the act recognized the $75,000 loan as having been made for the city hall and market, and authorized its payment, and the council were not limited to the payment of only so much of such loan as was actually so expended. Haskell, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1934; Dec. Dig. ⟸921.]

*371

[5. Municipal Corporations ⟸955.]

*In the absence of proof that the proceeds of the bonds were expended for purposes other than such as constituted proper municipal objects, it cannot be held that there was a violation of the sixth section of the act which required such proceeds to be applied "first to the payment of any debts heretofore contracted, or which may hereafter be contracted for the construction of the new city hall and the new market; and, secondly, for the improvement of the streets, the extension of the water works, and for any other improvements which shall be adjudged advisable by the said mayor and aldermen." Haskell, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2006; Dec. Dig. ⟸955.]

[6. Municipal Corporations ⟸911.]

Expenditures for purposes other than the construction of the city hall and market, before the completion of such buildings, were not unauthorized by this act. Haskell, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1899, 1901; Dec. Dig. ⟸911.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⟸1010.]

A finding of fact by the Circuit Court against the appellants, upon whom lay the burden of proof, sustained, there being no overbearing testimony to the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3979-3982, 4024; Dec. Dig. ⟸1010.]

[8. Municipal Corporations ⟸924.]

Section 8 of the act required "that said mayor and aldermen shall cause the provisions of this act, or an accurate abstract thereof, to be printed on the back of each bond." What purported to be an abstract of the act was printed on the back of the new bonds, but it omitted to state that the act required the old bonds to be canceled before the new could be lawfully issued. Held, that the bonds were valid obligations of the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1937; Dec. Dig. ⟸924.]

[9. Municipal Corporations ⟸931.]

A municipal corporation having borrowed money and delivered its bonds in payment therefor, neither the corporation, nor any one in its behalf can recover such bonds, upon the ground that it was not authorized to create such debt. Haskell, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1947; Dec. Dig. ⟸931.]

[10. Equity ⟸418.]

There can be no judgment against defendants failing to answer where the principal matter of the bill put in issue by other defendants, fails for want of proof; but other matters not necessarily connected with the principal matter, alleged against one only of the defendants, who did not appear to the action, will be taken as true, and judgment entered thereon against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 959; Dec. Dig. ⟸418.]

[11. Municipal Corporations ⟸907.]

The character and nature of the powers, duties and restrictions imposed upon the city of Columbia by the several provisions above recited of the act authorizing an issue of bonds, discussed by Willard, C. J., and Haskell, A. J.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1895; Dec. Dig. ⟸907.]

[12. Statutes ⟸239.]

[Cited in Walker v. State, 12 S. C. 302, to the point that an act creating new specific rights must be regarded as an express limitation of the authority sought to be conferred by the act.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ⟸239.]

[This case is also cited in City of Columbia v. Tindal, 43 S. C. 555, 21 S. E. 341, as to facts.]

Before Pressley, J., Richland, November, 1878.

The nature of this action and the terms of the act of March 13th, 1872, (15 Stat. 220,) construed by the court, are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the Chief Justice. The facts connected with the loan of $75,000 by J. L. Neagle, which preceded the passage of this act, are set forth in the Circuit decree.

John Alexander was mayor of Columbia from April, 1870, to April, 1874. Holders of bonds issued under the authority *of the act of March 13th, 1872, were parties defendant to this cause. The bonds issued under this act are called city hall bonds. They were first put up for sale at auction in the city of Columbia on June 19th, 1872, all the advertisements required by the act having been duly made. At this sale $100,000 in bonds were sold, of which C. Waring bought $10,000 in bonds, and he paid for them in claims then held against the city for work upon the city hall, and the remaining $90,000 were bid in by John Alexander for the city, under instructions from the city council not to let them go for less than a limit which exceeded the sum bid. It was then announced that the sale was adjourned to October 2d, 1872. The second sale was advertised in the Columbia and Augusta, and possibly the Charleston papers. At the second sale $50,000 in bonds were sold, some of which were bid in by third parties, and the remainder were bid in for the city. One of the purchasers at this sale was the Central National Bank, which held a note of the city for money borrowed in June, 1872, and the price of the bonds was applied in payment of this note. Public notice was then and there given that the sale was adjourned over to December 2d, 1872. The third sale was advertised to the same extent as was the second. At the third sale $100,000 in bonds were sold and were all bid in for the city.

*372

The bonds bid in by the city were disposed of afterwards by the corporate authorities by private negotiation. Some were sold directly to purchasers, others were deposited as collateral security to secure loans made by the city, and on default of payment, some of them were placed on market and sold. Of the bonds bid in by Alexander, he retained $750 for a debt due to himself by the city. Alexander, and other defendants who were holders of city hall bonds, did not answer in this action.

This statement, together with the Circuit decree, the grounds of appeal, the opinion of the court and the dissenting opinion, fully presents the case.

The Circuit decree is as follows:

The city of Columbia is oppressed with a heavy burden of debt, and the relators seek in this case to relieve her from a por*tion thereof. They allege that her bonds, amounting to $250,000, issued by authority of the act of March, 1872, are void and should be canceled. In the issue of said bonds important provisions of the said act were disregarded, as following, to wit:

*373

First. That before such issue certain other bonds previously issued were not recalled and canceled, as required by the first section of said act.

Second. That the bonds issued under the act were not advertised and negotiated "by public sale," as its third section required.

Third. That, contrary to the sixth section of said act, much of the proceeds of said bonds was wastefully and fraudulently used for the current expenses of said city.

Fourth. That "an accurate abstract" of the said act was not, as required by its eighth section, printed on the back of the said bonds.

The first of the said allegations has reference to a fraudulent contract, which, before the passage of the said act, had been made between J. M. Allen and the city council of Columbia for building a new city hall. After that contract had been executed, the city council, under pretence of raising money for that purpose, borrowed from J. L. Neagle the sum of $75,000, and, as security for the same, pledged to him its bonds, amounting to $250,000. These bonds so pledged were, by the said act of March, 1872, to be recalled and canceled before the issue of the new bonds therein authorized, and this requirement was not performed according to its letter. The new bonds were issued and sold at public sale on June 19th, October 2d and December 2d, 1872, but the old bonds were not in possession of the city council until November 28th, and were not canceled in fact until December 8th, 1872. If, therefore, the first section of the said act be construed literally, its mandate was not complied with in the said issue.

But previous to the said issue, very soon after the passage of the act, the city council had borrowed money from R. K. Scott and the Carolina National Bank, and had paid to J. L. Neagle the debt for which the old bonds were pledged. All that time the understanding with R. K. Scott and the bank was that these *pledged bonds should remain as security for the new loan until bonds of the new issue could be prepared to replace them. Under this agreement the old bonds were subsequently redeemed and canceled on December 8th, 1872.

*374

I hold that the said arrangement and its completion was a substantial compliance with the said act; the first and sixth sections must be construed together and so as not to contradict each other. If they be construed separately and literally, then the first section would require that the old bonds be canceled before the new be issued, whilst the sixth section would require a sale of new bonds in order that the proceeds might redeem the old bonds by paying the debt for which they stood pledged. Here, then, by construing the two sections separately, according to their letter, would be two priorities, each demanding precedence of the other, and that would be impossible. I therefore find it necessary to harmonize them by looking to the spirit and purpose of the act, and there its meaning seems to be that, before the new bonds be issued, some certain and positive arrangement was to be effected whereby to recall and cancel the old bonds, and so make it certain that the city should not, in any case, be liable at the same time for both issues. That arrangement having been made and successfully completed, it accomplished the full purpose of both sections of the act; it paid the debt previously contracted for the said city hall, as required by the sixth section of the act, and canceled the pledged bonds, as required by the first section. When that was done, the whole transaction, "nunc pro tunc," assumed the date of the contract which accomplished it, and the intent and spirit of the act was complied with.

2. As to the requirement that the said bonds should be negotiated only by "public sale," that, also, seems to me to have been substantially complied with. They were duly offered at public sale, but, to prevent needless and ruinous sacrifice, a limit as to the price they must sell for was fixed by the city council, and such bonds as were not bid for at that price were bid in by the mayor of the city, who afterwards, for its benefit, sold them at private sale. The testimony herein proves this to have been a wise plan; it most certainly obtained a higher price for the said bonds than unlimited public sale would have reached. It is, *therefore, the case of an agent authorized and directed to sell only at public sale who voluntarily incurs personal risk by bidding in the property so sold. If he afterwards sell it at a less price, he himself must pay the loss; but if he make profit by such subsequent sale and allow the benefit thereof to his principal, his conduct in that respect will not be unlawful or invalid, and a principal could rarely be found who would refuse to ratify such act of his agent.

*375

But even if the sale of the said bonds were not according to the requirements of the said act, it could not now be impeached; its performance was entrusted to the city council, which, by its recital on the said bonds, states that they were issued by a "public sale thereof," and that recital is, under the law, a sufficient protection to any purchaser for value.

3. As to the allegation that the proceeds of the said bonds, contrary to the sixth section of the act, were applied to the current expenses of the city, it is not, to any material extent, sustained by the testimony offered in this case. Previous to the passage of the act the $75,000 which had been borrowed, under pretence of building therewith the city hall, had been recklessly squandered; only $12,000 of it can be pretended to have been paid on account of the said building, and yet not so much as $2000 of it remained in the city treasury when the act was passed. But that wasteful expenditure was cured by the act. Its sixth section expressly directs that debt to be paid out of the proceeds of the bonds therein authorized. The provision of that section cannot be supposed to refer to any debt other than the $75,000 due to Neagle, because the city had not, up to that time, contracted any other debt which could be designated as one "heretofore contracted for the construction of the new city hall and the new market." It is manifest, therefore, that though the $75,000 had been previously squandered, yet the lender was to be paid first out of the proceeds of the bonds which the act authorized. To pay that and the interest thereon required nearly $80,000. The sale of the said bonds produced only $148,364, thus leaving less than $70,000 for the construction of the new city hall and the new market, and the improvement of the streets, the exten*sion of the water works, "and any other improvements judged advisable by the said mayor and aldermen."

*376

Under these unlimited powers the most active schemer in that body could scarcely have devised any plan for spending that balance which would not have been within the vast scope of the said act. But whatever might have been the result of such effort, it is certain that the trial was not made. The testimony herein shows conclusively that more than the said balance was applied to the special purposes of the act. And the fact that certain debts due for current expenses were paid out of the proceeds of said bonds does not falsify this conclusion, inasmuch as the accounts show that these payments, thus temporarily taken from the construction fund, were afterwards restored to it, when needed, from other resources of the city treasury.

But if that had not been done, and if part of the said $70,000 had been fraudulently misapplied, that would not have rendered the bonds invalid. They are negotiable securities, and purchasers thereof, even suspecting that the proceeds are to be misapplied, are not bound to inquire of that matter. No mere suspicious circumstances or negligence of the purchaser, nothing but bad faith in him, will impair his title, and I do not find in this case any proof of such bad faith.

Lastly. The remaining allegation of the relators refers to the printed abstract of the act which was placed on the said bonds. They say that it omits the condition precedent of the first section of the act, which required the old bonds to be canceled before the new could be lawfully issued. But the act entrusted that duty to the mayor and aldermen, and made no provision for the correction of such abstract as they might prepare. They, therefore, were the sole judges of its sufficiency, and their recital on the bonds that the said abstract was in compliance with the act is a complete protection to the bondholders.

I have reached the above conclusions most reluctantly. The act was drawn with consummate skill, so as to inspire the utmost confidence of purchasers, and it seemed to contain every provision necessary for the protection of the said city, yet in its sixth section it adroitly inserts the provision which its framer intended for his own benefit. By that he has recovered the $75,000 *which he had lent the city for wasteful and fraudulent purposes. It is very manifest that the whole city hall scheme originated in fraud and bribery. The said loan was only an ill-disguised bribe to purchase for the lender an exorbitant contract. Public clamor compelled him to surrender it, and then he devised the said act, whereby he regained the money he had lent, and retained, besides, $12,000 paid him in advance for work to be done, but not done—except to the extent of the value of $7,000. I cannot reach him by any proper decree in this case. My inclination in every case would be to inflict loss upon all who, knowingly, to the loss of the public, lend their money for wasteful purposes to reckless and dishonest rulers. But the law limits my authority, and the sixth section of the said act effectually protects those who lent their money to pay that debt, which it directed to be paid.

*377

It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the relators be denied the relief which they seek, and that their complaint be dismissed, without costs.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed, upon the following grounds:

1. Because the decision does not contain a statement of the facts found and the conclusions of law separately, as required by law.

2. Because the court erred in deciding that the recalling and cancellation of the bonds issued to the amount of $200,000, August 21st, 1871, "after the issue of the bonds under the act of March 13th, 1872," was a substantial compliance with the said act; whereas the court should have decided that the requirement of such recalling and cancellation, "before the issue," was an indispensable condition precedent, and until the condition was complied with the power to issue such bonds did not exist, and that all bonds issued under the said act prior to the performance of the said condition precedent are, therefore, null and void, and do not constitute obligations of the said city; and the court should have decreed that such bonds be delivered up to be canceled.

3. Because the court erred in deciding that the negotiation of *bonds issued under the act of March 13th, 1872, so far as the same was effected at public auction not duly advertised for the period and in the newspapers designated by the act, and so far as the said bonds were bid in for the city and subsequently negotiated privately by the mayor and aldermen, was a substantial compliance with the act; and because the court erred in deciding that such negotiation cannot now be impeached, for that it "was entrusted to the city council, which, by its recital on the said bonds, states that they were issued by a public sale thereof," and thereby gives, "under the law, sufficient protection to any purchaser for value;" whereas the court should have decided that the negotiation, as made, was not a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the act; that the sales at auction to the city were pretensive and void, and did not authorize the subsequent issue of the bonds by private negotiation; that the said statement on the bond being of a fact contemporaneous with the sale and delivery of the bond, of which all parties had equal means of knowledge, and as to which the mayor and aldermen were not invested with authority to decide, could not be made the subject-matter of recital so as to operate by way of estoppel.

*378

That if such recital could in any case estop these plaintiffs, it cannot be pleaded by holders of the said bonds, who (not "purchasers for value" or bona fide holders within the technical meaning of the phrases) were parties to the negotiation thereof, cognizant of each and every violation of law therein and partakers of the fraud, and that in the hands of such parties the bonds so negotiated are null and void, and do not constitute obligations of the said city, and the court should have decreed that such bonds should be delivered up to be canceled.

4. Because the court erred in deciding that the sixth section of the act of March 13th, 1872, expressly directs payment of the loan of $75,000 due to Neagle out of the proceeds of the sale of the said bonds, whereas it should have been found that this amount was borrowed as well "for other purposes necessary for the support of the city government," and the court should have decided that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds were applicable only to such portion of the said loan as was actually expended in the construction of the new city hall and the new *market, and that the remainder of the said loan, having been negotiated without power and without authority of law, did not constitute a valid obligation of the said city.

*379

5. Because the court erred in finding that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds issued under the act of March 13th, 1872, were not to any material extent applied to the current expenses of the city, the facts being conclusively established that the total amount received from this source is $148,364, and the amount expended on the city hall and market, from all sources, is $71,926, leaving $76,438 as applied for the most part not to "the improvement of streets, the extension of water works or any other improvements judged advisable by the mayor and aldermen," but to purposes of extravagant and fraudulent expenditure, whilst a large amount of debt contracted for the erection of the city hall is yet unpaid and the construction of the city hall has not yet been completed.

6. Because the court erred in deciding that under what is termed "the unlimited powers" in the act, "the most active schemers could scarcely have devised any plan for spending the balance" remaining after the payment of the Neagle loan "which would not have been within the vast scope of the said act;" whereas the court should have decided that under the said act an amount had been expended or set apart sufficient for the construction of the new city hall and the new market, and any and all expenditures of this fund for other purposes were unauthorized and in violation of law.

7. Because the court erred in deciding that there was no proof of such bad faith in the application of the purchase money of said bonds as would impair the title of the holders thereof; whereas the court should have found that the purchases by the Carolina National Bank, the Central National Bank and Robert K. Scott, directly from the mayor and aldermen, were made for the purpose of applying the proceeds in payment of claims against the city held by these parties respectively, which, to the knowledge of and in collusion with these parties, were contracted for and applied to purposes not contemplated by the said act of March 13th, 1872, and which, having been incurred without power and authority, were not legal and valid obligations of the *said city; and the court should have decided that the payment of the said claims out of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds was conclusive evidence of such bad faith as would constitute these purchasers trustees by virtue of a constructive trust, and should have decided that said bonds were issued in fraud, and are therefore null and void, and of no obligation against the city; and the court should have decreed that such bonds be delivered up to be canceled.

*380

8. Because the court erred in deciding that the validity of the bonds was not affected by the omission to include in the abstract of the provision of the act, printed on the back of each bond, the condition precedent of the first section, "which required the old bond to be canceled before the new could be lawfully issued;" and that the mayor and aldermen were the sole judges of the sufficiency of the abstract, and that their recital on the bond that the said abstract was in compliance of the act is a complete protection to the bondholders; whereas, the court should have decided that the act not being a matter peculiarly known to the mayor and aldermen, but one of which all parties are presumed in law to have knowledge, the recital of the abstract thereof on the back of said bond could in no way afford protection to the bondholder, there being no judicial action or decision devolved upon the mayor and aldermen thereby, and the omission of any reference to the condition precedent contained in the first section, "which required the old bonds to be canceled before the new could be lawfully issued," and of any recital that such condition had been complied with, operated as notice to all purchasers of said bonds that the said condition precedent had not been performed, and also of the purpose of the said mayor and aldermen to disregard this imperative requirement of the act, and put each and every of them upon inquiry at their peril.

9. Because the court did not find that certain bonds, as set forth in the complaint, held by the Carolina National Bank, Robert K. Scott and other defendants, had been pledged by the mayor and aldermen to the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company as collateral security for a loan created and expended for general purposes of the city government, and were purchased by the said defendants with notice; and that the bonds held by *Thomas B. Jeter had been pledged to him by the mayor and aldermen as collateral security for a loan created and expended for general purposes of the city government; and because the court did not decide that the city council were without power or authority to borrow money for general purposes of expenditure, or for any purpose to negotiate the said bonds by way of pledge, and the bonds so negotiated were wholly null and void and of no obligation against the said city; and because the court did not decree that such bonds be delivered up to be canceled.

*381

10. Because the court did not find that the bonds held by the defendant, John Alexander, have never been sold or hypothecated, and were held by him without power or authority; and because the court did not adjudge the same to be null and void and of no obligation against the city, and did not decree that they be delivered up to be canceled.

11. Because the court erred in failing to find as matter of fact that the bonds held by the defendants, the Carolina National Bank of Columbia, S. C., Robert K. Scott, the Central National Bank of Columbia, S. C., the Citizens' Bank of Petersburg, Va., Clark Waring, Fanny C. Wallace, Harriet English, S. F. Trotti, Thomas B. Jeter and John Alexander, were procured by these defendants by direct and immediate negotiation with the mayor and aldermen, with notice of all the matters of fraud and irregularity alleged in the complaint; and because the court erred in deciding that these defendants are entitled to the benefit of the protection of the law accorded to bona fide holders for valuable consideration without notice, otherwise characterized by the law as "innocent third parties."

12. Because the defendants, Thomas C. Dunn, Robert K. Scott, C. J. Carroll, George A. Shields, John Alexander, John S. Wiley, The National Bank of Spartanburg, S. C., and Acacia Lodge, No. 94, Ancient Free Masons of South Carolina, having failed to answer the complaint, the court did not find the matters of fact alleged therein in reference to the bonds held by these defendants, and adjudged the same sufficient in law to render the said bonds null and void and of no obligation against the said city; and because the court did not thereupon decree that *the bonds held by the said defendants should be delivered up to be canceled.

*382

13. Because the court erred in decreeing that the relators be denied the relief which they seek and dismissing their complaint.

Messrs. Melton & Wingate, for appellants.

Messrs. J. H. Rion, W. A. Clark and F. W. McMaster, for respondents.

October 3d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This is a complaint in the nature of a bill by the attorney-general, in the name of the state and upon the relation of corporators and tax-payers of the city of Columbia, alleging that the municipal authorities of that city have illegally issued certain coupon bonds, claiming to have authority therefor by an act of the legislature, but having failed to conform to the requirements of such act, and demanding that said bonds may be adjudged void and decreed to be delivered up by the defendants holding the same. The Circuit Court dismissed the complaint, and the plaintiffs have appealed. Various exceptions are urged to the decree that will be noticed in their order.

It appears that bonds of the city of Columbia have been issued to the amount of nearly $250,000, under the act of March 13th, 1872, (15 Stat. 220), and as the conformity of such issues to the requirements of that act is the whole question in the case, it will be convenient, in the first instance, to inquire what are the powers of the city corporation under that act, and to what limitations and directions such powers are subject. This involves the construction of the act in question, with a view to ascertain its intention as it regards the matters in issue.

The first section provides "that the mayor and aldermen of the city of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered to borrow money by issuing city bonds, from time to time, to an amount which, together with the outstanding indebtedness of the city of Columbia, shall not exceed the sum of $600,000, it being thereby intended that the whole indebtedness thereof, whether *by bonds or otherwise, shall, at no time, be increased beyond the said sum of $600,000; provided, that, before such issue, the city council shall recall and cancel the bonds issued to the amount of $250,000, issued August 21st, 1871, for the erection of the city hall and market; and provided further, that no part of said bonds shall be used for the purchase of any franchise or corporation."

*383

The second section provides the form of the bonds, their terms and the mode of authentication. The third section contains a clear limitation on the powers conferred by the first section, in the following language: "That no bond shall be negotiated under the provisions of this act otherwise than by public sale, notice of which shall be given for at least thirty days in one newspaper published in Columbia, one in Charleston and two in the city of New York, and that the sale of all such bonds shall be made by the treasurer of the city of Columbia; provided, that all such sales shall be conducted in accordance with such rules and regulations as the city council may prescribe."

Section 4 provides for a registry of such bonds, and for a publication by the mayor and aldermen of a detailed statement of the city indebtedness and the character of the same, at the demand of holders of bonds or corporators. Section 5 regulates the taxation to pay the interest on such bonds.

Section 6, upon which the case of the plaintiffs mainly depends, is as follows: "That the said mayor and aldermen are hereby authorized and directed to apply the proceeds of the sale of said bonds, first, to the payment of any debts heretofore contracted or which may hereafter be contracted for the construction of the new city hall and the new market; and, secondly, for the improvement of the streets, the extension of the water works, and for any other improvements which shall be judged advisable by the said mayor and aldermen; provided, that no part of said bonds shall be used for the purchase of any franchise or corporation."

Section 7 prohibits the city from increasing its public debt beyond the sum of $600,000, and gives an action to any corporator or tax-payer to enjoin such attempted increase.

Section 8 provides "that the said mayor and aldermen shall cause the provisions of this act, or an accurate abstract thereof, *to be printed on the back of each bond; and on the face of each bond it shall be expressed that the same is issued under the authority of this act."

*384

The ninth section declares the privately or fraudulently issuing of any of said bonds to be a felony. The tenth section provides for creating a sinking fund on the completion of the city hall, to be obtained from the income derived therefrom, and provides that the proceeds of that sinking fund shall "be solemnly set apart for the payment of the debt and the interest thereon, contracted in the erection of said city hall," and gives a remedy to citizens in case of the failure to establish such sinking fund. Section 11 repeals all acts theretofore passed authorizing the mayor and aldermen of that city to borrow money on the bonds thereof.

The effect of the first section, standing by itself, is to authorize the city of Columbia to borrow money by bonds to a limited amount, subject to the restriction that such borrowing must not have the effect to increase the whole city debt beyond $600,000. The objects for which money shall be so borrowed are not stated in this section, although one particular object is, in terms, excluded, namely, where such money is intended to be used for the purchase "of any franchise or corporation." There is an implied object included, namely, the recalling and canceling of certain bonds alleged by the act to have been issued for the erection of the new city hall and market; but otherwise the objects of borrowing are unlimited. It was evidently intended that the bonds thus authorized should take the place, as indebtedness of the city, of the bonds referred to as having previously been issued for the erection of the city hall and market, and it is a fair inference that the authority thus conferred was to afford the means of recalling and canceling such bonds.

So far, then, as the first section is concerned, the authority to borrow was general, and for any object other than that prohibited in the proviso. This conclusion is important, for one of the fundamental questions in this case is, whether the loan was authorized for a particular object, so that a debt could only be contracted under such authority for that particular purpose, and within the limits of the authority only to the extent that was *requisite in order to accomplish such purpose, or whether the authority was intended to be general.

*385

To illustrate this question, suppose that the mayor and aldermen, having such authority, should ascertain that the construction of the city hall and market, and the completion of all the objects fairly arising under the sixth section of the act should demand a sum less than the whole amount authorized to be borrowed, and they should find it desirable to include some other object not named in the act, such as funding the floating debt of the city, could they go on and make the whole issue and apply the proceeds accordingly? It is to this section, when the whole nature and scope of the authority asked for was before the minds of the legislature, that we naturally look for the solution of this question. Other parts of the act may afford such solution, but here it would naturally be found. It does not appear from this section that any such limited object of borrowing money was in the mind of the legislators when framing the language that constitutes the leading feature of the act; on the contrary, confining the exclusion to one particular object, impliedly allowed it to extend to all others fairly within the scope of the municipal authority. It must be concluded that if the first section stood alone the authority would have to be regarded as sufficiently comprehensive to admit of borrowing for any proper municipal purpose other than the one interdicted, if that is entitled to be regarded as, in itself, a proper municipal object.

It will presently be considered whether other parts of the act have the effect to limit the authority conferred by narrowing down the objects for which it should be exercised, but that question is included in a more general one, namely, what are the express and implied limitations imposed by the act on the authority conferred.

The express limitations will be first considered. In the first place, the bonds issued for the erection of the new city hall and market must be recalled and canceled before such issue. That this was intended as an express limitation appears by the terms in which it is expressed. It is something to be done before such issues are made, and assumes the form of a proviso—a form consistent with the terms employed. This limitation, as well as *that precluding the use of the bonds for the purchase of any franchise or corporation, and that restricting the issue with reference to the extent of the whole debt of the city, occurs in the first section, and are the only ones made in that section.

*386

The declaration of the third section, "that no bond shall be negotiated under the provisions of this act, otherwise than by public sale," &c., must be regarded as imposing limitations on the authority conferred by the act in the nature of a condition precedent. The language employed is negative, so that to affirm that a bond issued otherwise than as prescribed in that section was sanctioned by the authority of the act would directly contradict the declaration of the statute. The bonds, when issued, derive their actual efficacy from the act of negotiation, as that term is intended by the act, although the validity of their obligation rests upon the first section of the act, so that, certain forms of negotiation being interdicted, they cannot become the means of imparting such actual legal force to the bonds. Such a provision, having for its object the creation of new specific rights, cannot be regarded as merely directory as it regards the mode prescribed for bringing such rights into existence. This must be regarded as an express limitation of the authority sought to be conferred by the act.

The limitation fixed, with reference to the amount of the whole public debt of the city, is repeated in the seventh section, and enforced by the use of prohibitory language, and is clearly an express limitation of the authority conferred.

The next inquiry is as to what implied restrictions on the power of issuing bonds are imposed by the terms of the act. This inquiry will be confined to such restrictions as are alleged to exist by the plaintiffs, and on which they base their right to an injunction.

It is contended that the provisions of the fourth section requiring the mayor and aldermen to keep a registry of all bonds theretofore issued and outstanding, and of all bonds issued under the authority of that act, are an implied condition. The language of this section does not import a restriction in terms, but simply imposes on the officers of the corporation the duty of doing something which, so far as it relates to the bonds issued *under this act, could only be properly done after such bonds had been issued and had assumed full validity. It amounts to a requirement that a certain public record should be made of the transactions in regard to the issuing of bonds; and as a record of a transaction is naturally made after the transaction is consummated, it is not to be assumed that the legislature intended to make the validity of issued bonds depend on the compliance with such requirement. In other words, the making of the record of the issuing of the bonds is not an act which, in its nature, must precede the lawful issuing of the bonds, and, therefore, it cannot give rise to an implied limitation of the authority conferred by the act.

*387

It is also contended that there is an implied restriction of the authority conferred contained in the sixth section. The language of this section is that the mayor and aldermen "are hereby authorized and directed" to apply the proceeds of the sales of the bonds to certain objects in the first instance. To authorize and direct does not necessarily imply that the matter so authorized and directed is a condition precedent to some authority already fully conferred in another and appropriate place. This is enough to exclude this section from the category of express limitations. It remains to consider whether there is evidence on the face or in the nature of the requirements of the section to warrant the conclusion that it was intended as a condition precedent, or even as a condition subsequent, to the validity of the bonds. The plaintiffs have got to make out of this section something equivalent to a declaration that unless the moneys received from the sale of the bonds are applied in a particular way, the bonds so issued, under some circumstances and in some cases at least, shall be void.

The direction is: "First, to the payment of any debts heretofore contracted, or which may hereafter be contracted, for the construction of the new city hall and the new market; and, secondly, for the improvement of the streets, the extension of the water works, and for any other improvements which shall be judged advisable by the said mayor and aldermen." The plaintiffs read this as if it directed the city corporation to build and complete a city hall and market

*388
and apply the proceeds of *the bonds exclusively to that purpose until completed and paid for, and after that they must go on and devise improvements until the whole money should be consumed. In other words, they try to make a sort of trust out of it, instead of regarding it in the only light in which it can properly be viewed—as a mere provision for funding the present and future debt of the city, not exceeding a certain amount, giving preference in the funding to a class of debts of a particular character. This is the whole scope and character of the act, as is manifest by its various provisions. Whether the erection of the city hall and market should be continued or abandoned was a matter properly left to the judgment of the municipal authorities as a matter of a purely local concern. This section must, therefore, be stripped of the idea that the proceeds of the bonds were a trust to build a city hall and market.

The plaintiffs' view of the eighth section appears still more inadmissible in its application to the objects contained in the second direction as to appropriating the proceeds of the loan. The subject here is "the improvement of the streets, the extension of the water works, and for any other improvements which shall be judged advisable by the said mayor and aldermen." It would be difficult to make out of this sweeping language the case of a particular and prescribed improvement in respect to the consummation of which the money available for that purpose was to be regarded as a trust. In the first place, no defined object can be made out from the terms employed, to which, as matter of construction, the court could say the money ought to have been applied, and, in the next place, the discretion of the city authorities to enter upon such improvements and to abandon or complete them at will is fully recognized, and no attempt is made to interfere therewith. If we were required to say what was to be regarded as an improvement in the sense of the statute, we should find great difficulty in so doing. In the first place, the mayor and aldermen are to determine what are and are not to be regarded as improvements, and if their determination is subject to any limitation arising from the intended sense of the word improvements, as used in the statute, we would find it very difficult to find the key of that sense. When an assumed con*struction of an act runs out into vague and limitless questions and considerations, it may be taken to be aside from the true construction. The true construction is that which was in the mind of the legislators as evidenced by their language, and is generally characterized by the simplicity and completeness of the object in view. The view that has already been developed removes all these difficulties of construction by holding that the object of the statute was to enable the city to fund its floating debt, contracted, or which might be contracted, within a certain limit, giving preferences in such funding to certain classes of obligations.
*389

In order to fully appreciate the consequences arising under this view of the authority conferred, it is necessary to distinguish still more clearly the difference in point of law between the present view and that held by the plaintiffs. For that purpose each will be more particularly stated. The view that the object of the loan must be regarded as intended to enable the city to fund its floating indebtedness, present or future, is based on the idea that the act conferred no new authority or duty on the mayor and aldermen as it regards the building of a city hall and market, and the other works mentioned in the eighth section, and that it does not diminish such authority or change the nature of the discretion and responsibility of the city government as it regards the initiation, conduct, suspension or abandonment of such works. The act must, then, be regarded as intending no effect upon that class of municipal powers employed in bringing into existence the classes of debts which may be funded under that act.

Without the statute the city could, at will, undertake any such work, but would be compelled to treat the debt created as calling for immediate payment, and the proceeds of its taxes and other revenues and property would be immediately liable for the payment of such debts. Now, what the act sought to do was to allow the city to maintain a permanent credit as the means of discharging such debts. This is, in effect and substance, funding such debts, and there is no more difficulty in conceiving authority granted for the purpose of funding future debts than *that to fund debts already contracted; the operation and effect is the same in both cases.
*390

The plaintiffs' view, on the other hand, is that a fund was intended to be created in the hands of the city government for the accomplishment of certain specified objects, in which case a special trust to apply it to those objects would exist. The difficulty in the way of this view is, as already illustrated, that such trust could not exist except where there was a specific object on which it could act. In a general sense, wherever property or money is in the hands of a public agent for disbursement upon general objects of a public nature, a trust to apply it so exists. Such a trust is, in its nature, political, and in this respect differs from the special trusts that are cognizable in equity on the demand of a cestui que trust. It is true that public trusts in the hands of municipal bodies may, to some extent, be enforced through the intervention of the attorney-general, but not upon the idea that the equity of the cestui que trust demands such enforcement, but upon the more general ground that the public authority, whether vested in the king or in the state, has a supervisory control over all trusts of that nature, as in the nature of public charities. In this country the application of this principle is necessarily much modified by the more distinct recognition of the principle of local self-government, that tends to a liberal construction of the legislative powers vested in municipal communities.

The plaintiffs' view, in effect, makes the state the beneficiary of the powers conferred upon the city authorities, instead of the municipal body itself. It is clear that all the restrictions imposed on the city authorities were intended for the benefit of the municipality. Hence the plaintiffs call the parties into a court of equity on the same footing as if a trust had been created in which the state had a beneficial interest, and demand a remedy that leaves out of view both the interest and the duty of the municipality, as will be made to appear.

It is clear that the provisions of the sixth section are not to be regarded as creating a condition on which the validity of the bonds should depend, but as merely giving a direction as it regards the disposition of the proceeds realized from the sales of *such bonds. The statute assumes that when the period arrives for disbursing the proceeds derived from the sale of the bonds, that bonds will have previously been issued and in full force and effect. It is not to be assumed that it was intended that the lender of the money to the corporation should be responsible for the rightful application of such money; hence we must conclude that it was no part of the scheme or intention of the act that the validity of the bonds should depend upon the due application of the moneys to be derived from the sale thereof, and therefore there is no implied condition of that character imposing restrictions on the authority conferred. If a party happens to get possession of the bonds while still the property of the city, without compensation or lawful authority, that, no doubt, would be a conversion for which an action would lie, and the bond, would be worthless in the hands of one so holding without negotiation and consideration; but that is very different from the proposition advanced by the plaintiffs, that the bonds in the hands of such wrong-doer are void in virtue of an express or implied limitation of the authority to issue them, as it regards the use of the money arising from the sale thereof.

*391

Then, as the object of the statute was that of enabling the city to fund its floating indebtedness, with a preference of the debt incurred, or to be incurred, of a certain class, it would follow that when the proceeds of the loan were realized the disposition of these funds ought to be made upon the following principles: First. The debt already created for the erection of the city hall, and for which bonds had been already issued, should be paid. Second. A sum should be set apart sufficient to pay for all the work intended to be put upon the city hall and market. Third. Any debt arising from the class of improvements mentioned in the second clause of the sixth section should be paid, and if any contracts or obligations for any such improvement are outstanding, to fall due in the future, should be set apart for the payment of the same. Fourth. If the mayor and aldermen determine at that time that any further improvements of that class should be undertaken on the faith of that fund, then a proportionate part thereof should be set aside accordingly. If, on the other hand, the municipal authorities do not contem*plate or intend any such such further works of improvement, or if they do intend improvements of that character, but conclude that the same should be paid for out of current income of the city, then all further requirements of the statute as it regards the disposition of the fund, are satisfied, and the balance of the fund could, consistently with the general purpose of this act, its special directions being satisfied, be applied to funding the existing outstanding indebtedness of the city.

*392

Assuming, then, that this present complaint could be maintained by showing that the statute has not been complied with, its equity would consist in the statement that debts of the character provided in the sixth section were outstanding at the time of the filing of the complaint. In fact the only debt alleged or proven to exist at that time of the class referred to is a balance on account of the construction of the city hall, now in judgment against the city, which will be considered hereafter.

It is contended that the duty imposed by the eighth section, as it regards the endorsement on the bonds of the provisions of the act, or an accurate abstract thereof, constitutes an implied restriction of the power of issuing bonds in the nature of a condition precedent on which the validity of the bonds must depend. The terms employed do not expressly warrant such an inference, and if it arises it must be from the nature of the act required to be performed by the city authorities. It cannot be assumed that the rights of the lender were to be made dependent upon the good faith and diligence of the borrower. Such a presumption is inconsistent with all principles of fair dealing. The purchasers of the bonds were bound to know the provisions of the statute, and whether in point of fact they did know them or not they are clearly chargeable with such knowledge. The only object, then, in view was, in point of fact, to give them actual knowledge of that which the law assumed them to know independently of such special means of information. Publishing the statute, or an abstract thereof, did not enlarge or in any way change the legal responsibility of the purchasers of the bonds, but only enabled them to provide against the full measure of their responsibility. It was, therefore, a provision wholly for the benefit of the purchasers of bonds, and if neglected by the *opposite party the purchasers are the only losers, and should not be put in a worse position by reason of such neglect. It must be concluded that the requirements of the eighth section are not a restriction upon the authority to issue bonds, and that the validity of such issue does not depend upon their fulfillment.

*393

Having obtained an understanding of the intention of the legislature, it remains to consider the various exceptions that have been taken to the Circuit decree.

The first exception has been previously disposed of by this court, holding that the neglect of the referee or Circuit judge to present distinct findings of fact and conclusions of law is not error. It is to be regretted that so little regard is paid to this salutary requirement, but the remedy is not by appeal to this court on the ground of error in the judgment. What might be the effect if a motion refused to correct such irregularity as a foundation of an appeal, we are not called upon to say, as that is not the present case.

The second exception is based upon the ruling that the issuing of the new bonds while the old bonds were still unrecalled and uncanceled did not necessarily, under the circumstances, destroy the validity of the new bonds from and after such recalling and cancellation had actually taken place. The plaintiffs are in equity where mere technical forfeitures are not considered but only substantial rights and injuries. Whether the new bonds could have any legal efficacy until the old bonds were recalled and canceled is not the question here. The true question is whether the allegation of the invalidity of the bonds in the complaint was true when it was made. In this respect the conclusions of the Circuit judge appear to be substantially correct. It must be assumed that the new bonds were issued with the intent to recall the old bonds by means of the proceeds realized from them, for that is what the statute required and was in fact done. It is reasonable to conclude that this was the only way in which it was practicable to retire them. Such an issue did not necessarily violate the ultimate intent of the statute, and, therefore, is not reprehensible. It is true it did not conform to the requirements of the act, and could not create the rights intended to be created by the act. When the plan was consummated and the *old bonds retired and canceled, there was no impediment to the new bonds assuming validity. Under such circumstances, equity will look to the substantial rights of the parties, and, as the plaintiffs have sought a remedy in equity, they must submit to have the validity of the bonds determined upon equitable principles. This exception should be overruled.

*394

It is objected that the sales of the bonds were not made at public auction, as the act required. The Circuit judge finds otherwise, in point of fact, and there is good ground for such finding. The parties who purchased at the auction sales must be regarded as legally bound by the consequences of such purchases, so that had the bonds subsequently sold for a less sum they would be responsible for the difference. The fact that they purchased for the benefit of the city made them volunteers, but not necessarily agents, and, as such, the legal undertaking was binding, and the bonds must be regarded as sold in the sense of the statute.

As it regards the advertisement, it appears that due advertisement was made before the commencement of the sales. It appears from the testimony of Mayor Alexander that the first sale was regularly adjourned to a day certain, at which it was resumed, and again adjourned to a further day, when the balance of the bonds were sold. It was not necessary to repeat the original advertisement, as the adjourned sales are, for all legal purposes, a continuation of the original sale, which was properly advertised. The conclusions of the Circuit judge should be sustained in this respect.

The plaintiffs' fourth exception is not well taken. In the first place the act itself fixes the character of the indebtedness arising on the $75,000 note. It is undisputed that the bonds previously issued, as referred to in the act, were hypothecated for the security of this note. The first section of the act declares that such issue had been made "for the erection of the city hall and market." There is no other transaction than this to which the statute could refer, and the identity of the transaction is made apparent by the terms of the resolution of the council under which the loan was negotiated. This resolution gave authority "to borrow money from time to time, as may be neces*sary, to carry on contracts for building the proposed extension of the market and erecting a new city hall," &c. It appears in evidence that the loan was negotiated under authority derived from this resolution. It is contended that the actual intention in making the loan was to raise money for other purposes than those expressly named in the resolution, but this is immaterial to the present view, which is that, as it regards the disposition of the proceeds derived from the sale of the bonds, direct statute authority existed for applying such proceeds to the payment of this loan. It is not a question of the general satisfaction of this transaction, but merely of the proper disposition of the proceeds of the bonds under the statute. The fundamental requirement of the statute was that these previously-issued bonds should be recalled and canceled. Unless this should be accomplished the purpose of the act becomes entirely ineffectual. To recall implies to get back by treaty or contract. That this was the intent of the statute is made evident by the sixth section, which provides for the debts theretofore contracted for the very purpose which in the first section is declared to have been the purpose of the previous issue of bonds. The conclusion is irresistible that the statute intended that the debt for which the previous issue was a security should be paid out of the proceeds of the new issue, and as the $75,000 note is without doubt the obligation referred to, abundant authority to pay it existed. This view disposes of all the questions relating to the validity of the payment of that note.

*395

The fifth exception is based upon an obvious misconception. It is assumed that moneys disbursed for "current expenses" of the city, cannot be regarded as disbursed in accordance with the requirements of the sixth section of the act. But, for the passage of the act, all the debts created for the purposes specified in the sixth section would have been necessarily liquidated as part of the current expenses of the city. The chief object of the act was to provide a means of defraying certain current expenses of the city by means of a resort to a permanent credit, instead of having recourse to current annual income. These current expenses are equally such, whether to be paid for in the one way or the other. The proof, then, that money derived from the *sales of the bonds was applied to "current expenses," is in itself wholly indecisive, whether it was properly applied or misapplied, as part at least of these current expenses were the very object of the statute for which authority to borrow money was given. It was for the plaintiffs, on whom the burden of proof rested, to show that the current expenses thus paid were not of the class that the statute contemplated, and this the plaintiffs have altogether failed to do. The plaintiffs offered no proof that any part of the money was expended for purposes other than such as constituted proper municipal objects, and all charges of fraudulent misapplication are unproved and no attempt was made to prove them. There is, therefore, no ground in the evidence to reverse the conclusion of the Circuit judge, who finds no substantial diversion of the fund, although his conclusion would have been strengthened by placing it altogether on the defect of proof to show that improper current expenses had been paid out of the fund.

*396

The court could not have decided against the defendants the proposition advanced in the sixth exception, that any and all expenditures of the fund for other purposes than for the construction of the new city hall and the new market were unauthorized and in violation of law. In the first place, the proposition ignores the duty of paying the debt for which the old bonds were hypothecated. In the second place, it erroneously treats the city government as under an obligation to build a city hall and market in the nature of a trust. And, finally, it advances the erroneous conclusion that there could be no lawful expenditure of the money raised until the city hall and market were actually paid for, or a sum actually set apart to pay for them when completed.

The seventh exception cannot be maintained. There is no ground to set aside the finding of fact by the Circuit Court that the defendants, who were purchasers of the bonds, were innocent holders for value, a finding fairly embraced within the conclusions of the Circuit decree. Such a fact can only be reversed upon overbearing testimony, as the onus of proving such to be the case rests on the plaintiffs. So far from the conclusion of the Circuit Court being overborne, there is no evidence of the fact of *the misapplication of the moneys, and, therefore, nothing of which to charge the bondholder with knowledge prejudicial to his claim. The evidence that the money was paid, or, what is equivalent, that the bonds were specifically delivered to satisfy debts existing for current expenses of the city, is, as we have seen, wholly indecisive of any such misapplication. No other evidence was offered that could be the foundation of a charge that the persons taking these bonds had knowingly connived at a breach of trust on the part of the municipal officers. There is no proof that any of the defendants knew, at the time they took their bonds, that there were not adequate funds in the hands of the city, derived from the bonds, to meet all outstanding demands under the sixth section of the act. The city had it in its power to stop all improvements of the class named in the sixth section, and, on paying what was due up to the time of so stopping, could expend whatever remained in their hands for the funding of any part of its floating debt, and, having such ample powers, no reason exists why third persons should not deal with them accordingly. Such persons would have the right to assume that the city, having authority to make good its dealings in that respect, would do so. The position of bona fide holders can only be decided upon the ground of evidence and as against the presumption of innocence. It is not possible to wield against them the argument of general corruption, even if it had proved to exist. The greater the evil resulting from maladministration, the greater the importance that it should not invade the administration of justice, and to take away the rights of citizens on general charges and suspicions, would be as corrupt, as a judicial act, as any charged in this case against the municipal authorities, and more dangerous to the community.

*397

The eighth exception is mainly disposed of by the conclusion that the endorsement of the abstract on the bond was not a condition on which the validity of the bonds depended.

The ninth exception has, in part, been disposed of by the conclusions already stated. It raises, however, a question whether the corporate authorities had power to borrow money for the use of the city and to bind the city for the repayment thereof. This question is not raised by the pleadings and proofs in such man*ner as to call for a decision upon it. It appears, by the admission of the complainant, that the various obligations of the city that were discharged by a delivery of the bonds in question, were contracted for the benefit of the city. Several of these obligations appear to have arisen on account of money borrowed for the use of the city. The main point made by the complaint is, that the purposes for which the money was borrowed in that class of cases, were not such as those indicated by the sixth section of the act, the object of this averment being to show that the issue of bonds under the act had been made for debts contracted for other purposes than those contemplated by the sixth section. Incidental to this averment of the complaint are allegations that may be construed as questioning the right of the corporate authorities to borrow money. The ground thus alleged for invalidating these debts is, that the city had no authority to borrow money in such cases. It appears, however, that these debts have been paid by the delivery of bonds for that purpose, and the question arises whether the authority of the city officers to create such debts can be questioned after their actual payment. This question will be next considered. The bearing of this question on the case made by the plaintiffs is this: It amounts to an allegation that part of the bonds issued under the act in question were issued by the city authorities upon no consideration, and, therefore, without authority of law. And their conclusion is that such issue is illegal and void. If the debts that were discharged in this manner were not legal debts, the consequence would be that the city would have an action against the parties who had received either money or property of the city in discharge thereof from the city authorities to recover back such money or property or its value. It is clear that if the city could not maintain such a cause of action, then the plaintiffs, in behalf of the city, cannot allege that the debts were invalid, for that would be allowing indirectly that which could not be done directly. The question, then, resolves itself into that of the right of the city to recover from the parties these amounts paid to them in discharge of debts, the validity of which is questioned. Assuming the simplest form in which this question can be stated, we will suppose that the city authorities borrow money for the use of the *city and subsequently repay the amount so borrowed. Has the city, in an action to recover back the amount so repaid, a right to show that the original act of borrowing was without legal authority? The city having got the benefit of an illegal transaction was bound—morally if not legally—to refund the same. Such would be the rule of moral duty that would force itself upon the mind of any conscientious person in a like situation, and the moral duties are the same in their application to individuals and communities of individuals. Such a moral obligation is a good consideration to support the payment that rests upon it. Hence, money voluntarily paid to discharge an obligation cannot be recovered back upon the allegation that such obligation was without legal force. If, after such payment, the city could not, in its own behalf, allege the invalidity of the original act of borrowing, it cannot be done by the attorney-general or any one else in behalf of or in the interest of the city. It follows that if the attorney-general had filed a bill specially framed to compel the defendants who had received money or property under such circumstances to repay the same on the idea of a breach of public trust or duty, he would have failed, for the reason that equity pays the same respect to moral obligations that is paid at law, but goes further than the law can go to enforce them, and as the law would deny such a remedy on such grounds, equity would, at least, do as much. The present bill, so far as it can be regarded as attacking the consideration upon which the bonds were issued, has this aspect and effect. The ninth exception should be overruled.

*398

*399

The complaint charges that John Alexander individually appropriated certain of the bonds in suit to his individual use, without consideration, and retained bonds that had not been issued to the amount of $1-000. Alexander does not appear to have answered the complaint, in this respect, and its allegations must be taken as true. As these allegations are not necessarily connected with the principal matter of the complaint, in regard to which the plaintiffs have failed to make due proof, they are unaffected by such fact. The tenth exception is, therefore, well taken, and the decree should be set aside, so far as it regards the matters alleged against the defendant, Alexander, individually, *and the cause remanded for a judgment, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, as affecting defendant Alexander alone.

*400

The matter of the eleventh exception has already been disposed of.

The construction that has been put upon the act of 1872 leads to the conclusion that the only possible equity of the complaint would be in an allegation that debts preferred by this act in the order of funding had not been so discharged, and remained unpaid at the commencement of this suit. It might still be a question whether that equity does not belong exclusively to the parties in behalf of whom such preference was given, but that question has not been raised and need not be considered. It does not appear by the allegations of the bill that any such preferred debt existed at the commencement of this suit. It appears, however, in evidence, that there is a demand outstanding for the erection of the city hall, in behalf of C. Waring, which has been put in judgment against the city. Waring is made a party defendant, but instead of insisting on any equity under the act of 1872 resists the plaintiffs' demand for relief.

As it regards the unpaid demand of Waring, now in judgment against the city, it must be concluded that the city is in possession of a fund especially devoted by the act of 1872 to the payment of such debt, namely, the "annual income derived from such parts of the said city hall as may be leased from them, the proceeds of which sinking fund shall be solemnly set apart for the payment of the debt and the interest thereon, contracted in the erection of the said city hall." It might well be a question how the creation of this sinking fund can be reconciled with the construction put by the plaintiffs on the sixth section, that that debt was to be paid absolutely and at all events out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds. If that had been the intention of the act it would hardly have named another and distinct fund for that purpose. But it is not important that this question should be considered, for it is clear that the act intended that if that debt should not be paid out of the proceeds of the bonds that it should fall on the sinking fund, and that contingency has actually happened. This leads to the conclusion that the city *having in possession the fund thus solemnly pledged, ought to appropriate that fund to pay the Waring judgment.

*401

The defendants, who failed to answer, lost the benefit of the right to set up their claims as bona fide holders; but as the principal matter of the bill fails for want of proof, and the case alleged against all these defendants, except Alexander, is necessarily connected with that aspect of the complaint, there cannot be judgment against them.

The decree of the Circuit Court should be affirmed as to all things, except the dismissal of the complaint as against defendant Alexander, and as to said defendant, the cause should be remanded for a decree against that defendant, in accordance with what has been already held in that respect.

McIVER, A. J., concurred in the result.

HASKELL, A. J. I dissent from the conclusions reached by a majority of the court, and proceed to present my reasons.

The action is brought in the name of the state, by the attorney-general, ex rel. taxpayers and corporators of the city, against the said city, its public officers and others. It seeks injunction and relief on the ground that breach of trust has been committed: that onerous taxes are about to be and have been imposed to pay the interest on illegal bonds, and that the holders of said bonds, or many of them, being parties to the legal fraud, should be made to deliver up the bonds. The right of the state to institute such a proceeding, in such behalf, cannot be successfully disputed, nor is that question made in the pleadings or by exception. But comments are made and grounds taken in the opinion, which decides the case, which so narrow the scope of such a proceeding as to deprive it of all efficacy, and to take away from the members of municipal corporations the substance of the remedy by which they have hitherto been protected when fraud or illegal acts have been perpetrated by the corporation, its officers or parties dealing with them. It does not seem to be denied that the act of March 13th, 1872, creates a trust by conferring power to borrow money, and directing to what purposes the money shall be applied; but it is said that the trust is political *in its nature, and differs from special trusts, which are cognizable in equity on the demand of a cestui que trust. The meaning of that is that the only remedy possessed by corporators is to be found in the power of electing better officers. To support such doctrine it is said that municipal corporations, in republican governments, possess powers of local self-government which create a wide distinction between the jurisdiction of chancery in England and that in this country on such subjects. The question is serious in its character, and the majority of the court having concurred only in the results reached, it is left entirely open to conjecture what are the processes of reasoning by which such conclusions were reached. I shall, therefore, devote some attention to the jurisdiction which equity has in such cases. The original jurisdiction conferred upon the Court of Chancery in this state was as large as that exercised at the time by the said court in any of the American provinces. See acts 1712, 1721 and 1746, 7th vol. Statutes.

*402

It is shown in the case of Attorney-General v. Jolly, 1 Rich. Eq. 99 [42 Am. Dec. 349], and in Vidal v. Girard, 2 How. 127 [11 L. Ed. 205], that the jurisdiction was equal in extent to that exercised by the Court of Chancery in England. The difference being not in the jurisdiction of the courts in the two countries, but in certain powers vested in the Chancellor personally, when he administered for the king, and that the statute of 43 Elizabeth, on charitable uses, not being of force in this state, does not take from the court any of the subjects which it contains, because it conferred no additional jurisdiction on the court of England, which already had jurisdiction of those subjects, but only gave a new or ancillary remedy. Our court, therefore, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, has charge not only of the subjects recited in the act of Elizabeth, but of many others of like nature not therein mentioned. We can, therefore, with manifest propriety, place great reliance upon the English authorities in such cases when those of like nature come before us. No authorities, English or American, have been cited to sustain the proposition that the jurisdiction over municipal corporations, in cases of public trust, have been modified or diminished, and none can be found in our constitution or statutes; nor any to show that such corporations *have any right of local self-government independent of the grant contained in the charter.

*403

On the other hand, Judge Dillon, in his work on municipal corporations, Section 736, says: "That there appears to be no difference of judicial opinion as to the right of the taxable inhabitants, wherever the threatened illegal corporate act will increase the burden of taxation, to the aid of equity to prevent it. The difference is as to the proper party plaintiff in a bill of this character. * * * But it is agreed that any taxable inhabitant, or, perhaps, any citizen of the municipality, has such an interest to prevent or to avoid illegal corporate acts; that he may be a relator, on whose application the proper public officer of the commonwealth may, on behalf of the public, file the requisite bill to enjoin the menaced illegal act, or, if it has been consummated, to have relief against it." He is fully sustained by the authorities which he cites. That questions which affect at large the interest of the inhabitants of a municipal corporation are "public" in their character, flows from the nature of the corporation. It is the creature of legislation, brought into being to share in the civil government of the country, having power, not over specified persons, but over the fluctuating population as it comes within its limits. Such power is held in trust, subject at any time to be revoked by legislative repeal; and its exercise, while it continues in existence, is as properly the subject of judicial supervision and control as the conduct of any person or other legal entity.

While corporations and their officers may be parties to proceedings at law, they are in many cases peculiarly within the province of equity. For, as is said incidentally by Wardlaw, Chancellor, (Ex parte Greenville Academies, 7 Rich. Eq. 483): "In truth, nearly all corporations are trustees, as an incorporated bank for the stockholders."

And as is more fully said by Denio, C. J., (Darlington v. Mayor, &c., of New York, 31 N. Y. 197): "It is the representative or trustee of somebody, or of some aggregation of persons. We cannot conceive the idea of an aggregate corporation which does not hold its property and franchise for some use, public or private. The corporation of Dartmouth was held to be the *trustee of the donors, or of the youth needing education and moral and intellectual training. The corporation of New York, in my opinion, is the trustee of the inhabitants of that city. The property, in a general and substantial although not in a technical sense, is held in trust for them. They are the people of this state, inhabiting that particular subdivision of its territory—a fluctuating class, continually passing out of the scope of the trust by removal and death, and as constantly renewed by fresh accretions of population. It was granted for their use and held for their benefit. The powers of local government, committed to the corporation, are precisely of the same character. They were granted and have been confirmed and regulated for the good government of the same public; to preserve order and obedience to law, and to ameliorate and improve their condition and subserve their convenience as a community."

*404

The corporation thus holding a trust, and that trust being of a public character, the suit in equity, instituted by the state, is appropriate. Trusts for the benefit of the public have been always held in this state to be within the jurisdiction of equity, (Attorney-General v. Jolly, 1 Rich. Eq. 99,) and come within the rules which govern in all charitable uses. That gifts for general public improvement, utility, ease or convenience are charitable is fully sustained by the authorities. Perry on Trusts, § 704, and cases there cited. The suit, in such case, to enforce the trust or restrain its abuse, and for relief, may be brought by the state, where the government is the only party concerned, or by the state at the instance of relators where the rights of the government are not immediately concerned, but the interests of the public are affected. See remarks of Harper, Ch., in Attorney-General v. Jolly, supra, and Story's Eq. Pl., § 8.

It remains to be shown, in support of the position I hold, that all funds put into the hands of municipal corporations for public purposes constitute public or charitable trusts, cognizable in equity, and that the relators are, therefore, not confined to the ballot box for relief, but are entitled to the aid of equity. The general answer to this proposition is that while it may be true as to a gift, it does not apply to funds raised by taxation, or by bonds payable by taxation, which amounts to the same thing. *Or as it is expressed in Hill on Trustees, *454, the fund must proceed from the gift or bounty, either of the crown or state, or some private person, otherwise it will not be charitable, and, therefore, rates or assessments, levied under an act of parliament by the inhabitants on themselves for the improvement or benefit of their town, are not charitable funds to be administered by the court, for there is no gift or bounty in the creation of such fund. The authority cited by Hill is Attorney-General v. Heelis, 2 Sim. & Stu. 77, decided in 1824. It is true that such language is there used by the Vice Chancellor, Sir John Leach, who says that he is "of opinion that it is the source from whence the funds are derived, and not the mere purpose to which they are dedicated which constitutes the use charitable;" and he then proceeds to illustrate by supposing the instance described by Mr. Hill, as above. But that was not the case before him, for he held the funds to be charitable, and his opinion is a mere dictum, although it is referred to with great respect. Examination of the authorities will show that the opinion thus expressed by Sir John Leach was never admitted to be law, for, in Attorney-General v. Mayor, &c., of Dublin, 1 Bligh (N. S.) 312, decided in the house of lords in 1827, the very instance supposed by the Vice Chancellor arose, and the doctrine which he had announced was entirely disapproved by Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale, who, in the case of the city of Dublin, delivered the opinion of the house of lords. All the cases are reviewed in the more recent case of Attorney-General v. Eastlake, 45 Eng. Ch., 11 Hare, 205, which is very similar to the case before us, and quite in point. It is there held that the city of Dublin's case had clearly established the principle that, in a suit brought by the attorney-general at the relation of rate-payers of the city, the court had jurisdiction to compel the corporation to account for funds raised by taxation under an act of parliament to supply the city with water works, and to compel the replacement of funds which had been improperly applied. The language of Lord Eldon in Attorney-General v. Browne, which preceded Attorney-General v. Heelis, is cited at length in Eastlake's case. Only the conclusion need be repeated here. "I have heard nothing," says Lord Eldon, "which prevents my concurring in *the opinion that a parliamentary grant, destined to such purposes, (public benefit of a town,) is a gift to charitable uses. If that doctrine is to be contradicted, it must be done by higher authority than mine." The grant was a power to collect toll to be applied to public purposes, and all the cases cited show that a grant of power to collect a tax for such purpose is precisely similar and governed by the rule laid down by Lord Eldon. The language used in Attorney-General v. Eastlake is a conclusion drawn from the leading cases, and is very clear on both the above points. "The difference of reasoning to which the remarks of Lord Eldon in Attorney-General v. Corporation of Dublin apply, consists in the distinction taken by Sir John Leach, that you are to look at the source from which the funds proceed, and not merely to their object. However, Lord Eldon, in the case of Attorney-General v. Corporation of Dublin, adheres distinctly to the view which he had taken in the earlier case, (Attorney-General v. Browne); and there can be no doubt that the conclusion of the house of lords was that the mode in which the rate was levied was not to be looked at, but the purpose to which it was to be applied, and I apprehend the purpose must be the real criterion." The purpose was, in Eastlake's case, paving and lighting the town. "It is sufficient to say it is a large and general purpose for this town, although not beyond the limits of the town, and that for that purpose certain moneys are to be levied. I cannot see that the source from which those moneys are here derived, namely, from taxation, can make any difference as to the charitable and public nature, and which would be attributable to the funds if they proceeded from a more limited sphere of bounty; and if there be no distinction on that ground the attorney-general is the proper person to represent those who are interested in that public and general or charitable purpose." See, also, Beaumont v. Oliveira, 4 Eng. Ch. App. Cas. 310; Attorney-General v. West, 10 Hart, Jury Com., Eng. Eq. Cas., *152.

*405

*406

So much for the jurisdiction and the propriety of the form of action brought. If these views are sustained by the authorities, it follows that the grounds on which relief may be demanded, and the relief itself are of vastly greater extent than is allowed *in the opinion which represents the majority of the court. In Attorney-General v. Eastlake it was admitted that the money was applied to purposes within the range of the ordinary powers of the body acting; but because the funds were diverted from the purposes for which they had been collected the court enjoined further misapplication, and ordered that the fund so expended should be replaced by the defendants. So, in Attorney-General v. Aspinall, 2 Myl. & Cr. 613, which is, in principle, exactly similar to the case before us, parties with whom the corporation had been improperly dealing, were brought in, and it was held that the application of the funds to purposes other than those named in the act was a breach of trust; that the parties so dealing had notice; that the appropriation must be rescinded, and that the funds thus misapplied must be recalled and delivered up. Instances might be multiplied without end, but the above are sufficient to show what are the usual principles of law and practice by which courts are governed in such cases.

*407

I come now to the points properly presented by the pleadings and the exceptions, and on which my conclusion differs very materially from that of the majority of the court. Among the most important differences are those which arise from the constructions put upon the act of March 13th, 1872. It is said (1) that among the primary objects for which money shall be borrowed under the power conferred by the act is an implied object, namely, the recalling and canceling of certain bonds referred to in the act as having been issued in 1871 for the erection of the new city hall and market.

The first section of the act authorizes the city council to borrow money by issuing bonds, but provides, "that before such issue the city council shall recall and cancel the bonds issued to the amount of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, issued August 21st, 1871, for the erection of city hall and market." It is a condition precedent, as absolute as words can make it, for it directs what must be done before the power previously conferred can be exercised. Yet it is contended to mean exactly the reverse, and that the new bonds shall be issued prior to the recall and cancellation of the old, in order that by the sale of the new bonds the city council might acquire means, and out of the pro*ceeds of the new buy in the old bonds. Such interpretation negatives the power of words to express thought, and renders futile any attempt on the part of the legislature to attach conditions to its grants. The construction, however, really rests for its support upon a clause in Section 6 of the act, which directs that the proceeds of the bonds shall be applied "first to the payment of debts heretofore contracted for the construction of the city hall," &c. It is said, in substance, that because Section 1, in its proviso, states that the $250,000 in bonds, issued August, 1871, were "issued for the erection of city hall and market," that those bonds, or any loan for which they may have been pledged, represented the "debt heretofore contracted," mentioned in Section 6; and that Section 6, therefore, entirely superseded the provision in Section 1, and rendered the old bonds the prime object of the new bonds; whereas, from the ordinary sense of the words used, the act would seem to condemn the old bonds, and orders the cancellation of the same before the city shall be allowed to exercise the new power which it sought and obtained by the act of March, 1872. The legal result of the construction given to the act by the court is the recognition of the validity of the old bonds, and the practical result would have been, if any such idea had then been entertained, that the old bonds would in all probability have been as good as the new, and consumed the latter, dollar for dollar, in the cancellation of the former. The answer is that the old bonds had been hypothecated to a limited amount, and were under control of the city on payment of that sum. That may be true, but the price obtained for the new bonds may not have been in excess of that sum. The true reply, however, is that there is no evidence of that fact in the statute; and when a court is seeking the legislative intention, it must confine itself to the language used by that body, and not be influenced by extrinsic facts. Sedg. 241.

*408

It is only by the evidence given at the trial that it is shown that the old bonds had been pledged for a debt outstanding at the time the act was passed, yet it is by that fact alone that the clause in Section 6 has been linked to the proviso in Section 1, and thus the true purpose of each portion of the act utterly defeated. It is hardly necessary to say more. The proviso is a *condition precedent, which must be performed before the trust fund could come into existence. Section 6 is a direction subsequent, and undertakes to dispose of the application of the funds. The latter could not go into force until the former had been done, and it is unjustifiable to suppose that the legislature meant a thing so flagrantly contradictory to what the words express.

*409

The true and fair presumption is, that the issue of the bonds in August, 1871, was regarded as an illegal act, and for that reason the recall and cancellation was made a peremptory condition. This view does not arise from the evidence of extrinsic facts, but is a conclusion of law, for the Statutes at Large show that there was no law in existence in August, 1871, authorizing the issue of bonds for the erection of the hall or market, or any kindred purpose. And it is manifest that such was the view taken by the legislators; for, while they ordered the bonds of August, 1871, to be recalled, they by Section 5 of the act, laid a tax sufficient to pay the interest on the new issue, "and all heretofore issued by authority of law." If the August, 1871, bonds had been regarded as issued by authority of law, they would have come within the provision of Section 5, and if not recalled and canceled, would have enjoyed its benefit. That, clearly, was not the intention.

The record of the points to which I express dissent is that, as is said, Section 6 of the act must be stripped of the idea that the proceeds of the bonds were a trust to build a city hall and market. I hold that, under Section 6, such proceeds do constitute a trust fund, to be applied in the manner prescribed in Section 6, and in no other.

"Section 6. That the said mayor and aldermen are hereby authorized and directed to apply the proceeds of the sale of said bonds, first, to the payment of any debts heretofore contracted, or which may hereafter be contracted, for the construction of the new city hall and the new market; and, secondly, for the improvement of the streets, the extension of the water works, and for any other improvements which shall be judged advisable by the said mayor and aldermen."

The ground that Section 6 constitutes no trust, is taken because the section does not, in terms, order the hall and market to *be built, the improvement of streets to be completed, and the water works to be extended, &c.; and because it does not explicitly declare that the bonds are issued for such purposes. What force, if any, such argument may have had, had the objects named in Section 6 never arisen, it loses all force the moment such objects come into existence. That debts for the hall and market had been contracted prior to the passage of the act, and large debts for the hall, subsequently, is shown by the evidence throughout the case, and, in fact, is admitted. Further, streets and water works were in existence when the act was passed, and their improvement and extension were clearly specific objects. But the direction to proceed with the city hall and market, which are treated by the act, (Sections 1 and 6), as then being in process of erection, is plainly impliable from the whole act. Indeed, the act differs in little from an ordinary deed of trust. Section 1 creates and vests the trust fund: Section 6 directs how it shall be applied. Each object named in Section 6 was then in being, or has arisen since. It is argued that this plain dedication of the fund does not specify and limit the objects to which the money shall be applied, because it names no object which was not already within the scope of the authority of the mayor and aldermen, and to which they might not have applied the surplus of the ordinary revenue of the city; and that the act, substantially, did nothing more than confer a power to increase the revenue for current purposes. The result would be that the mayor and aldermen could avail themselves of all the other portions of the act, but could cut off Section 6, and hold or spend the money at their sole discretion. I can see no difference between this act and a deed conveying to trustees, already exercising a trust over certain property, additional funds dedicated to the payment of specified debts already incurred and to be incurred in the improvement of the trust property, and then to certain specified, and then to general, improvements. Such a deed is never construed to give license to the trustees to disregard the instructions and spend the money at their pleasure, leaving to the cestui que trust, and to the donor, no remedy. There is no substantial difference, in principle, between this trust and that contained in the will of Stephen Girard. Vidal v. Girard, 2 How. 127 [11 L. Ed. 205]. The city of Philadelphia, with *its own funds could, if it had seen proper, have executed many of the purposes named in that will, but it has never been for a moment contended that this gave it the right to disregard Girard's instructions. Like this act, it names several objects in successive order, the two latter of which are the maintenance of a police force and the "improvement of the city property and the general appearance of the city itself." But, as is held in Vidal v. Girard, supra, and Girard v. Philadelphia, 7 Wall. 1 [19 L. Ed. 53], the first object has the first claim upon the fund, and until that object has been accomplished the city has no power to devote the money to any other purpose. In the case before us, the very first and great object referred to throughout the act, is not near completion; heavy debts are outstanding, and yet the mass of the bonds have been wasted and misapplied. It is needless to argue the point further.

*410

*411

Reference to Perry on Trusts, § 704, will furnish ample authority to show that when a deed, devise or statute endows a corporation or its officers with funds, by direct gift or by power to levy a tax, such funds to be used for the improvement of the town in general terms, or for public water works or buildings, or works of any kind as enumerated in Section 6, such direction constitutes a specific express trust; the funds are held subject to the trust, and the trust can be enforced or protected by the court of equity. See, especially, Attorney-General v. Eastlake; Attorney-General v. Dublin; Attorney-General v. Aspinall, supra.

The third ground, to sustain which it is said that the object of the statute really was to enable the city to fund its floating debt, &c., giving merely a preference to certain classes of obligations, appears to me to be sufficiently refuted by the act itself, and I have already, under the second division of my objections, said all that I have to say on that subject.

As a fourth ground, to sustain the conclusions reached by the court, it is said that the sole equity would consist in the statement that debts of the character provided for in the sixth section were outstanding at the time of the filing of the complaint; that the only debts of that class are debts on account of the city hall, and that as to them there is no equity, because such debts have an additional provision made for them by the tenth section of the *act, which directs that the income derived from lease of portions of the building shall be made a sinking fund for the payment of such debts. To answer the latter part first—that provision in Section 10 plainly either refers to the bonds devoted to the erection of the hall, or, more properly, is an additional security to the parties contracting to build the hall, for there is nothing in the act limiting the amount which might be expended on the hall. It is inconceivable that it was intended as a shield to cover the trustees in their breach of the trust imposed by Section 6, for such intention certainly is not expressed and ought not to be presumed.

*412

To say that the equity of the case, or the right for relief, is limited to the debt now outstanding on the city hall, is a total disregard of the position occupied by a trustee, and of all the other objects mentioned in the act. It is a fixed rule that a trustee, and all parties dealing with him, with notice of the trust, are liable to account for the entire trust fund. Even if all the objects named in the act had been completed, and there remained a surplus of the proceeds of the bonds, the corporation had no right to devote it to purposes foreign to those named in the act, Merchant Taylors Co. v. Attorney-General, 11 Eng. Ch. Cas. 34, and could be held to account. Whether the act of such a trustee, if done in good faith and for a good purpose, could be confirmed by the court, or would need legislative confirmation, is a question which it is needless to discuss; but that one or the other would be necessary is very clear. If I understand the law, as laid down by the authorities, the plaintiff is entitled to relief against all misconduct of the corporate officers and parties dealing with them in the professed exercise of the powers contained in the act. I readily admit that the court should not go within the scope of the authority conferred, and interfere with its discharge, upon the ground that it is unwise or injurious to the public, but its plain duty is to keep the corporate officers within the scope of their authority, and when they go outside of it to treat them, and all dealing with them, exactly as it treats other parties committing or aiding in breaches of trust. "So long as those functionaries strictly confine themselves within the exercise of those powers which are confided to them by the law, this *court will not interfere. The court will not interfere to see whether any alteration or regulation which they may direct, is good or bad; but if they are departing from that power which the law has vested in them, if they are assuming to themselves a power over property, which the law does not give them, this court no longer considers them as acting under the authority of their commission, but treats them, whether they be a corporation or individuals, merely as persons dealing with property without legal authority." Freeman v. Lewis, 4 Myl. & Cr. 249.

*413

The fifth point which compels dissent is the assumption by the court below, and sustained on appeal, that when the legislature directed that debts "heretofore contracted for the construction of the new city hall and market" should be paid out of the proceeds of the bonds, it meant that a certain note to J. L. Neagle, for $75,000, should be so paid. The note to Neagle is not mentioned in the act, and if the court goes outside of the act to extrinsic facts to ascertain the intention, it violates the settled rule of construction. The general assembly did not mean a debt to any particular person, nor any particular debt, for it did not say so; but it did mean debts of a specified class, viz., debts theretofore contracted for the construction of the hall and market. It devolves upon the court to decide what debts come within such description, and to do that the court properly resorts to evidence, and has no right to say that the legislature has preadjudicated the question of fact, unless that body has done so in explicit language. The evidence is conclusive that the note to J. L. Neagle for $75,000 did not, to that full extent, represent a debt under Section 6.

The note was given in August, 1871, for money loaned to the city council. The loan was negotiated under and by authority of proceedings of the board of mayor and aldermen, which, by law, are published; and it is admitted in the evidence "that the proceedings of council, referred to in the testimony in this case, were published in the newspapers of Columbia, S. C." The proceedings are as follows (July 11th, 1871, p. 99, minute-book of proceedings of city council of Columbia): "Resolved, that the mayor and committee of ways and means be authorized to borrow money from time to time, as may be necessary to carry *on contracts for building the proposed extension of the market, erecting new city hall, &c., and to secure any advances for this purpose, to dispose of and hypothecate city securities."

*414

On August 17th, 1871, (minute-book, p. 213,) the following report was made by the committee of ways and means: "That in furtherance of the duty confided to them to raise money to build city hall and market, and for other purposes necessary for support of city government, they negotiated with various parties, and are able to borrow seventy-five thousand dollars ($75,000) at current bank rates, which loan is to be secured by hypothecating two hundred and fifty thousand dollars' ($250,000) worth of city bonds. This mode of raising money the committee regards as preferable to the sale of the large amount of bonds that would be required now to raise the money needed. The committee believe that there will be such an advance in city bonds, in a few months, as to enable council to sell bonds sufficient to liquidate the debt now created, without suffering the discount and great loss that the sale would now entail upon the city. The committee would, therefore, recommend that the mayor, with the advice of the committee of ways and means, be authorized to execute a note of the city of Columbia for the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars, and to secure the said note by a pledge of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) of city bonds, which bonds he is hereby directed to issue."

It is proven that under a resolution of the said city council, adopted on the said 17th day of August, 1871, (see p. 212 minute-book,) the report was adopted, and thus became a resolution of council. The date of the note, the sum and the security prove that the loan was obtained under the authority conferred by the latter resolution of August 17th, and not under the resolution of July 11th, 1871, as is said by the majority of the court. And the chairman of the committee of ways and means testifies that "upon the resolution of July 11th, 1871, we negotiated the loan with Dr. Neagle. After the adoption of the report made August 17th, we closed the transaction."

The testimony further shows, and it is admitted by both sides, that the proceeds of the note were disposed of by January 1st, 1872, prior to the passage of the act, as follows:

*415

*For city hall	$14,494 66
For market	6,302 70
Total	$20,797 36

For the ordinary current expenses of the city government, having nothing to do with the hall or market, $53,917.08, leaving a balance of $285.56 unaccounted for.

It thus appears that the transaction was not completed under resolution of July 11th, which is construed to refer solely to hall and market; that the power to borrow money, conferred by that resolution, was not exercised, but that the committee came back and said that they might be able to borrow $75,000 for the hall and market and other purposes necessary for the support of the city government, but that for this loan securities were demanded which were not in their hands, and recommended that instead of their acting as under July 11th resolution, the power be confided in the mayor, under their advice, to give a note of the city of Columbia; to hypothecate as security for said note $250,000 in bonds, and to enable him to do the latter he be forthwith directed to issue the said bonds, which had thus to be brought into existence before they could be pledged. It is as plain as words can make it that the loan rests on the authority of the resolution adopted August 17th, 1871, and the resolution of July 11th has no more to do with the contract of loan and the note as perfected than if it had never existed. It was insufficient to support the scheme, and it was set aside, and one of far greater magnitude put in its place. The money was thus borrowed for several purposes, of which the hall and market were the two minor, and the sum necessary for the support of city government the major, as the testimony shows. It is useless to say that J. L. Neagle loaned under the resolution of August 11th, 1871. His own demand for $250,000 in bonds, which had not then been put in the committee's hands, shows that he was the very person who objected to the July 11th resolution, and required better and stronger note and security than that resolution authorized. He was satisfied with the resolution adopting the report on August 17th, 1871, because it was in full compliance with his requirements as therein set forth, and forthwith completed *the transaction on those very terms, of which he had full notice in the published resolution. He cannot now, with any merit, claim that he thought the loan was for the city hall, nor can his assignees, for the legislature did not make that the measure by which the object of the debt should be determined, but left it to be fixed by the ordinary rules of evidence. So much only as was paid for the hall and market is a debt contracted for their construction; the residue is a debt contracted for other purposes "necessary for the support of city government."

*416

As to other points in the case, I concur in the following:

1. That the validity of the bonds is not impaired by the defective "abstract" of the act endorsed thereon.

2. That the failure to recall and cancel the $250,000 in bonds, referred to in Section 1, prior to the sale of the new bonds, does not, per se, invalidate the sale. No objection was made at the time the sales were made, and the bonds in question had been recalled and canceled before this action was brought. The plaintiff may be considered as bound by acquiescence, or with length of time having elapsed as estopped by laches. The failure to recall was a gross irregularity, but, no one having complained, the city was able afterwards to make amends by recalling the bonds, and thus, substantially, did comply with the results contemplated by the act. This view does not at all affect the right on the part of the plaintiff to object to the use of the proceeds of the sale of the new bonds to recall the old. The two questions are entirely disconnected—one is an irregularity which may be waived or repaired, the other is a plain breach of trust, and stands on a different footing.

3. That the bonds were advertised and put up at public sale substantially in compliance with the act (Section 3.) The first advertisement and sale was literally in compliance; the two subsequent, being on days fixed by public adjournment, were regarded as mere resumptions of the first sale. The public stood by, acquiescing to such construction, and it is too late now to complain.

I concur, therefore, so far as concerns the public conduct of the sales, but I differ widely from the view which is taken of the completion of these sales by subsequent negotiation. The *intention of Section 3 of the act was to secure the best market price, by attracting public attention, and to prevent fraudulent private negotiation. The evidence shows that this intention was fully carried out. The city council, to prevent sacrifice, limited the price at which the bonds should be allowed to go, and had large amounts thus bid off by its agents. But bidders at auction sales do not perfect their titles until they have complied with the terms. The city, which was both vendor and vendee, when it bid off the bonds by its agents, held them still subject to the same trusts as before, and the same limitations, with this exception, viz., that, having complied with the requirements of the act, intended to fix a fair market price, it was left to the discretion of the city officers whether they would put the bonds up again for public sale, or transfer the city bid to third parties at the same or an advanced price for the benefit of the city, subject to the purposes of the act.

*417

The bonds were bid off at the three sales as follows:

Clark Waring, for himself	$ 10,000
R. K. Scott (per Donaldson)	20,000
Central National Bank (per Gambrill)	10,000
City of Columbia (per Alexander, Waring & Wilder.)	210,000
	$250,000

The question is whether the sales were perfected by payment, for, unless payment was made, (the sales being made in pursuance of a statutory trust, of which all had notice,) the title would not pass, and the bonds, in the hands of original purchasers, or persons having notice, are affected by the trust, and should be delivered up. To answer this inquiry it must first be fixed what, under the act, is a payment. The act, Section 1, empowers the mayor and aldermen "to borrow money by issuing city bonds," and directs that the issue be made by public sale. Section 3. One buying in the manner prescribed by the act, and paying money, is responsible for nothing which may occur in the future by reason of the conduct of the corporate officers, provided, always, that he is not particeps. Therefore, if the bonds had been sold for money, and the money paid, bondholders would not properly be parties to this action.

*418

The sole question would *be as to the application of the money, and in that only the corporation, its officers and parties dealing with them, could be concerned. But not $1 of money was paid for the $250,000 in bonds thus bid off, and the whole transaction is thereby opened to inquiry where the original parties are before the court. Money is the only payment technically admissible, because the express purpose of the issue is to "borrow money" by sale of the bonds. There may, nevertheless, be an equivalent for money. Debt, to the payment of which the money is dedicated by the act, is an equivalent. Section 6 defines such debt. A debt contracted for the construction of the hall and market was, from the first, an equivalent of money, and could be delivered up, satisfied, in payment for bonds. It matters not whether such debts were in the hands of original creditors, assignees or the city council, which had borrowed money to pay them, and remained liable for the amount. The proceeds of the bonds would be applicable thereto, and any obligation representing such debt could be taken as money. But an obligation for money previously borrowed by the city council, on the mere pretence that it was for a purpose, such as the act afterwards named, and not actually so applied, occupies no such position, and cannot be used in payment for bonds, for the council is a mere trustee under the act; the relators are the true parties in interest, are liable on the bonds, and should not be made to bear any burthen, or suffer any loss but such as results from the act, strictly construed. Therefore, in testing the validity of the sales, the payment for the bonds must be subjected to the rule thus laid down; it must be in money, or what, under Section 6, is its equivalent. The evidence shows, as already stated, that the city hall is not yet completed and that debts contracted for its construction are still outstanding to a large amount. The city council has, therefore, up to this time, had no power to apply the proceeds of the bonds to any other purpose, (Vidal v. Girard, Girard v. Philadelphia, supra,) and, consequently, no other class of indebtedness or obligation has been receivable in lieu of money.

I will now pass upon the sales in detail.

Clark Waring, who was then the contractor charged with the construction of the city hall, bid off $10,000 in bonds, and paid *for them by crediting the amount on the debt then due to him on city hall account. The payment was valid under Section 6, and those bonds are free from objection.

*419

The Central National Bank bid off $10,000 in bonds, and for payment delivered up a note held against the city council and a small parcel of city coupons. The note was for money loaned to the council and expended for ordinary purposes, not included in Section 6. The payment was not good, and the bonds being in the hands of the original purchaser, should be delivered up, and the parties restored to their original position, leaving the bank to such remedy as in law it might have.

R. K. Scott bid off $20,000, and for payment entered a credit to the amount of his bid on a note he held against the city council for money previously loaned to aid in paying the $75,000 note held by J. L. Neagle. The credit was prima facie no payment, and the bonds should be delivered up; but another feature in the transaction will be subsequently noticed. The remaining $210,000 were in hands of the city officers, as vendors and bidders at the public sales, still subject to the conditions of the trust, and negotiable thereunder, but with the right, on the part of the council, to transfer their bids to purchasers on the terms and in the manner above laid down. The fact that the bonds were still in the hands of the city officers refutes the idea that purchasers from them can be regarded as holders of negotiable instruments, without notice. Possession by the city was notice that the bonds had not been issued, and none put up such defence except the Carolina National Bank. As to that defendant its own evidence and transactions conclude it by showing that it was intimately acquainted with the whole matter, and recognized the bonds as unissued and still the property of the city.

The city officers undertook to sell the bonds, as follows, to—

R. K. Scott	$ 50,000
Carolina National Bank	100,000
John English	3,500
Clark Waring	4,500
John Alexander	750
Union Savings Bank	15,000
	$173,750

*420

*And pledged as collaterals—

South Carolina Bank and Trust Company	$29,250
Thomas B. Jeter	6,000
Leaving in hand	1,000

The sale to John English was bona fide; the money was paid, and the bonds are free from objection.

The sale to Waring was likewise unobjectionable. Valid payment was made by credit duly entered on his account for work done on the city hall.

The sale to John Alexander was void, for payment was made by credit on an account not within the objects named in the act. As to the rights of the subsequent holder, who has not answered, the court has disposed of them generally, and it is unnecessary to discuss the question in a mere dissent.

The second sale to R. K. Scott, is of the same character with the first, and should be set aside, except to the extent hereinafter indicated.

The sale to the Carolina National Bank is good in part, and as to the residue, is of the same character, in part, with the sales to R. K. Scott, and in part is without any legal or equitable validity. The amount professedly given for the bonds was $66,000. It was paid by crediting on obligations held against the city council to the amount of $52,420.30, and by putting to the credit of the city $13,579.70. The latter was a valid payment, and to the extent that amount covers the bonds the sale is unobjectionable. Of the remaining $52,420.30, the amount, $35,513.25, represents money which the bank had loaned to aid in taking up the note to J. L. Neagle. R. K. Scott loaned $40,000, which was applied to the same object. Scott and the bank, therefore, represent any equity which was attached to Neagle's note. As already indicated, that note was to the extent of $20,797.36, entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of the bonds. The right to that sum, or rather to bonds which would represent that amount, is held by R. K. Scott and the bank in the proportion of $40,000 to $35,513.25, and in the additional proportion of the price at which they respectively bought the bonds. As to the balance of the bonds bought by Scott and by the bank, the sale should be set aside and the bonds *delivered up, and the parties restored to their respective rights as they stood at the time of the attempted sales, except in so far as the sales are confirmed by the rules above laid down.

*421

The sale commonly called a sale to the Citizens' Bank of Petersburg, Va., was, in fact, a sale to the Union Savings Bank, as is shown by the testimony of the then mayor and treasurer, whatever may have been the intention in the mind of the purchaser, an agent, who represented both banks in the transaction. Parties dealing through agents are bound by the acts and by the knowledge on the part of their agents, within the scope of the authority. The testimony is that the sale was made to pay demands held by the Union Savings Bank as against the city. It makes no difference whether the agent paid by check on the Union Savings Bank, which he represented, and paid the check by crediting the amount on demands against the city, or paid down the money of the Citizens' Bank of Petersburg, Va., with one hand and took it up in the other, to satisfy the demands of the Union Savings Bank. In either course of conduct he colluded with the city council in the misappropriation of the proceeds of the bonds to debts not comprehended by the terms of the trust, and the law should fall, not upon the innocent relators, but upon the principal, who should be made to deliver up the bonds, and go for remedy against its agent and the Union Savings Bank.

The hypothecation of $29,250 of the bonds with the Carolina Bank and Trust Company was clearly illegal, and, in the hands of the original holder, the bonds could have been at once recalled; but being negotiable in their character, and having passed into the hands of others by subsequent pledge, and then by public sale, and there being no evidence of notice, they have passed beyond the reach of the power of the court, and are valid obligations. There seem, however, to have been other bonds sold at the same time that were of the number delivered to R. K. Scott. They were pledged by his agent and were bid in by himself. As to these, no change was effected, and they are open to the original objection, and have been already disposed of. R. K. Scott was the owner of the pledge, and had notice of the defect in the title. It cannot be held that by pledging the bonds *and suffering them to be put up at public sale he could perfect his title by bidding them in, when he had full notice.

*422

The hypothecation with Thomas B. Jeter to secure a loan, was without authority and ought to have been rescinded, and the bonds delivered up. It is alleged in the answer that they have been pledged in the Central National Bank, but there is no evidence that the pledge was made prior to the commencement of this proceeding.

The result of these views would be to reverse the judgment of the Circuit Court, and to order a decree confirming the sales of bonds to the amount of about $55,000 in bonds, and establishing the validity of the $29,250, which are made valid by their character of negotiability.

The power of the city council to borrow money and thus impose burthens on the city, is questioned in the case, but the court has not deemed it raised by the pleadings, and has not passed upon it. I am inclined to think the point does arise, but have already gone to such length that I am indisposed to say more than that very sound authorities seem disposed to lean against the exercise of such power by a corporation. The power to borrow money is distinct from the right to give certificates or evidence of indebtedness for services rendered, &c., and the case of Neely v. Town of Yorkville, 10 S. C. 141, by no means settles the former question.

Decree.

---

12 S. C. 422

(Case No. 763.)

J. H. BROOKS, Executor of Whitfield Brooks, and of Mary P. Brooks, v. M. C. BROOKS et al.

M. C. BUTLER, Assignee, v. J. H. BROOKS, Executor, and J. C. BROOKS.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Wills ⇐727.]

A testator, by his last will, declared: "All and singular the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, of every description, I give devise and bequeath to my beloved wife,

*423

M., for and during the term of *her natural life; and, after her death, it is my will and desire that the same shall be sold and the proceeds thereof equally divided among my children in fee, share and share alike." Other provisions of the will clearly showed that the sale of this residuum was not to take place until after the death of M. Held, that the estate was to be enjoyed specifically in mass by M. during her life.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Robinson v. Ostendorff, 38 S. C. 74, 16 S. E. 371.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1748; Dec. Dig. ⇐727.]

[2. Life Estates ⇐11.]

In such case the only duty of the life-tenant is to maintain and preserve the estate as a whole, in as good condition as to productive capacity as when received, and she is not responsible for deterioration occurring without fault on her part. Cases considered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Orr v. Orr, 34 S. C. 280, 13 S. E. 467.

For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 29, 30, 42; Dec. Dig. ⇐11.]

[3. Life Estates ⇐23.]

Hence, a sale of two slaves, a small proportion of the estate, by such a life-tenant, is not improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. ⇐43; Dec. Dig. ⇐23.]

[4. Life Estates ⇐20.]

The burden of proof rests upon the remaindermen to show deterioration, improperly permitted, in the value of furniture and like property in the hands of the life-tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. ⇐20.]

[5. Life Estates ⇐15.]

The consumable or vendable products of such life-estate, over and above what are needed for the current support of the property, should, when adequate, be applied to the reasonable maintenance of the life-tenant, and to maintain the estate in as good condition as when received; when inadequate, they should be applied equally to the maintenance of the life-tenant and of the estate. Cases considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 21, 34, 35; Dec. Dig. ⇐15.]

[6. Life Estates ⇐15.]

Of the produce on hand at death of testator, such as is proper to be consumed for the benefit of the estate is properly only a part of the estate, to be accounted for as a whole by the life-tenant; a surplus of such produce not so needed, is to be accounted for as of its pecuniary value at testator's death. Property not consumable is to be regarded as a specific bequest, to be preserved in proper condition for the remaindermen. Cases considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. ⇐15.]

[7. Life Estates ⇐14.]

Where a life-tenant dies before the agricultural year is completed, the produce of such year belongs to her estate, subject to her accountability for the life-estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. ⇐14.]

[8. Life Estates ⇐20.]

In the absence of special circumstances warranting a charge upon the estate by a life-tenant, money expended by her therefor cannot be made a claim against the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 21, 41, 42; Dec. Dig. ⇐20.]

[9. Life Estates ⇐17.]

Permanent improvements put upon land by a life-tenant, are to be considered under the general question of the condition of the estate as a whole, and cannot be otherwise made a charge against the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. ⇐17.]

[10. Executors and Administrators ⇐266.]

A life-tenant, who was also executrix, receiving the residuum of an estate, is entitled to credit for a debt of testator paid out of her individual property, but not to interest thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1029; Dec. Dig. ⇐266.]

[11. Executors and Administrators ⇐66.]

A life-tenant, who is also executrix, is not bound to return an inventory of the property held by her in her character of life-tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 315; Dec. Dig. ⇐66.]

[12. Executors and Administrators ⇐130.]

Where an executor has an election to take a tract of land at a valuation, and doubts as to the construction of the will and the mode of valuation require a determination by a court of equity, the executor may await the decree before making his election, and may, meantime, retain the land in his own possession, and should be charged therefor only a fair rental value, and should not be held accountable for the profits derived from its use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 537; Dec. Dig. ⇐130.]

*424

[13. Wills ⇐705.]

*Where the court is asked to construe a will, it is competent to require, by decree, that releases should be executed by the legatees according to the direction of the will, before receiving their legacies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1682; Dec. Dig. ⇐705.]

[14. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇐175; Judgment ⇐780.]

Where land is given to A for life, and after her death to be sold, and the proceeds divided amongst testator's children, share and share alike, a judgment obtained against one of these children during the lifetime of A, constitutes no lien upon his share in the remainder; and when sold under the direction of a court of equity, the share of such child in the proceeds, passing under an assignment, previously executed for the benefit of his creditors, will be regarded as equitable assets.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. ⇐547; Dec. Dig. ⇐175; Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1348; Dec. Dig. ⇐780.]

[15. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇐202, 293; Limitation of Actions ⇐102.]

Equity will enforce the terms of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, although not legally complete under the act of 1759, by reason of the failure of the assignee to accept the trust. Creditors in interest may seek the aid of a court of equity to enforce its terms, and the statute of limitations is no bar to the trust thus created.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. §§ 850, 851, 889; Dec. Dig. ⇐202, 293; Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 499; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

[16. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇐48.]

Where an assignment made under the act of 1759 for the benefit of creditors, fails to convey the legal title for want of acceptance by the assignee of his trust, a subsequent assignment of a portion of the same property to others, will be upheld, the validity of such second assignment not being made a question in the cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. ⇐48.]

[17. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇐295; Creditors' Suit ⇐13.]

Under a bill which cannot be regarded as a general creditors' bill, as the legal remedies were not exhausted, but retained as a bill to carry out the trusts of an assignment, the plaintiffs have no right to have the interests of the debtor in property not embraced in the assignment, defined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. § 865; Dec. Dig. ⇐295; Creditors' Suit, Cent. Dig. § 67; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

[18. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇐202.]

A payment of a portion of the assigned estate to one who had made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, under the act of 1759, sustained, as, the assignee having refused to accept the trust, there was no one else to whom payment could be made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. §§ 491, 688–690; Dec. Dig. ⇐202.]

[19. Wills ⇐705.]

When property at a fixed valuation is offered by the will to one of the children of testator, the decree which declares the right of such child to this property should, at the same time, provide for equalization of shares among all the children, as contemplated in the will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1682; Dec. Dig. ⇐705.]

[20. Gifts ⇐66.]

The gift by a mother to her son, during her last illness, of a certificate of deposit, payable to bearer, upheld as a donatio causa mortis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. § 136; Dec. Dig. ⇐66.]

[21. Executors and Administrators ⇐89.]

An executor is not responsible for failing to collect a note of the estate from a party proved to have been insolvent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 394; Dec. Dig. ⇐89.]

[22. Executors and Administrators ⇐500.]

An executor is not entitled to commissions for years in which he filed no returns.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2134; Dec. Dig. ⇐500.]

[23. Appeal and Error ⇐1154.]

This court will direct a decree to be opened to enable the Circuit Court to correct a clerical error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4497; Dec. Dig. ⇐1154.]

[24. Executors and Administrators ⇐111.]

Allowance of counsel fees to an executor is a matter within the discretion of the Circuit judge; and the refusal of one judge, at an early stage of a cause to allow them, cannot control the judgment of another judge who finally hears the cause.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Walker v. Killian, 62 S. C. 489, 40 S. E. 887.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 459; Dec. Dig. ⇐111.]

[25. Executors and Administrators ⇐104.]

Where questions of doubt prevent an executor from lending or paying out the moneys of the estate, he should not be charged with interest until the end of a year after his qualification.†

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 428; Dec. Dig. ⇐104.]

*425

*Before Carpenter, J., December, 1875, and Pressley, J., October, 1878, at Edgefield.

In the action first above stated, John Hampden Brooks, as executor of the will of his father, Whitfield Brooks, and as executor of his mother, Mary P. Brooks, asked for a construction of both wills and the instruction of the court as to the several questions arising thereunder. All other parties in interest were made defendants, who by answer demanded an accounting of both estates. This action was commenced in 1871.

† See Koon v. Munro, (4), 11 S. C. 140.

The second action was instituted in 1872 by M. C. Butler, assignee, and others creditors of James C. Brooks, a son of Whitfield and Mary P. Brooks, against James C. Brooks, J. Hampden Brooks, executor, and W. P. Butler—the last-named having been named as assignee under an assignment for the benefit of creditors, but who refused to act. This action claimed the benefit of the assignment made by James C. Brooks of his interest in the estate of his father after the termination of his mother's life estate therein, and demanded an accounting by J. H. Brooks, executor, and the payment to them of J. C. Brooks' interest.

Whitfield Brooks died in 1851, leaving of force a last will and testament. After making some specific bequests, the will proceeds:

9. If any one or more of the negro slaves hereby specifically bequeathed to my beloved son, John Hampden Brooks, shall die before he has attained to the age of twenty-one years, the loss of the slave or slaves so dying during the minority of the said John H. Brooks, shall be made up to him by substituting in the stead of the slave or slaves so dying another slave or slaves of like value, or a sum of money equal to the value of the slave or slaves so dying to be taken from the residuum of my estate, and I desire and direct that during the minority of my said son, John Hampden Brooks, all and singular the property and estate hereby devised to him shall be and remain in the custody and possession of his mother, and that in respect to the income and profits thereof during his minority she shall therefrom defray and discharge all the charges and expenses of his maintenance *and education, but beyond that shall not be in any wise accountable or chargeable therefor.

*426

10. The portion and share of the estate of my lamented mother-in-law, Mrs. Mary Carroll, deceased, which in and by her last will and testament is devised to my beloved wife for the term of her natural life, with remainder to her children; I do hereby, give, devise and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary P. Brooks, to be had and held by her not merely for and during her natural life, but absolutely and in fee forever, with power to dispose of it by deed or will, and to do all other acts respecting the same as fully and perfectly to all intents and purposes as though she were the unqualified and unrestricted owner thereof; and for the purpose of making this disposition valid and effectual, I hereby provide and declare that all and singular the devises and bequests in favor of my children and each of them, in this will contained, are and shall be held and taken to be upon the express condition that they and each of them shall assign, release and relinquish to my beloved wife absolutely and unreservedly all and singular their and each of their said rights, interest and estate in remainder accruing to, or vested in them in and by the will of their said grandmother, Mrs. Mary Carroll, deceased, as aforesaid.

11. All and singular the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, of every description, I give devise and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary P. Brooks, for and during the term of her natural life; and after her death it is my will and desire that the same shall be sold and the proceeds thereof equally divided among my children in fee, share and share alike.

12. I request of my beloved wife that she will annually make certain gifts and presents to the negro slaves bequeathed to her for life, according to a memorandum that I deliver to her.

13. I authorize and empower my beloved wife, out of the estate hereby devised to her for life, to make such advancements as she may choose to any one of our children, always provided, however, that within six months after any such advancement or advancements shall have been made to any one of them, she shall make advancements of like value to the others of our *children; and provided further, that this restriction shall not be construed to extend to small gifts or presents not exceeding $20 in value.

*427

14. It is my will and desire that my beloved son, John Hampden Brooks, shall at the death of his mother be entitled to take as parcel of his portion of the residuum of my estate, and at the valuation to be placed upon it by five disinterested persons to be appointed by the executors of my will, all that portion of my lands comprehended within the following boundaries, that is to say, a straight line running from the oak corner on the Mims tract to the grape-vine corner next to G. W. Holloway's land, the dividing line between my land and the lands of Z. W. Carwile, A. P. King, Dr. John Mobley and James Dorn, the Matthews road, and the dividing line between my lands and the lands of Wiley Kemp, Thomas Payne and James Mims.

15. All the residue of my lands lying between the parcel of land carved out for my son, John Hampden Brooks, as provided for in the preceding clause, and the tract of land I have already given to my beloved daughter, Ellen Dunovant, I desire and direct shall be taken at the death of my beloved wife by my said daughter as parcel of her share of the residuum of my estate, and at a valuation to be fixed upon by five commissioners, disinterested persons, to be appointed for that purpose by my executors, if my said daughter chooses.

16. I nominate constitute and appoint my beloved wife sole executrix of this my will for and during the term of her natural life, and after death I confide the execution of the same to my three sons, Preston S. Brooks, James C. Brooks and John Hampden Brooks, as the executors thereof; and I do hereby invest my said executrix and executors with full power and authority to sell and to do all other acts necessary to the execution of this my last will and testament.

Whitfield Brooks left a large estate, consisting of plantation, negroes, horses, mules, cattle, &c., besides silverware, furniture, &c. His widow, Mary P. Brooks, and four children, survived him, viz., Preston S., James C. and John H. Brooks, and Ellen Dunovant. Mary P. Brooks qualified as executrix, and took possession of the estate. Shortly thereafter she paid the claim of *Cornelia Cross, as stated in Judge Pressley's decree. She sold two slaves belonging to the life estate. Other sales and purchases by her, and improvements added, are stated in the Circuit decree.

*428

In 1860 judgments were obtained against James C. Brooks, upon which writs of capias ad satisfaciendum were issued, and in 1861 he was arrested, and having applied for the benefit of the insolvent debtor's act, and made an assignment of his entire estate, was discharged from custody. His schedule contained inter alia the following: "Whatever interest I may have, in remainder or otherwise, in my father, the late Whitfield Brooks' will, after the death of my mother, Mary P. Brooks." William P. Butler, the assignee, declined to accept the appointment, and never acted as assignee, and no one else was ever substituted in his stead.

In October, 1871, James C. Brooks assigned to J. H. Brooks so much of his interest in his father's estate as would amount to $1500, and to John E. Bacon so much of the same as would amount to $500. In 1872 he assigned to J. H. Brooks, as executor of Mary P. Brooks, all of his interest in his father's estate.

Before that time, in December, 1870, Mrs. Mary P. Brooks died. Her son, Preston S. Brooks, and her daughter, Ellen Dunovant, had survived their father, but predeceased their mother—the former leaving a wife and four children, the latter a husband (R. G. M. Dunovant) and four children. Mary P. Brooks left a will, and appointed J. H. Brooks sole executor, who qualified as such, and also then became executor of his father's will. She gave a plantation of nine hundred and fifty acres, called Turkey Creek, to her son, J. C. Brooks, in trust, after paying for his own maintenance, for his children. Her remaining estate, after a few specific legacies, she divided among her son, J. H. Brooks, and the children of her deceased son and daughter—to each one-third. Clause 12 reads as follows:

"If the debt due me by the said R. G. M. Dunovant for the purchase of my said house and lot in the village of Edgefield, of which he is now in possession, shall not be paid by him within one year next after my death, then, and in that event, the con*tract to him for the sale of the last-mentioned premises shall be on my part renounced and forever abandoned; and the said house and lot, to be valued at the sum of $5000, shall belong to and vest in my said daughter and her children as parcel of her and their share of my said residuary estate; if such share shall be worth more than $5000, and if such share shall be of less value than that sum, then the said house and lot shall stand charged in favor of the other shares, with so much money as shall suffice to produce equality in value among all the residuary shares."

*429

Mrs. Brooks, before her death, held a certificate of deposit for $2000 in a bank in Columbia. It was claimed by J. H. Brooks, after her death, as his property, by gift from his mother, and he received the money. The only testimony upon this point (his own being objected to) was that of his wife. She testified as follows:

"Witness is the daughter-in-law of Mrs. Mary P. Brooks; resided in the house with her from the time of witness' marriage until Mrs. Brooks' death—about three years; Mrs. Mary P. Brooks spoke to witness more than once about the indebtedness of Chancellor Carroll to Mrs. Brooks, and said that she intended to give it to J. H. Brooks; that she had written to Messrs. Pope & Haskell about it, and that she intended to arrange the matter when she went to Columbia, which she expected to do soon; witness does not remember that Mrs. Mary P. Brooks ever mentioned the amount of the indebtedness; it was some thousands; during her last illness Mrs. Mary P. Brooks asked for the certificate of deposit of the amount due by Chancellor Carroll, when it was brought to her, and she gave it to J. H. Brooks; witness does not remember exactly what she said, but it was something equivalent to 'now it is done;' Mrs. Mary P. Brooks always made the impression on witness' mind that she intended to give this particular money to J. H. Brooks, saying 'that she felt he would need all she could give him, as he had lived so long with her without a home of his own.'

"+ Witness does not remember seeing Mrs. Mary P. Brooks take the paper in her hand and deliver it to J. H. Brooks; saw J. H. Brooks take the paper.

*430

* "++ Upon reflection, saw Mrs. Preston Brooks bring the paper and give it to Mrs. Mary P. Brooks, who gave it to J. H. Brooks."

Shortly after Mrs. Brooks' death, J. H. Brooks had the lands of Whitfield Brooks' estate appraised, and also procured an appraisement of the rent for the year 1871. He continued in possession for several years afterwards. There was a great deal of testimony upon the question of rents. A number of witnesses testified as to the sum for which, in their judgment, it would have rented at public outcry. It was also shown what were the products of the place during these years, and what rents were received by J. H. Brooks from his tenants.

After the death of M. P. Brooks, the executor made payments to J. C. Brooks, on account of his interest in his father's estate out of the proceeds of the life estate which had fallen in, and without notice of the general assignment made in 1871. Among the assets of Whitfield Brooks' estate was a note on A. P. Blocker, which was never collected by the life-tenant or her executor, and never could have been enforced by legal proceedings.

At the time of W. Brooks' death he was indebted for the purchase money of certain slaves. His widow paid the debt out of moneys received from her mother's estate. She did not return these slaves upon the inventory of her testator's estate filed by her in the proper office. Her executor claimed the amount so paid as a credit upon her accounts as executrix, which was refused by the referee.

S. B. Griffin, Esq., being referee, made his report, submitting the testimony taken and his conclusions of fact, with a statement of accounts. Exceptions taken thereto by plaintiffs and defendants were heard by his Honor Judge Carpenter, who filed his decree in December, 1875. He directed all the lands of W. Brooks to be sold, sustained the gift of the certificate of deposit, subject to the rights of M. P. Brooks' creditors, approved the charge of the rent for 1871 at the amount fixed by the appraisers, and allowed the counsel fees paid by the executor to be credited on his accounts, but directed that no more should be allowed. Upon all other matters the decision was reserved, and the report was recommitted.

*431

*Exceptions to the second report of referee Griffin were heard by his Honor Judge Townsend in October, 1877. In February, 1878, Judge Townsend resigned his seat upon the bench before rendering his decree. By order he was afterwards appointed referee in the causes, and, as such, submitted his report, accompanied by a statement of accounts, in which he allowed credit to the executor for counsel fees paid after the date of Judge Carpenter's order.

On exceptions to the report of Townsend, referee, his Honor Judge Pressley heard the causes at October Term, 1878, and January 2d, 1879, filed the following

Decree:

The facts of this case bearing on the legal issues discussed by the referees are fully stated in their reports, and from the mass of testimony attached thereto, I gather other facts which bear on some legal points in which I differ from the referees.

Judge Carpenter has decided the point that the $2600 given to J. H. Brooks, by his mother, was a valid gift. All other points in the case are yet undecided.

The plan of the referees for estimating the rent to be paid by J. H. Brooks, for Rose lands, is doubtless the best under the circumstances, but I add $100 a year to their estimate for the last four years. This is done, not as overruling their finding on the facts, but only as enforcing that policy which, in the case of doubt, charges the highest rate to an executor who uses his testator's land without having tested its rental value at public auction.

The referees rightly award to the creditors of J. C. Brooks his share of his father's estate. They take his portion of the land, furniture and silver-plate, according to the priority of their judgments. The other assets which had no corporeal existence in 1861, when he took the benefit of the insolvent debtor's act, must be divided pro rata amongst his other creditors of that estate. His said share has not been forfeited for want of the release to his mother which his father's will required; her payments and advances to him under the said will conclusively prove that he did deliver the said release.

*432

I do not agree with *the referees that J. H. Brooks, executor, is responsible to the creditors of J. C. Brooks for so much of his share as was paid to him in 1871 and 1872, before they filed their complaint. He cannot be presumed to have had notice of the said assignment made so long ago.

In the matter of the accounts of J. H. Brooks, executor, I find in all the reports of Mr. Griffin a very serious error, which Townsend, referee, also adopts. They charge the said executor with the whole indebtedness of his mother to his father's estate, whereas he should have been charged with only the cash balance of his mother's estate in his hands. Also, there is too much interest charged against him; he could neither have lent out the money on interest nor have paid it to the devisees whilst so many questions of doubt remained to be settled. Under such circumstances reasonable time for proper action is always allowed, and in that case an executor is not usually charged with interest until the end of the twelve months after his qualification.

As to the indebtedness of Mrs. Brooks as life-tenant and executrix under the will of Whitfield Brooks, I differ from both of the referees. They both charge her with the whole inventory, and crediting her with certain payments and advances, and with the value of the emancipated slaves, hold her responsible for the rest of the said inventory. This balance is further reduced by referee Townsend, who allows her the value of such articles as were consumable in the use. To this allowance exception has been filed.

The class of decided cases which charge the inventory of the personalty to the life-tenant are not applicable to this case. They all rest upon the presumed intention of the testator that the life-tenant should sell such articles, invest the proceeds, and use only the income, thus leaving the principal intact to the remainder-men. But no such intention can be presumed in this case; the testator expressly directs that his estate shall be sold after the death of the life-tenant. The said estate, therefore, falls under the case of Calhoun v. Furgeson, 3 Rich. Eq. 160, which holds that where a plantation, with the slaves, provisions and other articles thereon, is bequeathed in mass to a life-tenant, he or she is trustee for the remainder-men, and is bound by proper care *and diligence to keep up the whole estate to its original value. But, if such care and diligence be used, and nevertheless a deficiency in the value of such estate should arise from causes beyond the control of the life-tenant, then he or she is not responsible for such deficiency. Under this rule the referees do not charge the value of the emancipated slaves, and, by the same rule, they should not have charged any depreciation in the value of the vehicles, implements of agriculture, or of the work animals, which, as one of the results of the late war, fell upon this estate no heavier than upon others the best managed in this state.

*433

I can see no reason why a life-tenant should be held chargeable for losses which other persons, the most prudent and the most careful, had to suffer, and could not prevent in their own estates. Holding that this life-tenant is not so chargeable, unless for default of care and lack of proper prudence, I have carefully examined the mass of testimony attached to the referees' reports, and find therein no shadow of proof that Mrs. Brooks was ever wanting in faithfulness to her trust. There is no evidence, and not the slightest probability, that she applied to her own use any of the money on hand at the death of Whitfield Brooks, or any of the proceeds of the notes, accounts or cotton which he left. The whole of these was about $5700. He must have owed some debts, such as physician's bill, overseer's wages, and other items incident to a large family and several plantations with numerous slaves. Besides these were the usual expenses of administration, including the usual and necessary counsel fees. As the executrix kept no account, it would scarcely be possible to prove payments of this character after the lapse of more than twenty years, and after the death of the said executrix. But if, notwithstanding the almost positive certainty that she did make payments of considerable amounts in that behalf, credit for the same be denied for her want of proof, yet even the items now proved to have been paid by her, including her lawful commissions, exceed the money which she received by more than $1500. In making this estimate I include her commissions, not only on the said $5700, but also on the proceeds of a large amount of real and personal property, which, soon after the death of Whitfield Brooks, she sold and divided as his will directed. Town*send, referee, supposed that she did not account for that property in her lifetime, but at the hearing of this case it was admitted by all the parties that immediately after the sale the proceeds were fully divided.

*434

Following these commissions is a payment by her of $1690, the legacy to H. Brooks; also, an advance of $1000 to J. C. Brooks to equalize his share with others who have received slaves to that amount. Then follows a payment of $3662 to Cornelia Cross. Concerning this item, it appears in the testimony that Whitfield Brooks, only six months before his death, filed his last account as executor of his father. It showed that he was then indebted to that estate in the sum of $6167.52, to wit, $2871.26 to the share of William Gillison and wife, and $3296.26 to the share of Charles Cross and wife, both the said items bearing interest from November 21st, 1849. There is no proof as to the time when the share of Gillison and wife was paid, or by whom it was paid, but the proof is very clear that Mrs. Brooks paid the share of Cornelia Cross, which with the interest and counsel fee, amounted to $3662.

But the referees raise the legal presumption that the payment to Cornelia Cross was made out of assets which Whitfield Brooks in his lifetime had reserved for that purpose from his father's estate. I fail to find in the testimony any proof whatever of the existence of such reserved fund, and the idea of its existence is completely rebutted by the fact that the decree of the court, under which said payment was made, did not order the transfer of any reserved fund or the collection of any assets of which Cornelia Cross was to have the proceeds; on the contrary, its direction was that Mrs. Brooks pay the amount, principal and interest, and that direction is consistent only with the supposition that Whitfield Brooks, as executor, owed that amount to his father's estate, having previously mingled its assets with his own. It is, therefore, very manifest that this payment was or should have been from the assets of the estate of Whitfield Brooks, and that, adding it to the other payments of his executrix and to her lawful commissions, it makes the amount of her payments for his estate greatly exceed what she received in money, even omitting the very considerable payments that she must have paid, but which *have not been proved, and thus a large portion of the income of her life estate was dedicated to the benefit of the remaindermen.

*435

After this she further freely used her income to build on the plantation five cabins for the slaves, a large wheat barn, an additional stable for the work animals, and a large shed for the other stock. She also purchased brood mares to keep up the supply of horses, and introduced improved breeds of cattle and hogs; she sold five of the old mules, and replaced them with five young and more valuable; and she kept such constant care of the slaves that they had increased, at the time of their emancipation, forty more than when she received them. Thus by her constant care and diligence the whole estate was improved, until further improvement was rendered impossible by the late war. That left this estate as it did all others within its sweep. Her means to restore its losses perished with confederate money. She reserved from year to year unsold portions of her cotton crop, and after the war her own money, the proceeds of this cotton, was very largely expended by her in restoring the plantation, organizing labor, replacing the work animals and other stock upon the same. At the time of her death the cattle, hogs and sheep on the said plantation were appraised at more than those left thereon at the time of the death of her testator, but the mules, horses, plantation vehicles and other implements, were deficient. So, also, was the provision crop made during the last year of her life. For these deficiencies I hold that she is not chargeable. So far from having been a faithless trustee to the remaindermen, she did more after the war to restore and keep up the value of the estate in her hands than it was reasonable to expect of her, and very few planters in this state did so much for their own estates as she did for this.

I therefore adjudge and decree that her estate be charged only with the sum of $816, the value fixed by the referee on the furniture and silver plate which she bequeathed to J. H. Brooks; also, that the proceeds of the work animals, cattle, hogs, plantation vehicles and tools left on hand at her death be carried to the credit of her testator's estate. That being done, I hold her estate no further liable.

The provisions of the will of Mrs. Brooks do not require *special detail; after some small legacies, it directs an equal division of the rest of her property among her children. Her house and lot in Edgefield has been surrendered by Gen. Dunovant, who held it under a contract to purchase; his children now have possession of said house, and at a price named in the said will they are to keep it as a part of their share. Its rental value for the time they held it, to be fixed by appraisement or otherwise, must be added to that price.

*436

J. C. Brooks, for his children, is in possession of the Turkey Creek plantation, bequeathed to them; it also must be appraised, and its rental value fixed in order to equalize all the shares, as the said will directs.

Let J. H. Brooks restate and file his accounts as executor of each of the said estates, in accordance with this decree.

The parties to this cause, all or any of them, may apply to me or to the judge of the Fifth Circuit, at chambers, for such other and further orders as may be necessary to execute this judgment and decree, and to settle the said estate in accordance therewith.

From this decree appeals were taken by plaintiffs and defendants in both causes, upon the several grounds stated—

By J. H. Brooks, as executor of W. and M. P. Brooks, and J. C. Brooks.

1. His Honor erred in adding $100 to the estimate of the referees, report upon the rents of Roselands, for the last four years, such decision being contrary to law and evidence in interfering with the findings of facts by the referee, and also arbitrary and without foundation.

2. His Honor erred in deciding that J. C. Brooks has executed the release required by the tenth clause of Mr. Whitfield Brooks' will, there being no evidence of such execution, and the same being denied in the answers of the said J. C. Brooks and J. H. Brooks, executor.

3. That his Honor erred in deciding that J. C. Brooks' creditors can take at all in the present state of the pleadings, that portion of his land, furniture and silver plate, under his father's will, and that the same is distributable among his creditors according to the priority of their judgments—inasmuch as the said *J. C. Brooks takes no such property, and that all such interest as he does take under said will of whatever description, is but equitable assets in the hands of the executor, to be distributed pro rata among all of his creditors.

*437

4. His Honor should have dismissed the amended complaint of M. C. Butler, as assignee; J. C. Lark, survivor, et al., v. J. H. Brooks, executor, and J. C. Brooks, upon the grounds stated in the answer thereto, and in the ninth exception of the defendants J. H. and J. C. Brooks.

5. That his Honor erred in decreeing that the children of Gen. Dunovant should take the house and lot in Edgefield at $5000, "as a part of their share" under Mrs. Brooks' will, without decreeing further, as said will directs, that should that sum ($5000) be more than they were entitled to under said will, the said house and lot should stand pledged for the payment to the other legatees of such a sum as would equalize all the parties interested.

6. His Honor should have decided the point made by the answer of J. H. Brooks, executor, and J. C. Brooks, and insisted upon in argument; that the assignment by

J. C. Brooks to John E. Bacon and J. H. Brooks, of so much of his interest in his father's estate as would amount to $1500 and $500 were valid, and should prevail as against the assignment under the insolvent debtor's act, by said J. C. Brooks to his creditors. The facts being, that the said J. H. Brooks had no notice of the latter assignment made over ten years before the former, and never acted upon in any way by the assignee or the creditors; that property enough was assigned under the insolvent debtor's act to pay the debts of the said creditors, and that they took no steps for a period of over ten years to enforce the collection thereof; and that the said J. H. Brooks accepted the said assignments to the said Bacon and himself in good faith, and is bound to pay the same, and upon the grounds set forth in the pleadings and exceptions.

7. That Judge Carpenter, in his decretal order of December 13th, 1875, should not have overruled the executor's second exception, but should have decided that the life-tenant should not *be held accountable in any way to the testator's estate in remainder.

*438

8. That Judge Carpenter errs in the sixteenth paragraph of said decretal order, in deciding, that although the gift of the $2000 certificate by Mrs. Brooks to J. H. Brooks was valid, still that he should account therefor in case of the insolvency of her estate.

9. That Judge Carpenter, in the seventeenth clause of the said decretal order, errs in deciding that J. C. Brooks and his children hold the Turkey Creek place subject to the creditors of Mrs. Brooks, and should have decided that they hold it absolutely and in fee.

10. That his Honor should have decided the issues made by the executor in the first and fourteenth exceptions to the report of C. P. Townsend, referee.

By R. G. M. Dunovant and his children, and James C. Lark, survivor, a creditor of J. C. Brooks—

1. Because his Honor erred in not holding that the estate of the life-tenant should be charged with the entire inventory of 1852, including provisions and articles consumable in the use, with the exception of the slaves not sold by her.

2. Because in stating the accounts in reference to the liability of the life-tenant no credit should be allowed the life-tenant for abrasion and use of the furniture, plate, &c., the difference in value resulting from abrasion and use not having been determined by a sale of said furniture, plate, &c., at the death of the life-tenant nor by any lawful appraisement, and his Honor should have so held.

3. Because in stating the account in reference to the liability of the life-tenant, the estate of the life-tenant should have been charged with the value of the two slaves sold by said life-tenant, and his Honor should have so held.

4. Because the estate of the life-tenant should have been charged with the Blocker note, and his Honor should have so held.

5. Because the executor, J. H. Brooks, should have been charged with the rents actually received by him for the years *1871 to 1877 inclusive, and said rents should not have been determined upon by the speculative testimony and opinion of witnesses; and their Honors Judges Carpenter and Pressley, erred in holding that said executor was not chargeable with the rents actually received by him.

*439

6. Because the executor should not be allowed any commissions for the years in which he made no returns, and his Honor Judge Pressley should have so held.

7. Because in the statement of the accounts of the executor by Referee Townsend, he should not have been allowed credit for $1363.24 paid out in 1871 and 1872, when the payments for said years actually amounted to only $331.71, if so much as that, and it was admitted at the hearing before his Honor Judge Pressley, that the same was a clerical error, and his Honor should have held that said clerical error should be corrected.

8. Because the crops made by the life-tenant in the year 1870 on the lands held by her as life-tenant constituted a part of her testator's estate, and his Honor should have so held.

9. Because no counsel fees should have been paid by the executor without leave of the court, after the order of Judge Carpenter refusing to allow further counsel fees, and his Honor Judge Pressley should have so held.

10. Because his Honor Judge Carpenter erred in holding that the certificate of deposit of $2000 was a gift to J. H. Brooks by his mother, Mrs. Mary P. Brooks.

11. Because his Honor Judge Pressley erred in holding that the life-tenant was entitled to credit for the amount paid to Mrs. Cornelia Cross under an order of the court, the proof being that it was not paid out of the life-estate, and there being no proof that it was paid out of the life-estate.

12. Because his Honor Judge Pressley erred in holding that the life-tenant was entitled to credit for the negro cabins and other improvements erected by her on the life-estate during her life-tenancy.

13. Because his Honor Judge Pressley erred in holding that the life-tenant was entitled to commissions, and more especially that she was entitled to commissions on property sold by her, and of which she made no returns.

*440

*14. Because his Honor erred in holding that the children of R. G. M. Dunovant are chargeable with the homestead lot in Edgefield village at $5000 and the rent, the proof being that said property was sold by the executor, who is chargeable with the proceeds thereof and with interest upon the same, and in any event said children are not chargeable with the same.

15. Because his Honor Judge Pressley erred in holding that the Turkey Creek place is vested in James C. Brooks and children, it having been decided by Judge Carpenter that they hold it under the will of Mrs. Brooks and subject to her debts.

16. Because his Honor Judge Pressley erred in holding that the estate of the life-tenant is only chargeable with $816 as the value of the furniture, plate, &c., received by her when she took charge of the life-estate after giving her credit for the decrease in value from use and abrasion.

17. Because his Honor erred in holding that the executor, J. H. Brooks, is not chargeable with interest on the funds received by him as executor until after the expiration of one year.

18. Because if the rule adopted by his Honor is the correct one for ascertaining the rent, then for the reasons stated by him he should have charged the executor with a larger amount for rent for the years stated by him, and a larger amount should have been charged for the years previous to those stated.

19. Because his Honor erred in holding that the executor should only have been charged with the cash balance of his mother's estate in his hands.

20. Because his Honor erred in holding that the estate of the life-tenant "should not have been charged with any depreciation in the value of the vehicles, implements of agriculture, or of the work animals," she being bound under the law governing the case to keep the estate in all its departments up to the condition it was in when she received it.

By R. G. M. Dunovant—

1. Because, by the decree, his Honor does not hold that the executor, J. H. Brooks, should be charged with the difference between the appraised value of the lands of testator and the price for which they sold, he having held said lands until they were *greatly depreciated in value, and contrary to the provisions of the will.

*441

2. Because J. H. Brooks should have been charged with the difference between the appraised value of the property sold by him January 5th, 1871, and the price for which he purchased it.

By J. C. Lark—

1. Because he holds that the share of J. C. Brooks should be distributed among his creditors according to their legal priority, and not as equitable assets.

2. Because his Honor holds that J. H. Brooks, executor, is not responsible to the creditors of J. C. Brooks for what he paid over to J. C. Brooks before said creditors filed their complaint.

By James Mansfield (creditor of J. C. Brooks.) Because his Honor held—

1. That Judge Carpenter had never decided but one point in the case, to wit, that the gift of $2000 by Mary Brooks to J. H. Brooks was valid.

2. That while recognizing the principle of law that an executor should be held liable to the highest rate of rent who uses his testator's land without having tested its rental value at public auction, he only partially enforced the same, whereas he should have carried out said principle to its full extent, which would make the rent at $1000 per annum.

3. That J. H. Brooks is not responsible to the creditors of James C. Brooks for paying him, in 1871 and 1872, certain sums of money out of his father's estate as a part of his share of the same.

4. That the executor, J. H. Brooks, should not be charged with the indebtedness of his mother to his father's estate; that referees should not have charged her with the inventory; "that the class of decided cases which charge the inventory of the personalty to the life-tenant is not applicable to this case."

5. That executrix did not apply to her own use the money on hand at the death of the testator, as also the proceeds of the notes, accounts and cotton on hand, while not accounting for the same, amounting to about $5700, and that the executor did not receive.

*442

*retain and appropriate entire commissions on each and all transactions when she was entitled to the same.

6. That the proof is very clear that Mrs. Brooks paid the share of Cornelia Cross out of her own funds; whereas it is more than probable that she paid it out of the funds of testator, and that, with her usual prudence, reserved her commissions, while the pecuniary means and business character of testator totally negatives the idea that he had commingled said share and his own property, or did not leave a distinct and designated fund to settle it.

7. That the crop of 1870 did not go to testator's estate.

8. That life-tenant should not account for the two slaves sold by her.

9. That life-tenant should have credit for erecting negro cabins, barns, &c.

10. That the house and lot in the village, now in possession of R. G. M. Dunovant and his children, and the Turkey Creek plantation now in possession of James C. Brooks' children, are not liable for indebtedness of life-tenant to testator's estate; that the children of each (R. G. M. Dunovant and J. C. Brooks) hold the same.

11. That the executor's estate is only chargeable with $816, on the value of the furniture, plate, &c.

12. That the executor should be allowed credit for $1363.24, as paid out by him in 1871 and 1872, instead of $331.71.

13. That the scrip or certificate of deposit in bank was a valid gift.

14. That both referees, Judge Carpenter and his Honor, erred in not holding the life-tenant, Mrs. Mary P. Brooks, and J. H. Brooks, her executor, to that strict accountability as trustees which the law requires; while recognizing the doctrine, neither has fully enforced the same.

[For subsequent opinions, see Ex parte Dunovant, 16 S. C. 299; 16 S. C. 621.]

Messrs. J. E. Bacon, M. L. Bonham and L. E. Le Conte, for J. H. Brooks and J. C. Brooks.

Mr. H. W. Addison, for James Mansfield.

*443

*Messrs. A. J. Norris and J. C. Sheppard, for R. G. M. Dunovant and his children, and J. C. Lark.

October 3d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. A question of construction upon the will of Whitfield Brooks is fundamental to the present accounting.

After making various specific devises and bequests and pecuniary legacies, the testator, in the eleventh clause of his will, provides as follows: "All and singular the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, of every description, I give, devise and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary P. Brooks, for and during the term of her natural life; and after her death it is my will and desire that the same shall be sold and the proceeds thereof equally divided among my children in fee, share and share alike." The question arising in the first instance on this clause is whether Mary P. Brooks was to take a life-estate, to be specifically enjoyed by her as such, or was she simply to enjoy the interest of a fund equivalent to the value, at the death of the testator, of the estate that passed to her under the residuary clause—the principal of such fund to pass to the children of the testator at her death?

It is clear that Mary P. was not intended to take independently, as specific devisee and legatee, each of the items of which the mass of the estate was composed, for, in the first place, the form of the devise precludes such construction, it being in its character residuary, implying primarily that that which passed was to be taken as a whole; and, in the second place, part of the residue of the estate consisted of personal property in its nature consumable in the use and not reproductive, in which a life-estate with remainder could not be created by way of an independent specific bequest, so that the only mode in which the residuary devise could operate, with full effect as to all that was intended to be included in it, was by treating the residue of the estate as intended either to be specifically enjoyed in mass or as a fund producing interest according to its value. Calhoun v. Furgeson, 3 Rich. Eq. 160; Patterson v. Devlin, McM. Eq. 459.

Was the estate, then, intended to be enjoyed specifically in mass, or as an interest-bearing fund, its value to be computed at *the death of the testator? The fact that it was devised as a remainder standing by itself would lead to the conclusion that the testator intended that the whole residue should, at his death, be converted into money and enjoyed, after payment of debts, according to the terms of limitation, as a fund. But this inference, in the case of a devise of a residuum to a tenant for life with remainders, is rebutted by the expression of an intention that the sale shall be postponed until after the death of the life-tenant. The reason of this conclusion is that the motive of postponing the sale must be assumed to be a desire that the tenant should have the specific enjoyment of the property itself. Calhoun v. Furgeson, 3 Rich. Eq. 160; Glover v. Hearst, 10 Rich. Eq. 329.

*444

In the present case, the sale of what passed to Mary P. under the residuary clause was postponed until after the death of the life-tenant. That the provision for the sale of the residue after the death of Mary P. was intended as a postponement of such sale, and not merely as a provision for the final disposition of what had not previously been sold, is apparent from other clauses of the will. As it regards the realty part of such residue, the sale could not take place at an earlier day than that of the death of the life-tenant, because, as to certain parcels of such real estate, J. H. Brooks and Ellen Dunovant were to have at that time an election to take such parcels specifically at a valuation to be ascertained, and accordingly a sale could not take place until such election was made or declined. As it regards the slaves, two distinct clauses of the will contemplate their remaining specifically in the hands of the life-tenant during the whole or a considerable part of her life. Clause 9 provides for the substitution, out of the slaves of the estate, in the case of the death during his minority, of certain slaves bequeathed to John H., and thus contemplates the permanence of the source from which such substitution was to be made for a considerable period after his death. Clause 12 contains a request that the life-tenant should make annual presents to the slaves bequeathed to her for life, thus contemplating their indefinite continuance specifically in her service.

It is beyond doubt that the sale intended was to embrace both *realty and personalty together, so far as their union was essential to maintain the value of the estate as a whole, and therefore the provisions that tended to postpone the sale as to part of the property in the residuary clause must be regarded as fixing a construction on the eleventh clause as it regards the sale.

*445

Having concluded that the life-tenant, at the death of the testator, took, under his will, a life-estate in the residue of his estate, to be enjoyed specifically, it is necessary to state the principles that should govern an accounting by her executor, after the termination of such life-estate.

It is necessary here to recognize the fact that John H. Brooks, as the executor of Mary P., is properly called upon to account, in addition to his own doings, for those of his testatrix, in her individual right, and as executrix of Whitfield Brooks. In order to state such an account accurately, it is necessary to know what part of the estate of Mary P. that came into the hands of her executor was assets of her individual estate, and what part, if any, assets of the estate of Whitfield Brooks.

As to each of these distinct parts, separate rules of accounting are to be applied. It is necessary to consider, then, in the first place, the rules governing an accounting by the executor of a tenant for life of an estate held for specific enjoyment in mass.

In the first place, the time to which the accounting relates is the death of the life-tenant, and not that of the testator. In this respect, an accounting by a life-tenant differs from that of an executor. The life-tenant is entitled to hold the whole estate for his own profit, subject to certain conditions or obligations. His primary duty is to maintain the estate in as good condition as when it came into his hands. If this estate is one of a productive character, as in the present case—being a plantation—that productive character must be maintained. It is self-evident that the utmost duty of the life-tenant, in this respect, is to apply the product or increase of the estate to its maintenance, so as to be in a productive condition when it passes into the hands of the remainderman. So far there is no conflict among the authorities. The question affecting the liability of the estate of the life-tenant at his death is, whether the estate, at that time, was, as a whole, in a proper condition as to value and productive capacity. As *it regards value apart from productive capacity, the test is not a comparison between its pecuniary value at the death of the testator and at that of the life-tenant. The value of property of that class may have undergone change, and the non-productive property of the estate may have undergone deterioration from natural causes, or from accident, without the fault of the life-tenant, in which case it appears that the estate of the life-tenant is not accountable for such loss or deterioration. These principles are clearly recognized and illustrated in Calhoun v. Furgeson, 3 Rich. Eq. 160. The question is not whether each article of a class of articles that went to make up the estate as a whole is in the same condition as to preservation, value and productiveness as at the death of the testator, but whether the estate, as a whole, is in a similar condition. In making such an inquiry the condition and value of the parts of the estate must necessarily be considered, for the value of an estate is the sum of the value of its parts considered in their relation to the whole.

*446

Johnston, Chancellor, says in Calhoun v. Furgeson: "I think the inquiry should be made into the particulars of the estate and their value at the time the remainder takes effect, for the purpose of discovering whether that which is to go over is substantially the same estate which was received by the life-tenant, and of the proper value, and whether, upon the whole, it is in as good plight, though not in the exact plight as when the life-tenant took possession." He holds that the increase of one species of stock should be balanced against the diminution of another, and says that if, upon the whole, the life-tenant "has been faithful and diligent and judicious, and has not deteriorated the substantial parts of the estate as a whole, he should not be made to suffer."

It is easy to perceive that under this view lies the consideration that the business conducted with a view to profit should be capable of modification to suit the various conditions that may arise affecting the question of profit. A large planting or farming estate usually embraces several distinct sources of profit, not necessarily connected together and not equally profitable at all times and under all circumstances. Its produce may cover a wide range of animal and vegetable products, and embraces that *intended for home use and consumption, as well as that intended for sale or barter. Adaptation to the ever-changing wants of mankind is the condition of profit, imposing changes of internal economy.

*447

In addition to this the means and methods of production undergo changes. Such causes operate to occasion changes in the relative adjustment of permanent property, stock and implements. It is evident, then, that what concerns the interest of the remainderman is that the tenant for life of such an estate should exercise a reasonable judgment in maintaining the general capacity of the estate for production, without improperly lessening the value of that which constitutes the capital invested with a view to such profit. The rule laid down in Calhoun v. Furgeson fairly conforms to this view. The strength of these conclusions will appear in Glover v. Hearst, 10 Rich. Eq. 329. In that case, although the life-tenant was limited to taking a mere support from the profit of an estate devised in mass, and as to all profits over and above what was needed for her support was a trustee for the remainderman, yet the general rules, as to the duty of the tenant for life to maintain the estate, were laid down in substantial accordance with the doctrines of Calhoun v. Furgeson. In Finley v. Hunter, 3 Strob. Eq. 78, the estate was not regarded as devised in mass, but the life-tenant was regarded as holding the several classes of property devised, by distinct specific devises, so that the question of the value and profitableness of the estate, as a whole, was not involved; still, the same general rule as that already stated, was applied, as it regarded such class separately devised.

The devise in Patterson v. Devlin, McM. Eq. 459, does not appear to have been regarded as a single devise of an estate in mass, although the nature of such devises is recognized in the opinion of Nott, J.; consequently we should not look to the discussion in that case for the rule applicable to devises of productive estates in mass, nor can that case be regarded as touching directly this subject.

The duty of the life-tenant, as it regards the application of the consumable products of the estate to its maintenance as a whole, and of the several parts of which it consists, has been the *subject of much discussion and apparent contrariety of opinion. The question has generally been stated in our own reports as that of the duty of the life-tenant in applying the consumable property of the estate to its maintenance, but probably the word merchantable or vendable would best describe the class of property entering into that question, as those terms would embrace such property, the product of the estate over and above what were needed for the current support of the estate as was disposable by sale or barter, and thus was available as a means of supplying deficiencies in the permanent property, stock and implements considered as the capital of the estate.

*448

There are two aspects of this question, first, as with regard to the produce of the estate in hand at the death of the testator and that passed as part of the gift to life-tenant; and, second, as it regards the produce of the estate while held by the tenant for life. The last of these questions will be first considered, as furnishing the simplest illustration of the principles that enter into the solution of the other.

The question of the duty of the life-tenant, as it regards the produce of the estate made in his hands, is necessarily connected with that of the proper disposition of such of the produce of the estate, arising while in the hands of the life-tenant, as may remain in specie at his death.

If the product of the estate in the hands of the life-tenant is reasonably sufficient for the maintenance of the life-tenant, it is clear that any surplus over this amount should go to keep up the value and productiveness of the estate to the condition in which it came into the hands of such life-tenant. There can be no doubt as to this proposition upon the authorities. The question becomes now completed when there is an inadequate production for the reasonable maintenance of both the life-tenant and the estate.

When one devises an estate for life to one with remainder to another, each must be regarded as equally the object of his bounty. Not that they will necessarily have equal enjoyment of such bounty, for their gifts necessarily differ as to time and quantity, but the object sought by the testator to be attained by the respective gifts should be regarded as standing in equal im*portance before his mind. The one object is near to him in point of time and represents his present wishes, while the other, though more remote, is presumably more permanent. It is not difficult to conceive such gifts as connected by equality of importance in the mind of the testator, nor to see the relation of such an idea to the habitual ideas of equity. We have, then, two objects to be accomplished by the application of the produce of the estate—one intended to benefit the life-tenant and the other the remainderman. The one looks to it for present maintenance and the other as a capital capable of future productiveness for his benefit.

*449

It is clear that it would be a violation of the principles of equality to hold that whatever fortuitous event diminishes the productiveness of the estate, such mischance should be thrown wholly upon the tenant for life by requiring him to make good any amount taken for his necessaary support, in order to maintain the value and productiveness of the estate to the full measure it had when it came into his hands. Such a construction could only be based on the idea that the testator intended a bounty for the remainderman, not only differing as to time and quantity, but in its nature, considered as an act of bounty. This, as we have seen, is an inadmissible conclusion; but its evil tendency is fully illustrated when it is considered that the labor and skill of the tenant for life has entered into that produce, and to that extent it would be seizing the property of one to confer it upon another.

It is equally clear, on the other hand, that the tenant for life should not be permitted to appropriate to his own purposes the whole product of the estate, making no provision for the future maintenance of the estate, for this would violate the plainest rules of ordinary prudence as well as equality. It would follow that the produce of the estate ought to be equally applied to the reasonable maintenance of the life-tenant and of the estate itself, and if that prudence should, without the fault of the life-tenant, be inadequate to fully accomplish both objects, the life-tenant and the remainderman should submit to equal inconvenience. The application of such a rule may at times be difficult and involve intricate questions of fact, but the difficulty of applying *a sound principle ought not to be balanced against the wrong of refusing its application. It remains to consider the bearing of the authorities on this question.

*450

An expression contained in the Circuit decree made by Chancellor Caldwell in Calhoun v. Furgeson, 3 Rich. Eq. 160, is in point. He says: "It would seem that the testator intended that the property should support him" (the life-tenant) "and itself, so that she should not impair it." This inference as to the intent of the testator is drawn from the nature of the estate created in that case, namely a life-estate to be specifically enjoyed in mass. The question we are now considering did not directly arise in that case, still the remark is significant, and it will be observed that it was not called in question on the appeal. Johnston, Chancellor, after speaking of the general duty of the tenant for life of an estate in mass to keep up the consumable but reproductive property, such as flocks and herds, says: "I will not say that he is bound at all hazards for the original stock, for the relation he bears to the remainderman is that of a trustee, a relation of confidence, and though he is prima facie bound for the property, and the burden must be upon him to show diligence and integrity in the performance of his duties, yet it is not clear upon principle that he is liable if he does show fidelity to his trust, and that the flock has perished, not by his fault, but by the act of God, as by pestilence, earthquake or other unavoidable providence." If the Chancellor had recognized the rule, that whatever might be the cause of the diminution of the original stock the tenant must make it good to the extent of the whole product of the estate, without deducting anything for his own maintenance, he certainly would not have discussed the question in the form in which it appears to have been treated by him. The question of making up the loss out of the produce would, it may be presumed, supersede that of responsibility for the original loss, or, at all events, so modify it as to become a necessary part of its discussion. It must be concluded that the idea was not entertained at the time Calhoun v. Furgeson was decided that the life-tenant was bound to apply the whole produce of the life-estate to make good losses to the capital of the estate occurring without his fault.

*451

It is proper to *remark that the argument from the relation of the trustee, between the life-tenant and the remainderman, should not be carried too far. The life-tenant primarily holds the legal title for his own beneficial enjoyment, and in that respect does not sustain the relation to the remainderman that gives rise to a technical trust. But as it regards the preservation of the value and productiveness of the estate, he owes a clear duty to the remainderman which may fairly be said to be in the nature of a trust, and as such cognizable in equity. Glover v. Hearst, 10 Rich. Eq. 329. In order to understand the application of the remarks made by the court in that case, it is necessary to have in mind the peculiarity of the interest of the life-tenant there. What was given to her there was "to enjoy all the benefits and profits arising merely from the use of the same, after fully supporting and supplying all the wants of the plantation during her natural lifetime." The will adds: "And here let it be understood that all future increase will not be regarded as profits, but will remain and be regarded as part of my estate." To carry out this plan the testator gave to his executor a certain supervisory power as it regards the management of the life-tenant. According to this provision the produce of the estate was devoted in the first instance to meeting the wants of the estate itself; second, to supporting the life-tenant; third, to accumulate as part of the estate to go to the remainder. Such a case does not test the principles on which the rights of a life-tenant are to be determined who has the whole usufruct during the life-tenancy, though coupled with the implied duty of maintaining the estate. Wardlaw, Chancellor, says: "The tenant for life must, therefore, be considered as a trustee for the remainderman, and must preserve the estate, with all its appurtenances, in the situation in which she received it." This, as applied to the situation of the life-tenant in that case, is undoubtedly correct, if it be added that such liability to make good the original stock should not go beyond the amount of the product of the estate. It is remarked in that case that the devise there was similar to that in Calhoun v. Furgeson, but while the two agree in the fact that both estates were devised to be specifically enjoyed in mass, in the one case the tenant of the life-estate had an unrestricted beneficial inter*est, as in the present case, while in the other such beneficial interest was not only restricted in quantity, but burdened with the express duty or trust of maintaining out of the produce of the estate its original condition. It was natural that in such a case the general rule requiring the estate to be maintained should be considered, without noticing the ordinary limitations of that rule, as such limitations were inapplicable under the terms of the devise in that case. Having in view this fact, we must understand that when it is said, as in that case, that the tenant "must keep up the stock of cattle, horses and provisions, and implements of husbandry in the condition in which he received them," it is meant that such is his general duty, but not that such duty is unqualified by any exceptions or restrictions. What these exceptions and restrictions are, that case does not attempt to show, inasmuch as they were not applicable to the peculiar case then before the court.

*452

Finley v. Hunter, 3 Strob. Eq. 78. The court withdrew that case from the rule governing estates in mass in the hands of a tenant for life, and placed it on particular expressions of the will. The duty of the life-tenant to apply the produce of the estate to repair losses, is not considered. It is easy to see that that case manifests a tendency quite contrary to that of fixing the duty of making reparations to the full extent of the product of the estate. The fact that the rule was found stated in the previous cases, apart from its qualifications, may have had an influence in the withdrawal of that case from the rule. Robertson v. Collier, 1 Hill Eq. 370. That case cannot be regarded as involving the rights of a tenant of an estate in mass to be specifically enjoyed. It was granted by a residuary clause which the court recognized as primarily implying that the estate was to be sold and enjoyed as an interest-bearing fund. In that case there was no clear intent that the sale of the estate should be postponed until the end of the life-estate, from which an intent could be gathered that it should be specifically enjoyed by the life-tenant at her will, but on the contrary, power was expressly granted to his executor and executrix (the life-tenant) to sell during the life-tenancy, in terms that implied that the interest of the estate was to be solely consulted as to such sale, and not the interest or *inclination of the life-tenant. This placed the life-tenant, as executrix, in a position of responsibility differing essentially from that of one who enjoys the specific use of the estate for life, according to the will of the devisor.

*453

On the whole it must be concluded that the cases in our reports afford some support to the rule that has been stated above, and contain nothing necessarily impugning its correctness. The rule can, therefore, stand, if its reasonableness has been made apparent.

The next question to be considered is, as to the right and duty of the tenant of an estate specifically enjoyed in mass and productive in its nature, as it regards the produce of the estate realized at the death of the testator and passing under the devise of the life-estate. The true inquiry in this connection is, whether such produce is merchantable or otherwise. The produce of an estate, as a general rule, certainly ought to go, in the first instance, to maintain the estate. There can be no doubt about this proposition, either on principle or on authority. It cannot well be considered as separable from the estate when that separation would tend to impair the value and productiveness of the estate. It is, therefore, reasonable to consider that the produce of the estate on hand at the death of the testator, to the extent that is proper to be consumed or used for the benefit of the estate, should be considered as a part of the estate, and, as such, to be accounted for only as a part of such estate as a whole. On the other hand, a surplus of produce on hand at the death of the testator, over and above what was reasonably needed for use or consumption or for the benefit of the estate, would naturally assume a merchantable character as commodities suitable for sale or barter. If such vendable property is, in its nature, consumable in the use, being no necessary part of the estate as a productive whole, the only mode in which a life-tenancy with remainder could be enjoyed in it, as held by the cases already cited, is by treating its pecuniary value as an interest-bearing fund.

If such property is not consumable in the use, the tenant for life would stand to it in the same position as if it had been the subject of an independent specific bequest; that is, would have its use for life, exercising reasonable diligence to preserve it for the remainderman who would take it in the condition it was in *at the death of the life-tenant. This result would flow from the mere fact of regarding such property as detached from the estate by a natural process, like that which detaches the ripe fruit from the parent stem.

*454

It would follow from these principles that if the tenant for life takes property of this class at the death of the testator for his own use, that his estate at his death would be liable to account, in a corresponding manner, for a reasonable quantity of like property on hand at that time. It would also follow that when the life-tenant dies before the agricultural year is completed, the produce of such year should be realized to the estate of the life-tenant, subject to such accountability as that just stated.

It remains to consider what support these conclusions have from the authorities.

Calhoun v. Furgeson, 3 Rich. Eq. 160. It was held in that case that although the life-tenant of an estate devised in mass is only accountable for causing or permitting the deterioration of the estate as a whole, still, in making this inquiry, regard must be had to the several kinds of property of which the estate is composed, and the rules applicable to each kind. It would follow that the produce of the estate on hand at the death of the testator may be considered as if the subject of an independent specification, subject, however, to the consideration that if found a necessary part of the estate as a whole, any loss or deterioration may be balanced by corresponding gain in other parts of the estate as a whole. It is clear, then, that a discrimination must be made between that part which cannot be separated from the estate without loss to the latter, and that part which may be regarded as the merchantable product of the estate. The former would be considered under the general question, whether the estate, as a whole, has suffered improper deterioration; the latter part would be considered as the subject of an independent specific devise, and the life-tenant would be answerable for it if of the nature consumable in the use as a fund, according to the value which was or ought to have been realized for it; and if not consumable in the use, then for such property specifically in its condition at the death of the life-tenant and for damages for improper deterioration.

*455

*In the case of Calhoun v. Furgeson, which we are now considering, it would appear that the Circuit decree held the life-tenant "liable to reproduce, at the expiration of her life-estate, the same amount of corn which she received with the estate or account for the value of the deficiency."

This part of the decree was properly reversed. It does not appear in that case that the corn upon the estate at the death of the testator exceeded what was required to supply the current wants of the testator. Chancellor Caldwell holds that it was not in proof that she had used such consumable property as merchandise. We must, therefore, conclude, as the doctrine of Calhoun v. Furgeson on this point, that a reasonable amount of the produce of the estate on hand at the death of the testator must be regarded as part of the estate as a whole, and accounted for only in the manner in which the estate, as a whole, is accounted for, and we cannot fail to conclude that if it had appeared in that case that the life-tenant had separated from the estate and sold or otherwise disposed of the produce left by the testator, or had allowed it to go to waste when it might have been sold, Chancellor Caldwell's decree would have ordered an account thereof. The Circuit decree in that case applies to the life-tenant the provisions of the act of 1789, (5 Stat. 111), as it regards finishing the crop incomplete at the death of the life-tenant. Such an application is eminently reasonable in view of the duty of the life-tenant's estate to turn over to the remainderman a reasonable amount of produce to maintain the future operations of the estate. But Calhoun v. Furgeson properly holds that the amount received by the life-tenant is not the measure of the amount required to be left, for that must depend upon the state and productiveness of the estate, for which the life-tenant is not necessarily responsible.

Glover v. Hearst, 10 Rich. Eq. 329. The result of that case is in harmony with the rule above stated, although the case does not assume to lay down the precise rule on the subject. The life-tenant received, at the death of the testator, a large amount of former produce of the estate, which must be assumed to have been largely in excess of the amount needed to carry on the estate. It was reasonable, therefore, that the life-tenant should be held *accountable for such excess, and so the court held in effect. The case, as it stood on the final appeal, was complicated by the fact that the Court of Appeals had, in a previous decision in the same case, held that the life-tenant was not accountable for the produce of the year in which the life-tenant died. The grounds of this conclusion do not appear, but as it was the law of the case the final decision had to be accommodated to it.

*456

This led the court to say that it was unreasonable that the life-tenant should have the entire product of both years, and led to the conclusion that she must account for what was received by her at the death of the testator. It is clear that the court, in its final decision, did not intend to lay down any general rule. It cannot be affirmed that that case was decided upon the rule under consideration, but it is not inconsistent with the principles of that rule. It may be further contended that it was not the intention of the court to state the general rule of accountability in such cases, or to put forth that case as an illustration of the true rule. It should also be observed that there is a material difference between the rights of the life-tenant in that case and in cases of the class to which the present case belongs, as there the profits of the estate, over and above the maintenance of the estate and the support of the life-tenant, were directed to be accumulated for the benefit of the remainderman.

Robertson v. Collier, 1 Hill Eq. 370. In that case the life-tenant was held accountable for produce received at the death of the life-tenant, the consumable property being treated as convertible into a fund. It appears that the amount of produce received was large—upwards of $4000—and must be assumed to be largely in excess of what was required for use or consumption upon the estate. The question is not raised or discussed whether the life-tenant should be liable for as much of the produce on hand at the death of the testator as was requisite for the maintenance of the whole. The consequence is that the rule applied in that case, though not complete in its statement, is in harmony with that under consideration.

It must be concluded that the authorities in this state do not preclude the application of the rule above presented, which is recommended by its simplicity and reasonableness.

*457

*The matter of the various exceptions taken by the parties will next be considered.

The findings of the referee as to the annual value of the rental of Roselands appear to have been approved by the Circuit judge so far as they represented what would be a fair valuation as between parties standing on an equal footing. The Circuit judge, however, adds $100 per annum, on the principle of charging an executor with the highest rate who uses his testator's land "without having tested its rental value at public auction." Cases may exist where even a decree in equity may impose consequences in the nature of a penalty, but the present case is not appropriate for the exercise of that extreme function of equity. The executor had an election to take Roselands at a valuation to be fixed in the manner pointed out by the will. It is clear that the executor was not blamable for allowing his right of election to depend upon the result of a suit to settle the construction of the will, the various conflicts of right, and the precise mode of ascertaining such valuation. In the meantime there was a manifest propriety in the executor's retaining the cultivation of the estate in his own hands, leaving the question of the proper allowance, either by way of interest or rent, to be determined in the controversy. The determination of the referee appears to coincide with this view of the case, and should stand.

As the principal bill now before this court seeks a construction and execution of the will of Whitfield Brooks, it is competent that the conditions as to releasing contained in the tenth clause of the will should be carried into effect through the decree. If, therefore, the parties called upon to release have not effectually done so, either in form or by their answers, the decree should be so modified as to call for an election whether they will take under the tenth clause of the will of Whitfield Brooks, and release accordingly, and, in case of such election, should call for the releases provided for by that clause.

J. C. Brooks cannot be regarded as having taken a vested remainder in the lands devised to Mary P. for life, so that the judgments against him can have a lien on his interest in such lands. The direction is that at her death the lands shall be sold and the money divided. J. C. Brooks had nothing that he *could alienate, except as executor under the power contained in the will, and, therefore, there was nothing to which the lien of the judgments could attach. If it is assumed that the title to the land by way of remainder passed to the heir-at-law, and thus to J. C. Brooks as to his proportional share, subject to the execution of the power, still, as the execution of the power was one of the objects of the principal bill, the judgments cannot be regarded as having any lien as it regards the land. The creditors of J. C. Brooks must, therefore, so far as it regards the property claimed under the will of Whitfield Brooks, come in under the assignment of their debtor upon an equal footing, as upon assets made by a creditor's bill in equity. In the present will there are no words of conveyance under which J. C. Brooks could take a vested interest in the land as such. The disposition of the remainder after the death of the tenant for life is under the power of sale given by the will, and is absolute in its character. In such cases the recognized authority of a testator to convert land into money is regarded as fully exercised. Fletcher v. Asburner, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 497; Wilkins v. Taylor, 8 Rich. Eq. 291, Mathis v. Guffin, Id. 79.

*458

There was no ground for dismissing the bill of the creditors of J. C. Brooks. The object of that bill, so far as that object can be accomplished at the present time, was to set up a trust, under the assignment of J. C. Brooks, for the benefit of his creditors. It is true that at law nothing passed under the assignment for want of an accepting assignee, and consequently of delivery. In equity, however, there was an inchoate trust which could be upheld and a trustee appointed. It is true that the assignment was an incident of a strictly legal proceeding, the defect of which equity cannot aid; still, the assignment was voluntary in the sense that it was not constrained or rendered necessary by law, but could be made or withheld, according to the will of the debtor. It is to be assumed that the motive that led the debtor to assign was that of obtaining a release from his debts. That end was not attained for want of compliance with the statute (4 Stat. 86) by an actual delivery to the assignee of the property assigned. Wall v. Wardens, 1 Bay 434. But the character of the assignment as the basis of the rights of creditors *in equity, at least, must be determined by the state of things that existed at its execution, and at that time, by such act of assignment, the debtor obtained substantial advantage as against his creditors, as it was not competent for any such creditor to obtain a lien on the property so assigned from and after the date of such assignment, so long as the debtor chose to pursue his remedy for a discharge. There was, therefore, a consideration for the assignment such as equity can notice, and the abandonment of the proceedings subsequently by the debtor could not affect the character obtained by the assignment at the time of its execution. If a different view was taken it would place it altogether in the hands of a debtor, with a conniving assignee, to bind or release himself at his pleasure, and thus to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors. The declaration of trust thus being a free act of the debtor, upon adequate consideration, is capable of being put in force by a court of equity, and the creditor's bill before the court is framed so that such remedy may be had under it. As a trust existed in equity, as between the assignee and the creditors beneficially interested, lapse of time is not a bar.

*459

So much of the decree as declares that the children of General Dunovant should take the house and lot in Edgefield as part of their share should have provided for the equalization of the shares of such children with the other devisees upon the valuation of $5000 fixed by the will of Mrs. Brooks on such property. In taking the property the will intended that Mrs. Dunovant and her children should take as purchasers at the fixed valuation, the amount of their proportional share of the estate being determined by other provisions of the will, and they to be charged with the $5000 and credited with the amount of their distributable share, and the account adjusted accordingly. The contract of sale having been abandoned, and an election to take under the will having been made, the title passed by the words of the devise contained in the will, and it only remains to equalize the shares according to the direction of the will, and decree accordingly.

The assignments made to J. H. Brooks and J. E. Bacon should be upheld. The legal title of the assignor not having passed to the assignee under the assignment made by J. C.

*460

Brooks *for the benefit of his creditors for want of acceptance or delivery, it remained in him, (Belden v. Pate, 12 Rich. 358,) and his assignees, under subsequent assignments, took such legal title. The creditor's bill does not make J. E. Bacon a party, and does not make J. H. Brooks a party otherwise than as executor, and does not seek to set aside the assignments to J. H. Brooks and J. E. Bacon, nor is the question of the validity of such assignments a proper incident of the matter of either of the bills, but of an independent equity. The parties against whom this independent equity is asserted had a right to be impleaded in respect thereof, and to make a formal defence of the bar arising from the lapse of time. The course of proceeding in this respect tends to deprive them of this right. After so great a lapse of time, apparently sufficient to bar an equity of that character, and a failure to proceed formally for the enforcement of any equity they may possess, it should not be asserted in an informal and incidental manner to obtain a decree against the parties named.

Upon the principles already stated, it is clear that the proposition advanced in behalf of the executor of M. P. Brooks, that "the life-tenant should not be held accountable in any way to the testator's estate in remainder," is inadmissible.

Several objections have been raised to the decree as to the gift of $2000 by Mrs. Brooks to J. H. Brooks, shortly previous to her death, which will be considered together. There is a concurrence of conclusion between the Circuit judge who decided that question and the referee, that the delivery of the certificate of deposit to J. H. Brooks was intended as a gift. As that conclusion was inferentially drawn from somewhat vague statements made by Mrs. Brooks at the time of the alleged gift, the concurrence of the views of the Circuit judge and the referee should conclude this court, unless such conclusion violates some rule of law. The certificate must be assumed to be payable to bearer, and thus the delivery of the certificate would be a complete delivery of the money payable under it. There can be no doubt as to the sufficiency of the circumstances attending the gift, assuming it to be intended as a donatio causa mortis to maintain the character of such a gift. Such being the case, the devisees and legatees of Mrs. Brooks cannot avoid the gift. As the *insolvency of the estate is not alleged, the case is not in such a position that the question of the responsibility of J. H. Brooks for the whole or any part of this amount can be considered as affecting creditors. The decree is somewhat vague on this question, but should be construed in accordance with the conclusions just stated.

*461

There is no error in the decree as it regards Turkey Creek plantation. The decree does not assume to define the exact interest of J. C. Brooks, nor whether that interest can be reached by his creditors.

The bill of the creditors of J. C. Brooks cannot be sustained as a general creditors' bill for the reason that it does not appear that the creditors have exhausted their remedy at law. Ragsdale v. Holmes, 1 S. C. 91. The only ground for maintaining that bill is to enforce the trusts of the assignment. The Turkey Creek place is not embraced in the assignment as to the interest of J. C. Brooks in that place—was not acquired until long after the assignment was made. The creditors filing the bill have no recourse thereunder against the estate of J. C. Brooks not embraced in his assignment. It was, therefore, unnecessary to define the exact interest of J. C. Brooks in that place as between himself and his creditors or children.

It appears by the report of the referee that Whitfield Brooks purchased negroes at the sale of the estate of Mrs. M. C. Carroll, deceased, part of which were originally purchased by J. B. La Borde and transferred to W. Brooks, and that after the death of W. Brooks, Mrs. Brooks paid for such purchases out of a legacy coming to her from the estate of Mrs. Carroll. The presumption is that these negroes thus purchased formed part of the estate of W. Brooks at his decease, and, therefore, passed under the clauses of his will. This, however, is unimportant. It is not disputed that the debt was a legal demand against the estate of W. Brooks, and was paid by Mrs. Brooks out of her individual estate; she is accordingly entitled to credit therefor. She is not entitled to interest on such payment, as she had the use of the property of the estate under the life-tenancy which was subject to the discharge of such debt. The referee is clearly in error in holding these negroes to be the property of Mrs. Brooks, on *the ground that they were not included in the inventory of the estate. They must be assumed to have formed part of the estate that went under the residuary clause to Mrs. Brooks as tenant for life. She was not bound to return an inventory of property held by her as life-tenant and not in the character of executrix. If such an inventory was in fact made it was unnecessary. The rights of the remainderman to demand an inventory depends upon an allegation of waste or the like. The inventory spoken of in Patterson v. Devlin, McM. Eq. 459, is clearly a specific inventory, distinct from that required of an executor as to property of his testator held in that character.

*462

In Robertson v. Collier, 1 Hill Eq. 370, the inventory that may be required of a tenant for life of an estate in mass is spoken of as one of the remedies of the remainderman for the preservation of the property.

There is no evidence that Mrs. Brooks treated the slaves in question as her individual property, or in any way denied the rights of the remainderman in respect thereof. She is entitled to the credit claimed.

The decree is correct in not allowing to the estate of Mrs. Brooks money expended in keeping up the estate held by her in life-tenancy. It does not appear that the estate has received such enhancement of value as to give occasion for such an inquiry, but improvements made by the tenant for life cannot be charged against the remainderman unless special circumstances appear warranting such charge. No such circumstances appear in the present case, and the life-tenant must be regarded as having made a voluntary advance for the benefit of the estate and cannot claim reimbursement.

The exception that the referee erred in not charging the life-tenant's estate with the original inventory has already been disposed of and should be overruled.

The referee properly allowed for the difference in the value of the furniture and like property arising from natural and usual deterioration. The proof of such deterioration should come from the remainderman, and if such proof is deficient, as in this case, the life-estate cannot be charged.

The two slaves sold by the tenant for life do not appear to *have been disposed of to the detriment of the estate. The slaves are not to be regarded as the subjects of an independent specific devise and to be accounted for specifically. They formed part of the estate as a whole, and the whole question is disposed of by the finding that the estate was in a reasonably good condition at the death of the life-tenant. The question of emancipation need not, therefore, be considered as bearing on this question. There is no error in the decree as it regards the Blocker note.

*463

The exception that J. H. Brooks should have been charged with the actual amount derived from Roselands is not well taken. The ground of this conclusion has already been specifically stated. It is not the case of an executor seeking to make a profit to himself out of the estate, but of a provisional management pending a controversy in which the executor had a personal interest as a beneficiary under the will.

It appears that commissions were allowed by the referee for years in which no returns were filed by J. H. Brooks, as executor. The decree is erroneous in this respect and should be corrected.

It is alleged that a clerical error occurred in the accounting that was overruled in the decree, in consequence of which the executor was allowed a credit in excess of the proper amount. The decree should be opened so far as to enable the Circuit Court to correct any clerical error that may be found.

The question of the crops of the year in which the life-tenant died has already been disposed of, and the exception of Dunovant and Lake as to that matter should be overruled.

The allowance of counsel fees is a matter belonging in a proper case to the discretion of the Circuit Court. The refusal of a judge at an early stage of a cause to allow counsel fees cannot control the judgment of the judge who hears the cause finally, nor is he bound by a previous order attempting to regulate in advance demands of that class, unless such order is in form or effect an agreement among the parties in the cause in a form binding on them.

The tenth exception of Dunovant and Lake has already been disposed of and should be overruled. The decree is entirely correct as it regards the credit for the amount paid to Mrs. Cor*nelia Cross, and the reasons assigned by the Circuit judge therefor are satisfactory.

*464

The exception charging the decree for allowing the life-tenant for the cabins and barns erected by the life-tenant is not well taken. There does not appear to be any such charge allowed by the decree. Permanent improvements put by the life-tenant upon the land go to the remainderman as part of the estate, and are to be considered under the general question as to the plight and condition of the estate, but are not the subject of specific allowance as against the remainderman. No account appears to have been stated in conformity with the final decree. When that account is stated the estate of the life-tenant should only be entitled to commissions as executor for the years in which returns were filed.

The fourteenth and fifteenth exceptions of Dunovant and Lake have already been considered and should be overruled.

The sixteenth exception of Dunovant and Lake should be overruled. It results from the conclusion already stated, that the life-tenant is not bound for furniture, plate and other articles of that class at the value when received by her, but only for deterioration improperly caused or permitted by her, and there is no proof of any such ground of charge.

The postponement of the charge of interest against J. H. Brooks, as executor, until the expiration of a year from his qualification, is not in violation of the established rules. The seventeenth exception should be overruled.

The decree, as it regards the account against J. H. Brooks, as executor, is correct in making the amount received by him as executor the basis of the account against him. The indebtedness of his testator is not his indebtedness as executor, the latter arising solely from the receipt of assets or neglect to call them in.

The eighteenth and twentieth exceptions of Dunovant and Lake are overruled, on the grounds already stated. As it regards the separate exceptions of Dunovant, no proper foundation is laid for the charges claimed by such exceptions, and they should be overruled.

The separate exceptions of Lake have already been disposed of and should be overruled.

*465

*The first and second exceptions of Mansfield are controlled by what has already been held, and should be overruled.

The payments made by J. H. Brooks, as executor to J. C. Brooks, were properly sustained. The assignment not having passed the legal title to J. C. Brooks' estate, J. H. Brooks could settle the interest of J. C. Brooks in the estate with no one but himself. The equity of the creditors, as it regards the interest of J. C. Brooks, can only follow that interest into the hands of J. C. Brooks, but cannot undo the legality of transactions between parties as it regards a party paying that which might have been recovered of him as between the immediate parties.

The fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth exceptions of Mansfield have been sufficiently considered and should be overruled.

The fifth misconceives the purport of the decree, and should be overruled.

The decree should be modified to conform to the foregoing conclusions.

Decree modified.

McIVER and HASKELL, A. J.'s, concurred.

12 S. C. 465

(Case No. 764)

J. D. TIBBETTS, as Administrator of Sarah Melton, v. THE LANGLEY MANUFACTURING COMPANY et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Dower ⟸79.]

The recitals made in a mortgage deed of lands executed during coverture by a husband some days after obtaining a legal seizin, are not admissible in evidence to affect the wife's right of dower in such lands, she not having been a party to the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 299, 302; Dec. Dig. ⟸79.]

[2. Evidence ⟸248.]

After the right of dower has attached, the wife's interest is independent of the husband, and she is no longer a privy in estate with him, and is not bound by his admission, subsequently made, of an agreement at the time of purchase affecting her right of dower. Cases cited.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Whitmire v. Wright, 22 S. C. 452, 454, 53 Am. Rep. 725; Shell v. Duncan, 31 S. C. 566, 10 S. E. 330, 5 L. R. A. 821; Bradley v. Drayton, 48 S. C. 245, 26 S. E. 613; Pruitt v. Pruitt, 57 S. C. 162, 35 S. E. 485; Elder v. McIntosh, 88 S. C. 292, 70 S. E. 807; Dowling v. De Witt, 96 S. C. 438, 81 S. E. 172.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 953–964; Dec. Dig. ⟸248.]

[3. Dower ⟸46.]

A judgment of foreclosure and a sale under proceedings against the hus*band alone in his lifetime, do not bar an action by the widow for her dower in the land so sold.

*466

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 92, 145–153; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[4. Dower ⟸69.]

The jurisdiction of Probate Courts in matters of dower, is not limited to cases where no dispute exists as to the right of dower or as to title. Stewart v. Blease, 4 S. C. 37.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 240; Dec. Dig. ⟸69.]

[5. Costs ⟸277.]

This court, on appeal, will not disturb the determination of a Court of Probate, whereby it refused to stay the prosecution of an action for dower in that court, until the costs of a former action in a Court of Equity, which had been stricken from the docket, were paid.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hadwin v. Southern Ry., 67 S. C. 466, 45 S. E. 1019.

For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 1058; Dec. Dig. ⟸277.]

[6. Dower ⟸72.]

A widow is not barred of her action for dower by reason of a former action upon the same claim, not prosecuted to judgment. The act of 1744, (3 Stat. 612), has no application to cases of dower.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 252; Dec. Dig. ⟸72.]

[7. Abatement and Revival ⟸56.]

Where a widow has a decree establishing her right to dower, with leave to apply for the necessary orders to carry the decree into effect, and dies pending an appeal therefrom, her administrator is entitled to an account from defendant of rents and profits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 356; Abatement and Revival, Dec. Dig. ⟸56.]

[8. Dower ⟸46.]

A widow has a clear right to have her dower assigned to her in the surplus value of lands which were sold for the satisfaction of a mortgage, to which her right was subject, but in respect to which she has made no formal relinquishment. Per Maher, Circuit judge.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Shiell v. Sloan, 22 S. C. 157; Grube v. Lilienthal, 51 S. C. 452, 29 S. E. 230; Groce v. Ponder, 63 S. C. 167, 41 S. E. 83.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 92, 145–153; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[This case is also cited in Columbia Water Power Co. v. Columbia Land & Investment Co., 42 S. C. 497, 20 S. E. 378, 540, without specific application, and in Hutzler Bros. v. Phillips, 26 S. C. 151, 1 S. E. 502, 4 Am. St. Rep. 687, as to facts, and in Seibert v. Todd, 31 S. C. 211, 9 S. E. 822, 4 L. R. A. 606; Bradley v. Drayton, 48 S. C. 234, 26 S. E. 613, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Maher, J., Aiken, December, 1875.

This was an action instituted in July, 1872, by Sarah Melton, in the Court of Probate for Edgefield county, against eight defendants, each one of whom had in possession a portion of a tract of land of which her husband, Wiley Melton, had been seized during coverture. Wiley Melton died in December, 1865. In October, 1873, the cause was transferred to the new county of Aiken, which included that part of old Edgefield county, in which the land lay.

It appears that a former action had been commenced in 1867, in the Court of Equity for Edgefield district, and that on the dockets of that court there appears the entry made in 1868, "stricken from the docket." There was no other evidence of the proceedings in or disposition of the former action.

The other facts of the case are fully set forth in the decree of Judge Maher, which is as follows:

This is an appeal from the Probate Court in a proceeding for the allotment of dower. Both parties appeal on questions involving the merits. The defendants have presented other grounds, which will first be considered.

*467

*The position, that the jurisdiction of Probate Courts in matters of dower can be exercised only in cases where the right is not disputed, and, particularly, when no dispute exists in relation to title, is completely disposed of by the decision of the Supreme Court in Stewart v. Blease, 4 S. C. 37; see, also, Faust v. Bailey, 5 Rich. 107.

It is considered quite plain from the provisions of the act of 1871, (14 stat. 695), taken as a whole, that until the organization of the new judicial and election county of Aiken, in October, 1872, the jurisdiction of the Probate Courts of the several counties from which Aiken was formed, remained without change. The proceeding was, therefore, properly instituted in the Probate Court of Edgefield county, and the transfer to the Probate Court of Aiken county was expressly authorized by Section 7 of the act; see, also, act of 1874. 15 Stat. 652.

As to the stay of proceedings herein until the payment of the costs of the former suit in equity, the ruling of the Probate judge is affirmed for the following reasons:

1. There is no inflexible rule by which a plaintiff is compelled to pay the costs of a former action before he is suffered to proceed with the second. The rule is intended to prevent vexatious repetitions of actions, and is administered with a view to the circumstances of the particular case and in the exercise of a large and liberal discretion. 2 Tidd Pr. 538; Youle v. Brotherton, 10 Johns. 363; Miller v. Grice, 2 Rich. 27 [44 Am. Dec. 271]. If the action of the Probate Court in a matter resting in discretion, is not conclusive, it should, at least, not be disturbed without special reasons for the interference of this court, and the case presents no such reasons.

2. It is necessary to the proper application of the rule that the first suit should be at an end, and in such a state that the defendants are entitled to receive and the plaintiff bound to pay costs. Graham Pr. 555. The entry, "stricken from the docket," does not necessarily import that the suit was at an end. It might have been restored to the docket on motion. The case may have been struck from the docket because the pleadings were not completed, (Equity, Rule 29;) costs could not have been taxed upon the footing of a mere entry of this character. It could not be *considered as a dismissal of the bill, under Rule 33, upon which an execution or attachment for costs would have been authorized, for it does not purport to be such; and, besides, an order of the court was indispensable to terminate the suit, whether by dismissal of the bill or a voluntary discontinuance; without such order costs could not be taxed and the payment thereof be enforced. Moreover, courts of law have not considered the rule applicable when the former suit was in a court of equity. 2 Tidd Pr. 1233; 3 B. & Ad. 602; Stebbins v. Grant, 19 Johns. 196.

*468

The act of 1744, (3 Stat. at L. 612), has uniformly been considered by our courts as confined to the action of ejectment, and its statutory substitute, the action of trespass, to try title. The widow's claim of dower is a mere chose in action, not even assignable at law. Lamar v. Scott, 4 Rich. 516. She cannot enter upon her dower until it is assigned to her, and may be pursued as a trespasser if she tary beyond her quarantine. McCully v. Smith, 2 Bail. 103. "It is not until her dower has been duly assigned that the widow acquires a vested estate for life, which will enable her to maintain her ejective suit." 4 Kent 62. It follows that the act of 1744 has no application to the present case.

In relation to the principal questions to be considered, the facts of the case are briefly as follows: Melton, the husband of the demandant, purchased, during the coverture, a tract of land, parcels of which are now in the possession of the defendants, for the sum of $8000, which he paid in cash, and received a conveyance of the land on December 30th, 1833. On January 18th, 1834, he executed and delivered a mortgage of the same land (with certain exceptions) to Bland, Frazier and Jeter, wherein it is recited that Melton had lately made such purchase for the price stated; that in order to procure a part of the purchase money he had given his note with said Bland, Frazier and Jeter as sureties, payable to the order of one Drake, at the Bank of Augusta, for $6480, the proceeds of which had been actually appropriated in payment of the land; and that it had been explicitly understood and agreed between the said parties that Melton, so soon as he obtained a deed for the land, should execute a mortgage of the same to indemnify and secure said sureties *from any loss they might sustain on account of their securityship, and the premises are thus conveyed by way of mortgage professedly "in pursuance of said agreement, and for the better securing the said Avery Bland, Benjamin Frazier and John S. Jeter from all liabilities on account of said securityship, and in order to indemnify them from any loss which they may sustain as aforesaid." The sureties having been compelled to pay part of the note, brought suit against Melton and obtained judgment for $3759.45, and an order for foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises. Avery Bland became the purchaser at such sale for the sum of $7100, which he paid, and received a conveyance from the sheriff, dated May 4th, 1840. The defendants severally hold under him through mesne conveyance. Melton died in 1865—the demandant never relinquishing her dower in the premises.

*469

An agreement to execute a mortgage for specific enforcement, is considered in equity as actually performed before a decree for the purpose. 1 Story Eq., § 649; Adams Eq. 135. Such agreement constitutes an equitable lien, which will prevail against subsequent purchasers and creditors with notice. Dow v. Kerr, Speers Eq. 413; Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq. 421; Boyce v. Shiver, 3 S. C. 515. If the agreement be entered into prior to the acquisition of the property, it would attach instantly upon the vesting of the title, in preference to the lien of a judgment then impending. Allston v. Bank, 2 Hill Eq. 235. The execution of a mortgage after the time stipulated therefor would not supersede the equitable lien, so far, at least, as its continued recognition might be necessary for the protection of the holder against intermediate encumbrances affected by notice. For this purpose there need be no relation of the mortgage to the date of the agreement, or to the time of the acquisition of the title. A continuous lien, at first equitable and afterwards legal in its nature, would not rest upon the land from the inception of the title.

Whether Melton's agreement with his sureties was in writing or merely verbal, does not appear from the recitals in the mortgage. If, in a suit for specific performance, the agreement had been set forth in the bill in the precise terms recited in the mort*gage, and Melton had either failed to answer, or, answering, had confessed the agreement without setting up the statute of frauds, the validity of the agreement would have been presumed without further inquiry, and a decree have been made accordingly. And the result would have been the same if the bill had explicitly stated that the agreement was verbal, and Melton, by his course of pleading, had relieved the sureties from the necessity of proving the agreement. 2 Story Eq., § 755; Reeves Dom. Rel. 50; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 527; [Seabrook v. Hammond] 5 Rich. 170. "If," says Mr. Justice Story, "the defendant does not insist on the defence, he may fairly be deemed to waive it; and the rule is, quisque renuntiare potest juri pro se introducto." Persons who may have dealt with Melton in respect to the property, intermediately the vesting of the title in him and the execution of the mortgage, would doubtless have good ground to resist the force of any subsequent written acknowledgment of a parol promise as affecting their rights. But certainly creditors holding general liens at the time the title vested, could successfully urge no such objection; and persons deriving interests in the land under Melton, if not in a position to avail themselves of want of notice, would be as effectually concluded as if the writing had been executed at the time the agreement was made. Whether, then, it be presumed that the agreement was in writing, by analogy to the rule in relation to unqualified admission in an answer, or the statements in the mortgage be taken as an acknowledgment of a mere parol promise, the result, it is apprehended, must be the same. It was Melton's privilege to waive the immunity of the statute, and his fulfillment of the promise, though tardy, was an act of honesty and good faith which is to be commended. The same effect must be given to his voluntary act, which would have followed a compulsory decree enforcing a parol agreement confessed by answer, without reliance on the statutes of fraud. The effect of such a decree would have been to set up the agreement as an equitable lien coincident in its origin with the acquisition of the legal title and such, in the judgment of the court, is the equitable view of the transactions between Melton and his sureties. If there had been mention of the agreement in the mortgage, it would not have been admissible to show, by parol evidence, its connection *with any antecedent verbal promise. But the mortgage served the double purpose of supplying written evidence of the previous agreement, and of carrying the same into effect. In the light of established principles of equity, it is conceived that only one view can properly be taken of the case, which is, that there was a valid agreement to execute a mortgage which affected the land as an equitable lien instantaneously upon the delivery of the conveyance to Melton, and that the agreement was afterwards consummated by the execution of the instrument contracted for.

*470

*471

It is a general principle, says Chancellor Kent, that "the wife's dower is liable to be defeated by every subsisting claim, in law or equity, existing before the inception of the title, which would have defeated the husband's seizin." Thus "an agreement by a husband to convey before dower attaches will, if enforced in equity, extinguish the claim to dower." 4 Com. 50; 1 Scrib. on Dow. 564. In Allston v. Bank, 2 Hill Eq. 235, a remainderman assigned his contingent interest in land to indemnify his accommodation endorser on a note in bank. Before the happening of the contingency on which the estate was limited, a judgment was entered against the remainderman. After the estate vested, a contest for priority arose between the assignee and the judgment creditor. The court held that the assignment, though inoperative as a conveyance, availed as an agreement specifically enforceable in equity; and, accordingly, that the lien of the judgment attached subject to the equity with which, in the consideration of the court, the estate of the remainderman was burdened at the moment it vested in him. If the question in that case had arisen between the assignee and the widow of the remainderman on a claim of dower, the ground upon which a distinction could have been made in her favor is not apparent. If a prior equity would prevail over the lien of a judgment subsisting at the time the title vested, it seems to me quite clear that the inchoate right of dower, partaking, as it does, of the nature of the husband's estate, would equally be subject to the burden which affected that estate, in the very inception of its origin. In states where the doctrine of the vendor's lien prevails, it has been uniformly held that "when the lien attaches, and so long as it is preserved, it is paramount to the dower of *the vendee's wife." 1 Scrib. on Dow. 530, and cases cited in note 3. And yet this lien was considered by Mr. Justice Story "not of so high and stringent a nature as that of a judgment creditor, for the latter binds according to the course of common law, whereas the former is the mere custom of a court of equity, which it moulds and fashions according to its own purposes. It is, in short, a right which has no existence until it is established by the decree of a court in the particular case, and is then made subservient to all the equities of the parties, and enforced in its own peculiar manner and upon its own peculiar principles." Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason 192 [Fed. Cas. No. 5,441]; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. (Am. note) 249. If the dower right is subordinated to a lien of this character, for much stronger reason must it yield to an equity which springs from the express agreement of the parties, and is impressed as a specific lien upon the land by its intrinsic force, and not by virtue of the retroactive operation of a decree which originates it. At the time Melton entered into the agreement with his sureties, their claim to be protected by a punctual performance of the obligation was unquestionably superior to that of his wife to be endowed of the forthcoming estate. Without their assistance he would probably not have been able to complete the purchase. The land came to him impressed with this superior equity, and it is but just that the wife's claim of dower should be subjected to it. Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. She is in privity of estate with him, and what bound the land at the instant of its acquisition necessarily binds her dower, which is but a part and continuation of his estate. She is estopped, as his privy, from denying the efficacy of his solemn admission, under seal, respecting the agreement with his sureties, and is fully committed to the consequences, which, in the regard of equity, resulted from that admission.

*472

The conclusion is that the demandant's inchoate right of dower attached to the land, subject to the encumbrance of the mortgage.

When the wife relinquishes her claim of dower to a mortgage, in the mode prescribed by the statute, the purchaser under a decree for foreclosure and sale would take a title absolutely unencumbered of the dower. Keith v. Trapier, Bail. Eq. 63, 66; Keckley v. Keckley, 2 Hill Eq. 252; Rickard v. Talbird, Rice

*473

*Eq. 170. The widow is remitted, in such case, to the surplus proceeds of sale; and her claim thereon will be protected, if the fund remain in the custody or within the control of the court, when her right becomes consummate. Keith v. Trapier, Titus v. Nelson, 5 Johns. C. 452.

In Brown v. Duncan, 4 McCord 346, the case was that land had been sold under decree in former suits, for the satisfaction of two mortgages, one of which, having been given for the purchase money, was valid against the claim of dower. The land brought $40,000, and the amount applied to the purchase money mortgage was $8000. Duncan, the purchaser, complied with the terms of sale, and received a conveyance. The proceeds of sale were applied to the mortgage debts, as directed by the decree; afterwards the husband died, and his widow brought suit against Duncan for her dower. It was testified by the commissioner that the land had been sold subject to the contingent right of dower. This circumstance, however, was considered no impediment to a vigorous contention on behalf of Duncan that the widow was not dowable in an equity of redemption, and hence the conclusiveness of the decree and sale thereunder could have been urged with equal propriety. The court, following the principle of Crafts v. Crafts, 2 McCord 54, held that the dower attached, subject to the mortgage for the purchase money, and that the demandant was entitled to dower in the surplus value of the land at the time of the sale. Her right to an allotment in specie was explicitly recognized, though the return of the commissioner, assessing a sum in lieu of dower, was confirmed. No question was raised as to the effect of the decree and sale upon the inchoate right of dower, nor did any observation on that point fall from the court. The operation and effect of the act of 1791, and the basis of assessment, were the only subjects of discussion. The case, however, is at least a tacit recognition of the widow's right of dower in the surplus value of land, against a purchaser under decree for foreclosure, when her right, although subject to the encumbrance, had not been formally relinquished. In Pledger v. Ellerbe, 6 Rich. 266 [60 Am. Dec. 123], a mortgage for purchase money had been foreclosed in the husband's lifetime, and the defendant held through several mesne conveyances under the *purchaser at the sale. It was conceded by the distinguished counsel for the defendants that the demandant was entitled to her dower "in the excess of the value of the land over the mortgage debt."

*474

But it was objected on the part of the defendant that the deed of the husband was inoperative as a mortgage, it having been attested by only one subscribing witness, and hence that her dower extended to the entire premises. It was so ruled on Circuit, and a verdict was rendered for the demandant accordingly. On appeal, the ruling of the Circuit judge was reversed, on the ground that the widow was estopped, by reason of her privity in estate with the husband, from denying the validity of the mortgage, which had been adjudged valid against him in the proceedings for foreclosure. The court say: "A mere transitory seizin of the husband, for the purpose of re-conveying the land, will abridge the title of dower, and the demandant in such a case takes her dower cum onere. If there be any surplus, therefore, after satisfying the mortgage security, she may be endowed of that." A new trial was ordered, and that "the writ do issue to admeasure and ascertain her dower in any surplus which may remain after paying the mortgage encumbrance." Here, again, the widow's right of dower in specie, to the extent of the value of the land in excess of the mortgage debt, was recognized and enforced, without question, against one holding under the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. As the question now under consideration was not distinctly raised, the point cannot be said to have been expressly adjudicated; but certainly these cases cannot with propriety be lightly disregarded, nor even be considered as without the weight of authority, unless upon examination it should be found that there is no just ground of distinction, as it regards the widow's claim upon the surplus, between mortgages upon which her dower had been renounced and such as are binding upon her without relinquishment.

When the act of 1791 (5 Stat. at L. 169) converted what had been known as the equity of redemption into a legal estate, the wife's right of dower necessarily attached as upon a legal and abiding seizin of the husband, although in subjection to the lien of any mortgage which was paramount to that right. But the *right is so subject only to the extent of the mortgage debt. A sale for satisfaction of the debt being a necessary incident of the mortgage, where the encumbrance is valid against her claim, she would of course be bound by a decree for foreclosure and sale. She could set up no right as against the mortgagee, or any one claiming under him, unless she comes to redeem before a sale; when, however, a sale yields a surplus over the mortgage debt, it is demonstrated that the land was more than sufficient in value to satisfy the debt. When the sale is in the husband's lifetime, the wife could urge no complaint that more than a sufficiency of land had been sold, since her claim rests in contingency, and her husband's deed conveyed his entire estate for all the purposes of a sale for satisfaction of the debt. To the extent, however, of any excess in value of the land beyond the debt, her right could remain intact; unless, by her voluntary act, she had concluded herself from setting up the claim, such would be the effect of a formal relinquishment in favor of the mortgagee and his assigns. The relinquishment would attend the deed of the husband to the purchaser, as a muniment of title. If, in such case, she retains any right after a sale, it is restricted to the proceeds. The purchaser would have no concern with the disposition of the proceeds. He holds under the parties to the mortgage, namely, the mortgagor, the mortgagee, and the wife herself. But how is the case where the right of dower, though subject to the encumbrance, has not been relinquished in the entire premises? On what grounds could the purchaser oppose her claim of dower in so much of the land as corresponds in value with the surplus proceeds of sale? She has not renounced it; her husband's deed does not affect it; the mortgage debt has been satisfied without it; and the purchaser himself has no pretence of claiming to be protected against it, since he might have regulated his bid with a view to the contingent right.

*475

The surplus proceeds of sale are properly to be regarded as the equivalent of the husband's estate in the land, over and above the mortgage debt. The value of the wife's contingent interest is not included in such proceeds, unless she has relinquished her claim to dower in the entire premises. Where no relinquishment has been made, the dower right remains intact in *the land itself, to the extent of its surplus value, the purchaser having bought such right only to the extent of the mortgage debt. The purchaser holds virtually as assignee of the mortgage, though the wife has no right to redeem. If, after deducting the mortgage debt from the value of the premises at the time of alienation, there should be an overplus, she is entitled to her dower in that. Her right is clear, when, as in the present case, the land sold for a sum in excess of the mortgage debt.

*476

These considerations persuade me that Brown v. Duncan and Pledger v. Ellerbe, proceeded upon a conscious recognition of a clear right on the part of a widow to have her dower in the surplus value of land sold for the satisfaction of a mortgage, to which her right was subject, but in respect to which she has made no formal relinquishment.

I own that my impressions at the hearing were decidedly adverse to the conclusions of the Probate Court on this branch of the case. I had always supposed that foreclosure of a mortgage valid, for any reason, against the wife, would bar her claim of dower in the land, absolutely and under all circumstances. The result of a careful examination of the subject is to convince me that the conclusion of the Probate Court on this, as on the other questions raised by the appeal, is correct.

It is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the decree of the Probate Court be and hereby is affirmed, with costs of the appeal to the demandant. John J. Maher.

From this decree both plaintiff and defendant appealed to this court.

Pending the appeal the demandant died. By order of this court, in November, 1877, J. D. Tibbetts, as administrator of Sarah Melton, was made a party plaintiff without prejudice to any right of the defendants, arising from the death of Sarah Melton.

The case was argued at April Term, 1878, and being ordered for re-argument was again heard at this term.

*477

*Mr. J. P. Carroll, for plaintiff.

The mortgage had no effect until its delivery in 1834, at which time the demandant's inchoate right of dower had attached. 1 Dall. 415; 1 Scrib. on Dow. 264–266; 11 Rich. 417; 43 Me. 489; 4 B. Mon. 339; 12 B. Mon. 261. Relying upon the recitals of the mortgage, the defendants must fail. 12 Leigh 264. But the recitals cannot prejudice the demandant. 5 S. C. 275; 9 Rich. Eq. 513; 9 Rich. 50; 12 Rich. 363; 1 Greenl. on Ev., §§ 180, 190, 536; 1 Ad. & El. 787; Stark. on Ev. 328; 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 68, 590; 2 Scrib. on Dow. 204–5; 8 Ohio 412; 4 Kent 51; 8 S. C. 100. This is not a mortgage for the purchase money; even if executed the day of purchase it would not prevent dower. 11 Rich. 417; 1 Story Eq. Jur., §§ 629, 630. The mortgage having never been foreclosed, the dower remains unimpaired. Scrib. on Dow. 533, 558; 5 S. C. 213, 461; 2 Hill Ch. 252; 1 Story Eq., § 776, 779; 7 Ves. 265; 3 Lead. Eq. Cas. 80; 2 Lead. Eq. Cas. 699.

If the widow is not entitled to dower upon the whole, she undoubtedly is upon the surplus. 1 Scrib. on Dow. 476–8; Bail. Eq. 63.

Mrs. Melton having died, her administrator is entitled to rents and profits, or to one-third of the interest upon the value at the time of alienation, to be computed from the accrual of her right of dower. 3 Bro. C. C. 495, 632; 1 Fonb. Eq. 22; Bail. Eq. 69; Dud. Eq. 127; 1 S. C. 124; 4 S. C. 9; 2 Scrib. on Dow. 696; 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 625.

Mr. L. F. Youmans, attorney-general, for defendants.

The demandant in dower is dead, having in her favor a Circuit decree affirming the decree of the Probate judge, which latter decrees the opinion expressed therein, to wit, that she is entitled to dower in the residue of the value of the land after satisfaction of the mortgage debt, and that she have leave to apply for necessary orders to carry that judgment into full effect. Dower not being an estate until assigned, and when assigned in the land or the value of the land, being an estate only for life, and she being dead, the authorities cited in the Circuit decree, (4 Rich. 516; 2 Bail. 103; 4 Kent 62,) are conclusive that her *administrator can have no estate in the land or its value, nor can he obtain any account of rents and profits, for the principal failing the accessory goes with it. Indeed, the Probate Court has jurisdiction only in allotment of dower. Const., Art. IV., § 20; Code, § 38. And this cannot extend to personal representatives, and no account for rents and profits is attempted to be given thereby. If such right existed even, it could not be prosecuted in this court or in the Court of Probate.

*478

But in support of the exceptions to the jurisdiction of the Probate Court, we rely upon the Const., Art. IV., § 20; Code, §§ 38, 40, 146, 276, subd. 1; 14 Stat. 695; 15 Stat. 652; 5 Rich. Eq. 350; 10 Rich. Eq. 428.

The costs of the former action should have been paid before the institution of this suit, or at least this action should have been stayed until the costs of the former action were paid. 2 T. R. 512; 2 B. & P. 23; 6 T. R. 740, 233; 8 T. R. 645; 2 Strange 1152; 2 Sellon Pr. 144, 450; 3 Com. Dig., tit. "Costs, A," 8; 4 East 585; Hullock on Costs 452.

The statutes of limitation barred the action. 2 Stat. 584; 3 Stat. 612; 1 Rich. 476; Code, § 96.

The mortgage was for the purchase money. 1 Scrib. on Dow. 261, 262; 11 Allen 407; 4 Kent 50; 1 Ham. 249, 538; 3 Edw. Ch. 47; Lamb. on Dow. 23; 1 Leigh 264; Bail. Eq. 463; 2 Hill Ch. 428; Spears Eq. 460, 417; Bail. Eq. 223; 2 Desaus. 552; 12 Rich. Eq. 345; 12 Leigh 264; 2 Ohio St. 415; 5 S. C. 90.

The wife is bound by the recitals of the mortgage. Co. Litt. 352, b; 6 Rich. 271.

The widow is entitled to dower only out of the surplus money after the mortgage is satisfied. 9 Rich. Eq. 512; 2 Hill Ch. 252; Rice Eq. 170; 1 Scrib. on Dow. 458–461, 476–478, 521, 522, 532; Bail. Eq. 63; 5 Johns. Ch. 452; 10 Paige 49; 4 Edw. Ch. 678.

October 3d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. This is a proceeding for the allotment of dower, commenced in the Court of Probate, carried up by appeal to the Circuit Court and thence brought by appeal to this court. *The facts are very fully set forth in the decree rendered by the Circuit judge.

*479

Several important questions are presented in the appeal from that decision. This court, however, is impressed by the preliminary question, upon the determination of which the consideration of several of the other questions depends. We will thus state it: The prima facie right of the demandant is established. That is to say, the marriage, the legal seizin of the husband during coverture, his death, and that the wife had not relinquished her right of dower in the land, are facts not disputed. But the defendants by way of defense allege as matters of fact that the husband, within a short time, a few weeks, after the execution and delivery to him of a deed of conveyance of the land, executed a mortgage thereon to secure payment of a part of the purchase money; that this mortgage was executed in pursuance of an agreement entered into before the purchase of the land by the mortgagor and of force at that time; that the mortgage was foreclosed in the lifetime of the mortgagor, the husband, and that they derive through the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. They claim as conclusions of law that such a mortgage for the purchase money is by virtue of the agreement part of the res gestæ, and is a right superior to that of dower; and that foreclosure having been had in the lifetime of the husband the land was sold freed and discharged from all right of dower. The facts as above stated are sustained by the findings of the court below. The chief aim, therefore, of the decree by the Circuit judge is to reach the conclusions of law flowing from such facts. The fact, however, which must underlie the entire defence is the existence of the "agreement" at the time of the sale and as part of the transaction. We are of opinion that there is no proof in the record of the existence of such an agreement as against the widow. The defendants offered in evidence nothing but the recitals made in the mortgage executed nearly a month after the legal estate had vested in the husband. The wife was not a party to the mortgage deed. The question is, whether such recitals made subsequent to the time when the wife's inchoate right of dower has attached to the land are admissible in evidence against her demanding her dower. The mortgage *was executed to third persons who were not directly parties to the transaction, and there is not a title of other evidence to prove the agreement or to connect it with the transaction. It cannot, then, as in the case of Dutart v. Chovin, Riley 170, be "receivable under the idea of res gestæ," but must rest solely upon the credit given to statements made by the mortgagor, in which view, as conceded in Dutart v. Chovin, "it must according to the rule be clearly inadmissible."

*480

But the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge rests upon the ground that the wife is "in privity of estate" with her husband, and "is estopped as his privy from denying the efficacy of his solemn admission under seal respecting the agreement with his sureties, and is fully committed to the consequences which in the regard of equity resulted from that admission."

It would be difficult to state the general rules on this subject in language more concise or accurate than that found in Greenleaf on Evidence, as follows: "In regard to recitals in deeds, the general rule is that all parties to a deed are bound by the recitals therein which operate as an estoppel working on the interest in the land, if it be a deed of conveyance, and binding both parties and privies; privies in blood, privies in estate and privies in law." Vol. I., § 23.

"The term privity denotes mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property. * * * The ground upon which admissions bind those in privity with the party making them is, that they are identified in interest, and of course the rule extends no further than this identity." Id., § 189.

Can the widow claiming dower be said in this sense to be in privity of estate with her husband? If she cannot, the evidence is mere hearsay and inadmissible.

The inchoate right of dower is said by Mr. Scribner (Vol. II., p. 8,) to be "a substantial right, possessing in contemplation of law the attributes of property, and to be estimated and valued as such." And in Cunningham v. Shannon, 4 Rich. Eq. 135, it is defined to be "a right attaching by implication of law, which although it may never be called into effect, * * * yet from the moment that the fact of marriage and of seizin have concurred, is so fixed on the land as to become a title paramount to *that of any other person claiming under the husband by a subsequent act. Park on Dow. 256. The estate to which the right of dower attaches comes through the husband, but the right by which it attaches comes through the law.

*481

Thus the wife is in privity of estate with her husband quoad his derivation of estate; that is to say, until the right of dower attaches; but when the right has attached, her interest is independent of him, and is against him. The privity ceases on the concurrence of marriage and seizin. That her right is adverse to her husband would perhaps be an awkward expression, for it cannot be set up against him, because it does not consummate until his death; but that it is against his interest and affects his estate is manifest, for it is good against his heir or his alienee, and the assertion of the right constitutes a breach of a covenant of warranty for quiet enjoyment. Lewis v. Lewis, 5 Rich. 12. The wife's right attaches to the estate which was in the husband at the concurrence of marriage and seizin, and in questions to determine that estate she is in privity with him as to all transactions antecedent, but not so as to any subsequent, for the husband and wife are no longer indentified in interest. In Gaunt v. Wainman, 3 Bing. N. C. 69, an action for dower, it was argued that the tenant was estopped by the deed under which he claimed title to dispute the nature of the title conferred by that deed. Tindall, C. J., says: "As between the parties to that deed there may be an estoppel, but you set it up against [the wife] a stranger to the deed." In Foster v. Dwinel, 49 Me. 44, in commenting on the above, it is said by Kent, J.: "The ground of this decision seems to be that the wife or widow is not a party or privy to the conveyance. Her claim is by a title paramount and distinct and therefore she is not estopped." And again: "We have seen that a widow cannot be defeated of her dower by any declarations or recitals of her husband." The case of Gayle v. Price, 5 Rich. L. 525, is not in conflict with this principle. The title under which the defendant held, and he did not attempt to set up any other, was the title on which the widow relied, and the estoppel was reciprocal. But in this case the title under which the defendants claim is the equity arising from an agreement which depends for proof upon a declaration or recital *subsequent to the deed of conveyance under which the widow sets up her demand. The defendants are not estopped from proving such agreement, but there is no estoppel against the widow, as would be if, for instance, such recitals were in a deed indented, to which her husband was a party, and by which he derived title.

*482

No cases directly in point were cited, and we have found none in our own reports, and but little in the text-books, bearing directly on the point in question, but so far as decisions of other courts have been found, they entirely sustain the view already expressed. It is true that the case of Pledger v. Ellerbe, 6 Rich. 266 [60 Am. Dec. 123], was to some extent relied on, not by the Circuit judge on this point, but by the counsel for the defendants. We do not, however, consider it as at all sustaining the position attributed to it, and will consider it presently in another connection.

In the leading case of Greene v. Greene, 1 Ohio 244, though the rule of evidence is not in question, the law as to the effect of such agreements is thus expressed: "If it be considered as real estate, it was acquired subject to a condition or agreement that qualified the estate of the husband, and the wife when there is an agreement, unless it were executed after her right attached, would be bound thereby, so as to exclude her right of dower." We would remark incidentally that that is really all that is decided in Pledger v. Ellerbe, supra. See, also, on that subject Stoppelbein v. Shulte, 1 Hill 200; State v. Laval, 4 McC. 336, and Wilson v. McConnell, 9 Rich. Eq. 500, showing the effect of the act of 1791, and the change which has occurred since the decision in Bogie v. Rutledge, 1 Bay 312, and Verree v. Verree, 2 Brev. 211, doing away with that idea of instantaneous seizin in the mortgagee which left to the widow only an equitable right, and substituting in its stead the principle that a mortgage for the purchase money, or an agreement to that effect, simultaneous or connected with the purchase, is part of the res gestæ and to that extent qualifies the legal seizin of the husband and subordinates the wife's right to the lien thus fixed upon the land. But to return: The recitals in the mortgage unquestionably are, as against the husband and those claiming under him, evidence of an agreement, but being subsequent to the time when the *wife's right attached, she is not thereby bound, for as against her they do not constitute evidence that the agreement was prior to or constituted a part of the transaction of purchase. When the right of dower has consummated it is a right fixed upon the land, but that right relates back to the time when it originally attached; or, as already said, the inchoate right itself "is so fixed on the land as to become a title paramount to that of any other person claiming under the husband by a subsequent act." Such right is protected by the same rules of evidence as other rights of property. Thus when dower has attached and the right has become independent of the husband "nothing that he could" (thereafter) "say would be evidence against his wife; her claim is not through him, but in her own right, and altogether independent of him." Smith v. Scudder, 11 Sergt. & Rawle 325. That was not a case for dower, but states the rule which we think is applicable.

*483

In Doe v. Webber, 1 Ad. & El. 733, 28 Eng. C. L. 191, where a party had by a voluntary settlement after marriage conveyed away his interest in an estate and afterwards executed a mortgage of the same estate; it was held, that declarations, implied or expressed, of the mortgagor made after he had parted with his interest by the settlement were not admissible evidence on behalf of the mortgagee (after the death of the mortgagor) to show that money had actually been advanced upon the mortgage. The views of the judges were various, but the reason is thus pointedly expressed by Taunton, J.: "I am of opinion that he (the husband) having parted with his interest by the settlement was not competent to cut down that settlement by his declarations afterwards made. It is not for us to decide what would have been the effect of the evidence if admitted."

It is difficult to perceive any difference in principle between that case and one in which by reason of the marriage and seizin the interest has passed out of the husband by operation of law. He is a party to it by virtue of the marriage, and as much affected as if the interest had gone out of him by a settlement.

It would be even more startling if, by the admission of his subsequent declarations as evidence, he could "cut down" so highly favored legal right. In Pinner v. Pinner, Bar-bec's L. *475, the question fairly arises. The proceeding was by the widow of Wm. Pinner for dower. The other side produced a deed from the husband dated thirteen years before his intermarriage with the petitioner, and by a subscribing witness proved a delivery of the deed a short time before the husband's death, and his declaration that the deed had been delivered many years before. Held that this declaration was no evidence of any previous delivery as against the petitioner. The court, per Nash, Chief Justice, says: "The only testimony upon which the defendant, Nancy, relied to show that the deed was delivered at the time it bore date was the declaration of William Pinner, which was incompetent on that point. The declarations of Pinner before Lanning as to the acknowledgment of the deed were competent as showing a present delivery, for it was part of the res gestæ then taking place. But it was no evidence of what had taken place at any time before. The plaintiff did not claim under him but under the law, and he was endeavoring to deprive her of her rights. So far, then, the declarations of Pinner were incompetent to give the deed an operation before his then acknowledgment."

*484

In Derush v. Brown, 8 Ohio 412, a proceeding for dower, it was held that admissions in a deed of release executed by the husband after he had become seized of the land, could not be taken in evidence as against the widow. The court says: "A deed of release from Stearns to the Browns, in which he admits that he purchased the lands in trust for the Browns with their property and as their agent, has also been introduced. To the incompetency of this testimony the counsel for complainants objects and insists that such admissions, made either by parol or by deed, cannot operate to defeat a widow of her dower, and of this opinion are the court. It is true that the right of the widow to dower is derived from the husband, and in a certain sense she may be said to claim under him. But in some respects her interests are adverse to his. By the marriage and seizin of the husband she acquires an interest in the land of which he cannot divest her. He cannot do it by deed of conveyance, and it would be strange if he could by parol declarations. Declarations made by the husband while contracting for the land or at the *time of purchase may with propriety be proven; but declarations made subsequently must be excluded."

*485

The meaning is that if the trust had been proven the right of dower would never have attached, and that it might have been proven by declarations of the husband, which constituted a part of the original res gestæ, or by other evidence, but not by subsequent declarations of the husband, which, if admissible in evidence, would thus enable him at any time to deprive his wife of dower.

Regarding it, therefore, as settled that the wife, as respects her dower, is not in privity with her husband in any transactions subsequent to the concurrence of marriage and seizin, to which she is not a party, the general rule of evidence must govern, and on that the current of authorities is unbroken. Sims v. Saunders, Harper 374; Newman v. Wilbourne, 1 Hill Eq. 10; Smith v. Asbell, 2 Strob. 141; Ruff v. Thomas, 2 Speers 601; Land v. Lee, 2 Rich. 168; Kittles v. Kittles, 4 Rich. 422; Renwick v. Renwick, 9 Rich. 50; Raiford v. French, 11 Rich. 370; Adams v. Lathan, 14 Rich. Eq. 304. The declarations must be made prior to the res gestæ or be part thereof; and as to what constitutes part of the res gestæ it is said in Haynes v. Rutler, 24 Pick. 242, and approved in Adams v. Lathan, supra: "If a declaration is in itself a fact in the transaction, or is made by a party while doing an act, and serves to explain it, it is to be received in evidence as a part of the res gestæ. But a recital of past transactions is not admissible, although it may have some relation to the act which the person may be doing at the time when he makes the declaration." Greenl. vol. I., § 110.

That the mortgage deed was admissible in evidence is unquestionable, and it proved that the recital had been made, but not the fact which the recital alleges.

Stress is laid upon the effect of the foreclosure. "Judgments and decrees of courts of competent jurisdiction directly on the point in controversy are admissible in evidence not only between the parties, but all persons standing in the relation of privies in blood, in estate or in law. And I understand by privy one whose interest has been legally represented at the trial." McMullin v. Brown, 2 Hill Eq. 457.

*486

*The wife was in no sense a party to the proceeding for foreclosure; nor, according to the views already expressed, can it be said that her interest was "legally represented at the trial." The "relationship as to the same rights of property"—between the husband and the widow demanding dower, and the identity of their interest—cease at the moment that the right of dower attaches, for the interest of the wife is thenceforth freed, is independent of that of the husband and is adverse to it. That the foreclosure was had in the Court of Common Pleas in the exercise of its power under the act of 1791, thus becomes an immaterial question; the conclusion would be the same had the proceedings been in the Court of Equity in the exercise of its comprehensive jurisdiction.

The case of Pledger v. Ellerbe—already referred to—does not aid the defendants, for the circumstances are essentially different. The act of the husband which there worked the estoppel was admitted to have been a part of the res gestæ. The instrument called a mortgage was given by the husband to the vendor at the time of the sale to secure the purchase money, and whether or not duly attested, was at least an agreement, and was part of the transaction by which the seizin was acquired. That fact was admitted. Whatever the husband did, in the transaction of purchase, affecting the seizin, was binding on the wife, for her right of dower attached to the seizin thus qualified or encumbered. His agreement could have been specifically enforced in equity, and the wife would have been bound, for the decree would have determined a fact in the res gestæ by which the seizin came to the husband, and to that extent she is in privity with him. None the less is she bound when by the husband's assent to foreclosure he admits what would have compelled specific performance, and thus merely dispenses with unnecessary circuity of action. Such acquiescence on the part of the husband is not an act or declaration, subsequent to the seizin, affecting the right to dower, but is an act on his part solely affecting a proceeding at law or in equity, arising from an act in the res gestæ, on which her right depends, and which right could have been in nowise changed or altered by the difference in the mode of procedure. We, therefore, entirely concur in the conclusion reached in *Pledger v. Ellerbe, and deem it in no sense in conflict with the views entertained in this case.

*487

For the reasons above stated it follows that the widow's right of dower was not affected by the mortgage, and that she is therefore entitled to dower in all the land in question.

As to the other points raised by this appeal we are satisfied with the conclusions reached by the Circuit judge for the reasons which he has given, and we deem it unnecessary to add anything to what he has said.

Since the case has been pending in this court the demandant has died, and, by an order of this court, J. D. Tibbetts, as her administrator, has been made a party, without prejudice to any right of the defendants arising from the death of the demandant. It is now contended that as dower is but a life-estate, and there has been no decree for an account of the rents and profits, and no appeal from the decree on account of such omission, the proceeding is necessarily at an end. We think it is clear, from the decision rendered in Keith v. Trapier, Bail. Eq. 63, and the authorities therein cited, that where the widow has made her demand of dower, but dies before her right has been established, equity will decree an account for rents and profits in favor of her personal representative. But in this case the Circuit judge affirmed the decree of the Court of Probate, which not only established the widow's claim of dower, but gave leave to apply for the necessary orders to carry the decree into effect. Under that decree we see no reason why the widow, or her administrator after her death, might not apply for an account of the rents and profits, which, in this case, will be represented by the interest on the value of the dower assessed in accordance with law. Gen. Stat. 530, § 7.

The important question so thoroughly discussed by the Circuit judge does not, under the view which we have taken, arise in this case, and therefore has not been considered.

The judgment must be modified in accordance with the views herein expressed, and the case is remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

Decree modified.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

12 S. C. *488

*(Case No. 765.)

A. L. ANNELY et al. v. W. G. DE SAUSSURE, Executor, et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸1022.]
Findings of fact by a referee in an equity cause, concurred in by the Circuit judge, reversed, as being without evidence to sustain them. McIver, A. J., dissenting.†

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015–4018; Dec. Dig. ⟸1022.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸1119.]
Where an executrix, who is also a legatee, sues a mortgagor for the foreclosure of a mortgage given her testatrix, making the other legatees parties defendant, and the mortgage is declared satisfied by the Circuit Court, whose judgment, upon appeal by the executrix alone, is reversed—Held, that the reversal cannot benefit the defendant legatees not appealing, and to the extent of their interests in the estate, the executrix cannot recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4415; Dec. Dig. ⟸1119.]

[3. Attorney and Client ⟸81.]
An attorney has implied authority to obtain and enforce satisfaction of his client's demands, and to bind him as a party litigant in certain matters appertaining to the conduct of his causes, but has no general power to contract independently in relation to such demands nor to transfer them. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Wieters v. Gideon, 76 S. C. 463, 57 S. E. 193.

For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 142; Dec. Dig. ⟸81.]

[4. Mortgages ⟸148.]
A forfeiture to the state for taxes, but with the right of redemption existing, does not extinguish the lien of a mortgage. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 299; Dec. Dig. ⟸148.]

[5. Mortgages ⟸490.]
The state is not a proper party to an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon lands which have been forfeited to the state for nonpayment of taxes. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1431; Dec. Dig. ⟸490.]

[6. Mortgages ⟸426.]
When unpaid taxes constitute a lien upon mortgaged property, a judgment of foreclosure and sale should order such taxes to be paid out of the proceeds of sale. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. ⟸1277; Dec. Dig. ⟸426.]

[7. Vendor and Purchaser ⟸231.]
Mortgagees of land are not bound to give to purchasers from the mortgagor any further notice of their claim than that which the record of the mortgage gives. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Van Diviere v. Mitchell, 45 S. C. 132, 22 S. E. 759.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 393; Vendor and Purchaser, ⟸231.]

[8. Mortgages ⟸148.]
When tenants in common make sale of land, and set apart the interest of one co-tenant in the purchase money to be applied to the credit of a bond secured by a mortgage upon such co-tenant's interest in the land, the mortgagees are not bound by such sale, nor will the court require them to acquiesce, upon proof that it was an advantageous sale, or because of the rights and interests of the other parties. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. 299; Dec. Dig. ⟸148.]

[9. Mortgages ⟸137.]
A mortgagee has no title to the mortgaged land, but he holds the legal title to the lien created by the mortgage. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Heath v. Haile, 45 S. C. 647, 24 S. E. 300.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 273; Dec. Dig. ⟸137.]

[10. Mortgages ⟸274.]
Where the executor of a mortgagor advised a purchaser that a clear, unencumbered title was being conveyed, and the purchaser believing such statement, completed his purchase and erected improvements, held that the improvements were not excepted from the lien of the mortgage. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Folk v. Brooks, 91 S. C. 12, 74 S. E. 46.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. ⟸274.]

[This case is also cited in Gibbes v. Greenville & C. R. Co., 14 S. C. 385, and distinguished therefrom.]

*489

*Before Reed, J., Charleston, May, 1877.

This was an action for a foreclosure of a mortgage, instituted by Amelia L. Annely and Julia A. Blake, as devisee and as executrix of Anna Maria Annely, against Wilmot G. De Saussure, executor of John W. Lewis, F. P. Lewis, J. W. A. Lewis, the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company, and the heirs of John W. Lewis.

The case is fully stated in the report of Hon. B. G. Pressley, which, upon the matters considered by this court, is as follows:

To the Honorable Jacob P. Reed, Judge of the said Court:

By your order of March 16th, 1876, the issues of law and fact in this case were referred to me to report thereon to the court, with leave to report any special matter.

I respectfully report, that in connection with the solicitors of the plaintiffs and defendants, I have taken the testimony filed with this report, and find thereon the following facts, to wit:

On January 5th, 1859, John W. Lewis, Sr., was indebted to Amelia and Anna Maria Annely on two bonds, each in the sum of $5813, with legal interest, payable semi-annually until the whole amount be paid. These bonds were secured by mortgage of his one-fourth share of the commercial wharves in Charleston, and the whole principal and interest to be computed with semi-annual rests, from January 5th, 1865, are now due and unpaid.

In October, 1865, Anna M. Annely died, leaving in full force her will, whereby she bequeathed the bond held by her to Amelia J. Lewis, Francis P. Lewis and John W. Lewis, Jr., of whom the first named, before the death of Miss Annely, had intermarried with Julius A. Blake. She was appointed and qualified as executrix of said will, and in that character is one of the plaintiffs in this case. On July 14th, 1872, Miss Amelia Annely and Mrs. Blake, executrix, placed their said bonds and mortgage in the hands of W. G. De Saussure for friendly foreclosure. He was survivor of H. A. De Saussure & Son, who, before that time, had been the legal advisers of the mortgagor and also of Miss Annely. Her letter, accompanying the delivery of the bonds and mortgage to Mr. De Saus-sure, simply *directs him "to take charge of her interest in regard to the foreclosure of the bond in her possession, all parties consenting." The other bond held by Mrs. Blake, executrix, was delivered to same solicitor under same instructions.

† See note at the end of this volume.

*490

Previous to that time the said wharves had been placed for sale in the hands of L. D. De Saussure, broker. His authority was from the mortgagor and the trustees of John Fraser & Co., who then held an undivided one-half of said property. The price limited by them for the whole was $40,000, but no offer was made for it at that price. When Mr. W. G. De Saussure, as attorney of the mortgagees, applied to the mortgagor for his consent to a decree of foreclosure, he refused to give it, unless the mortgagees would first agree to release him from personal responsibility on his bonds, and look for payment only to the mortgaged property. To that all the mortgagees, except John W. Lewis, Jr., assented, and his refusal stopped the foreclosure at that time. Mrs. Blake, being daughter of the mortgagor, would not press the foreclosure against his consent, and if that were to be done, Mr. De Saussure also informed the mortgagees that they must employ some other attorney for that purpose. They did not employ any other, but stopped the suit, and left the bonds and mortgage in the hands of Mr. De Saussure, giving him no notice or indication that they did not expect him to act as their attorney, and so to represent their interests in that behalf at a future time. I therefore hold that his authority so to represent them still continued.

After this the said wharves remained for sale in the hands of L. D. De Saussure, broker, until June, 1873, at which time the share of John W. Lewis was sold and forfeited to the state for large arrears of state taxes. This suspended, for some time, the attempt to sell the wharves as a whole, and the trustees of John Fraser & Co. advertised their moiety at public sale. That was stopped by order of the United States court, which then had charge of the said trust, and which soon thereafter transferred the authority of the trustees to S. Lord, Jr., referee.

In September, 1873, John W. Lewis, Sr., died insolvent, leaving very little personal property, and mortgages on all his real estate, greatly exceeding its market value. All the said *mortgages except that involved in this case, contained power to the mortgagees to sell the mortgaged property. The will of Mr. Lewis gave a like power to his executors, of whom only W. G. De Saussure qualified. In his answer he states that the other executors refused to qualify because of the manifest insolvency of the estate, and that he qualified only for the purpose of enabling him to redeem from the state the forfeiture of the Lewis interest in said wharves and sell it under the power conferred in the will, for the benefit of the mortgagees. After so qualifying, he continued the authority of the said broker to sell the said property, and Samuel Lord, Jr., referee, also employed him for that purpose, at the same time directing him to obtain authority from the other owners, and to sell the wharves as a whole. They were then very much out of repair and produced no income, or not more than paid their current expenses. That appears by the testimony of Mr. Taft, who says that the Lelands did not receive any income on their share, and paid the taxes thereon from other sources. In this condition of the property an undivided interest in it could not have been sold for its proportionate value in the whole. For that reason, S. Lord, Jr., referee, instructed the broker to obtain authority from the other owners and sell the whole property, and in that form it was offered for sale. In so offering it the broker had no express authority from the mortgagees, except such as could be conferred by W. G. De Saussure, executor of John W. Lewis, who was also their attorney. He believed that in his character as executor he was bound to pay the state taxes as first lien on the said property, and could lawfully sell the same for that purpose, even without the consent of the mortgagees. But he also regarded himself as representing them in the said matter, using his best judgment for their interest, with their knowledge and acquiescence. The price then fixed by him and the other owners for the whole property was $40,000.

*491

Afterwards, the gale of 1874 carried away the wharf pierheads and otherwise so injured the said property and the docks as to make it impossible to use them, except for small vessels. Two or more parties then, or about that time, were in treaty to purchase the said property—none of them made a definite offer for it, except R. Q. Pinckney, president of the Palmetto Cotton *Press Company, who offered for the whole $35,000, which, after some delay and consultation, was accepted on January 4th, 1875. On the same day the written contract was executed by the said purchaser, and by L. D. De Saussure, as broker for the vendors, who immediately thereafter ratified it by their signatures, W. G. De Saussure signing it as executor for the Lewis interest. By this contract the vendors agree to sell their respective shares of the said wharves, but the vendee only contracts for the whole; and so to pay the purchase money, which, by the contract, "is to be divided among the vendors according to their respective interests, when definitely ascertained." The payment was to be "one-fourth cash on delivery of the property, to be held by L. D. De Saussure, as a stakeholder, and the balance when satisfactory and legal titles are executed, by bonds bearing seven per cent. interest, payable in three annual installments, secured by mortgage of the property." The testimony before me proves, to my satisfaction, that the price provided in the contract was a very full price for the said property, and the mortgagees have not produced any counter testimony on that point.

*492

On January 7th, 1875, L. D. De Saussure, as a stakeholder, received the cash portion of the purchase money, and the purchaser immediately went into possession of the wharves. He had employed W. G. De Saussure as his attorney to examine the title. He advised that it was good, and that during the delay required for obtaining conveyances from the vendors, the purchaser might safely take possession and proceed with his proposed improvements. In reliance on that opinion, the said purchaser paid the cash portion of the purchase money, took possession and made the improvements hereinafter stated.

There is some confusion in the testimony as to the time when the mortgagees of Lewis were first informed that the sale had been effected. W. G. De Saussure testifies that it was before he signed the contract; John W. Lewis, Jr., testified that it was in the month of March, thereafter; and Mr. Blake's memory fixes it after the sale, some time in January, and a few days prior to a notice of said sale in the News and Courier. That notice was on the 11th of January, 1875, and on the 26th of the same month is the date of Miss

*493

Annely's receipt to Mr. De Saussure *for the said bond and mortgage, of which she then resumed possession. I therefore find, on the testimony of Mr. Blake and on the date of said notice, that the mortgagees were first informed of the sale between January 4th and 11th, 1875, and that they were then "disappointed in the sale."

It is not proved that before that time they expressly authorized their said attorney to sell their interest in the said wharves or to appoint a broker for that purpose. But they had directed a foreclosure of their mortgage in the lifetime of the mortgagor, and only his refusal to consent to it prevented the foreclosure at that time. That obstacle was removed by his death in September, 1873; and from that time until this sale more than fifteen months had passed. During all this delay the mortgagees received no interest on their bonds nor income from the mortgaged property. It was well known to be a very insufficient security for the mortgage, and was continually becoming more so by dilapidation of the buildings, increase of mud and debris in the docks, and by yearly addition of taxes and of interest on the debt. The loss to the mortgagees by this decay of the mortgaged property was not expected by them to be made good from the estate of the mortgagor. He left no other estate, except such as was fully covered by mortgage. Knowing all this, the mortgagees did not, themselves, commence or direct any suit to foreclose their mortgage. Without such suit they could sell the property only through the executor of Lewis, under the power conferred on him by the will. If they had directed their attorney to foreclose by suit at law, it would have been his manifest duty to advise them that a sale in that manner of an undivided share in property so dilapidated would be ruinous to their interests, and that a sale by him, as executor, in concert with the other tenants in common, was the easiest, best, least expensive, and far more advantageous method of foreclosing their mortgage. That method he adopted, and all the circumstances satisfy me that the mortgagees knew of his plan and acquiesced in it. They knew, also, that said property was for sale by the said broker; that is proved by Mr. Blake, who says that some months before this sale he was consulted by the broker about selling it to Mr. Pelzer. They also knew that it was not the equity of redemption, *but the interest of the mortgagees, which was being sold. How else could they have expected to receive the proceeds, and why "disappointed in the price when they heard of the sale?" I am, therefore, forced to find that the mortgagees relied on the judgment of their said attorney to foreclose the mortgage as he might deem best for their interest; that they knew of the plan adopted by him for that purpose, and of his appointment of the said broker to execute it; and that they acquiesced before the sale in the said plan and appointment.

*494

After the sale none of the mortgagees, when informed thereof, gave any notice of their dissatisfaction or dissent, and two of them, F. P. Lewis and John W. Lewis, Jr., who each have an interest of one-sixth of the money secured by said mortgage, signified their concurrence in the sale, and desired to have the matter closed speedily. Whilst the completion of the title was delayed, by reason that the forfeiture to the state must be redeemed before a valid title could be made, the purchasers, relying on the opinion of their said attorney, and having no notice to the contrary, commenced the necessary improvements and repairs, the extent and nature of which had been published in the notice of the News and Courier of January 11th, 1875. That was read by Mr. Blake and John W. Lewis, Jr.; whether also by Mrs. Blake and Miss Annely, is not proved; but Mr. Blake testifies that Miss Annely then lived with him, and that and other circumstances proved by him and by John W. Lewis, Jr., satisfy me that both Miss Annely and Mrs. Blake knew of the proposed improvements and of their progress. During the progress of the work of said improvements, Mr. Blake, being then the personal friend of Mr. Pinckney, considered it his duty to inform him of anticipated difficulty concerning the title to the said property. To this end he asked Mr. Pinckney if he knew of the condition of the bonds and mortgages held by Miss Annely and Mrs. Blake; told him that Miss Annely was peculiar; had great objection to signing legal papers; knew that she would not sign unless they were to get something from the sale; knew, also, that Mrs. Blake would not sign in that case. This notice was not given to Mr. Pinckney as coming from any of the mortgagees or by their authority; on the contrary, Mr. Blake requested *Mr. Pinckney not to mention it. He did not wish the mortgagees to hear or know that he had meddled in the matter; but though he gave this information without their authority, yet it was sufficient to require the purchasers to stop their improvements and await the perfection of their title, if it had been in time. Whatever be its date, whether in the spring, as Mr. Blake thinks, or in June, according to Mr. Pinckney, at either date, it was after that conveyances had been accepted by said purchaser from the other tenants in common, and after the improvements had been contracted for; the foundations of the range of offices had been commenced, part of them laid, and the digging going on for the other part; old buildings had been pulled down and the bricks were being cleaned for the new; and the appropriation of $13,000 to pay the contractor, had been raised to $26,000. If, in that condition of the work, the purchasers had stopped its progress, some further compensation must have been made to the contractor, and the property costing $35,000, and that cost much increased by improvements already made, would have remained in the hands of said purchasers as owners of an undivided interest, not able to derive any income from it so long as the improvements should remain in that condition. The notice of Mr. Blake was, therefore, too late as a precaution of any value to the said purchasers.

*495

The plaintiffs claim that in addition to the record of their mortgage, the purchasers had also special notice thereof, by "a communication" to them. This claim is not proved by any testimony offered before me, but is based on the ground that it is alleged in the complaint and not denied in either answer. I find that Article IX. of the complaint does allege such "communication," but by whom, or when made, or whether it was before or after the "communication" by Mr. Blake to Mr. Pinckney, or whether that was the communication intended, does not appear by the allegation. As Mr. Pinckney testifies that the first notice he had of the mortgage was from Mr. Blake, and as Mr. Blake gave that notice, in the belief that his friend Mr. Pinckney ought to be put on his guard concerning the said mortgage, I find that the "communication" alleged in the complaint, was either that which Mr. Blake made to

*496

Mr. Pinckney, or was subsequent *to it. But the attorney employed by the defendants, the purchasers, to examine the title for them, I regard as having, at the time of the contract of sale, express notice of the mortgage, it being then in his hands as attorney for the mortgagees.

Before this conversation Mr. Blake had not conferred with the attorney of the mortgagees concerning the said sale, but John W. Lewis, Jr., had done so several times. His impression now is that said conferences were only casual, or "just so," as he expresses it. I differ from him in that respect, because in other parts of his testimony he says that, after hearing of the sale, "he was very glad to have the whole thing closed, being 'advised' that it was the best that could be done." That he "was at first surprised at the price, but after consulting with General De Saussure, thought it the best that could be done." It is clear, therefore, that he then regarded Mr. De Saussure as his adviser in the said matter, and that his conferences were with him in that capacity. Mr. Lewis also states that, in said conferences, he spoke only for himself, not for Miss Annely or Mrs. Blake. I do not find that he was ever authorized to speak for the latter, but there is no doubt whatever that he was the channel of communication between the former and her solicitor. He wrote and delivered the first letter which Miss Annely sent, "at his request," asking General De Saussure to take charge of her interest in the matter of foreclosing the said mortgage; and he and Mr. Blake both testify that, in their final interview with General De Saussure, they respectively represented Mrs. Blake and Miss Annely. That final interview was in July, 1875. Mr. Blake and Mr. Lewis had previously talked several times about going to see General De Saussure, but had been delayed. Miss Annely and Mrs. Blake had been asked to have the mortgage satisfied, but had heard "a rumor that the taxes would eat up the whole of the Lewis share," and "they would not satisfy the mortgage without knowing what they were to receive." Accordingly Mr. De Saussure was asked, at this interview, to explain his plans and give a statement of the taxes and expenses.

His plan was that the mortgagees should satisfy their mortgage, so that he, as executor of Lewis, might make good title to the purchaser and receive the purchase money.

*497

That the cash *portion and some of the bonds for the credit portion be used to pay the state and city taxes and other charges and expenses, and the balance go to the mortgagees, who were also to petition the legislature to have the penalties, charged for the non-payment of the taxes, in time refunded to them.

This plan was objected to by Mr. Blake, partly because he thought that said penalties, if once paid, would never be refunded, and partly because there was too little (only $3000), left to the mortgagees after deducting taxes, penalties, costs and charges. They, however, took from Mr. De Saussure a full statement of the whole matter and submitted it to Mrs. Blake and Miss Annely, and they, after some consultation, resolved to consult an attorney before making a final decision of the matter.

Accordingly, on July 19th, 1875, Mr. Blake wrote to Mr. De Saussure, informing him that Messrs. Campbell and Whaley had been employed by the mortgagees as their attorneys in said matter. Said attorneys failed to adjust it amicably, and soon after filed the complaint in this case.

Before the date of the said letter the purchasers had been incorporated by the name of the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company, and without notice of the refusal by the said mortgagees, had accepted conveyances from all the other vendors of their respective shares, except for the one-twentieth share of the estate of Mrs. Fitzsimmons. They had also nearly completed repairs and improvements on said wharves, costing $56,500.

These repairs and improvements, or nearly all of them, were necessary to restoring the property to its condition before the war, and without them, or nearly all of them, the said property would not have produced an income. They were made judiciously, and at the lowest cash price. The present market value of the property, so improved, is not more than $80,000. The very full contract price, $35,000, at which it was sold before the improvements, being deducted from the improved market value of the wharves, leaves $45,000, which I find as the actual value added to said property by the improvements, and if said property, as improved, could be sold for more than $80,000, the surplus, over $35,000 to the amount of $56,500, could be attributable only to the value so added.

*498

*I have therefore reported to your Honor that the sum of $1907.53 is due to the state for taxes on the mortgaged property, and by order of the court I was authorized to pay the same and redeem the forfeiture of the property. Of the amount so reported, $213.15 is due and payable by the defendants, if their contract of purchase be confirmed.

The city of Charleston claims the sum of $3813.30 for taxes due to it on the same property for eight years, beginning with 1867 and ending with 1874, inclusive. Whether that claim be a valid lien on said property, will depend on the matters of law, as set forth in the legal issues of this report.

Issues of Law.—On the issues of law involved in this case, I respectfully report:

First. That the executor of John W. Lewis, Sr., could not, under the power conferred on him by the will of Lewis, sell the said property discharged of the mortgage, unless the mortgagees assented to that manner of foreclosure. It had been forfeited to the state, and that discharged the lien of the mortgage, but such discharge was, at any time, capable of being set aside by the redemption of the property, either by the mortgagor or his personal representative, or, if he failed to redeem, then by the mortgagees. No other person, as the law then stood, could so purchase the property as to acquire the right to redeem it, other than in the name of the mortgagor. But if redeemed in his name, the effect of that would be to restore not only the former title, but also the former liens, according to their respective priorities. The tax was a first lien, but an executor is under no obligation to pay taxes on real estate, unless there are personal assets in his hands to be appropriated for that purpose; but his obligation to pay taxes as a first lien out of the personal assets, does not carry with it the power to marshal the liens on the real estate which is under mortgage. The mortgagor could not sell real estate, encumbered by a first and a second mortgage, in order to pay the first, nor could he sell real estate discharged of the first mortgage, in order to pay taxes or any other prior lien. Having, therefore, no such power himself, he could not, by his will, confer it upon his executor.

*499

*Secondly. I find that the said executor, in his character as attorney of the mortgagees, could not, without their consent, express or implied, foreclose their mortgage by a private sale of the mortgaged property; nor could he, without such consent, authorize a broker to make a contract of sale which would bind them. But I have heretofore found, as an issue of fact, that the said mortgagees, in the matter of the proper method of foreclosing their mortgage, relied upon the judgment of W. G. De Saussure, as their attorney; that they knew of his plan for that purpose, and acquiesced in it before the sale; that after the sale two of them ratified it and that the other two did not, in reasonable time, repudiate it. It follows, therefore, that under these circumstances they should be held bound by the said contract of sale, and should be decreed to complete it. Their previous acquiescence in the plan adopted by their attorney was an equivalent to an agreement by them to satisfy their mortgage if a sale should be made by their attorney, and the co-operation of the other tenants in common in effecting a sale of the whole property, in a manner most advantageous to the mortgagees and all interested, was a sufficient valuable consideration to support the joint agreement to sell in that manner.

Thirdly. As to two of the mortgagees, F. P. Lewis and John W. Lewis, Jr., I find that the former has filed no answer in this case, and that nothing appears before me herein showing that he has any desire to be relieved from his express ratification of the said sale after it was made. The latter seems to claim that he ought not to be held to his ratification, because, he says, that his assent was upon the advice and supposition that the completion of the said sale was the best that could be done. But he has not attempted to prove any mistake in that advice, nor has he produced before me any testimony to the effect that a better sale of the said property could have been made in January, 1875, or could now be made, the property being in the same condition as at that time. I therefore perceive no equity for releasing him from his said ratification, and find that both he and F. P. Lewis are expressly bound, to the extent of their interest in the said mortgage, by the said contract of sale.

As to Miss Annely and Mrs. Blake, I find that apart from *their acquiescence in the plan of their attorney before the sale, their long silence afterwards, during which the purchasers, without notice from them, accepted conveyances of undivided interest in the said property from other tenants in common, and made costly improvements on the property, created new equities in favor of the said purchasers, which not only strengthen the implied agreement of the said mortgagees prior to the sale, but also constitute of themselves an equitable foundation for a decree of specific performance. Before the other tenants in common conveyed their undivided interests to the purchasers they had an acknowledged right to compel a sale of the whole for partition. Pell v. Ball, 1 Rich. Eq. 361. But they did not exercise that right, because of their belief, at that time, that all parties in interest had agreed to a private sale, and to that end had united in a contract of sale, which purported to give the purchaser a good title to the whole property. That contract so made was manifestly advantageous to all the vendors, including the mortgagees, and if the latter had in time given notice of their refusal to complete the sale, and the other tenants in common had made them parties to a suit against the purchaser for a specific performance, upon the proof offered before me in this case, they would then have been compelled to perfect the title of the purchasers. In such case the court would have regarded the true interests of all the parties before it, and would not have permitted one co-tenant, or the mortgagees of a co-tenant, to defeat a sale so manifestly proved to be advantageous to all who had any interest in the property, unless some proof had been offered that it was possible to make a better sale. In such a case as between the tenants in common and against the consent of one or more of them, it would even have the right to assign the property to one of the co-tenants at an appraised value, and if such would be the power of the court as against a tenant in common, who holds the legal title, its power is certainly no less, but rather greater, against his mortgagee who holds only an equitable title. In foreclosing that, the court may make such decree as shall best protect the rights and equities of all parties to the suit; to that end it may sell the mortgaged property at public or private sale, and on such terms and in such manner as may seem best to the court. In *Stoney v. Schultz, 1 Hill Eq. 465 [27 Am. Dec. 429] the mortgaged property was ordered to be sold on credit, though the whole of the mortgage debt was then due, and in order to protect the rights of purchasers of portions of the mortgaged property, it was decreed to be sold in lots and in such order as the equities and priorities of the said purchasers required. I cannot doubt that a similar power over the mortgage would have been exercised by the court in this case, and upon the abundant and uncontradicted proof that this contract of sale secured a very full price, the court would not have subjected the other tenants in common to the loss of the advantages of this contract; on the contrary, it would have compelled the mortgagees to perfect the title and the purchasers to complete their purchase. What the court would have done in favor of the equities of the other tenants in common, in case they had been compelled to apply to it for a decree of sale in partition, it will now do in favor of an innocent purchaser, who had contracted for the whole property, and who, believing that he was finally to get a good title for the whole, accepted the conveyances of the other tenants in common, and, without any notice that his title was not to be perfected, made improvements on the common property, which considerably exceed, in cost and value, the price at which it could have been sold before it was improved.

*500

*501

Fourthly. If my findings be correct on either of the above issues of law, it will be unnecessary to consider whether the purchaser will be entitled to a charge on the property for the value which his improvements have added to it. On the issues of fact I have found that the said property was in ruinous condition when the purchasers took possession thereof, and that all, or nearly all, the improvements they have made were necessary to restore it to its former condition. It is, therefore, claimed that it is a case of repairs, and that one tenant in common, in possession, may repair and charge the cost thereof to the common property. That might be so if, on proceedings in partition, the property could be divided without sale, and the improved portion could be set off to the tenant who made the improvements. But when this cannot be done, then the right of one tenant in common to have the cost of repairs refunded to him is limited to *the necessary repairs of a house or mill, and even in that case he must show that he requested his co-tenant to join in making such repairs, and that he refused to do it. 4 Kent 370. But I do not regard the work done on the property involved in this case as repairs. That relates only to buildings or structures still standing, though dilapidated, and yet capable of being made useful by repair without being pulled down and rebuilt. To erect a new building in such case, even with the old material, is not to repair, but to rebuild, and that is improvement, not repairs. If one or more tenants in common unite to purchase a house, a mill, or a factory, an agreement between them to keep it in repair would probably be presumed in law, but no such agreement would be presumed in case of the total destruction of such house, mill, or factory. I therefore find that the new wharf, new offices and new sheds, which were built upon the old sites of former buildings by the purchasers in this case, were improvements, and that the value thereof would not be a charge on the property if made by owners of undivided interests, unless they then supposed that they were to obtain good title to the other interests. On this point the decisions of the courts of this state are very clear. The cases of Hancock v. Day, McM. Eq. 69 [36 Am. Dec. 293]; Thompson v. Bostick, Id. 75; Dellett v. Whitner, Chev. Eq. 213; Thurston v. Dickinson, 2 Rich. Eq. 317 [46 Am. Dec. 56], and Corbett v. Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq. 301, all agree and settle that one tenant in common may not, without the consent of the other tenant, improve the common property, as a charge thereon, for the cost of said improvements.

*502

But the purchaser claims to be refunded the value of his improvements under the betterment act of this state. Rev. Stat. 559. The constitutionality of this act is questioned by the plaintiffs' attorneys, who cite on that point Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 100 [5 L. Ed. 547]. They also claim that this is a case of purchase from the mortgagor of property encumbered by mortgage which was duly recorded, in which case the purchaser as against the mortgagee, in proceedings to foreclose the mortgage, will not be allowed the value of his improvements out of the mortgaged property. Hughes v. Edwards, 5 Cond. Rep. 657. This doctrine would certainly be applicable to this case, if it were a pur*chase from the mortgagor, without the supposed concurrence of the mortgagee; but in my finding on the facts I have concluded that though the mortgage was on record, and though the purchasers' attorney had express notice of it, yet they supposed at the time of the purchase that all parties having any interest united in the said sale, and that the improvements were made by the purchasers in that belief and without notice to the contrary. Their case, is therefore, clearly that of purchasers for valuable consideration, improving the property with the knowledge of the mortgagees, and without any notice from them of their intention not to perfect the title. After silence on their part, until the improvements were almost completed, they come into a court of equity to foreclose their mortgage, and claim not only the mortgaged property according to its value at the time these innocent purchasers took possession, but also, in addition thereto, the improvements they placed upon it. To such case the betterment act would apply, if the suit were on the law side of the court; its intent is to afford the defendants in suits at law the same relief which, before the act, a court of equity had power to give, according to the doctrine that "he who comes into that court seeking equity must do equity." This doctrine I regard as plainly set forth and elucidated in the following cases, to wit: Green v. Biddle, supra; Southall v. McKean, 1 Wash. 336; Coulter's case, 5 Co. 30; Putnam v. Ritchie, 6 Paige 391; Bright v. Boyd, 1 Story 478; 2 Id. 615; Lowndes and Ton v. Chisolm, 2 McC. Eq. 455 [16 Am. Dec. 667].

*503

On the authority of the above cases I hold that if it were possible in this case to conclude, as matter of fact, that the mortgagees of Lewis never assented to or acquiesced in the sale made in this case by W. G. De Saussure, their attorney, and that without their consent it was sold by him, as executor, solely under the power conferred on him by the will of Lewis, yet even in that case, as he believed when he made the sale that the said authority conferred on him was sufficient to enable him to convey to the purchasers a valid, unencumbered title, and so advised the purchasers, and as they looked to him as their legal adviser in that behalf, if he was mistaken in law, and by that mistake caused the purchasers to make improvements on the property, *believing that their title to it was good, they will be compensated for their improvements out of the lands to the extent added thereby to its value.

*504

This doctrine of relief against a mistake in law was subsequently fully discussed and maintained in Lawrence v. Beaubein, 2 Bail. 647 [23 Am. Dec. 155], and Gist v. Gist, Bail. Eq. 343, which settled conclusively, as the law of the state, that a mistake of law is ground for relief as clearly and as fully as a mistake of fact. See, too, Dellet v. Whitner, Chev. Eq. 213.

From the above-cited cases it is manifest that Judge Story was mistaken in supposing that he was the first to extend the equitable doctrine of compensation for improvements to the case of a claimant by land by legal title—our judges had preceded him in that matter by many years, and are quite as decided and as clear upon the point as he was.

In this case plaintiffs claim the land, not by legal title, but by the lien of a mortgage, which, under our law, is only an equitable title. As against such title, under all the decisions, even as restricted by the case of Green v. Biddle, and the subsequent case decided by Chancellor Walworth, the defendants are entitled, out of the mortgaged property, to the amount of the value added by their improvements; and, under the cases in this state, I would hold the same, under the circumstances of this case, even if the plaintiffs held the legal title. If this view be correct, there will be no necessity to order a re-sale of the property, because, according to the facts found by me, whatever it could be sold for above the contract price in this case would be due to the value of the improvements, and could not amount to their actual cost. The defendants should, therefore, not be subjected to the inconvenience and expense of a re-sale, which could not possibly benefit the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs excepted to the findings of fact by the referee upon the questions of authority of W. G. De Saussure to act for them, and acquiescence and ratification by them, and also as to betterments, rents and profits, and actual notice by the purchasers of the wharf. Upon the referee's conclusions of law, the plaintiff's exceptions were as follows:

*505

*1. Because the referee erred in finding that the plaintiff, Julia A. Blake, the executrix of Maria A. Annely, could not recover the whole debt of her testatrix, because of the acts of the legatees, John W. Lewis, Jr., and F. P. Lewis.

2. Because the referee erred in finding, that even in the absence of authority from, or acquiescence in, or ratification by the plaintiffs, they should be required to complete a contract of sale to which they were no party.

3. Because the referee erred in finding that the mortgagor, who was a tenant in common, could, together with the other tenants in common, make a partition among themselves which could affect the rights of the mortgagee without his consent.

4. Because the referee erred in finding that the Commercial Wharf Company was a bona fide purchaser.

5. Because the referee erred in finding that a contract at private sale between tenants in common, should be enforced against the mortgagee, simply because he concludes it to be their interest, from the testimony of witnesses called by the purchaser from the mortgagor.

6. Because the referee erred in finding that the plaintiffs were bound by the acts of Col. Blake, John W. Lewis, Jr., and F. P. Lewis.

7. Because the referee erred in applying the doctrine of mistake of law, and in finding that the wharf company was entitled to relief, when the plaintiffs sought to enforce no contract against them, and only required them to account for rents and profits from the time of filing this complaint for foreclosure.

8. Because the referee erred in extending the doctrine of allowance of improvements to a case in which the occupants of the land had knowledge of the true state of the title, as well as of the encumbrance thereon.

9. Because the referee erred in applying the law, that allows the mortgagee in possession for his improvements, as against the mortgagor, to the case of a mortgagee out of possession against an occupant under the mortgagor.

The decree of the Circuit judge confirmed the report of the referee, and concluded as follows:

It is further ordered that the said Commercial Wharf and *Cotton Press Company do pay to the referee the sum of $8750, with interest thereon from January 4th, 1875, less the amount paid through said referee for taxes due to the state on said property, in accordance with his report; and that upon receiving said sum the referee do enter satisfaction as of record upon the mortgage held by the plaintiffs.

*506

It is further ordered that the referee, after paying the costs of the plaintiffs, do pay over the remainder of the sum so received by him to the plaintiffs in this case, and that they have leave to enter up their decree for the amount remaining unpaid on their bonds against the estate of Lewis; to be paid in due course of administration of said estate.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed upon the several grounds taken as exceptions to the referee's report.

The defendant, W. G. De Saussure, appealed upon the ground that his Honor should have ordered that out of the proceeds of sale, after the payment of costs, there should be paid to the defendant a commission of five per cent. for effecting the sale, either as executor of John W. Lewis, under the power of sale contained in his will, or as agent or attorney of the plaintiffs, as reported by the referee.

[For subsequent opinions, see 17 S. C. 389; 26 S. C. 497, 2 S. E. 490, 4 Am. St. Rep. 725; Ex parte Blake, 18 S. C. 603.]

Messrs. B. J. Whaley and J. B. Campbell, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. De Saussure & Son, for the executor of J. W. Lewis.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for wharf company.

October 30th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The action is for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The complaint alleges that J. W. Lewis gave a mortgage to the plaintiff, Amelia L. and to Anna Maria Annely, to secure two several bonds, one to the said Amelia and one to Anna M., covering the undivided one-fourth part of certain wharf property in the city of Charleston, known as the commercial wharves. That Anna M. has died, leaving a will, of which the plaintiff, Julia A. Blake, is executrix; that J. W. Lewis, the *mortgagor, has died also, and that the defendant, W. G. De Saussure, is his executor. The proper parties appear to be before the court.

*507

The executor of the mortgagor, J. W. Lewis, and the Commercial Wharf Company, answered, setting up a contract of purchase, under which the Commercial Wharf Company claim to have become the owners of the wharf property, made by the executor of J. W. Lewis, under a testamentary power of sale, and by the other parties owning the remaining three-fourths of the property, and claim to have made valuable improvements on the property, greatly enhancing its value, rendered necessary by injuries arising from various causes to the structures on the wharf property. It does not appear by the answer that the mortgage has ever been satisfied, or the mortgaged land released by the mortgagees, but certain matters are set forth which are claimed to have extinguished the right of the mortgagees under this mortgage, and to have subjected them to certain equities set forth by the defendants, as arising out of their contract of purchase. The nature of these claims will be stated in connection with the discussion of the question raised upon them.

The case was heard before a referee, and a decision rendered sustaining the claims of the defendants.

The report was confirmed by the Circuit Court, and the plaintiffs now appeal, alleging exceptions to various points of decision made by the report of the referee.

The referee holds that the plaintiffs are bound by the contract made by the executor of the mortgagor, on the ground of acquiescence. He says: "I am, therefore, forced to find that the mortgagees relied on the judgment of their said attorney to foreclose the mortgage, as he might deem best for their interests; that they knew of the plan adopted by him for that purpose, and of his appointment of the said broker to execute it; and that they acquiesced before the sale in the said plan and appointment."

The foregoing implies that W. G. De Saussure, executor of the mortgagor, was also the attorney of the mortgagees, and that whatever he thought advisable to do in this double character, bound them, as the act of their attorney, to such extent, at least, that, unless they expressly objected to his action, they were *bound, by the principle of acquiescence, to the extent of destroying the lien of their mortgage. Although his conclusion is stated by the referee as a conclusion of fact, it is evidently a mixed conclusion of law and fact.

*508

It is doubtful, on the face of the answer of Mr. De Saussure and the testimony, whether either the plaintiffs or Mr. De Saussure himself considered that the relation of attorney and client existed between them at any time subsequent to the death of J. W. Lewis, the mortgagor. Mr. De Saussure says, in his answer, that in the summer of 1872 the plaintiffs "placed the said bonds and mortgages in the hands of this defendant, professionally, to foreclose said mortgages, and the papers, by way of summons and complaint, were prepared for the purpose, but in consequence of an objection made by the said John W. Lewis, the said plaintiffs instructed this defendant not to proceed further in the matter. The said bonds and mortgages remained in the hands of this defendant until January 26th, 1875, when they were delivered up to the plaintiff, Amelia L." This is the only statement of the relations of the parties in question that we can find in the answer of Mr. De Saussure, and it falls far short of claiming that the relation of attorney and client existed between himself and the plaintiffs after the decease of Mr. Lewis. We find no evidence in the testimony of the existence of such relation after Mr. De Saussure became the executor of Mr. Lewis. The continuance of that relation cannot be presumed, for the obvious reason that when Mr. De Saussure became the executor of the mortgagor he assumed responsibilities inconsistent with his acting as the professional adviser and representative of the plaintiffs.

Finally, it is clear that Mr. De Saussure did not regard himself as acting in the interest of the plaintiffs, for it appears by his own testimony, as well as that of another witness, that when in consultation as to the possible effect upon the treaty with the Commercial Wharf Company of the refusal of the plaintiffs to assent to such contract, he assumed the ground that if their consent was withheld the title might be made through the forfeiture of the land for non-payment of taxes. If Mr. De Saussure had supposed that he was under an obligation to pursue the interests of the plaintiffs, he could not and would not, as we are *bound to say, have devised any mode of carrying out the plans of the other parties in disregard of their interests. In this respect it is apparent that the referee has done Mr. De Saussure unintentional injustice.

*509

But if Mr. De Saussure had been the attorney and counselor of the plaintiffs it would not follow that without special authority he could make a contract that would so far bind his clients that they could only discharge such obligation by express notice repudiating his authority.

The relation of attorney and client implies authority to enforce the demands of his client, of obtaining either voluntary or coercive satisfaction of such demands, and to bind the client as a party litigant in certain matters appertaining to the conduct of causes; but it does not confer a general power of attorney to contract independently in relation to such demands, nor to transfer such demands to a third party. The proper duty of a counselor is to advise his clients; if he becomes a negotiator, a business manager, it is through some other form of authorization than that implied in being selected as a legal adviser merely.

The evidence shows no authority in Mr. De Saussure to bind the plaintiffs by any contract whatever.

The first proposition of law by the referee, adverting to the fact that the property had become forfeited in the state for non-payment of taxes, says: "It had been forfeited to the state, and that discharged the lien of the mortgage, but such discharge was at any time capable of being set aside by the redemption of the property, either by the mortgagor or his personal representative, or, if he failed to redeem them, by the mortgagees." If this be taken as a correct statement of the rights of the parties as against the state, then the forfeiture to the state was not absolute, but leaving outstanding a right of redemption: whether legal or equitable, the state would be regarded as holding title as security for a debt, and its rights would be in the nature of a mortgage prior to that of the plaintiffs. How the existence of such a prior mortgage could extinguish the lien of a subsequent mortgage, when there was a clear right of redemption for the latter to act upon, is inconceivable.

It may be as well in the present connection to notice the *general question as to how far the consequences of the forfeiture of the land to the state by the failure to pay taxes can be brought into the case, thus anticipating the fifth proposition of law.

*510

Only the right existing between the plaintiffs and defendants can properly be considered in the present case. Can a mortgagor, in a suit for foreclosure, set up title in a third person, not a party to the suit, and in which he has no interest? Clearly he cannot. If so, then in case the mortgagee was let into possession, on condition broken, and the mortgagor put to his bill to redeem, the mortgagee could plead as against such right of redemption title outstanding in a third person, with which he was disconnected.

The action is based upon the rights existing between mortgagor and mortgagee. The mortgage being established, as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, and a breach shown, the only right of the mortgagor that can be considered is that of the right of redemption.

If the mortgage binds nothing by reason of title outstanding in a third person, then the equity of redemption is valueless, and the mortgagor has no interest to defend.

Nor could the title of such third person be examined unless he is made a party. The state is not a party in the present case, neither is any person a party claiming to have derived title or to hold under the state.

When a mortgagor remains in possession of the mortgaged premises, as was the case here, he is entitled to the rents and profits of the mortgaged lands without liability to account. He should accordingly pay annual taxes, as he has the fund out of which they should be paid, namely, current income. If there happen to be no income, that does not change the legal relations of the parties. The mortgagor is not bound to hold possession, and may throw the entire burden of protecting the mortgaged lands upon the mortgagee by surrendering possession. If he does not choose to do so he can gain no advantage by suffering taxes to accumulate or allowing the land to become forfeited or sold for taxes. Certainly, in a court of equity, he would stand in a bad light, alleging that through his failure to keep down taxes the mortgagee had lost the lien of his mortgage, and thus *claim to be left, or that his assignees may be left, in undisturbed enjoyment of the mortgaged premises as against the mortgage.

*511

Whether the land mortgaged has been forfeited for non-payment of taxes, or whether there is or is not a right to redeem them by law in the parties to the suit, or whether the lands are in the position of being chargeable with state or city taxes, are circumstances altogether immaterial to the present question. If the taxes claimed to be due to the state and city are to be regarded as still operative as a lien on the lands in the hands of the proper legal owners, then, as was held in Smith v. Gatewood, 3 S. C. 333, they are to be regarded as liens prior to that of the mortgage, and title made under a decree for the plaintiffs must be subject to such liens, unless provision is made for the payment of such taxes out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged lands. To accomplish this it is not necessary or proper that either the state or the city should be made parties to such action. The state and city have a right to choose their own methods, as allowed by law, of enforcing their taxes, and should not be subjected to the expense of becoming parties to all suits incidentally involving questions of taxation, as was said in Smith v. Gatewood. Under proper administrative orders the officer authorized to sell for foreclosure may apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of taxes. If there is a question as to the legality of the taxes imposed, the course to be pursued can be fixed in suitable administrative orders.

It, therefore, follows that all that is decided by the referee in regard to an outstanding title in the state for taxes, and as to the proper mode and effect of redemption, and as to the effect of unpaid state and city taxes, the right of the parties, is foreign to the issues in the present case.

The conclusion of the referee, that forfeiture to the state discharged the mortgage, was erroneous.

The conclusions as to the powers of the executor of the mortgagor to pay taxes, are quite immaterial to the present case. They may tend to show that the mortgagor had not, by any intentional default, suffered the lands to become forfeited by non-payment of taxes, but as no such charge is made by the plaintiffs the inquiry is immaterial. The fact that the executor *of the mortgagor has had no means of keeping down the taxes, cannot benefit the assignee of the mortgagor or prejudicially affect the rights of the plaintiffs, as mortgagees, in any way.

*512

The second conclusion of law is based upon the finding of fact in reference to acquiescence on the part of the plaintiffs in the action of Mr. De Saussure, and is already disposed of by the conclusion of fact above stated, that no authority in Mr. De Saussure is shown sufficient for a foundation for the application of the principle of acquiescence.

The third proposition advanced by the referee holds that F. P. Lewis and J. W. Lewis, Jr., co-devisees with the plaintiff, Julia A., under the will of Anna M. Annely, deceased, and made defendants to the complaint, are bound to the other defendants, on the ground of acquiescence.

F. P. Lewis and J. W. Lewis, Jr., are not before us as appellants from the decree, and, therefore, it must stand as against them. It cannot, however, bind the plaintiff, Julia A. Blake, in either of the characters in which she sues, viz., as devisee of A. M. Annely or as executrix of the latter. As devisee, it leaves her share of the estate of her testator unaffected. As executrix, it excludes her from claiming in the right of F. P. Lewis and J. W. Lewis, Jr., co-devisees, as equity will look through her title, as executrix, to the substantial rights it covers, and finding that F. P. Lewis and J. W. Lewis, Jr., have bound their interests in the manner determined by the decree of the Circuit Court, it will not permit the executrix to set up in their right, what they themselves could not demand as against their co-defendants. But, for all that appears before us there may be other interests, as that of creditors of the testator, entitled to such protection, who would not be affected by any act of such devisees, and who are not parties to the action; as to such possible rights there must be an inquiry in the Circuit Court, under proper orders, to be made conformable to the judgment of this court, and the rights of such third parties, if any there be, placed on the same footing with those of the executrix and devisee, Julia A.

The referee also holds that the plaintiffs, Miss Annely and Mr. Blake, are bound to the defendants also, on the principle of *acquiescence, independently of the authority conferred upon their alleged attorney, constituting "an equitable foundation for a decree of specific performance."

*513

This conclusion states, as its grounds, two facts. First, their silence while the defendants were purchasing, without notice from them, from other tenants in common. Second, the additional fact of such silence, while the purchasers were making valuable improvements on the premises. This proposition is not correct, unless a general rule can be stated to this effect, that a mortgagee of an undivided interest in lands, under a recorded mortgage, is bound to give express notice of a refusal to be bound by a sale made by his co-tenants, holding in common with the mortgagor, when such co-tenants are known to be dealing with the land in contravention of such mortgagee's rights. This is an extraordinary conclusion which, if sound, will tend to impair materially the value of mortgage securities of that class.

One who purchases lands bound by a recorded mortgage, buys with notice. It is equally so whether the mortgage effects an undivided interest in the land or the entire interest. The statute determines what the notice shall be and nothing more can be exacted either at law or in equity. The purchaser purchases at his peril, having the right to demand access to the instruments that constitute the title he is purchasing, and all legal encumbrances upon it.

It is said that the purchase was made in the belief that the executor of the mortgagor had authority from the mortgagee to release the mortgage; then it was the obvious right and duty of the purchaser to demand proof of such authority. It was not to be assumed that the mortgagee would place in the hands of the executor of the mortgagor unlimited power of negotiation, and of canceling or discharging the mortgage. It does not appear that Mr. De Saussure ever asserted that he had such authority; on the contrary, it appears that he looked to the right of the state in virtue of forfeiture of the lands for non-payment of taxes as the means of making title in the purchaser in case the plaintiffs would not concur in his plans. There is no evidence to show that any conduct on the part of the plaintiffs, or either of them, contributed to impress the minds of the purchasers *with the idea that Mr. De Saussure possessed the authority they now allege that they thought he possessed. There is no foundation in the evidence, or the reasonable presumptions therefrom, for applying to these plaintiffs any limitation of the rule of conduct affecting all other mortgagees of undivided interests in lands.

*514

The referee, in discussing this question, refers to the right of partition that existed among the tenants in common, and says: "But they did not exercise that right because of their belief at that time that all parties in interest had agreed to a private sale, and to that end had united in a contract of sale, which purported to give the purchaser a good title to the whole property."

The fact that they did not exercise the right of partition is of importance, but the reason why they did not is altogether unimportant, unless that reason involves something tending to affect the equities or legal rights of the plaintiffs. The statement here is simply as to the belief of the purchaser founded on the contract of purchase itself. That contract was in writing, and did not purport to contain the signature of the plaintiffs, or of any one assuming to sign in their behalf. They could have drawn no such inference from the contract.

The referee, further discussing the same question, goes on to state that the contract was advantageous to the parties, and if the plaintiffs "had, in time, given notice of their refusal to complete the sale, and the other tenants in common had made them parties to a suit against the purchasers for a specific performance, upon the proof offered before me in this case, they would have been compelled to perfect title in the purchaser." If the referee here means to say that the court would have specifically enforced the contract on general equitable considerations, independently of proof of authority in Mr. De Saussure to bind the plaintiffs, it is not easy to see what ground there is for the conclusion. Of course, it will not be contended that one tenant in common can compel another by suit for specific performance, or in any other manner, to consent to and be bound by the contract of the former to sell the land held in common, upon the ground that the contract is advantageous to the latter.

It may be that the referee contemplated partition proceedings *in his remark. If so, his conclusion is equally erroneous, for in partition the court would not have adopted a private sale by one tenant in common as the basis of a decree enforcing such contract of a sale as against one refusing to be bound by it, however advantageous it might seem. Individuals make contracts for themselves; not the courts for them. The courts merely enforce that which is accomplished in the right and by the mind of the parties.

*515

The result of a partition would have been the sale of the land at public sale, if it could not be actually partitioned with reasonable convenience. Perhaps, in such a case, the land might have brought less than the purchaser was willing to pay for it. That is a matter for the consideration of the parties, who are not wards of the court or dependent on its assistance.

The referee is equally in error in holding that in such a writ "the court would have regarded the true interests of all the parties before it, and would not have permitted one co-tenant or the mortgagees of a co-tenant to defeat a sale so manifestly proved to be advantageous to all who had any interest in the property, unless some proof had been offered that it was possible to make a better sale." The courts do not undertake to enforce the interests of parties sui juris, but to enforce their rights. They may not allow their views of interest to prevail against rules of law and equity, but will not supplement their errors and fallibilities nor coerce their stubbornness from a more enlightened view of their interests than they themselves are willing and able to take. These principles are fundamental to enlightened jurisprudence. Nor would the court look to the interests of the tenants in common as a class as distinct from their individual interest, for there is no other bond, legal or equitable, between them than that their several rights meet in the same subject of property. There is nothing in the nature of an obligation arising from a contract, express or implied, existing between them that equity can lay hold of to give shape to their common rights and conduct. They are neither a legal corporeity nor related by any fiduciary tie nor obligation to pursue a common object. Both law and equity can, under certain circumstances, apply as between them certain modifications of the ordinary rules relating *to ownership in severalty. So equity may intervene to disasseverate their possession by dividing or selling the property for division of the proceeds, but that is accomplished not to carry out any equity implied in the relation, but to sever it on equitable principles.

*516

The referee further says: "In such a case as between tenants in common and against the consent of one or more of them, it would even have the right to assign the property to one of the co-tenants at an appraised value." It is not necessary to inquire whether as between tenants in common, like the present, deriving their title from distinct and independent sources, and not distributees or devisees from a common ancestor, the court could exercise the right here indicated; it is enough to know that no such authority has been exercised.

The essential feature of this proposition is the idea that one tenant in common may sell the entire lands held in common as if they were his own in severalty, and if called into a court of equity may validate his action, if he can show that under a proceeding in such court for purchase he might have by some means been enabled to reach the same practical result.

The purchasers do not ask a decree in the nature of partition based upon the rights of the parties as they stood at the time of suit brought. But what they ask is a decree of the character that would have been made had partition been obtained at the time they became purchasers of the property. They do not want the value of the property, as it stands, the basis of partition, but its value at the time of purchase. The proposition of the referee is, then, that the act of the co-tenants as affecting the plaintiffs, considered as representing the interests, subject to mortgage, was equivalent to a decree and sale in partition, subject to the right of the court to say that it was not well grounded in equity. Thus the co-tenants are the court of original jurisdiction, and the Circuit Court a revisory body to record its decrees, if not found wanting equity.

The court of equity often applies the principle of approving, when done without its authority, that which it could have authorized, and which it clearly appears it would have authorized. It will not be pretended that the court could authorize *one tenant in common to exercise the power of partition as against his co-tenant or one claiming in his right, nor will it sanction that which it could not authorize. The act of the co-tenants, under whom the purchasers claim, was an assertion of dominion merely; what is essential to separate tenancies in common is judicial authority; the court cannot make the one the equivalent of or the substitute for the other.

*517

The referee adds: "If such would be the power of the court as against a tenant in common who holds the legal title, its power is certainly no less, but rather greater, against the mortgagee who holds only an equitable title." It is true that he does not hold the title to the land while the mortgagor remains in possession, but he holds the lien or security on the land by a legal title. Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C. 354.

It is erroneous to suppose that a mortgagee holds only an equitable title to his security. The statute (Gen. Stat. 536) only takes away possessory action by the mortgagee while the mortgagor is in possession, but by so doing recognizes that the mortgagee has a legal title to the security. The equitable doctrine that a mortgage is a mere security for debt, on which the statute was founded, does not affect the character and nature of the title passed by the mortgage, for that existed independent of equity, but limits the use of that title against the mortgagor. A right created at law is none the less a legal right in its nature, because equity holds it affected by equitable considerations.

The statement of the referee, that in foreclosing "the court may make such decree as shall best protect the rights and equities of all parties to the suit," is correct, but may be misunderstood. The object of foreclosure is clear and definite. It is to sell the land by judicial sale, bar the equity of redemption, and give a personal decree, when demandable, for any deficiency of the proceeds of sale to pay the mortgage debt. The rights of mortgagors and mortgagees may become affected by and complicated with many circumstances giving rise to legal or equitable consequences that can be observed by the court. This does not, however, authorize the court to leave the beaten track of a familiar proceeding to devise more perfect methods of subserving the real or supposed interests of the parties.

*518

*The referee further adds that the court "may sell the mortgaged property at public or private sale, and in such terms as may seem best to the court." We know of no authority to sell at private sale under a decree of foreclosure in invitum. To a certain extent the court may fix the terms of sale, but an order for that purpose is made for the mutual benefit of all concerned, based solely on the ground of placing the property in the best marketable condition; it cannot be construed into a right to change the relative rights of the parties as they stand under the mortgage.

He finally concludes, on this point: "What the court would have done in favor of the equities of the other tenants in common, in case they had been compelled to apply to it for a decree of sale in partition, it will now do in favor of an innocent purchaser, who has contracted for the whole property, and who, believing that he was finally to get a good title for the whole, accepted the conveyances of the other tenants in common, and, without any notice that his title was not to be forfeited, made improvements on the common property which considerably exceed in cost and value the price at which it could have been sold before it was improved." The basis of this proposition we have considered and denied, namely, that upon partition the co-tenants, other than those represented by the plaintiffs, could have compelled the plaintiffs to accede to their contract of sale, because it was advantageous. If, then, the purchasers have equities against the plaintiffs, it must be upon other grounds than that these expectations are disappointed. Equity does not deny the fundamental principles of law. It does not assume to equalize among men the consequences of errors of judgment or misfortune. It is not a chimerical expediency, but a resolute system, looking to rights according to their proper equitable interpretation. It sometimes exercises providential care in the right of those incapable of representing themselves or protecting their own interest, but independently of this peculiar jurisdiction, inapplicable to the present case, it is contented to see that the dealings of men are just and equal, without attempting to insure that the practical and material results of those dealings shall be *distributed with theoretical equality. To do this would transcend the offices of Divine Providence.

*519

If there are any equities in favor of the views presented by the referee, they must arise from the proposition that it is inequitable and unconscionable for the plaintiffs to avail themselves of the benefits conferred on the mortgaged property by the improvements put upon it by the purchaser, and of the enhanced value of the property resulting from such improvements. This is not equivalent to asking whether, in the forum of private conscience, the plaintiffs could justify the acceptance of these benefits procured by the means and effects of others. Equity does not administer the dictates of private conscience, but certain rules that have been justly called the conscience of the court. If, therefore, the claims of the plaintiffs are inequitable and unconscionable, it is because they contravene fixed rules and principles of equity. Do they?

It is clearly inequitable for a party to demand the fruit of fraud, misrepresentation or dissimulation. The plaintiffs are free from any such charges. It is not inequitable for a mortgagee to claim the benefits of all improvements put on the mortgaged premises. The mortgage is a security for a fixed sum, that cannot be decreased by injury to or destruction of the property, or increased by adding value to it. In the present case, the value of the mortgaged premises was impaired by the casualties of war and tempest. Had the mortgagor himself rebuilt, there would not have been a question but that in legal and equitable consideration, the right of the mortgagee to go upon the improvements for the satisfaction of his mortgage, would have been perfect. How can the plaintiff's rights be less, so far as restoration has been accomplished by the assignee of the mortgagor. If a mortgaged house is consumed by fire and rebuilt by the mortgagor or his assignee, has there ever been a question whether it was equitable for the mortgagee to assert his mortgage, as it regards such improvements? So far as it regards the question of improvements made jointly by the assignee of a tenant, subject to mortgage, and his co-tenants, not affected by such mortgage, or as in the present case, by a party uniting both these characters, no inquiry has been made and findings of fact presented, enabling *this court to determine whether the improvements are of a nature, and the property so circumstanced, as to call for the recognition of equitable severalty in them, as regards the undivided interest derived under different titles. Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 475. For the want of a proper basis of fact, that question cannot be considered in the present stage of the case; but there should be an inquiry into such facts and proper action thereon.

*520

But should it appear that the improvements must enure to the benefit of the plaintiffs, it is not inconsistent with any rule of equity that they should insist on such demand. On the other hand it would be entirely inconsistent with equitable rules to deny to the plaintiffs relief to which they are entitled, simply because it imposes hardship on the purchaser.

We cannot say that the purchaser, if compelled to suffer hardships, is free from fault in the matter. It was the plainest dictate of prudence to perfect their title before expending upon the improvement of the property. If the purchaser felt secure on account of the forfeiture to the state, that expectation rested on a speculation that contemplated the entire loss to the plaintiffs of their mortgage security through taxation, and its failure entails upon the plaintiffs no duty to submit to the destruction by the arm of equity of that which has escaped the hardships of taxation.

Nor is there any reason to say that the plaintiffs have received benefit from the improvements by the purchaser, and, therefore, an equity rises against them. The object of the defence is not to obtain compensation for benefits conferred, but to deprive the plaintiffs of the right themselves. But the conclusive answer to the proposition under consideration is, that improvements put upon mortgaged lands, are not, in equity, regarded as benefits conferred on the mortgagee, nor can this conclusion be changed by the circumstances of the particular case, as it regards the sufficiency of the security without the improvements.

The application made to the case by the referee of the betterment law, and the equitable principles analogous to those to which that law relates, rests upon two grounds. The first has already been disposed of, inasmuch as it involves the supposed acquiescence of the plaintiffs; the other will be considered.

Referring to Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 McC.

*521

Eq. 455 [16 Am. Dec. 667], the ref*eree says: "On the authority of the above case, I hold that if it were possible in this case to conclude, as matter of fact, that the mortgagees of Lewis never assented to, and acquiesced in, the sale made in this case by Mr. De Saussure, their attorney, and that, without their consent, it was sold by him as executor, solely under the power conferred on him by the will of Lewis, yet even in that case, as he believed when he made the sale, that the said authority conferred on him was sufficient to enable him to convey to the purchaser a valid, unencumbered title, and so advised the purchaser, and, as they looked to him as their legal adviser in that behalf, if he was mistaken in law, and by that mistake caused the purchaser to make improvements on the property, believing that the title to it was good, they will be compensated for their improvements out of the lands to the extent added thereby to their value."

In other words, if the mortgagor, being the legal adviser of a third party, says he has authority to make good title as against a recorded mortgage, and such third person takes title under such assurance, he shall be so far released from the mortgage as to be protected as to all improvements made on the premises, whether such representation was correct or incorrect. If correct, he holds through its truthfulness; if incorrect, in virtue of its being a mistake.

The attention of the referee evidently was not called to McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C. 95, where the equitable relief afforded by equity in cases of mistake, was considered very fully upon the authorities. It will not be necessary again to develop that subject. It is enough for the present case to quote the language of Chancellor Dargan in Murrel v. Murrel, 2 Strob. Eq. 148 [49 Am. Dec. 664], who says: "A party fully competent to protect himself, under no disability, advised as to all circumstances by which he may be saved his rights, or in a situation where he might, by due diligence, be so advised, not overreached by fraud, concealment or misrepresentation, nor the victim of mistake, against which prudence might have guarded, has no right to call the courts of justice to protect him." This is sufficient to deprive the purchaser of the equitable relief demanded, as we have already seen.

*522

*It is held in McDow v. Brown, as to mistakes of fact, that "when a mistake has arisen without the fault of either of the justices * * * relief is granted only when the mistake is mutual." In the case, as presented by the purchaser, the mistake, if any was made, was one of fact as to whether the executor had been authorized to act for the plaintiffs in the manner contended for. That question has been considered in this case as one of fact alone, for it is not pretended that the executor had any implied or presumable authority whatever, or any other authority, except such as might be conferred by some act of the plaintiffs susceptible of proof as matter of fact. It was not a mistake as to the relationship or rights of the parties, nor as to the construction of a power in a will, deed or contract, nor in any other sense a mistake of law. Had there been a mistake of law on the part of the legal adviser of the purchaser, it is not clear how the consequences of that mistake could have been visited on the plaintiffs, especially when, by prudence, it might have been avoided, but the case presents no such question.

In McDow v. Brown, the case of Lowndes v. Chisolm is considered, and it is said that it "did not necessarily depend on the power of equity to grant affirmative relief on a bill alleging mistake, but upon the principle that when parties are before the Court of Equity seeking equity, the court will look into transactions collateral to and dependent upon the principal subject of inquiry, in order that full justice may be done."

Lowndes v. Chisolm stands upon the equities between a surety on a bond, additionally secured by mortgage, and the obligee of the bond subsequently becoming purchaser of the mortgaged property. The question of relief in equity for mistake of law is there discussed, but not with the view to lay down any final rule on the subject. But with that doctrine we have no concern at present.

The question of taxation raised by the fifth proposition of the referee, has already been disposed of. The conclusions of the referee as to interest, being based upon views from which this court dissents, are erroneous.

The decree of the Circuit Court and the report of the referee, so far as inconsistent herewith, should be set aside, and the cause *remanded for proceedings conformable to what is here determined. As has already been said, there should be an inquiry under proper orders to ascertain whether there are parties other than the devisee, Julia A. Blake, and the co-devisees, entitled to participate in the assets of the estate of Anna M. Annely, who, on the foregoing principles, ought to be considered. An inquiry should also be made into the situation and circumstances of the mortgaged property, with a view to determine whether actual partition can be made, and a decree made for the sale of the undivided one-fourth part of the property, in case such actual partition cannot be had, with liberty to the defendants, if they desire, to have the whole property and improvements sold, as for partition among them, to have it decreed accordingly, application of the proceeds of such sale to the payment of the amount found due on the mortgage to be made, as to their extent upon the principles of this decision, and in accordance with the determination of this matter reserved for further consideration by the Circuit Court.

*523

HASKELL, A. J. I concur in the opinion that the judgment should be reversed, upon the ground that there is a total lack of evidence to support the conclusion that the executor of Lewis, either in that character or personally, had authority to act for the mortgagees, or that the mortgagees ratified his action as to them by acquiescence or otherwise. I concur further in the opinion that such parties in interest as have not taken an appeal are bound by the Circuit decree. The mortgage, therefore, to the extent not thus affected, remains a lien on the interest held by Lewis. What that interest is, has not been considered by the Circuit judge, for the whole case turned upon the point which is error, and the right to foreclose being thus denied, the question of partition was never reached.

I concur, therefore, in the opinion that the case should be remanded for such further proceedings in the court below as may be necessary, in conformity with the views expressed by the Chief Justice on the points above indicated.

*524

*McIVER, A. J., dissenting. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by the testator, John W. Lewis, to secure the payment of two bonds held by the plaintiffs respectively. The mortgage covered an undivided fourth part of the commercial wharves, a property situate in the city of Charleston.

The issues of law and fact were referred to a referee whose report contains such a full and clear statement of the facts as to render a repetition of them here wholly unnecessary.

To this report various exceptions were filed by the plaintiffs, all of which were overruled by the Circuit judge, and from his judgment this appeal is taken upon the same grounds as are set forth in the exceptions to the referee's report.

It is very manifest that if the conclusions of fact reached by the referee and confirmed by the Circuit judge can be sustained, there is no ground for this appeal.

The rule that the findings of fact by a referee, concurred in by the Circuit judge, will not be set aside unless they are without any evidence to sustain them, or are manifestly against the weight of evidence, is so well settled and has been so frequently announced by this court that it is not necessary to cite the cases establishing it. Without entering upon a detailed examination of the testimony in this case, with a view to justify the conclusions of the referee, which is as unusual as it would be unnecessary in this case, it is enough to say that, in my judgment, after a careful examination of the testimony, there is no sufficient ground for disturbing the findings of fact by the referee, concurred in, as they are, by the Circuit judge.

It certainly cannot be said that the conclusions of fact reached by the referee are without any evidence to maintain them, and I do not think that they are manifestly against the weight of the evidence. On the contrary, it appears to me that there is very strong support for the main finding of fact that Mr. De Saussure, in making the sale, acted with the knowledge and assent of the mortgagees, in the undisputed fact that they were disappointed in the results of the sale.

This shows two things: First, that they knew of the terms of the sale, as otherwise there would be no reason in their expressing dissatisfaction; and, second, that they then understood that *the entire fee was sold and not merely the equity of redemption. For, if it was merely the equity of redemption which was sold, then there was no conceivable reason why they should express disappointment at the sale, as their rights could not possibly be prejudiced thereby, but they would, on the contrary, be actually benefited. The testimony leaves no doubt, not only of the fact that the property was sold for its full fee simple value, but that by selling the whole property together, rather than the one undivided fourth separately, upon which alone the plaintiffs had a lien, that fourth brought more than it would have done if sold as an undivided share. It is impossible, therefore, to believe that a mortgagee would express dissatisfaction at a sale of the equity of redemption in the property covered by his mortgage for a price equal to its full fee simple value, as by that means his chances for realizing the whole of his debt would be legally increased, especially in a case like the present, where the property mortgaged constituted the sole security, (the mortgagor being insolvent,) and was encumbered by a large arrearage of taxes which would have to be first paid out of the proceeds of a sale ordered to foreclose the mortgage. Act of March 19th, 1874, § 126, 15 Stat. 774. In addition to this it may be remarked that the testimony tends to show that the disappointment of the mortgagees arose, not from the fact that the sale was an absolute sale of the entire interest nor from the price obtained, but from the apprehension that the proceeds of the sale of the share upon which their lien rested would be wholly, or to a large extent, consumed in the payment of taxes and other charges, leaving but little, if anything, to be applied to the mortgage.

*525

Another circumstance which tends to strengthen the conclusion of the referee is that neither of the plaintiffs has ever yet denied the authority of the executor to make the sale, or their full knowledge of an acquiescence in his proceedings up to the time of the sale, neither of them having been examined as witnesses in the case. Numerous references were held, continuing from day to day, and although it was manifest from the course of the testimony that the defendants relied upon the fact that the executor in making the sale acted with the knowledge and assent of the mortgagees, as evidenced by the testimony in regard *to conversations between Blake and Lewis, who were alleged to be the agents of the plaintiffs, and the executor, and the message sent to them by the executor before concluding the contract of sale, yet neither of the plaintiffs were put upon the witness stand to disavow the authority of the executor to sell, or to deny any knowledge of, or assent to, his proceedings.

*526

Another circumstance in support of the view taken by the referee is to be found in the condition of things existing at the time, which rendered it highly probable that the mortgagees would have done just what the referee has found they did do for the protection of their own interests. Here were mortgagees holding a mortgage as the sole security for their debt which was rapidly increasing in amount, no payment having been made in about ten years upon property on which large arrearages of taxes had accumulated, which the mortgagor had no means of paying, and which the mortgagees do not appear to have taken any steps to provide for, though the property covered by the mortgage had been forfeited for non-payment of taxes, and the time allowed for redemption was rapidly drawing to a close, in which event the security would be wholly lost. Under these circumstances the most ordinary prudence would seem to prompt the mortgagees not only to assent to, but gladly adopt any scheme by which the property could be sold to the best advantage and at the least cost possible, whereby a portion at least of their debt might be saved. This is exactly what was done. The testimony places it beyond dispute that the mortgaged property was sold to the best possible advantage, without cost to the mortgagees, and after relieving the tax encumbrance, a balance is left to be applied to the mortgage debt. Thus, the result has proved the wisdom of the course adopted by the executor, with the knowledge and assent of the mortgagees, as the referee finds, and as I must believe from all the circumstances of the case.

The apparent inconsistency of Mr. De Saussure's acting both as executor of the mortgagor and as attorney or agent for the mortgagees is more apparent than real. He states in his answer what all the circumstances of the case confirm, that he qualified as executor only for the purpose of enabling him to benefit the mortgagees. The estate of the mortgagor was confessedly in*solvent, and the only source from which the debt of the plaintiff could be paid was the mortgaged property, which, under the power of sale contained in the will, could be sold by the executor without delay and expense incident to an action for foreclosure. He was, at the time he qualified, the attorney of the mortgagees, entrusted with the bonds and mortgage for the very purpose of effecting a sale of the mortgaged premises, "all parties consenting," which possession continued until after the sale was made without any change in his instructions; and as the course which he adopted, in the condition of things then existing, was, as we have seen, undoubtedly the best for the interest of the mortgagees, as well as for the estate of the mortgagor, I am unable to perceive any real inconsistency in his conduct.

*527

Nor do I think any weight should be attached to the remark attributed to Mr. De Saussure—that if the mortgagees refused to recognize his action they could be forced to do so by reason of the fact that the property had been forfeited for taxes—because, it will be remembered, that this remark was not made until after the sale, and after he had discovered that the mortgagees were disposed to repudiate his action in making the sale. It cannot, therefore, be fairly argued that this plan of perfecting the title in the purchaser was present to or influenced his mind at the time he made the sale.

A more reasonable inference would be that it was the offspring of a natural irritation at finding that the mortgagees were disposed to repudiate his action, taken, as he supposed, and as he had good reason to suppose, with their assent and for their benefit.

The point raised by the appeal on the part of the executor of John W. Lewis does not appear to have been taken before the referee or in the court below, and is not properly before us for consideration.

I am satisfied, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Decree reversed.

---

12 S. C. *528

*(Case No. 766.)

THE STATE v. LEMUEL DAVIS.

THE STATE, ex rel. BALL, v. L. DAVIS et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Bail ⟸74.]

A soldier of the United States army, indicted in the state court for murder, and convicted of manslaughter, was granted a new trial and then admitted to bail. Thereupon he filed his petition in the Circuit Court of the United States, praying a removal of his case to that court, and setting forth that the homicide was committed by the accidental discharge of his gun while he was one of a detail to assist a revenue officer of the United States government in arresting the deceased; a writ of habeas corpus cum causa was issued by the United States Circuit judge, and under that process the person of the defendant was taken out of the custody of the state authorities, and turned over to his commanding officer in another state. Held, that the sureties on his recognizance were liable for his failure to appear for trial at the succeeding term of the state court.†

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. § 291; Dec. Dig. ⟸74.]

[2. Criminal Law ⟸98.]

The jurisdiction of the state court over a prisoner charged with a crime against the laws of the state, is not affected by the removal of the prisoner from the custody of the court by virtue of a writ of habeas corpus, issued by a United States Circuit judge under Section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 192; Dec. Dig. ⟸98.]

[3. Habeas Corpus ⟸45.]

The writ of habeas corpus under this section is not an original, remediable writ, but merely an auxiliary process to bring the person of the petitioner within the jurisdiction of the United States Circuit Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. §§ 38–45; Dec. Dig. ⟸45; Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. § 210.]

[4. Constitutional Law ⟸27.]

Every grant to the government of the United States by the constitution is limited to the powers expressed in the terms of such grant, or arising therefrom by necessary implication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. ⟸27.]

[5. Courts ⟸258.]

Congress cannot confer upon the courts of the United States any jurisdiction or powers not granted by Article III. of the constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 793; Dec. Dig. ⟸258.]

[6. Courts ⟸258.]

Congress cannot confer upon the United States courts original jurisdiction of a case involving an offense against the laws of a state, because that the defence interposed depends for its force and effect upon the constitution and laws of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 793; Dec. Dig. ⟸258.]

[7. Courts ⟸256.]

Meaning of the word "case," as used in Article III., Section 2, of the constitution of the United States, with regard to the appellate and original jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 792; Dec. Dig. ⟸256.]

*529

[8. Courts ⟸260.]

*The United States courts can have original jurisdiction of cases only where there is a demand of affirmative relief by plaintiff or defendant, based upon the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 792; Dec. Dig. ⟸260.]

[9. Courts ⟸417; Removal of Causes ⟸11.]

The Circuit Courts of the United States have no appellate jurisdiction over cases properly instituted in the state courts; and cases are removable to the former courts from the latter under the acts of congress, only where they could have been brought, in the first instance, in the courts of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 1118; Dec. Dig. ⟸417; Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 198; Removal of Causes, Dec. Dig. ⟸11.]

10. Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304 [1 L. Ed. 97], and Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264 [5 L. Ed. 257] considered.

Before Mackey, J., at Spartanburg, October, 1877.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. L. C. Northrop, U. S. district attorney, for appellants.

Mr. B. W. Ball, solicitor, contra.

November 15th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. Lemuel Davis was indicted in the Court of General Sessions of Spartanburg for willful murder, and convicted of manslaughter. Subsequently a new trial was granted. Thereupon he filed his petition in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district in which the indictment was pending, alleging, in substance, that he was a soldier in the military service of the United States, and was detailed as one of a guard of United States soldiers to aid a deputy marshal of the United States in making the arrest of Brandy Hall, under a warrant issued by a United States commissioner, for violation of the internal revenue laws as a distiller. The petition then states that while guarding the house in which the deputy marshal was attempting to make the arrest, Hall escaped suddenly from the house, frightening the petitioner's horse, and causing an accidental discharge of his piece, by means of which Hall was mortally wounded and died.

The petition demanded the removal of the cause for trial into the Circuit Court of the United States.

It appears that thereupon a writ of habeas corpus cum causa was issued by the United States Circuit Court, and Davis was *taken out of the custody of the sheriff of Spartanburg and brought before the Circuit Court. It also appears that Davis was discharged from custody under said writ, and removed from the state and placed under the orders of his commanding officer in the State of Pennsylvania.

*530

The Court of General Sessions assumed

† The defense in this case was not the same as that in State of Tennessee v. Davis, a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered after the opinion in this case was filed, and not yet published. It is believed, however, that the decision upon the main point here is not in accord with the conclusions of the majority of the court in the Tennessee case. REPORTER.

subsequently to proceed with the cause, and, Davis not appearing, made an order for the forfeiture of a recognizance taken in the Court of General Sessions for his appearance. From this order the sureties on this recognizance have appealed to this court.

The question presented is, whether the Court of General Sessions lost jurisdiction of the case in virtue of the proceeding in the Circuit Court of the United States that resulted in that court obtaining custody of the body of the prisoner under indictment.

It is manifest that a full decision of this question of conflicting jurisdiction here presented will render necessary an inquiry into the constitutional limits of the authority vested in congress touching the matters contained in Section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, under which section the authority under which the removal of the cause was attempted is claimed. It is understood that this question is now before the Supreme Court of the United States in its general aspects, but there is no reason to assume that the decision of that court will reach some of the important features of the present case that to some extent render it independent of any solution that may be given to the question of the constitutional powers of congress.

Without adverting at the present time to the special features of the present case, it is enough to say that the uncertainty that the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States will dispose of all the matters in controversy, the gravity of the question, involving, as it does, the integrity of the power of administering criminal justice in the courts of the state, and the importance of an early presentation of the questions involved to the court of last resort in all matters that have their origin and force from the constitution and laws of the United States, should the parties so desire, leads us to dispose of the questions at issue without delay.

The first question to be considered is, whether we can look *into the grounds on which the jurisdiction claimed for the United States Circuit Court in this case rests, for the purpose of determining whether that court had constitutional power to proceed in such manner as to divest the Court of General Sessions of its undoubted jurisdiction. If we find ourselves bound to conclude that the effect claimed to be produced upon the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions, namely, the destruction or suspension of its jurisdiction, could only be so produced in a case where the Circuit Court of the United States could take jurisdiction, then we would be compelled to look into the constitutional jurisdiction of the Circuit Court in order to make that the measure of the authority of the Court of General Sessions over the case. But if the loss of jurisdiction by the General Sessions is not necessarily dependent on its acquisition by the Circuit Court, then ground may exist for an argument tending to exclude us from looking into the grounds on which the Circuit Court claims jurisdiction. That argument is based on the fact that under Section 643 the petition presenting the grounds for the removal of the cause is required to be presented to the United States Circuit Court, and no means are afforded for bringing such matters to the attention of the state court. Until the passage of the enactments contained in Section 643, the mode of removing causes was by a petition filed in the State Court, and the removal of the cause took place, in form at least, as a voluntary cession of jurisdiction by the state court after looking into the sufficiency of the grounds stated therefor—a mode of procedure that was dictated by a spirit of comity that always accompanies a just understanding of what appertains to the administration of justice. It may be argued that the change in this respect implies an intention on the part of congress of excluding the state courts from judicial knowledge of the ground of the removal, and thus disabling them from discharging the important judicial duty of maintaining jurisdiction in its full exercise. It is fortunate that we are not compelled to examine the considerations arising from the constitution, the comity between judicial bodies, and the practice of well-ordered governments that would be material to the discussion whether such an implication could arise from the language of the act.

*531

*532

It is through *the force of a proposition that seems adequate to dispose of the present case that we are relieved from considering that construction of the section in question. This proposition is as follows:

That if the courts of the United States could by no possible means obtain original jurisdiction of the present case, then we are justified in concluding that the authority of the General Sessions remained intact.

As this proposition assumes that the loss of jurisdiction by the General Sessions depends on its acquisition by the United States Circuit Court, it is necessary to inquire whether such is the case. It probably will not be seriously disputed that, ordinarily, this would be the rule, arising from the important principle that no lapse should occur in the administration of justice, and, therefore, the duty of receding from jurisdiction should be commensurate with the right of claiming and exercising it. It may be contended, however, that Section 643 creates an exception to this rule by force of the provisions that enable the United States Circuit Court to take the person of the prisoner in confinement under the process of the state court into its custody by the writ of habeas corpus cum causa; that, having done so, the Court of General Sessions having lost control of the prisoner would lose, as incidental thereto, jurisdiction to proceed, and this without regard to the question whether the Circuit Court could or could not take jurisdiction in the case. The correctness of this proposition need not be considered, for it is clearly inapplicable.

If the act had provided that the writ of habeas corpus should issue as an original and independent remedy, questions of difficulty might arise as to the constitutional limits of that jurisdiction and as to the effect of custody of persons subjected to such jurisdiction in the proceedings in state courts affecting the person, such as criminal proceedings requiring the presence of the prisoner. Even if the habeas corpus under which the petitioner was taken into the custody of the Circuit Court had been such an original remedial writ, yet in the present case no question of the effect of custody held under such writ could become material, for it appears that the prisoner was permitted to pass out of that custody, and, as we are compelled to assume, out of all judicial custody of the courts of the United States into that *of his military commander, acting under military authority alone. In addition to this, the proceedings of the General Sessions brought here by appeal were of such a nature that the presence of the petitioner was not essential to their validity, namely, the forfeiture of his recognizance.

*533

But we are forced to conclude that Section 643 did not intend to authorize the issuing of the writ of habeas corpus as an original remedial writ, but merely as process to bring the person in question within the jurisdiction assumed to be competent to take cognizance of the case and the person of the defendant. That this writ was intended as auxiliary to the judicial jurisdiction in aid of which it issued is apparent from the use to which it was put, and by the fact that it was issuable as matter of course by the clerk. Any other construction would open the act to the criticism of attempting to stretch the judicial power of the United States beyond the jurisdiction of its courts, so that it might be able to destroy the jurisdiction of the state courts without being able to replace it by that of the United States courts; "for unless it was intended that the interference of the judicial power of the United States should go to a case beyond the constitutional powers of its courts, there could be no possible motive for giving effect to the writ beyond what might be necessary to subserve the jurisdiction of the court in aid of which it was given. This leads us to conclude that the writ as auxiliary process was limited in its effect by the nature of the constitutional jurisdiction of the Circuit Court."

If, then, congress could not confer jurisdiction on the United States courts to take cognizance of the present case, and the Court of General Sessions could not lose its jurisdiction except where the Circuit Court had authority to take it, it was not material, to enable the General Sessions to discover the state of its control over the case, to know the grounds on which its removal to the United States court was sought, but, on the contrary, it was the duty of that court to proceed with the case.

The question of the constitutional power of the United States Circuit Court to take original jurisdiction, by removal from a state court of a criminal case seeking alone to impose penalties *for the infraction of the laws of a state, is, then, fairly presented, and we are forced to its consideration.

*534

It will not be disputed that the general rule of the constitution of the United States, that all powers not granted expressly or by necessary implication are expressly reserved, is as applicable to grants of judicial powers and jurisdiction as those of any other class. It will be remarked that this reservation is made in express terms, (Amendment, Art. X.,) and is not left to result as an implication or a mere consequence from the nature and extent of that which is expressly granted. And this is in harmony with the conclusion that the reasonableness of an implication is not sufficient ground to apply it to the language of the constitution, but that it must have the character of a necessary implication, reached by Justice Story in Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304 [4 L. Ed. 97]. This distinction is important in a case where the convenience to the government of certain powers is strenuously urged as ground for enlarging the sense of the constitution on the principles of implication. In order to engraft on express terms of the constitution granting powers of government in their nature capable of being exercised by the states previous to the adoption of the constitution, an enlarged sense due to necessary implication, it is requisite to show that the denial of such implication would work a substantial destruction of the powers granted. This cannot be shown by demonstrating merely that such powers can be made more full and satisfactory under the operation of such an implication, for that would be enlarging the sense on the ground of the mere reasonableness and not the necessity of the implication. With this key to the construction of the constitution, derived from the doctrines advanced by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, we will endeavor to arrive at the intention of that instrument as it regards the original jurisdiction of the courts of the United States other than the Supreme Court.

Section 1, Article III., of the constitution, commences with the following language: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." The second section then proceeds to define the limits of that *"judicial power," which, so far as it is applicable to the present case, is accomplished by these words: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority." It will not be disputed that in order to find authority for congress to confer power on the courts of the United States to take original cognizance of a criminal case instituted in a state court under the laws of a state, and solely to enforce penalties for the infraction of such laws, a grant of such legislative power must be made out from the language just quoted, either as inherent in its express terms or arising by necessary implication therefrom.

*535

It is clear that Article III. was intended to limit as well as vest the judicial power of the United States. In the first place, limitation is implied in the words "extend to." In the next place, the object of the constitution was to apportion certain governmental powers between the general and local governments, and such an apportionment is, in its nature, limitative. In the last place, under the operation of the tenth article of amendment, the constitution must receive that construction. That article is as follows: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people." This cannot, with any propriety, be read as a new grant to the states or the people of such power as had not been delegated or prohibited by the constitution, for that would assume the existence of a considerable period of time when these powers were either in abeyance or vested somewhere else, which is an assumption inadmissible as inconsistent with the nature of governmental powers. It must be concluded that article X. was intended as declaratory of a pre-existing intent of the constitution, and that would lead us to construe the constitution precisely as if the tenth article of amendment had been incorporated in it at its first adoption. Reading, then, the constitution with this reservation, it is necessary that the terms of every grant should be construed as the express limitation of such grant where that is reasonably possible. In the present case we have no difficulty in so doing, as the terms employed import limitation.

*536
*The next consideration is, that the limitation of the judicial power of the United States affects not only the powers of the courts of the United States, but the power of congress to vest and give exercise to such judicial powers. Judicial power is not identical with jurisdiction. It may lie within the power of the legislature, ungranted wholly or in part, and in the latter case the measure of such jurisdiction as may have been lodged would not be the measure of the judicial power that created it. It may safely be affirmed, however, that when the legislature is restricted in the creation of judicial jurisdiction within certain limits, such limits are the measure of the extent of its judicial power. The effect of this limitation on the legislative power would present a question of great importance if it had appeared in this case that congress had attempted to destroy the jurisdiction of a state court in a case where it could not open the doors of the United States courts to entertain such case, but, as we have seen, no such intent can be inferred from Section 643. The only deduction sought to be made for the purposes of the present case from the proposition just considered, is too plain to need discussion, and is this: that congress cannot, by any measure, enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States beyond the measure of Article III. of the constitution, or grant them powers that are not warranted by such grant of jurisdiction.

It being clear, then, that the grant of judicial power in the constitution to extend to certain prescribed cases, is equivalent to its denial in all other cases, it becomes necessary to define this limit with sufficient exactness to ascertain whether the present case is within or without the scope of that grant. The first limitation is perceived by comparing the first and second sections of Article III. In the first section the judicial power of the United States is described by a limitation that has its force from the mode in which that power shall be vested, namely, in the Supreme and inferior courts of the United States. The second section gives it a further definition as to the subjects that may be brought within it, among which are cases arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States. As congress can only establish the jurisdictions of courts, ordain their functions and delegate their powers, in virtue of the grant of judicial *power, and that grant is required to be exhausted upon the United States courts, it follows that congress cannot mould the jurisdiction, remedial system or process of the state courts, and, therefore, cannot directly cut off that jurisdiction or accomplish that result in any other way than indirectly by means of constitutional jurisdiction conferred on the United States courts. The conclusion just drawn is of importance in fixing the sense of the terms "cases arising under the constitution," &c.

*537

It must be conceded on the ground of indisputable authority, that for the purpose of determining the scope of the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States over the final judgments of the highest courts of the states, cases arising under the constitution, laws and treaties, must be understood as embracing all cases in which any question depending on the construction of the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States arises material to the judgment. The further limitation imposed by the original judiciary act, confining that jurisdiction to cases where there has been a denial of some right asserted under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, is not contained in the constitution, and may be left out of view.

A superficial view of the question might lead to the conclusion that the same interpretation put upon the words in question for the purpose of defining the appellate powers of the Supreme Court, ought to prevail, when the question of original jurisdiction comes to be considered. It must be admitted that, as a general rule, words capable of being applied to different classes of subjects should receive the same definition in their application to each class. Allowing the utmost force due to this consideration, it is a rule of uniformity merely, and must not stand in the way of reaching a conclusion, rendered necessary by the nature of the subjects involved.

With a view to an exact understanding of the nature of the present question, a classification of the cases concerned will be serviceable. Three classes are recognized: First, where the cause of action is some claim or demand that claims its origin or force from the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States. As to this class there is no dispute, congress having the undoubted power to extend the original jurisdiction of the United States *courts to embrace all such cases. The second class is where there is some subject of controversy to which both plaintiff and defendant make title or claim, the plaintiff claiming under the laws of a state, and the defendant under the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, and wherein the defendant may have affirmative relief. The remaining class consists of cases in which the defendant makes no affirmative claim, but stands upon purely defensive ground. The question presented by the present case belongs to the third class, from the nature of the proceeding, namely, a criminal prosecution under the laws of a state. Strictly speaking, we have at present nothing to do with cases of the second class, but it will be impossible to bring the principles applicable to the third class into full discussion without involving considerations bearing directly on the second class.

*538

The distinction shown between cases of the second and third classes is very clearly pointed out by Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264 [5 L. Ed. 257], although there applied to distinguish classes of cases capable of being brought up by writ of error. He there denies that a writ of error brought by a defendant occupying a purely defensive situation, as in a criminal case, could be regarded as the substance of a suit prosecuted against a state. The distinction thus pointed out is identical with that here presented, though employed for a different purpose.

The exact question, then, is, whether a defence interposed to an indictment under the laws of the state, depending for its force and effect upon the constitution and laws of the United States, is a case arising under the constitution and laws of the United States in the sense of the constitution. This question is not stated upon the facts disclosed in the petition to the Circuit Court, because that petition was not by law required to be presented to the general sessions, and it may be contended that that court could not properly base its decision as to its jurisdiction on the terms of that petition—a proposition that need not be considered under the view of the case we take. It will be observed that the nature of the defence, as disclosed by the petition, is materially different from that contemplated by Section 643. That section, so far as it affects the present case, provides for the case of a defence by an officer appointed under or acting by the *authority of any revenue law of the United States, or of any person acting under the authority of such officer, whereas the petitioner claims to have been acting for the protection of a United States deputy marshal, under his authority, while in the execution of process of the United States courts. It certainly cannot be claimed that the United States marshal or his deputy is such an officer, or that the authority he exercises under the process of a court can be properly said to be the authority of any revenue law of the United States. Although the revenue law defined the crime, it did not constitute the authority under which the marshal acted. Again, Section 643 covers the case of an "act done under color of his office, or of any such law, or on account of any right, title or authority claimed by any such officer or other person under such law," whereas the defence disclosed by the petition is that of accidental shooting. The present question, in order to avoid all disputable minor points, is put on the broad ground that congress cannot confer on the Circuit Court of the United States original jurisdiction in any such case.

*539

We come now to consider what original jurisdiction the courts of the United States can properly take under that clause of the constitution that extends the judicial power of the United States to, and limits it at, cases arising under the constitution, laws and treaties. If we arrive at the conclusion that such original jurisdiction does not embrace the present case, then it will remain to show that the Circuit Court could only get possession of the case as part of its original jurisdiction; in other words, that the removal of the cause could not be justified as an exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the United States courts over cases pending in a state court.

The object of the language under construction was to establish and limit judicial jurisdiction by defining the "cases" to which it should extend. Cases are the natural boundary of jurisdiction in one of its directions. In the other direction the character of parties is the boundary. That sense of the word "case" should then be taken as its intended sense that enables it to serve as the boundary of original jurisdiction where that jurisdiction is described by it. The constitution, with a nicety of expression due to the merited influence of the distinguished lawyers who assisted *in its preparation that leaves no doubt as to its intention to use the word case in its technical sense, employs that term when defining the limits of jurisdiction by the nature of its subject matter, and applies the term controversies where jurisdiction is intended to depend on the character of parties. The instance of "cases affecting ambassadors," &c., is not a departure from the order of expression; on the contrary, the form of the expression opens the inference that it was intended to give this jurisdiction a scope beyond the instances where the ambassador or other public minister is a party in a legal sense, as consisting with the use of the word cases instead of controversies. More exact and significant language could not have been employed. There is not the slightest doubt that it was intended that the word case should receive its definition and sense by means of legal exposition, and not according to any idea popularly attached to the term. Its direct and primary sense is that technical sense in which the law understands it, and if that sense best satisfies the manifest object of the use of the expression it must prevail.

*540

The term case is, according to familiar legal usage, applicable either to a suit or other remedial proceeding in a court of justice, or to matters brought into an appellate court by means of a writ of error and assignment of errors, or other similar proceeding. When used to designate a suit or proceeding in a court of original jurisdiction it embraces the idea of parties and a subject matter in controversy between them, its character and description for jurisdictional purposes being determined by the nature of the demand of the party seeking the court for relief. When applied to a writ of error and assignment of errors, it covers the idea of certain alleged errors in a legal judgment consisting in failure to apply the proper law of the case to its adjudication. Every error assigned is a case in substance and effect, as it would separately and independently support a writ of error as such. It would follow that, in order to determine, for the purpose of appeal, whether a case is one arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, inquiry would be directed to ascertain whether any of the alleged errors concern propositions of law deriving their force from that constitution or the laws or treaties made under it. If such errors are found, a *case for the appellate jurisdiction of the United States courts appears.

*541

It is otherwise when the question concerns the original jurisdiction. Propositions of law are not in themselves the proper elements of such a case. The leading features of a case for original cognizance are the subject matter and law under which the party coming for relief demands judgment. If that party proves himself entitled to a judgment it is on the strength of the proper law of the case, and this is the law under which his demand had its origin. All other matters are incidental and tend merely to deny that the matter in controversy is subject to the law propounded as the ground of relief. It would follow that a case can be said to arise under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United Sattes only when the law propounded as the ground of demanding judgment has its force under that source of authority. If a defendant cannot claim affirmative relief his position is purely defensive, and the matter of his defence is always regarded as incidental to the main question, and, as such, does not enter into the legal description of the nature of the case. When such a defendant asserts title or claim in himself to defeat that set up by the plaintiff, the whole force of his defence is to negative the grounds on which the plaintiff demands judgment, each defensive ground not amounting to the introduction of a new and countercause of action. Where the defendant is entitled to affirmative relief, his matter of defence assumes the form of a cause of action. In that case considerations of a different character would present themselves which cannot properly be discussed in the present case, as it does not possess that feature.

In view of these obvious distinctions, it ought to be concluded that when the constitution used the terms in question, that it was intended that when the words "cases arising," &c., were resorted to for the purpose of fixing original jurisdiction, they should be taken in the sense appropriate to that purpose; and when as the test of appellate jurisdiction, they should be read in a manner agreeable to the idea of such jurisdiction. To assume the contrary is to imply that the framers of the constitution did not understand the differences between the various subjects to which *their language might be applied and their proper application according to the nature of such subject. We must then look for that sense which is agreeable to the nature of original jurisdiction.

*542

It is of the nature of original jurisdiction to attach to a case or to refuse to attach, according to the statement made by the party who is actor in the court, by whatever name he may be called. It is he who moves the court for relief who has a right to demand that the powers of the court shall be exercised in his behalf, if the nature of the case as disclosed by his pleadings warrant it. If it cannot attach at that stage of the proceeding, it can never attach, and, as a general rule, if it then attaches it cannot be lost by any means. There are cases where a general jurisdiction may be ousted in favor of an exclusive special jurisdiction, and there are many cases in which a special and limited jurisdiction may be ousted in favor of one that is general; but these are exceptional cases and leave the general proposition untouched that, for the purpose of determining what is a case for the exercise of original jurisdiction, the statements and allegations of the actor in the case must be looked to as the proper means of determining the existence of jurisdiction. That the framers of the constitution should have intended that the practice in exceptional cases, and not the great general rules established by the experience of mankind, should become the principle of its construction and form the basis for distributing the immense jurisdiction cognizable in the courts of the United States and the various states between those courts is incredible. We must conclude that they intended that the customary rules should be observed in applying their words giving jurisdiction to the various subjects to which they are properly applicable.

The question, then, comes to this: The constitution assumes to assign certain cases to certain juridictions. It assumes that what is meant by a case is well understood and attempts no new definition of the term. It signifies no intention to change any of the features of the great remedial system of the common law and equity, and yet an effect is claimed for its words that subvert fundamental principles of those systems. Nothing is better understood than that the actor should choose his forum, when *there are courts of concurrent jurisdiction, resting as it does on the rational ground that the actor being compelled to build his case, the defendant being concerned only to pull it down, he should have that compensating advantage. It is proposed to take that right from the plaintiff and give it to any defendant who is willing to allege, whether true or false, a defence having its force under the constitution and laws of the United States. To accomplish this end it is necessary to affirm that it was the intention of the constitution that, contrary to the spirit of our judicial system, neither the fact of jurisdiction rightfully acquired nor the nature of the issues as a whole should be decisive of the question of the right to retain that jurisdiction, but that any question of a certain class incidentally arising should control the jurisdiction and accomplish the novelty of stripping a court of general jurisdiction of authority once rightfully acquired. As long as the question of transfer concerned only the cases where jurisdiction depended on the character of the parties, such an anomaly did not arise, because that effect of personal privilege in divesting jurisdiction otherwise rightfully acquired was not unknown to the common law. In a word, a new and hitherto unknown jurisdiction, to which the designation of shifting would not be inappropriate, is to be regarded as of so much importance as to turn the sense of the constitution aside from the natural significance of its language. To repose the administration of justice on the shifting sands of such an unsubstantial system is to wreck it, and to render possible the recurrence of the spectacle afforded by this case; the judiciary of the United States, stretching out its arms and taking from the criminal courts of a state in times of peace, one of its soldiers indicted for murder, and returning him to the ranks of the army without a trial. It would be a blow inflicted on the principles of permanent order that could not be justified by any temporary necessity, however urgent.

*543

It must be concluded, then, that what the constitution meant by a case for the purpose of determining a question of original jurisdiction is the statement of the claim or demand made by a party prosecuting another in a court. This would apply to the case made by an indictment. It is easy, then, to apply the mode *of distinguishing such cases adopted by the constitution, namely, the fact of their origin under the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States.

*544

It will be found that the foregoing construction is in full harmony with the established doctrines as to the extent of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States in case of appeals from the final judgments of the highest courts of the states.

It becomes necessary, at this point, to examine the actual determinations and the doctrines advanced in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States affecting the present question, and in the course of such examination the additional question will come up for consideration, whether, when the Circuit Court of the United States takes jurisdiction through the removal of causes before final judgment, such jurisdiction appertains to that conferred upon them as original or to that given as appellate jurisdiction.

Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304 [4 L. Ed. 97]. In that case an appeal had been taken from the Court of Appeals of Virginia to the United States Supreme Court, and judgment therein rendered and a mandate issued accordingly to the Court of Appeals. The court refused to obey such mandate, on the ground that the United States Supreme Court had not jurisdiction of appeals from a state court, and gave judgment contrary to such mandate. That judgment was appealed to the Supreme Court, and reversed. The question of the right of the Supreme Court to exercise the jurisdiction conferred by Section 25 of the old judiciary act was the only one actually decided, but the opinion of the eminent jurist who rendered the judgment of the court discusses many questions that have an argumentative relation to the question before the court, and are of great interest in view of the distinguished source from which they come and the occasion that called them forth. The basis of the argument in behalf of the jurisdiction claimed by the Supreme Court was the fundamental proposition that congress was bound, under the constitution, to vest the whole judicial power of the United States either as original or appellate jurisdiction. He held that that jurisdiction properly extended in some form to all cases in which questions *arose under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, either directly or indirectly. The existence of an exclusive jurisdiction in the state courts of cases that might involve questions arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States is recognized, and the argument is that as such questions could only be reached through the appellate power, that power must be deemed to be granted as constituting part of the judicial power of the United States.

*545

The argument just stated contains the proposition that within the class of cases described by the constitution as arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States there are two subordinate classes, namely, cases within the original jurisdiction and cases without that jurisdiction, that can only be reached by the appellate jurisdiction. Elsewhere the opinion points out a still further classification of causes within the original jurisdiction of the United States courts, namely, cases for the exclusive cognizance of those courts, and those of which the United States courts and the state courts may have concurrent jurisdiction.

The opinion places the criminal jurisdiction of the United States and the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the class exclusive in the United States courts, and finally says: "It can only be in those cases where, previous to the constitution, state tribunals possessed jurisdiction independent of national authority that they can now constitutionally exercise a concurrent jurisdiction."

To arrive at the means of harmonizing these various propositions it is necessary to bear in mind that the constitution places in one class three subjects of jurisdiction as to which jurisdiction is conferred by the same words. The primary inference would be that if one is the subject of exclusive jurisdiction, all of that class would be so subject. These classes are, first, "cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;" second, "cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls;" and, third, "cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." We have the authority of the distinguished jurist whose opinion

*546

we are considering, that the grant, *as it regards cases in the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, is of exclusive cognizance in the United States courts. We have also his authority to the same effect as it regards one of the class of cases arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, namely, criminal prosecutions under the laws of the United States. This last statement requires certification. The conclusion that jurisdiction in criminal cases, under the laws of the United States, cannot be conferred on the state courts, must depend on the principle that cases originating within the "judicial power" of the United States cannot be placed beyond that judicial power for adjudication, as that power is exclusively vested in the United States courts. The constitution draws no distinction between civil and criminal causes as it regards the matter of jurisdiction, so that it must be controlled by provisions common to both civil and criminal cases. It follows that the criminal jurisdiction of the United States is created and vested under the clause that relates to cases arising under the constitution and laws. We have here authority for the proposition that some of the cases that are described as arising under the constitution and laws of the United States become, under the grant relating to such cases, the subject of exclusive jurisdiction in the United States courts. We have also the same authority for the proposition that others of the same class may be the subject of concurrent jurisdiction in the courts of the United States and the states. The last class is described as including those cases "where, previous to the constitution, state tribunals possessed jurisdiction independently of national authority." The learned judge is here adverting to a distinction between cases arising under the constitution, &c., the effect of the application of which is to consign part to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States courts and part to the concurrent jurisdiction of the United States and the state courts. Here, then, is a distinct instance where words conveying jurisdiction over a class of subjects must yield different senses when the nature of the different subjects demand it. I shall endeavor to show the ground of this distinction.

Every action capable of being prosecuted must be constituted as such by some law.

The law may be the law of a state or of *the United States. In the latter case the action may be said to have its origin under the laws of the United States, and, whatever may be its nature, it has the same character, as far as jurisdiction is concerned, as a criminal cause under the laws of the United States. It is very clear that the class of cases described as arising under the constitution and laws of the United States has a much more extended range than that just indicated. A right of action may exist in virtue of our law, and the subject-matter of the action may arise out of an entirely distinct law. An action upon a contract made subject to the law of a foreign state illustrates the distinction. An action in a state court for the recovery of land claimed under title arising out of the laws of the United States is another instance. The right by which one clothed with the title to land seeks to be put in possession may exist under a state law and yet the title depend on the force and effect of the laws of the United States. When the right of action arises out of the laws of the United States, as we have seen, the jurisdiction of the United States courts is exclusive. This depends on the principle that congress is required to vest the entire judicial power of the United States in its own courts; it cannot delegate that judicial power to the state courts, nor can the latter exercise it without delegation. It follows that a right of action, having its origin as such, under the laws of the United States, appertains to its judicial power and cannot be separated from it. The class of cases recognized by the opinion under consideration as those in which the courts of the United States and those of the states have concurrent jurisdiction must, then, be of those in which the right of action has arisen under the laws of a state, yet the claim or demand presented by means of such action has arisen under the constitution and laws of the United States. It is clear that it was not intended to be held that every case cognizable by a state before the adoption of the constitution of the United States is the subject of concurrent jurisdiction, for that would include the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, which is held to be exclusive. The distinction must then be found in the nature of the cases described as arising under the constitution, &c., and that pointed out is the only one that appears to meet this case.
*547

*548
*When it is remembered that the learned judge is here discussing the question of original jurisdiction, it will become manifest that he construed the words of the constitution in extending the original jurisdiction of the United States courts only to cases where the title, claim or demand sued upon has arisen under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States. This is obvious, both from the nature of the conclusion and from the necessary meaning of other expressions in the opinion that will be hereafter considered.

It must be conceded that wherever concurrent original jurisdiction exists between the courts of the states and of the United States, congress may make that jurisdiction exclusive in the United States courts. At all events that proposition is fundamental to the appellant's case, for the whole power of removal, as between courts of concurrent jurisdiction, rests upon that principle. If, then, the original jurisdiction of the United States may extend to any case in which a federal question arises incidentally or collaterally, the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States courts may be extended thus far, so that the moment that a federal question is presented in a state court it would lose its jurisdiction, without regard to whether provision was or was not made to remove such cause to the United States courts. If such a doctrine should be established, the state judicial systems are practically at an end; or if they continue to exist for any useful purpose and with any dignity and authority, it is not because they are secure under the constitution, but because congress sees fit to spare them. Such a consequence cannot have been within the intention, or even within the contemplation, of the eminent jurist whose views we are considering. He was too near to the times and too much under the influence of the opinions that embodied in the constitution the great principle of placing the local governments and the general government as mutual checks upon each other, to make this instrument the means of destroying the efficiency of that balance.

This view of the authority quoted prepares us to understand what is stated in another part of the opinion in these words: "It must, therefore, be concluded that the constitution not only contemplated but meant to provide for cases within the scope of the *federal powers of the United States, which might yet depend before state tribunals. It was foreseen that in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction state courts would incidentally take cognizance of cases arising under the constitution, the laws and the treaties of the United States. Yet, to all these cases the judicial power, by the very terms of the constitution, is to extend. It cannot extend by original jurisdiction if that has already rightfully and exclusively attached in the state courts, which, as has been already shown, may occur; it must, therefore, extend by appellate jurisdiction or not at all."
*549

Here it is distinctly conceded that an extent may be given to the appellate powers of the United States courts that cannot be given to the original jurisdiction of those courts—a conclusion that necessarily involves the proposition that the words "arising under the constitution," &c., are to receive a somewhat different construction when applied to define original jurisdiction than when applicable to appellate jurisdiction. The instance cited as at least one of the causes giving rise to the conclusion of the opinion in this respect, is the circumstance of a state court obtaining possession of a federal question "incidentally," showing that it was in the mind of the learned judge that original jurisdiction could not extend to such cases. The argument is based on the constitutional inability of the original jurisdiction to reach all cases within the judicial power, for it is the intention of the constitution that is made the argument in behalf of the appellate power. Comparing the citation last made with those previously made, the reference is irresistible that the class of cases to which the original jurisdiction cannot extend, is that class where the federal question comes in "incidentally." Coming in incidentally means beyond doubt, coming in otherwise than as the foundation of the right put in suit by the action. This is not only the usual sense of the term, but is necessary to complete the view of the opinion. It first traces the lines of the original jurisdiction, both exclusive and concurrent, in order to find a class that falls outside of such line, and on that class bases the argument for the extended appellate power of the United States Courts.

We come now to a question that appears at first sight to be put in doubt by the views of this eminent authority. That doubt *will, however, disappear on a close examination of the opinion. The language of the opinion involves the proposition that the right of appeal from the state courts stands upon the same ground of constitutional authority with the right to remove causes from the state to the federal courts. He says: "This power of removal is not to be found in express terms in any part of the constitution. If it be given, it is only by implication as a power necessary to carry into effect some express power." He compares this right of removal with that existing in the courts of common law, and regards the two as identical in nature. He says that this right of removal "is always deemed, in both cases, an exercise of appellate jurisdiction and not of original jurisdiction." He concludes that the right of removal is embraced in the grant of appellate power, and is one of the modes in which it may be exercised, all modes being open under the grant of judicial power. He holds that, as appertaining to the appellate power, it may be exercised before as well as after judgment, on the ground that congress may authorize appeals from interlocutory judgments.

*550

It must be conceded that if the right of removing causes from a state to a federal court is derived from the right to establish appellate jurisdiction, then that power is commensurate with the appellate power of the Supreme Court over causes pending in a state court. That that power has been conclusively shown by the decisions of the Supreme Court, and is established by law under the constitution, cannot be disputed. As such it embraces all cases in which any question arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States arises incidentally and is material to the judgment. It is at present limited to cases where a decision has been made in effect denying some right claimed under the federal law, but that limitation is imposed by congress and not by the constitution, and may be removed by the same authority that gave it existence. Such a conclusion would involve the practical absorption and destruction of the judicial systems of the states. When it is considered that it is within the constitutional power of congress to affect the great mass of, if not all, transactions and contracts by some right, having its origin under the laws of the United States, especially *under its power to regulate commerce between the states, to levy duties, imposts and excises, to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and fix the standards of weights and measures, it is obvious that such a construction of the constitution aims a blow at the balance of power, local and general, that distinguishes this republic from other western republics, and was thought to promise to preserve it from that fate which the lessons of history seem to mark out for unbalanced republics. It cannot for a moment be supposed that this sound lawyer and able statesman contemplated any such possibility, living, as he did, in the midst of the men and institutions that created the constitution. It is true that expanding a system of government through implications drawn from the text of a written constitution, is the work of lawyers and not necessarily of statesmen, but we know that the eminent lawyers of that day were grounded in the sound principles of government, not from the teachings of schools of philosophy, but from the sober experiences of events that put in peril all social and political rights.

*551

It should be remembered that the idea of employing the power of congress to remove from the state to the federal courts causes there pending, on the ground of their involving incidentally federal questions, had not, at that time, been entertained in any legislation by congress. That Judge Story did not conceive the possibility of its application to any such purpose, is apparent from the nature of the argument by which he sustained the appellate jurisdiction of the court on argument that rested on the incapacity of drawing within the original jurisdiction of the United States courts cases where state jurisdiction had "rightfully and exclusively" attached. That he had in mind a much more limited idea of removal than that which would justify a court of the United States in taking a case out of a state court prior to any judgment or even interlocutory order therein, and proceed to hear and determine and render an original judgment therein is evident from language that has already been referred to. He instances the right of removal before judgment as dependent on the ground that appellate power may extend to the revision of an interlocutory as a final judgment. This shows that he had in mind that removal of a cause which is, in sub*stance and effect, an appeal, and presupposes a judgment or order as the subject of revision under that appeal. Again, he compares that mode of removal to certain modes prevailing at common law. The writ of certiorari is doubtless the remedy at common law that he had chiefly in view as a type of a class. That writ is undoubtedly a means of a limited character of revision. At common law that writ did not open the case for an original judgment in the court to which it was returned. There is a statute certiorari sometimes allowed to remove causes from an inferior court of appeal or limited jurisdiction that admits of an original hearing and judgment in the court to which it is returned; but there the writ is merely process incidental to an appeal, and, as such, is unknown to the common law, and only issues after a judgment below. It is easy to conclude that what was in view was something totally different from the removal of causes under Section 643, but it is not clear what was the precise idea here attached to the right of removal.

*552

To say that it is the same in substance to take a cause before verdict or judgment and remove it into a court other than that in which it orginated, and there try and hear the issue involved and render an original judgment and to take it by way of appeal after judgment, even though in the latter case the court may try the case de novo, is the obliteration of simple and clear legal distinctions. Such an intention ought not to be imputed to that distinguished jurist, except upon the strongest grounds of proof, and no such proofs are afforded by the opinion in question.

Aside from the importance that is given to the question by the obscure reference to it made by Judge Story, it is too plain and obvious to admit of discussion. The object of removal to the Circuit Court, under the judiciary act and its amendments, is to prevent the state court from trying or hearing the cause if a party having the right to remove so desires, and not for any purpose of revision. This is evident from the fact that the removal, if made at all, must be made before trial or hearing. If the object in view was the exercise of appellate power, the fact of a trial or hearing would constitute the strongest claim for the exercise of such appellate power. It must be concluded that the removal of causes to the Circuit Court is intended as a means of *obtaining original jurisdiction, and may take place in certain cases where the state court is excluded from such jurisdiction by the exclusive character of the jurisdiction of the United States courts, or where such courts have concurrent jurisdiction at the election of certain parties after suit brought to transfer the cause to the United States courts. If this is the true view, then the question in regard to the right to remove any particular case is whether it could have been brought in the first instance in the United States courts, and that would exclude at least criminal cases prosecuted under the laws of a state.

*553

Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264 [5 L. Ed. 257]. The argument of Chief Justice Marshall in that case is in substantial accordance with that in Martin v. Hunter. The broad definition that is given to the grant of jurisdiction in cases arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, is expressive of all that may be brought into the jurisdiction of the United States courts by means of their combined original and appellate jurisdiction. That the latter has the largest scope is conceded in this case as it was in Martin v. Hunter. The question of the appellate power was the only one before the court, and, therefore, the largest possible definition of the jurisdiction granted was pertinent to the case. What has been already said is applicable to Cohens v. Virginia and need not be repeated.

It admits of no doubt, on comparing the provisions of the original judiciary act with the reasonings on which the limits of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, was settled, that the prevailing idea was that when questions arising under federal laws were presented incidentally in causes properly brought originally in the state courts, the final adjudication of such questions in the United States courts should be accomplished through the exercise of the appellate power of the Supreme Court, and not by the removal of such causes for original adjudication in the United States courts. To this idea the administration of justice was brought contemporaneously almost with the constitution itself and was maintained for nearly a century. It is an instance of contemporaneous exposition reinforced by a settled system of administration lasting nearly a century. It is now proposed to *put new readings on the constitution to meet emergencies arising from public debt incurred in a great war. We may well pause to inquire whether the emergency is of sufficient magnitude, and sufficiently likely to occur in the future to warrant a readjustment of the federal powers of the government based on more critical views of the meaning of the constitution than those who framed it were enabled to take, although they inaugurated the government under circumstances in many respects similar to the present, at the close of an exhausting war and in the presence of public debt and the necessity for extraordinary revenues. The infant government struggled into a state of organization and self-support without disturbing the balance between the general and local administrations, and we may well inquire whether their ideas of government may not be adequate to any present or prospective emergency. These considerations have no place here as suggesting a question of policy, with which the courts have nothing to do, but as the means of estimating the degree of force that should be accredited to the practical exposition of the constitution embodied in the statutes of that time and the practice of the courts thereunder. If there is a disputable sense involved in the language of the constitution, that sense that has been thus practically embodied should be preferred.

*554

The constitution confers upon the Supreme Court, under its appellate jurisdiction, power to determine upon appeal matters both of fact and law. Why this power has not been fully put in exercise it is unimportant to inquire. The grant stands on the face of the constitution, and, under it, it is not possible, in a legal sense, that a state court may abuse its judicial power without a corrective being applied through this appellate power. It is not necessary to trace all the consequences of this provision. Its insertion in the constitution is best accounted for on the idea that that appellate power should be the means of preventing any maladministration on the part of the state judiciary, by means that leave untouched the integrity of the system of state administration. Then the argument from necessity falls to the ground, and that from reason, authority and the practice of the government remains unimpeached.

*555

*It follows that no authority existed for the removal of the cause to the United States Circuit Court; therefore the jurisdiction of the General Sessions remains intact and its proceedings must be sustained.

An order affirming the judgment has been already entered.

Judgment affirmed.

McIVER and HASKELL, A. J.'s, concurred.

[Reversed, Davis v. South Carolina, 107 U. S. 597, 2 Sup. Ct. 636, 27 L. Ed. 574.]

12 S. C. 555

(Case No. 767.†)

A. J. KIBLER v. J. D. McILWAIN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Appeal and Error ⟸425.]

Appeal dismissed on motion, for want of service of notice of appeal upon the clerk of the Circuit Court, within the time required by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2155; Dec. Dig. ⟸425.]

[This case is also cited in Crane, Boylston & Co. v. Moses, 13 S. C. 43, and distinguished therefrom.]

Motion to dismiss appeal, notice of appeal not having been served upon the clerk of the Circuit Court for the proper county, within the time required by statute. The appeal in this case was taken before the act of December 19th, 1878, took effect. 16 Stat. 698.

November 28th, 1879. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. The appeal must be dismissed for want of service in due time of notice of appeal upon the clerk. The power of allowing the rectification of any proceedings in taking an appeal where defective is regulated by the code and confined in terms to proceedings other than the notice of appeal as required. This excludes any general authority that might otherwise have been exercised.

Motion granted.

† This is the first decided case of those heard during the term of the present Reporter, which commenced September 27th, 1879.

12 S. C. *556

*(Case No. 772.)

L. D. POOLE et al. v. W. P. BROWN et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸20.]

This court, on an appeal, can exercise jurisdiction of only such matters as were within the original jurisdiction of the court in which the action was instituted.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Caldwell v. Little, 15 S. C. 241.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 81; Dec. Dig. ⟸20.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸185.]

This court, on appeal, will, of its own motion, take notice of the want of jurisdiction in the Court of Probate of a suit commenced in that court, where the allowance of the appeal would require further action in the case by the Court of Probate.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Reeder v. Workman, 37 S. C. 415, 16 S. E. 187.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1174; Dec. Dig. ⟸185.]

[3. Trusts ⟸298.]

The Court of Probate has no jurisdiction of a petition in the nature of a bill in equity by a cestui que trust against his trustee for an accounting, when it does not involve any matters testamentary. Const. Art. IV., § 20.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 417; Dec. Dig. ⟸298.]

Before Kershaw, J., at Spartanburg, March, 1878.

John Brown died in 1857, leaving a will, of which W. P. Brown and E. P. Brown qualified as executors. One of the devisees of testator was his daughter, Polly Poole, whose share was to be retained by W. P. Brown and E. P. Brown, as trustees for her to be managed and controlled by them and kept at interest for her benefit, the interest to be paid annually to his daughter during life, and after her death the corpus to be divided equally amongst her children.

Upon a settlement made by the executors before the Ordinary in 1860, the share of Polly Poole was ascertained to be $2020.93, which, by decree of the Ordinary, was ordered to be retained by E. P. Brown and W. P. Brown, executors of John Brown, deceased, they accounting for interest thereon. This interest was annually paid to Polly Poole until 1868. In 1871, Polly Poole and her husband, with an informal power of attorney from her children authorizing a full settlement with the trustees and a receipt of the amount, demanded an account and payment. The matter was referred to arbitration, and an award made, the amount whereof was paid to Polly and her husband upon their receipt. Polly Poole died in 1873, leaving L. D. Poole and W. D. Poole her only surviving children who afterwards filed their *petition in the Court of Probate for Spartanburg county, praying an accounting and settlement by W. P. Brown and E. P. Brown of the share of Polly Poole, retained by the said trustees. The judge of probate sustained the settlement made by the arbitrators and adopted their award as the decree of the court. On appeal to the Circuit Court, this decree was affirmed; and the plaintiffs then appealed to this court.

*557

No question was made in the Court of Probate, in the Circuit Court or in the arguments of counsel in this court, as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate.

Messrs. Evins, Bomar & Simpson and Duncan & Cleveland, for appellants.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for respondents.

December 4th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This suit was commenced in the Probate Court by cestuis que trust under a testamentary trust for an account against the plaintiffs as trustees, and is virtually based on an alleged breach of trust. The breach of trust alleged is that the trustees paid part of the trust estate to certain persons claiming to be the attorneys and agents of the plaintiffs, who had no such authority, and had assumed, in conjunction with such persons claiming to represent the plaintiffs, to submit to arbitration the question of the amount of the trust estate, and under the award of the arbitrators they had refused to pay the balance of the trust estate.

The Probate Court refused the petition of the plaintiffs, not upon the ground of want of jurisdiction, but on the ground that full payment had been made by the defendants. We are asked to reverse the decree of the Circuit Court affirming that of the Probate Court. The effect of the decree for which the appellants contend would be to sanction the jurisdiction assumed by the Probate Court, as this court, upon an appeal from a Circuit Court decree, based upon a decree of the Probate Court, can only exercise the jurisdiction proper to the Probate Court as the *court of original jurisdiction. No exception has been brought before us based on the want of jurisdiction in the Probate Court, and, therefore, it is not the right of the parties to insist upon any such defect of jurisdiction in that court. A question of jurisdiction is not necessarily incapable of being considered by this court, merely because not raised by the record, as has often been held. Where the appeal is such that if allowed the court will be compelled to put in exercise powers, as pertaining to the court of original jurisdiction, that are beyond the competency of that court, a case is made for the consideration of such question of jurisdiction, even though no exception is before it for that purpose.

*558

The question then arises, whether the Probate Court had jurisdiction of a petition in the nature of a bill in equity by a cestui que trust against his trustee, alleging a breach of trust.

The constitution (Article IV., Section 20,) fixes the jurisdiction of the Probate Court in these words: "A Court of Probate shall be established in each county, with jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration, in business appertaining to minors and the allotment of dower, in cases of idiocy and lunacy, and persons non compotes mentis." Unless the matter of the present suit can be regarded as a "matter testamentary," it cannot be brought within the terms of the grant of jurisdiction.

A trust, even though testamentary, is not necessarily a "matter testamentary" in the sense of the constitution. An action to enforce the trust is primarily based upon the liability of a trustee and not on that of an executor, and matters testamentary are such as grow out of the liability of an executor. It may be that where one is made both executor and trustee by a will, and the insolvency of the trustee or other sufficient reason makes it necessary for the cestui que trust to pursue the assets of the testamentary estate specifically, that a right of action might exist that could properly be regarded as a matter testamentary. The existence of such a right in that case could not be presumed, for when the executor is required to pay to himself as trustee, the law presumes such payment made, and the liability subsequently *arising must be presumed to be that due to the character of trustee.

*559

It would be specially objectionable to make a contrary presumption for the mere purpose of bringing the case within the jurisdiction of a court of special jurisdiction. Such being the case, it was necessary that the record should show facts and circumstances repelling this presumption in order to confer upon the Probate Court jurisdiction of the case as a matter testamentary. It nowhere appears that the plaintiffs are seeking to subject the defendants to liability on any other ground than that of a breach of trust committed by them as trustees. This is the aspect of the case presented by the Circuit decree. It appears in the case, in confirmation of this view, that there had been a final accounting before the Ordinary and a decree that the trust estate in executors' hands be retained by them as trustees, and the petition does not seek to get rid of that order or modify it in any way. This is conclusive of the proposition that the matter in dispute was the accounting of a trustee, and not any matter testamentary.

The appeal must be dismissed, and the Circuit decree is affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

McIVER and HASKELL,† A. J.'s, concurred.

† This is the last appearance of Judge Haskell's name as associate justice, he having resigned his office December 5th, 1879.

12 S. C. 559

(Case No. 775.)

W. A. ROGERS v. E. W. NASH, Administrator.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Exceptions, Bill of ⟸39.]

When the appellant fails to furnish the presiding judge with a copy of his exceptions within ten days after the rising of the court at which the judgment was rendered, the appeal will be dismissed on motion. 16 Stat. 698.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sullivan v. Speights, 12 S. C. 561, 562.

For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. ⟸39.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸633.]

When appellant fails to serve his case and exceptions within thirty days after giving his notice of appeal, the appeal will be dismissed on motion.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Scurry v. Coleman, 14 S. C. 166, 168; Gibbes v. G. & C. R. Co., Id., 385, 391; McElwee v. McElwee, Id. 623; Stribling v. Johns, 16 S. C. 116.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2773; Dec. Dig. ⟸633.]

[3. Exceptions, Bill of ⟸39.]

[Cited in Godbold v. Vance, 14 S. C. 470, to the point that the act of 1878 (16 Stat. 698) does not profess to be an amendment of the Code.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 52, 54–56, 60; Dec. Dig. ⟸39.]

[This case is also cited in Hyatt v. McBurney, 17 S. C. 151, without specific application.]

*560

*Motion to dismiss appeal from decree of Aldrich, J., Greenville, July, 1879.

This was an equity cause, heard on exceptions to the master's report, and decree rendered in open court, July 17th, 1879, during the term. It does not appear when the term was adjourned. Notice of appeal was given to respondent July 22d, judgment was entered August 9th, and the case, with exceptions, was served August 30th. The exceptions raised legal questions only.

Mr. W. L. Wait, for the motion.

Mr. D. R. Speer, contra.

December 10th, 1879. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal and shows that the appellant did not furnish the presiding judge with a copy of the exceptions within ten days after the rising of the court. The statute (16 Stat. 698), imperatively requires that such service shall be made within ten days after the rising of the court, and declares that if not so done the appeal shall be deemed to be waived. This statute does not profess to be an amendment to the code, so that the provisions of the code in relation to enlarging time and curing defects and irregularities, may have an application to it, but excludes that right, in this instance, by providing for its exercise in one of the instances provided for in the statute, but not in the case of a failure to take exceptions within ten days after the rising of the court. It follows that the appeal must be deemed waived, although it is competent for the respondent to ask the dismissal of the appeal.

It also appears that the appellant failed to serve the respondent with a copy of the case and exceptions within thirty days after serving his notice of appeal. This is also required by the statute, to which reference has already been made. The statute allows the enlargement of the time for serving the case and exceptions, but that must be accomplished in the manner pointed out in the act. As there has been no enlargement of the time, *according to the provisions of the act, the appeal must be deemed waived under the provisions of the act, and the appeal must be dismissed on the last-named ground as well as upon that previously considered.

*561

The motion must be granted and the appeal dismissed.

Motion granted.

12 S. C. 561

(Case No. 776.)

HEWLETT SULLIVAN v. A. M. SPEIGHTS et al.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Exceptions, Bill of ⟸39.]

A failure to furnish the presiding judge with a copy of exceptions within ten days after the rising of the court at which judgment was rendered, operates as a waiver of the appeal. Rogers v. Nash, ante p. 559, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. ⟸39.]

[2. Exceptions, Bill of ⟸41.]

The time within which the exceptions must be furnished to the presiding judge is not enlarged in cases where they are sent by mail.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Walters v. Laurens Cotton Mills, 53 S. C. 159, 31 S. E. 1; Craig v. United States Health & Accident Ins. Co., 80 S. C. 155, 61 S. E. 423, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 106, 128 Am. St. Rep. 877.

For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. ⟸41.]

[3. Exceptions, Bill of ⟸39.]

The provision of Section 427 of the code is intended for the benefit of the party upon whom the service is made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 52, 54–56, 60; Dec. Dig. ⟸39.]

Motion to dismiss the appeal.

This was an action upon a bond, tried before Fraser, J., and a jury, at Greenville, April, 1879. Thirteen days after the rising of the court, the appellants mailed to the address of the presiding judge a copy of their exceptions.

[For subsequent opinion, see 14 S. C. 358.]

Mr. C. G. Wells, for motion.

Messrs. Stokes & Featherston, contra.

December 11th, 1879. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the exceptions were not furnished to the presiding judge within the time prescribed by law.

It appears from the motion papers, and the fact does not seem to be controverted, that no exceptions were furnished to the pre*siding judge until after the expiration of ten days from the rising of the court at which the case was tried; and the only question is as to the proper construction of the act entitled "An act to alter and amend the law in relation to appeals from the Circuit Court to the Supreme Court," approved December 19th, 1878. 16 Stat. 698.

*562

This question has been disposed of by the decision rendered in the case of Rogers v. Nash, in which it was held that a failure to furnish the presiding judge with a copy of the exceptions within ten days after the rising of the court at which the case was tried, operated as a waiver of the appeal.

It was argued, however, that the service of the exceptions in this case was made by mail, and that by Section 427 of the code, when that mode of service is adopted, the time is enlarged to double the time required in cases of personal service. A sufficient answer to this is, that the act of December 19th, 1878, does not purport to be an amendment of the code, and, therefore, that provision of the code cannot be regarded as affecting the provisions of the act now under consideration. In addition to this, however, we may say that the provision of the code by which the time is doubled in case of service by mail, is intended for the benefit of the party upon whom the service is made, and not for the benefit of the party making the service. For while there is good reason for extending the time within which any act is to be done by a party who has been served by mail after such service, there is no reason for such extension in favor of one who adopts that mode of serving another, inasmuch as the service is complete from the time the paper to be served is deposited in the post-office, addressed to the person upon whom it is to be served, at the place of his residence, with the postage paid. Code, § 426.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

Motion granted.

12 S. C. *563

*(Case No. 777.)

M. P. LAKE v. J. P. MOORE et al.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸348.]

The time for giving notice of appeal from a judgment filed in vacation begins to run from the receipt of written notice of the judgment, notwithstanding actual notice, as by reading the original decree, previously had.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Maner v. Wilson, 16 S. C. 475; Bowers v. Watts, 40 S. C. 548, 18 S. E. 888; Greenwood Loan & Guarantee Ass'n v. Childs, 67 S. C. 252, 45 S. E. 167.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1902; Dec. Dig. ⟸348.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸937.]

The burden of proving that irregularities were committed in preparing an appeal, is upon the party alleging them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3788; Dec. Dig. ⟸937.]

[This case is also cited in McElwee v. McElwee, 14 S. C. 623, and distinguished therefrom.]

Motion to dismiss appeal.

The decision of Fraser, J., was filed in the clerk's office May 23d, 1879, which was during vacation. Defendants' attorney read it same day and directed notice of it to be served on attorney for plaintiff, which was done. Subsequently defendants' attorney obtained a copy of the decision from the deputy clerk of the court. Afterwards, on July 26th, defendants gave notice of appeal. This was a motion by plaintiff to dismiss the appeal.

Messrs. Earle, Wells & Westmoreland, for motion.

Mr. A. Blythe, contra.

December 11th, 1879. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. The respondent asks the dismissal of the appeal on the ground that the notice of appeal was not given in due time. It appears that the judgment appealed from was filed in vacation, and that no notice, in writing, was given to the appellant of its entry. It is contended, however, that the appellant had actual knowledge of the judgment, having seen and read it in the office of the clerk. This was not ground sufficient to put the statute laws for appealing in currency in the case of a judgment entered in vacation. The object of the notice is to apprise the appellant that the respondent intends to insist on an appeal within the time fixed by law, and unless such notice is *given the appellant is unrestricted as it regards the time within which an appeal may be taken.

*564

The respondent alleges that the case was not served within thirty days after notice of appeal was given. The motion papers contain no proof of this fact, and as the burden of proof is on the party moving upon the ground of irregularity, the matter charged must be regarded as unproved.

The motion must be dismissed.

---

12 S. C. 564

(Case No. 779.)

W. T. CRIBB et al. v. MARY ROGERS et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Deeds ⟸120.]

A deed of land to A in consideration of "love, good-will and natural affection," reserving to grantor "the use of said lands during my natural life only," habendum to A, her heirs and assigns forever, conveys the fee to A in præsenti, charged with a life-estate in favor of the grantor. Cases cited, and Dinkins v. Samuel, 10 Rich. 66, limited.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sumner v. Harrison, 54 S. C. 362, 32 S. E. 572.

For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 454; Dec. Dig. ⟸120.]

[2. Deeds ⟸142.]

A fee may be granted with a reservation of the usufruct to grantor for life.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ellen v. Ellen, 16 S. C. 142; Jacobs v. Mutual Ins. Co. of Greenville, 52 S. C. 118, 29 S. E. 533; Cook v. Cooper, 59 S. C. 564, 38 S. E. 218; Steele v. Smith, 84 S. C. 468, 66 S. E. 200; Rembert v. Veote, 89 S. C. 216, 71 S. E. 959.

For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 464; Dec. Dig. ⟸142.]

Before Wallace, J., Marion, April, 1879.

Action for recovery of a tract of land. At the trial the Circuit judge permitted defendants to introduce testimony to show a valuable consideration. Margaret Lewis, mentioned in the deed, and one of the defendants herein, was a step-daughter of grantor, and Mary Rogers was her tenant. Verdict for defendants.

The character of the claim and the terms of the deed under which defendants held are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Harllee & Montgomery, for appellants, cited 10 Rich. 66; 4 McC. 14; 4 Kent. 5; 2 Black. Com. 104; Wms. on Real Prop. 55, 155–6; Gen. Stat. 427, § 8.

Mr. J. G. Blue, for respondent, cited 1 Mills 148; 10 Rich. 66; 2 Strob. Eq. 376; 3 Strob. 21.

*565

*December 17th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The plaintiffs claim as heirs-at-law of D. Cribb, and the defendants under the following deed of lands: "I, Dempsey Cribb, of the county and state aforesaid, for and in consideration of the love, goodwill and natural affection which I have and bear to Margaret Lewis, have given, granted and conveyed, and by these presents do give, grant, release, convey and deliver to the said Margaret Lewis, a certain tract, piece or parcel of land, containing four hundred and sixty-seven acres, more or less, reserving for myself the use of said lands during my natural life only, said lands being situated," &c. Then follows the description of the lands conveyed "to the said Margaret Lewis, her heirs and assigns forever." The deed concludes with a general covenant of warranty, and was duly executed and attested.

The only question affecting the validity and operation of the deed, as sufficient to pass a fee in the lands conveyed, arises out of the words, "reserving for myself the use of said lands during my natural life only." The fact that the usufruct is separated from the fee is not inconsistent with the vesting of the fee. The grantor may convey the fee to one and the usufruct to another; hence the reservation of the usufruct to himself violates no rule governing the vesting of the fee. The grantee takes the fee, burdened with a use in favor of the grantor for his natural life.

It has been argued that under the operation of the statute of uses the fee was, at the moment of its creation, thrown upon the grantor by the execution of its uses, and thus the deed rendered ineffectual. The statute of uses could not operate until there was such a title in the grantee, as the deed was intended to vest, and this was a fee. The only effect of the statute would, assuming its operation, be to cast upon the grantor an estate commensurate with the uses created by the deed, and that would be a life-estate, leaving a remainder in fee vested in the grantee, which would owe its existence as such, not to the deed, but to the operation of the statute. The rules of the common law, as it regards the support required for a remainder, are, therefore, inapplicable, for the deed does not create a remainder as such. *The statute cannot operate to defeat the deed, for it was not intended to have such effect, but only to effectuate its purposes by raising estates competent to give the fullest support to its uses.

*566

Jenkins v. Jenkins, 1 Mills C. R. 48. That case fully sustains the conclusions just stated. The same conclusions were reached in Sunday v. Boon (MS.), cited in Jaggers v. Estes, 2 Strob. Eq. 376 [49 Am. Dec. 674].

Singleton v. Bremar, 4 McC. 15 [17 Am. Dec. 699]. The present interest was conveyed by the deed in that case, as it was to take effect only upon the death of the grantor. It is contrary to the nature of a deed that it should commence to operate as such at a time subsequent to its delivery; on the contrary, it must take effect, if at all, from the moment of delivery to operate as a deed, though in certain cases it may be upheld as a covenant to stand seized to the use of the grantee.

Dinkins v. Samuel, 10 Rich. 66. The principal question actually passed upon by the court was, whether such a relationship subsisted between the parties to the deed as could support the deed as a covenant to stand seized upon the consideration of natural love and affection. The conclusion that the deed in that case could not operate as a conveyance of a present interest probably arose from the terms of the habendum clause, and appears to have been reached without any particular consideration of the terms of the deed. As no reference is made to Jenkins v. Jenkins, it is fair to conclude that the view presented by this case was not pressed upon the court. Certainly no intention to overrule that case can be assumed, as it is not expressed, and it may reasonably be assumed that some attempt would have been made to distinguish that case from Jenkins v. Jenkins if the question in all its bearings was in the mind of the court. Judge Withers should then be understood, when, speaking of the absence of a substantial valuable consideration, he says: "It is, therefore, not a deed of bargain and sale; it is not a conveyance by lease and release, nor a deed of feoffment. The only question is, whether it can operate by way of covenant to stand seized to uses," as intending only that there was no such valuable consideration as would be competent to raise a use that would support the deed *as a covenant to stand seized, where it was, for other reasons, confessedly inoperative as a deed. It is enough to show the correctness of this interpretation that the deed in that case did express a nominal pecuniary consideration, in addition to natural love and affection, showing that he was solely considering the operation of the deed as a covenant to stand seized.

*567

It appears, then, that a present interest passed under the deed, and it becomes unnecessary to consider the other questions discussed, as they relate to the proofs to which resort may be had to support the deed as a covenant to stand seized. Misdirections as to such immaterial issue could not have affected the verdict of the jury who sustained the defendant's title.

The appeal should be dismissed and the judgment affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 567

(Case No. 785.)

THE STATE v. BELTON SAMPSON et al.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Burglary ⇐4.]

A mill-house, in which no one sleeps, distant seventy-five yards from its owner's dwelling-house, but separated by a public highway therefrom, and not proved to be appurtenant, is not the subject of burglary at common law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Evans, 18 S. C. 139; State v. Anderson, 24 S. C. 116; State v. Johnson, 45 S. C. 489, 23 S. E. 619.

For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 14–18; Dec. Dig. ⇐4.]

[2. Burglary ⇐4.]

In the absence of evidence showing the character and relation of such a mill-house, it cannot be deemed a parcel of the dwelling-house, or of its appurtenances, under the terms of Chapter CXXIX., § 32, of the general statutes.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Puckett, 95 S. C. 117, 78 S. E. 737, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 999.

For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. ⇐4.]

Before Aldrich, J., Abbeville, June, 1879.

Indictment against Belton Sampson and Ben Seawright for burglary. The facts are all stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. G. Graydon, for appellants, cited 1 Bouv. L. Dict., tit. "Appurtenance;" 1 Bl. Com. 88; and State v. Ginns, 1 N. & McC. 583. As to the fine, Gen. Stat., ch. CXXIX., § 7.

*568

*Mr. Solicitor Cothran, contra, contended that State v. Ginns was decided by a divided court, and had never been acceptable to the profession. As to the fine not invalidating the sentence, he cited 1 Archb. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 676–7, but admitted that there could be no fine.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an indictment for burglary in breaking and entering, in the night-time, into a mill-house and stealing therefrom flour and corn. The mill-house was situated about seventy-five yards from the dwelling-house of the prosecutor, on the opposite side of a public road, and was not inclosed. No one slept in it. The Circuit judge charged the jury "that the mill was the subject of burglary, and instructed them that if they believed that the defendants broke into it in the night-time and carried away the flour and corn, as alleged in the indictment, they must find them guilty." To this charge and instruction exception was duly taken, upon the ground that the mill-house was not the subject of burglary. The defendants having been found guilty, were sentenced "to be imprisoned at hard labor in the state penitentiary for three years, and to pay a fine of one dollar." Exception was also taken to so much of the sentence as imposed a fine.

At common law, the offence of burglary consisted in breaking and entering the dwelling-house of another with intent to commit a felony therein; and the term "dwelling-house" was held to include all outhouses contiguous to the dwelling and parcel thereof, if within the curtilage. 4 Bl. Com. 224; 2 Russ. on Crimes 14; 2 Bish. on Crim. L., § 104. These authorities show that to bring an outhouse within the curtilage of a dwelling-house, it must be parcel of or appurtenant thereto, and be connected therewith by being under the same roof or within the same inclosure. For, as is said by Blackstone, "if the barn, stable or warehouse be parcel of the mansion-house and within the same common fence, though not under the same roof or contiguous, a burglary may be committed therein, for the capital house protects and privileges all its branches or appurtenants, if within the curtilage or homestall." So in Russell, it is said "any out*house within the curtilage or same common fence as the mansion itself, was considered to be parcel of the mansion." And in Bishop's work: "The term 'dwelling-house' also includes the entire cluster of buildings not separated by a public way, which are used for purposes connected with the habitation." And in 1 Bouv. L. Dict. 391, the term "curtilage" is defined to be "the open space situated within a common enclosure, belonging to a dwelling-house." It is very manifest, therefore, that this conviction could not be sustained at common law, for the mill-house was not within the common enclosure of the dwelling-house, but was separated therefrom by a public highway, and there is no evidence that it was parcel of or appurtenant to the dwelling-house. For all that appears in the case submitted here, it might have been as distinct from and independent of the dwelling-house as if it had belonged to another person. Indeed the case, as originally submitted, did not even show that the mill-house belonged to the owner of the dwelling-house, though, on the argument here, it was agreed that the case should be amended by inserting that fact. But that fact alone is not sufficient to bring the mill-house within the class of houses which were the subjects of burglary at common law.

*569

The next question is, whether the mill-house in question can be brought within the class of houses which, by the act of 1866. (Gen. Stat., ch. CXXIX., § 32,) have been declared to be subjects of burglary. The language of that statute is as follows: "With respect to the crimes of burglary and arson, and to all criminal offenses which are constituted or aggravated by being committed in a dwelling-house, any house, outhouse, apartment, building, erection, shed or box in which there sleeps a proprietor, tenant, watchman, clerk, laborer, or person who lodges there, with a view to the protection of property, shall be deemed a dwelling-house: and of such a dwelling-house, or of any other dwelling-house, all houses, outhouses, buildings, sheds and erections, which are within two hundred yards of it, and are appurtenant to it, or to the same establishment of which it is an appurtenance, shall be deemed parcels."

Now, in order to bring this mill-house within the terms of this statute, it is not sufficient to show that it is situated within *two hundred yards of the dwelling-house, but it must also appear that it is an appurtenance of the dwelling-house, or of the establishment of which the dwelling-house is itself an appurtenance. Of this there is no evidence whatever. It does not appear that the dwelling-house of the prosecutor was the appurtenance of a farm or plantation of which the mill was a part and parcel, nor does it appear what the character of the mill was, whether a merchant-mill or an ordinary mill attached to and forming a parcel of a farm or plantation.

*570

The question raised by the second exception cannot arise under this view of the case, inasmuch as the judgment below must be set aside, and, of course, the sentence based upon such judgment must go with it.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial ordered.

New trial granted.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

12 S. C. 570

(Case No. 787.†)

R. H. GLENN, Sheriff, v. E. M. SHANNON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸993.]

A finding of fact by a Circuit judge in an equity cause tried before him is conclusive, unless without evidence to sustain it, or manifestly against the overbearing weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3900; Dec. Dig. ⟸993.]

[2. Payment ⟸85.]

Money paid under a mistake of fact to a person who has no claim in conscience to it, may be recovered by the party paying it.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bragg v. Thompson, 19 S. C. 578; Ford & Co. v. People's Bank of Orangeburg, 74 S. C. 182, 54 S. E. 204, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 63, 114 Am. St. Rep. 986; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Schrimer, 87 S. C. 309, 69 S. E. 439.

For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 272; Dec. Dig. ⟸85.]

[3. Justices of the Peace ⟸183.]

Errors and irregularities in proceedings in a trial-justice's court, may be objected to only by the party to the cause who was affected by them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 713; Dec. Dig. ⟸183.]

Before Pressley, J., Chester, March, 1879.

This was an action by R. H. Glenn, sheriff of Chester county, to recover from the defendant a sum of money paid to him under a mistake of fact. Both plaintiff and defendant consider it a *case in chancery because that mistake was the ground upon which relief was demanded.

*571

The goods of one Barber were attached by a constable under two trial-justice's warrants of attachment on December 17th, 1874. The plaintiff, as sheriff, levied an attachment on the next day upon the same goods, under a warrant of attachment from the Court of Common Pleas in favor of Shannon. Under an order from the Circuit judge the property was sold, and the sheriff, after paying expenses, paid the balance to Shannon. In this action he sought to recover from Shannon so much of the money, so paid to him, as the two trial-justice's attachments called for.

The affidavits made before the trial-justice, and the complaints or warrants issued by him, alleged that Barber was absent from the state, or so concealed himself that the due process of law could not be served upon him. There was no service upon Barber. Judgments were entered against him but no executions were proved to have been issued. It was ruled on Circuit in this case that Barber was made a party in the trial-justice's court by the attachment of his goods, and that he only could object to errors and irregularities there committed.

The only witness examined was Glenn. He testified that he went with Shannon to make the levy upon Barber's goods, under Shannon's attachment, and found the constable in charge of the goods. The constable told witness of his levy, but exhibited no inventory. Witness then said to Shannon that the trial-justice's attachments would have to be first paid. Witness then took possession of the goods. Some time having elapsed after the sale, and no papers being received from the trial-justice, witness supposed that those cases were settled, and paid balance in his hands to Shannon.

The presiding judge held that the payment was under a mistake as to the facts, and ordered judgment for the plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

Mr. J. F. Hart, for appellant.

Mr. W. B. Wilson, for respondent.

*572

*January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. This was an action to recover certain money which the plaintiff alleged that he, as sheriff, had erroneously paid to the defendant under a mistake of fact. The case came on for trial by the court, a jury having been dispensed with, and the court, having found that the money was paid under a mistake of fact, rendered judgment for the plaintiff. This finding of fact is conclusive here unless it were shown, as it has not been, that it was without any evidence to sustain it or was manifestly against the overbearing weight of the evidence. There can be no doubt of the correctness of the legal proposition that, where money is paid under a mistake of fact, to a person who has no ground in conscience to claim it, the person paying it may recover it back. Farmer v. Arundel, 2 W. Bl. 824; Bize v. Dickason, 1 T. R. 286; recognized in Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bail. 652 [23 Am. Dec. 155]. The same doctrine is recognized in Ash v. Ash, 1 Bay 304; Supervisors of Onondaga v. Briggs, 2 Denio 26; Ege v. Koontz, 3 Penna. St. 109; Haven v. Foster, 9 Pick. 112.

Exception was also taken to the ruling of the court below that the defendant could not object to or take advantage of any of the several errors or irregularities alleged against the proceedings by attachment in the trial-justice's court, but that such objection could only be made by the debtor himself. This ruling was unquestionably correct and is fully sustained by the authorities cited. Foster v. Jones, 1 McC. 116; Kincaid v.

†Case No. 786 will appear in the next succeeding volume [State v. Corley, 13 S. C. 1].—Reporter.

Neall, 3 McC. 201; Camberford v. Hall, 3 McC. 345.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. *573

*(Case No. 788.)

B. E. FEEMSTER v. M. L. GOOD et al.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸81.]

An executor deliberately departing from the instructions of the will, no matter what his motives, cannot impose resulting loss upon innocent devisees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 323, 334; Dec. Dig. ⟸81.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⟸81.]

So where the will directed all debts to be paid and the balance to be given to the widow "to dispose of as she may think best for her and our children," and the executor, in kindness and for the interests of the estate, as he thought, together with the widow, assumed a debt due by testator, and the widow, for herself and children, who were then minors, received the remainder of the estate, both real and personal, the latter being sufficient to pay all debts, the executor, after the personal property was lost, having been required to pay the debt assumed by him, cannot look to such real estate for reimbursement.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Wallace v. Craig, 27 S. C. 524, 4 S. E. 74.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 323, 334; Dec. Dig. ⟸81.]

[3. Wills ⟸836.]

But the widow having concurred in his act and enjoyed the use of the property, her interest in the land will be liable to his repayment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2150; Dec. Dig. ⟸836.]

[4. Wills ⟸531.]

Under the terms of this devise the widow and children took per capita.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rogers v. Morrell, 82 S. C. 404, 64 S. E. 143, 129 Am. St. Rep. 899.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1152; Dec. Dig. ⟸531.]

Before Pressley, J., York, March, 1879.

This was an action by Bond E. Feemster against Margaret L. Good, the widow of John H. Good, and their children.

John H. Good died leaving a will, which directed his funeral expenses and all of his just debts to be paid. Then followed paragraph two, which reads: "I give and bequeath to my wife, Margaret L. Good, all the balance of my estate, both real and personal, to dispose of as she may think best for her and our children, by the consent of my executor." B. E. Feemster was appointed and qualified as executor. Feemster paid all the debts of the estate, except one to W. J. Good, whose note was surrendered in exchange for another of like amount, signed by Feemster and M. L. Good. The executor then turned over to the widow, for herself and five minor children, all the remainder of the estate, consisting of a tract of land, negroes and other personal property necessary for farming operations. The personalty thus turned over, exclusive of land and negroes, was more than sufficient to pay the W. J. Good note. W. J.

*574

Good was a brother *of J. H. Good, and Feemster was a brother of M. L. Good. The arrangement was made and the extended credit given, because it was believed that it was for the best interests of the widow and children that the property should be held together and this debt paid off out of future crops; all the personalty turned over being needed to run the farm.

The personal property was exhausted and the slaves were emancipated, leaving W. J. Good unpaid. He brought his action against Feemster and obtained judgment for the amount of his debt, which Feemster paid. Plaintiff then brought this action to have the land of his testator sold and the proceeds applied to repaying the amount paid by him to W. J. Good.

C. E. Spencer, Esq., special referee, took the testimony and reported his conclusions of fact and of law. Upon exceptions thereto the case was heard on Circuit. In delivering his decree, the presiding judge said: "I concur in the report of the referee, as to the fact that this arrangement was in good faith, and then seemed best for the objects of testator's bounty, but afterwards the slaves were set free and nothing was left, except the land of testator for the payment of the said debt. The holder thereof sued plaintiff and compelled him to pay it. He now seeks repayment out of testator's land yet in possession of his legatees.

"I cannot doubt that the departure by the plaintiff from the directions of the will was made in kindness, and that it would have been best for the estate, if the war had never been. But if executors use their own judgment, even in best faith, against the express directions of the will, minor legatees will, in case of mishap, have the right to make such executors bear the loss which ensues. In this case all the defendants are minors except M. L. Good. She united with the plaintiff in the substituted note, and assented that the directions of the will be departed from, and the plaintiff is entitled to enforce his claim against one-sixth of the land, which is her share in it."

The decree concluded with an order for sale of M. L. Good's interest, gave directions as to costs, &c.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed, upon the grounds—

1. For error of law in not adjudging that the trust estate of plaintiff's testator, consisting of real estate in the hands of the *defendant, M. L. Good, is liable for reimbursing plaintiff for his outlay in behalf of the estate.

*575

2. For error of law in not adjudging that M. L. Good had one-third interest in the real estate.

Mr. G. W. S. Hart, for appellant.

The land is liable for the payment of this debt. 6 S. C. 66; 2 Hill Ch. 257; 2 McC. Ch. 112. The substitution was for the benefit of the trust estate, and it is therefore liable. 1 Hill Ch. 232; 1 Strob. Eq. 56; 2 McC. Ch. 82.

The testator not having defined the interests of his devisees, the statute of distribution must govern these interests. A devise to heirs, as such, is void; for one shall rather take as heir than devisee. 2 Wash. on Real Prop. 400. And heirs in this state means hæredes facti—under the statute of distributions. 6 Rich. Eq. 35. The devise under this will would have been void, but for the power conferred. Either the widow is sole devisee, or else the will does only confer the power, without altering the fixed rule of division under the law. See 9 Rich. Eq. 471.

Mr. W. B. Wilson, for respondents.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. In this case we concur with the Circuit judge in the conclusions which he has reached. If an executor deliberately undertakes to depart from the instructions contained in the will which he has undertaken to execute, no matter what may be the motives which prompted him, he cannot impose the loss which may ensue from such departure from his testator's instructions upon innocent devisees or legatees. It is very clear from the report of the referee that the executor had in his hands at one time ample means for the payment of all the debts, and if he chose voluntarily to place those means beyond his reach, where they most probably would be (and have been) appropriated to other uses, he has no equity to call upon the devisees and legatees to replace those means and repair the loss which has been occasioned by his own misconduct, whether willful or not, in which they have in no wise participated. The defendant, M.

*576

*L. Good, having, however, not only acquiesced in such departure from the instructions contained in the will, but actually enjoyed the use of the property thus illegally diverted by the executor from its proper channel, is not in a position to resist the claim of the plaintiff.

The question as to what was the share of Mrs. M. L. Good in the estate was probably not raised or but little attention bestowed upon it in the court below, as it does not appear to be discussed in the decree of the Circuit judge. We, however, see no error in the Circuit decision in this respect. The case does not belong to that class of cases in which the gift is to a class of persons, such as heirs, relations or next of kin, and it is necessary, in order to ascertain who are the individuals embraced in such class, to resort to the statute of distributions. Here the gift is to wife and children, and in such a case no resort to the statute is necessary. It is the same thing, so far as this question is concerned, as if the testator had made the gift directly to his wife and children by name, in which case it is clear that they would all take in equal shares, and not in the proportions prescribed by the statute.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 576

(Case No. 789.)

W. W. WALLACE v. CULLEN LARK.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Sales ⇐347.]

An answer alleging that the note complained upon was given as the purchase money of a horse to be used in the confederate service during the late war, and that said horse was actually so used, was held on demurrer not to state facts sufficient to constitute a defence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Jerkowski v. Marco & Lewenthal, 56 S. C. 246, 34 S. E. 386.

For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 962–972; Dec. Dig. ⇐347.]

[2. Contracts ⇐102.]

Mere knowledge by the vendor that the purchaser intends to make an illegal or immoral use of the article purchased is not sufficient to defeat an action for the purchase money. Hodgson v. Temple, 5 Taunt. 181, approved.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Pierson v. Green, 69 S. C. 564, 48 S. E. 624.

For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 464; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

*577

[3. Guaranty ⇐85.]

*An allegation that defendant, by writing his name on the back of the note, became a guarantor for the payment of the same, and that upon the strength of such guaranty B received the said note for value, is a sufficient statement that defendant guaranteed its payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. ⇐85.]

[4. Contracts ⇐138.]

[Cited in State v. Robinson, 70 S. C. 470, 50 S. E. 192, to the point that there can be no recovery on a contract based upon an illegal transaction in which the prosecutor actually participated.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 681–700; Dec. Dig. ⇐138.]

Before Pressley, J., Laurens, June, 1879.

This was an action on a sealed note, payable to Cullen Lark, upon the back of which are signed the names, "Cullen Lark," "Dennis Lark." Plaintiff is the owner and holder.

The complaint gives a copy of the note in its first paragraph. Paragraph 2 is as follows: That the defendant, by writing his name on the back of the said note, became a guarantor for the payment of the same, and that upon the strength of such guaranty Bennett Wallace received the said sealed note for value. Ownership, non-payment and amount due were stated, with prayer for judgment.

The defendant alleged that the note complained upon was given as the purchase money of a horse to be used in the Confederate service during the late war, and that said horse was actually so used. To this the plaintiff demurred as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a defence. Defendant demurred orally to the complaint for insufficiency in not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Both demurrers were sustained, and both parties appealed.

Mr. W. H. Wallace, for plaintiff.
Mr. J. W. Ferguson, for defendant.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an action brought against the defendant as the guarantor of a note under seal, executed by one Kay Burton, in favor of Dennis Lark. The defendant, in Paragraph 2 of his answer, set up the following as a defence: "That the note complained upon was given as the purchase money of a horse to be used in the Confederate service during the late war, and that said horse was actually so used." To this *defence the plaintiff demurred and the Circuit judge sustained the demurrer, from which the defendant appeals. That the demurrer was properly sustained is manifest from the fact that there is no allegation that either the plaintiff or his assignor, the payee of the note, knew at the time the note was given the purpose for which the horse was purchased. It is true a demurrer admits every fact stated in the pleading demurred to, but here the only facts stated are: 1. That the note was given for a horse to be used in the Confederate service. 2. That the horse was actually so used. Neither of these facts necessarily involves the idea that the vendor knew, at the time of the sale—the time when the contract was entered into—the purpose for which the horse was bought. The case, therefore, cannot even be brought within the rule established by the cases of Lightfoot v. Tenant, 1 B. & P. 551; Langton v. Hughes, 1 M. & S. 593; Cannan v. Bryce, 3 B. & A. 179; De Groot v. Van Duzer, 20 Wend. 330, that mere knowledge on the part of the vendor that the purchaser intends to use the article purchased for an illegal or immoral purpose will be sufficient to defeat an action for the purchase money.

*578

We are not disposed, however, to rest the case here, but are rather inclined to adopt the rule laid down by Lord Mansfield in Hodgson v. Temple, 5 Taunt. 181, that mere knowledge of the vendor that the purchaser intends to make an illegal or immoral use of the article purchased is not sufficient to defeat an action for the purchase money. There must be something more; something to show that the vendor was to participate in the illegal transaction, or that his intention in making the sale was not the ordinary purpose to dispose of his goods to the best advantage, but to aid or promote the illegal or immoral purpose for which the article was bought. The rule thus laid down is sustained by the following cases: Michael v. Bacon, 49 Mo. 474; S. C., 8 Am. R. 138; Hubbard v. Moore, 24 La. An. 591; S. C., 13 Am. R. 128; Mahood v. Tealza, 26 La. An. 108; S. C., 21 Am. R. 546; Tedder v. Odom, 2 Heisk. 68; S. C., 5 Am. R. 25. In the last-mentioned case the question now before this court was before the Supreme Court of Tennessee, with the additional fact that there the vendor knew at the time the note was given, the purpose for which the horse was bought, and it was held that *bare knowledge on the part of the vendor that the purchaser intended to make an illegal use of the horse did not violate the note given for the purchase money. This case cannot be brought within the rule laid down, quite reluctantly as it would seem, in the case of Converse v. Evins, 5 S. C. 52; following the case of Hanauer v. Woodruff, 15 Wall. 439 [21 L. Ed. 224]; for in those cases the consideration of the notes sued upon were bonds which were adjudged to be nullities, and as never having had any legal existence as property and of which no lawful use could be made, while here the consideration of the note sued upon is a horse which was always property of which a lawful use could be made. Nor does it come within the doctrine laid down in the case of Hanauer v. Doane, 12 Wall. 342 [20 L. Ed. 439], for there the action was upon a note given for supplies and commissary stores sold to a recognized supply contractor—in fact it was practically a sale to the Confederate government—while here the sale was to a private individual.

*579

The defendant also demurred to the complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the Circuit judge having sustained this demurrer, the plaintiff also appeals. In this we think there was error. It is very true that the fact that the defendant guaranteed the payment of the note is not alleged with that technical accuracy which would be expected from an artistic pleader, but still we think it sufficiently appears from the allegations of the complaint that the defendant was sued as guarantor of the note, and that he, therefore, was not taken by surprise. The code requires that "in the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed with a view of substantial justice between the parties," (Section 182,) and that "the court shall, in every stage of the action, disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which shall not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party." Section 199. Construing the pleadings in this case in such a spirit, we are unable to see how the error or defect complained of here—purely technical in its character—could possibly affect the substantial rights of the defendant. See, also, Mason v. Carter, 8 S. C. 103.

*580

*The judgment of the Circuit Court, in so far as it sustains the demurrer to Paragraph 2 of the answer, is affirmed, but in so far as it sustains the demurrer to the complaint, it is reversed.

Judgment modified.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 580

(Case No. 790.)

H. H. THOMSON v. T. M. JOPLIN et al.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Replevin ⇐109.]

Where in an action for the recovery of personal property the defendant gave his undertaking with sureties for the delivery of the property or for the payment of such sum as may for any cause be recovered against him, judgment for a sum of money, as damages, and a return of nulla bona, are conclusive evidence of the breach of the bond and of the damages sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. § 498; Dec. Dig. ⇐109.]

[2. Replevin ⇐123.]

The fact that the plaintiff elected to ask a recovery in damages in place of specific delivery does not discharge the sureties to such undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Parish v. Smith, 66 S. C. 431, 45 S. E. 16.

For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. § 481; Dec. Dig. ⇐123.]

[This case is also cited in Cheatham v. Morrison, 37 S. C. 193, 15 S. E. 924, without specific application.]

Before Aldrich, J., Spartanburg, March, 1879.

The nature of this action is fully stated in the opinion of the court. The waiver alluded to is thus stated in the report of the referee in the case for claim and delivery of the personal property: The plaintiff, at the opening of the case before your referee, having elected to ask a recovery in damages in place of specific delivery of the said mare, I find he is entitled to judgment against the defendant in the sum of, &c.

Mr. E. H. Bobo, for appellants.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for respondent.

*581

*January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The action was upon a bond given by a defendant in an action for the recovery of personal property, under Section 234 of the code, in order to secure to the defendant the return of the property in suit that had been taken by the sheriff under the provisions of Section 232. The condition of the bond followed the language of Section 234 substantially, and was as follows: "For the delivery of the said property to the plaintiff, if such delivery should be adjudged, and for the payment to him of such sum as may for any cause be recovered against the defendant in this action." Judgment was recovered in the action in which said bond was given, but no delivery of the property to the plaintiff was adjudged. The question is, whether proof of such judgment was conclusive evidence of a breach of the bond and of the damage sustained by reason of such breach. The Circuit Court so held, and the defendants who appeared and answered appeal therefrom.

It is clearly not the intention of the statute, which gives the language of the appropriate undertaking, to make the agreement to pay such sum as might from any cause be recovered against the defendant conditional upon there being a judgment for the return of the property to the plaintiff, and the bond must receive the same construction as the language of the act which it followed. There is no language to impart any such condition; on the contrary, the obligation of the sureties, as it regards the return of the property and the payment of any sum recovered, is stated in cumulative language, so that a separate and distinct breach may be assigned as to each. It is clear that this is one of the class of cases referred to in Smith v. Moore, 7 S. C. 209 [24 Am. Rep. 479], where the recovery of the judgment is in itself the happening of the contingency in which the surety was to become bound, and, consequently, conclusive proof not only of a breach of the bond, but of the quantity of damage resulting therefrom.

It is contended that the waiver of the plaintiff in the action in which the bond was given of claim to the delivery of the property specifically discharged the sureties on the bond. To make good this proposition it would be necessary to establish *that the sureties can question the regularity of the judgment recovered in the principal action.

*582

On general principles this cannot be done, but in the present case the insertion of the words "for any cause" clearly was intended to exclude the surety from alleging that the judgment was rendered for some special cause beyond the contemplation of the undertaking.

The judgment must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 582

(Case No. †792.)

A. W. HEATH, Executor, v. AMANDA BELK et al.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸261.]

In the administration of a decedent's estate, debts by specialty created since the act of March 9th, 1874, have no priority over simple contract debts, but both classes are postponed in the order of payment to bonds and debts by specialty of earlier date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 963; Dec. Dig. ⟸261.]

Before Thomson, J., York, June, 1879.

In the administration of the estate of D. D. A. Belk, deceased, under proceedings in the Court of Probate, the assets were insufficient to pay creditors in full. Among the claims presented were sealed claims created before the passage of the act of March 9th, 1874, sealed claims created after that date, and unsealed claims contracted before, and others contracted after the passage of that act. The judge of probate held that sealed claims created before the passage of the act were preferred in the order of payment, and that, after they were satisfied, sealed claims of later date and simple contract debts, without reference to their date, should be paid pro rata. On appeal to the Circuit Court this decree was approved.

*583

*Mr. W. B. Wilson, Jr., for appellant, contended that the effect of the act of March 9th, 1874, was to raise up debts by simple contract from the sixth to the fifth class, and to put them upon the same footing with bonds and debts by specialty; and thus to embrace, as of one equal grade under Subdivision 5, bonds and debts by specialty, and debts by simple contract created after March 9th, 1874, and to retain, as Subdivision 6, debts by simple contract created prior to March 9th, 1874.

Mr. G. W. S. Hart, contra.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The decision of the Circuit Court affirming the decree of the Probate Court, appears to be free from error. The question was as to the relative rank of bond and specialty debts created after March 9th, 1874, and simple contract debts created both before and after that date; and it was properly held that they take equal rank in distribution.

Immediately prior to the act of March 9th, 1874, (15 Stat. 609), the order of priority in the distribution of the assets of testate and intestate estates was as follows: (Gen. Stat. 457.) "1. Funeral and other expenses of the last sickness, charges of probate or letters of administration; 2. Debts due to the public; 3. Judgments, mortgages and executions—the oldest first; 4. Rent; 5. Bonds and debts by specialty; 6. Debts by simple contract."

Under the amending act of March 9th, 1874, the act reads as follows: "1. Funeral and other expenses of the last sickness, charges of probate or letters of administration; 2. Debts due to the public; 3. Judgments, mortgages and executions—the oldest first; 4. Rent; 5. Bonds and debts by specialty and debts by simple contract, so that after the passage of this act there shall be no distinction in the payments of the debts of persons deceased between bonds and debts by specialty and debts by simple contract."

The period of time referred to in the language of Subdivision 5, as it now stands, is the date of the passage of the amendatory act, viz., March 9th, 1874. The proviso to the effect "that this *act shall only apply to debts created after its passage," does not appear to be intended to form part of the language inserted into the act amended by means of the amendment, but controls the operation and effect of such amendment. There was evidently an unimportant mistake made in enclosing the words "therein contained" in quotation marks, which is corrected by the necessary sense of the language employed.

*584

It would follow that it was rightly held that bond and specialty debts created after March 9th, 1874, enjoy no priority as it regards simple contract debts, whether created before or after that date, and that all must take equal rank together.

The act, as amended, determines every question of priority as affecting such debts, except as it regards bonds and specialty debts created before March 9th, 1874, that still retain their priority over simple contract debts created at any time, and, consequently, over bonds and specialty debts created since March 9th, 1874, that can only take rank with simple contract debts.

The appeal must be dismissed and the judgment below affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

† No. 791 will appear in the next succeeding volume [Reynolds v. Witte, 13 S. C. 5].

12 S. C. 584

(Case No. 793.)

J. G. WILLIAMS v. D. RICHARDSON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Depositions ⟸75.]

Where commissioners to take testimony certify, in their return, that under the instructions contained in the commission, they have qualified each other and also the witness, whose signature is appended to his deposition, the commission is competent testimony, although the form of the oath taken by the commissioners and witness, and their signatures thereto, and the jurat, are omitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. §§ 175, 187; Dec. Dig. ⟸75.]

Before Aldrich, J., Newberry, May, 1879.

Action on note. Defendant offered in evidence testimony taken by commission. When the commission was opened plain*tiff's counsel objected to the answers being read, on the ground that, so far as appeared to the court, the commissioners had not sworn to the printed oath on the commission or subscribed to the same, and that there was no record showing that the witness had been sworn. The witness subscribed his name at the end of his answers and the commissioners put the following certificate at the bottom of that:

*585

"We, the undersigned commissioners, certify that by virtue of the authority vested in us by the commission hereunto annexed, we have this day summoned the witness, Dr. B. W. Bledsoe, before us, and after qualifying, each the other, proceeded to qualify him, the said Bledsoe, and to take down his depositions, according to instructions contained in said commission, and that, after being taken down, they were read in his hearing, and that he subscribed to the same in our presence.

"Reuben Jones, [L. S.]
"Thomas W. Caskie, [L. S.]
"W. T. Huff, [L. S.]
"Commissioners.

"This May 1st, 1876."

The presiding judge sustained the objection, and the defendant excepted and appealed to this court for a new trial.

Mr. L. J. Jones, for appellant.

Mr. J. M. Baxter, for respondent, contended that the examination of witnesses by commission was by virtue of a statute and in derogation of common law; and being an authority delegated by the court, must show exact conformity. 4 Dall. 410; 1 Wash. C. C. 13. Commissioners must take the oath, not an oath, and the record must show it. They may have misconstrued their instructions, and the record should enable us to determine.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The only exception in this case raises the question whether the return to a commission to take testimony is invalid where the commissioners fail to return the form of oath taken by them, with their signatures and jurat thereto. We *are not pointed to any statute rendering the return of the form of oath requisite, and therefore cannot hold that there has been any failure to comply with the requirements of the statute in this respect. It appears by the return of the commissioners that they were duly qualified in the manner prescribed by the commission, each administering the oath to the other. This was all that the statute or the terms of the commission required, and the commission must be regarded as fully executed and the return competent as testimony in the case.

*586

The Circuit Court excluded the commission; the judgment must, therefore, be set aside and a new trial ordered.

New trial granted.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 586

(Case No. 794.)

J. N. ROBSON v. H. C. MILLER.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Evidence ⟸194; Sales ⟸440.]

Where, in an action for the purchase money of acid phosphate, the defence is failure of the article to conform to the quality warranted, material represented by defendant in his testimony to be the substance sold, may be exhibited to the jury, although defendant admits that the seller's directions for composting were not wholly complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 679; Dec. Dig. ⟸194; Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1266; Dec. Dig. ⟸440.]

[2. Contracts ⟸201.]

When one undertakes to manufacture for another an article of known value and use, it is an implied condition of the contract that it shall be fit for the use to which it is commonly put.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 911; Dec. Dig. ⟸201.]

[3. Sales ⟸347.]

When a merchant introduces, under his own name and guarantee, an acid phosphate, stating that it will produce certain results when composted, his right to recover the value of certain bags of it sold by him cannot be made to depend solely upon the correctness of the chemical analysis printed upon labels and attached to the bags by the manufacturer.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ober v. Blalock, 40 S. C. 40, 18 S. E. 264.

For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 962–972; Dec. Dig. ⟸347.]

[4. Sales ⟸260.]

The words, "fertilizers, compounded of the purest materials," "of the highest standard," "introduced under my own name and guarantee," amount to an express warranty of good results from the article described, as a fertilizer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 723; Dec. Dig. ⟸260.]

*587

*Before Hudson, J., Anderson, September, 1878.

This was an action by plaintiff against the defendant to recover the price of eight tons of Robson's acid phosphate. The defendant alleged that he purchased under plaintiff's representations, copying the statements contained in plaintiff's circular—that the acid phosphate proved to be utterly valueless and wholly unsuited for preparing a compost manure, that it injured the fertilizing properties of his cotton seed, &c.—and claimed damages.

While the defendant was on the witness stand he exhibited lumps, some of which, he testified, were taken from the compost heaps, others from the field. To this plaintiff objected, as not pertinent to the issue, and, his objections being overruled, excepted. Witness did not, in every particular, follow directions of the circular, but only varied when experience had demonstrated an improvement. To all the bags were attached tags, upon which were stated their chemical constituents. The circular of the plaintiff was as follows:

"Charleston, S. C., November 16th, 1875.

"Having been engaged for twenty years in the guano trade, with eminent success, I deemed it advisable to introduce fertilizers under my own name and guarantee. I have made arrangements to have prepared a guano under my inspection and control, called Robson's cotton and corn fertilizer. This guano is of the highest standard. It contains, among other valuable ingredients, three per cent. of ammonia, one and one-half per cent. of potash, and fourteen per cent. of available phosphate.

"I have also prepared for me a compound acid phosphate of the highest standard. These fertilizers are compounded of the purest materials, and are manipulated and tested under the supervision of Dr. St. Julien Ravenel, of this city, whose name gives a warrant for its high character and adaptation for our soil." [Then comes prices, etc.]

"I take this occasion to return my thanks to those who have so largely patronized the fertilizers heretofore offered by me, and in soliciting their favorable attention to another. I pledge my *best efforts to meet a continuance of confidence by keeping the highest standard of fertilizers adapted to cotton and corn."

*588

There was a great deal of other testimony, but it is not material to the points made and decided here.

The plaintiff requested the presiding judge to charge—

1. That where an article of a certain and definite nature is to be manufactured, the seller can, in no sense, be considered as warranting it to be appropriate to the use to which the buyer intends to apply it, whether the seller be informed of such intention or not.

2. If the article sold failed to accomplish the results for which the defendant bought it, and there was no fraud on the seller's part, and both buyer and seller relied on the same source of information, to wit, the analysis of the chemist, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

3. If the improper and unskillful manipulation of the defendant, that is to say, the thickness of the alternate layers of cotton seed and acid phosphate in the compost heaps contributed to, or caused the results complained of, the defendant is himself responsible for these, and the plaintiff must recover.

4. As matter of law, whenever there is an express warranty, no implied warranty can arise. The express warranty, in this case, applies only to the constituent elements of the acid phosphate and the supervision of Dr. Ravenel. If the proof offered by the defendant fails to show that these elements and this supervision were wanting, as alleged, there was no breach of warranty, and the plaintiff must recover.

The first the judge refused, saying it would only apply when the vendee gives the directions.

The second he refused, because, as he said, the chemist, in this case, was the plaintiff's agent and not the defendant's.

The third he charged as correct.

The fourth he modified by extending the express warranty to the good results as a fertilizer, as well as to the ingredients.

He had previously charged that the plaintiff had contracted to sell the defendant an acid phosphate of good quality, and valuable as a fertilizer for corn and cotton, which, when com*posted with cotton seed in a particular manner, would produce a good result, to all of which the plaintiff excepted.

*589

The jury found a verdict for the defendant for $51.

Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which being refused, he appealed to this court.

Mr. B. F. Whitner, for appellant.

Mr. A. T. Broyles, for respondent.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This was an action for the sale of goods, consisting of an article intended as a fertilizer, described as "Robson's Acid Phosphate." The defense was a counter-claim in the nature of a recoupment, on the ground of the failure of the article sold to conform to representations made by the plaintiff and intended as a warranty.

On the trial a verdict was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff now brings before us certain exceptions, alleging error in the rulings of the Circuit judge, and asks a new trial. These exceptions will be separately considered. The first exception is to certain testimony and the exhibition of certain material represented to be the substance sold to the defendant by the plaintiff, and exhibited in connection with the testimony of the defendant given in his own behalf. The object of exhibiting the substance appears to have been to enable the jury to form a more intelligent judgment of the nature of the commodity sold. It is not material to inquire what inferences could be properly drawn from the appearance of the material thus exhibited; but there can be no doubt that it was competent to show to the jury what was claimed to be evidence offered by the condition of the material itself, as to whether it was in conformity to the character ascribed to it by the vendor. The plaintiff states as a reason for this objection that it appeared by the defendant's testimony that he had not followed the directions of the plaintiff in treating the substance, preparatory to its use as a fertilizer, and, therefore, the condition of the material, as exhibited, was not to be attrib*uted to any defect in its condition at the time of sale, but to the improper treatment of the defendant All this was matter for the consideration of the jury and is not pertinent to the question of the competency of the testimony. The jury had a right to know what was done and its effect upon the material and the exhibition of the material and the statement of the mode in which it was actually treated, had a clear bearing on the facts put in issue. This exception should be overruled.

*590

The remaining exceptions are to the refusals of the Circuit judge to charge propositions submitted by the plaintiff for that purpose, and for alleged errors in the matters actually charged by him. The first proposition of the requests to charge is as follows:

"That when an article of a certain or definite nature is to be manufactured, the seller can, in no sense, be considered as warranting it to be appropriate to the use which the buyer intends to apply it, whether the seller be informed of such intention or not."

It may be remarked that this purports to be a rule of implying warranty where no express warranty or representation is given, and, as such, is inappropriate to the case in hand, which is altogether one of express warranty, or, as the plaintiff views it, of misrepresentation. But the proposition is, in itself, unsound in the form stated, inasmuch as it embraces cases as applied to which it would lead to conclusions contrary to law. It is equivalent to saying that when one undertakes to manufacture for another an article that has a known value and use, it is not an implied condition of the contract that the manufacturer shall produce an article fit for the use to which such article is commonly put. This is equivalent to saying that a baker is not bound to produce bread that can be eaten. The proposition was, therefore, untrue, and was properly refused.

The second proposition submitted for charge was as follows:

"If the article sold failed to accomplish the results for which the defendant bought it, and there was no fraud on the seller's part, and both buyer and seller relied on the same source of information, to wit, the analysis of the chemist, the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

*591

*This proposition tended to present the question as depending wholly upon the nature and quantity of the constituent chemical elements of the commodity at the time of sale, whereas the question of the value of the commodity depended upon the fact whether it would act in a particular manner when composted with certain other materials in the manner prescribed by the plaintiff, so as to make a valuable fertilizer. A circular, issued by the plaintiff, was in evidence. It was for the jury to say whether the statements of that circular constituted the basis of the purchase by the defendant. In this circular the plaintiff stated that he had deemed it advisable to introduce fertilizers—using his own words—"under my own name and guarantee." The circular does not give the chemical composition of the "Acid Phosphate." The plaintiff, in his testimony, states the value of his article to depend on the fact that when composted in a particular manner with certain materials it retains the ammonia evolved, which would otherwise escape, in a form suitable for application to plants. He alleges that his "Acid Phosphate" is not a manure in itself, but that it becomes such under the treatment prescribed for it.

It appears by the plaintiff's own case that the question at issue was not confined to the inquiry whether the article sold had, at the time of sale, certain chemical constituents of a certain character and in certain quantities.

The proposition under consideration was defective in tending to withdraw the attention of the jury from the material features of the case, and confine them to the narrow question whether such constituents were present at the time of sale. It might well be that, as it regards the analysis of the article in its condition at the time of sale, both buyer and seller might be compelled to rely on the representations of a chemist, but that fact, even in the absence of fraud on the part of the seller, could not, in itself become decisive of the plaintiff's right to a verdict, as it was made to be by the plaintiff's proposition.

The fourth request was charged, subject only to the modification of "extending the express warranty to the good results of a fertilizer, as well as to the ingredients."

*592

This modification, as *well as the remainder of the charge, is in substantial harmony with what has been already held herein, and the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 592

(Case No. 795.)

S. S. ROSS v. MARY A. LINDER.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Husband and Wife ⇐79.]

A married woman may bind herself by contract.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Aultman & Taylor Co. v. Rush, 26 S. C. 528, 2 S. E. 402; Wallace v. Craig, 27 S. C. 519, 4 S. E. 74.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 317–323, 329; Dec. Dig. ⇐79.]

[2. Husband and Wife ⇐221; Parties ⇐75.]

Where the wife is sued upon contracts other than for her necessary support, the husband is a formal and not a substantial party, and objection to his non-joinder is waived when not taken by answer or demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell & Co., 15 S. C. 598, 40 Am. Rep. 705; State v. Corbin & Stone, 16 S. C. 545; Shumate v. Harbin, 35 S. C. 527, 15 S. E. 270; Anderson v. Baughman, 69 S. C. 40, 48 S. E. 38.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 806; Dec. Dig. ⇐221; Parties, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. ⇐75.]

Before Aldrich, J., at Spartanburg, March, 1879.

The complaint alleged that Alie Lipscomb had conveyed a valuable tract of land to defendant and to H. V. Ross, in consideration whereof they entered into an agreement with Alie Lipscomb to board, clothe and provide other comforts for her; that she boarded with plaintiff for two years, and she was also provided by him with clothing, &c. Judgment was demanded for one-half of this account against the defendant.

The defendant set up a different agreement, denied the correctness of the account, &c., and set up a counter-claim.

At the trial plaintiff proved the following deed:

"The State of South Carolina,
"Spartanburg County.

"Know all men by these presents that I, Alie Lipscomb, of the state and county aforesaid, have relinquished my life interest, and all the real estate of my deceased husband, Robert Lipscomb, of the aforesaid state and county, upon condition that Lee Linder, and Mary Linder, his wife, and S. S. Ross and his wife, provide for my support decent and comfortable, and in a style *conformable to my state and requirements, and the aforesaid parties to pay all doctor bills, to provide for my health and comfort during my natural life. The amount to be established by three disinterested parties, when a disagreement as to the amount necessary and requisite arises.

*593

"This relinquishment of life interest is subject to my choice as to where I live, and with whom.

"Signed and sealed this the 19th day of February, 1876.

"Alie Lipscomb. [L. S.]

"In presence of P. O. Lemmons, G. E. Clary."

Plaintiff testified that there was an agreement made at the same time whereby defendant agreed that her mother should live with plaintiff, and that she would pay one-half of the amount necessary for her mother's support and maintenance. H. V. Ross, wife of plaintiff, was also a daughter of Alie Lipscomb.

The presiding judge granted a non-suit for defect of parties, in that the husband of the defendant was not made a party defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for respondent.

January, 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The complaint was dismissed by the Circuit Court, on the ground that the defendant was a married woman, and that her husband was not joined as defendant.

The objection of the non-joinder of the husband of the defendant was not taken by either demurrer or answer, and is therefore waived, unless it can be made to appear that such defect is material to the question whether the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Code, § 171. It is necessary, therefore, in order to sustain the judgment below to establish one of the two propositions—that a married woman cannot bind herself by a contract, or that a judgment cannot be recovered in any case against a married woman without joining her husband.

*594

*The ability of a married woman to bind herself by a contract cannot be disputed under the provisions of General Statutes, p. 482.

There are cases in which a judgment may be recovered against a married woman without the joinder of her husband as defendant, as provided for in Section 137 of the code, so that it cannot be affirmed that a judgment recovered against a married woman without the joinder of her husband is necessarily erroneous. The provisions of the General Statutes that the husband shall not be liable for the debts contracted by the wife, except in a particular case of her necessary support, places the husband in the position of a formal and not a substantial party to suits against the wife on her individual contracts other than her necessary support, which is the nature of the present action, and failure to take such objection by demurrer or answer is a waiver of such objection.

The judgment must be set aside and a new trial granted.

New trial granted.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 594

(Case No. 796.)

S. ADAMS v. C. P. TURNER, Executor.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸310.]

Where executors overpay some of the legatees, and, by decree of the Ordinary, they are directed to pay balance due to the other legatees when they have collected the amounts overpaid, such decree creates an absolute obligation upon the executors, with a reasonable time allowed to call in their over-payments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1264; Dec. Dig. ⟸310.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, June, 1879.

The case is fully stated in the referee's report, which is as follows:

This action was commenced by summons and complaint by Sarah Adams, to recover her interest in the estate of Elijah *Turner, deceased. It was referred to me by an order of his Honor, the presiding judge, to hear and determine the issues in the cause. In obedience to this order, I held the reference, attended by the counsel of the parties, and now make the following report:

*595

From the testimony taken and herewith submitted, I find the following as matters of fact: That Elijah Turner died, leaving his last will and testament, whereby he bequeathed certain property therein mentioned to certain persons named, to be equally divided among them. John Turner and L. A. Turner were appointed executors of the will, and immediately thereafter qualified as such and entered upon the discharge of their duties. In a codicil to the will, the testator directed that the portion of his estate which he had bequeathed to Sally Ellis should be divided by his executors among the eight children of Sally Ellis, named in the codicil, one of whom was this plaintiff. On the 22d day of October, 1859, the executors divided the property mentioned in the will among the parties entitled thereto, in the division the parties receiving unequal shares, some of them largely overdrawing. Notes without any security were taken by the executors for the amounts overdrawn. In March, 1860, the executors, John Turner and L. A. Turner, filed their petition for a final settlement of the estate in the Court of Ordinary for Spartanburg county, and, after notice given by publication to the parties in interest living without the state, a final settlement of the estate was made in the Ordinary's office on the 22d of June, 1860. Upon a full accounting, in which it was found that the sum of $84.38 was due to the plaintiff in this action by the executors, as her share in the estate, a statement was made up showing this, and the amounts due to some and overdrawn by others of the parties in interest, and upon this statement the following decree was filed:

"It appears from the foregoing statement that some of the legatees have received largely over their shares, it is necessary, therefore, that they pay to the executors the amounts so overpaid, with interest, from October 22d, 1859. When this is done it is ordered that the executors pay to those who have not re*ceived their full shares the amounts found to be due them in the foregoing statement, with interest from October 22d, 1859.

*596

"Jno. Earle Bomar, O. S. D.

"June 22d, 1860."

L. A. Turner died in March, 1861. His executors, the defendants herein, have had nothing to do with the estate of Elijah Turner, deceased. After the death of L. A. Turner, John Turner, the surviving executor, collected in confederate money, at different times, nearly all of the amounts overdrawn. John Turner claims also to have paid out after said decree, for the benefit of the children of Sally Ellis, on January 30th, 1861, for medical services for their slave, $4; for the same, on December 21st, 1861, $5; on December 23d, 1861, for making a coffin for said slave, $3. He further set up that he attended and boarded said slave for eighteen months, and that same was worth $144. To said claims the plaintiffs pleaded the statute of limitations. With the modifications above given, I find that the allegations of the complaint are true. I find, as matters of law, that the defendant, as executor aforesaid, is indebted, by reason of the decree of the Court of Ordinary, as alleged in the complaint; but that the same is entitled to credit for amounts paid out on account of medical services and for burial of the slave belonging to the children of Sally Ellis. As there are three of said children unpaid, and all three have sued in this court, and their suits are tried along with this, and as interest amounts, at date of said payment, to more than principal, on the amount now due on said decree, there should be credited $4, being one-third of the amount so paid, the other two-thirds being credited on the claims of the two other children who have sued. The claim for $144, or other claim of payment, cannot be allowed. Even if not barred by the statute of limitations, it was no payment on the aforesaid decree of the Ordinary, and, at most, could only constitute a cause of action in favor of John Turner against the children of Sally Ellis. It can have nothing to do with the case in hand. I find, therefore, that there is now due and owing to the plaintiff from the defendant, as executor aforesaid, the sum of $190.26, *and recommend that the plaintiff have judgment for the same, and for the costs and disbursements of the action.

*597

Respectfully submitted,

S. J. Simpson, Referee.

February 7th, 1879.

To said report the defendant excepted as follows, to wit:

1. Because, by the decree of the Ordinary, the executors of Elijah Turner, deceased, were not required to pay said decree until the legatees, who had overdrawn their shares in the division of the estate, paid back the amounts so overdrawn, with interest; and it having been shown by the testimony that these amounts were paid to John Turner, the surviving executor, after the death of L. A. Turner, the referee erred in holding the estate of L. A. Turner liable therefor.

2. Because the referee erred in holding the estate of L. A. Turner liable under the said decree, when it was conclusively shown that John Turner alone was the active executor, and that no part of the estate was ever shown to have been in the possession or control of L. A. Turner.

The case came on for a hearing before Judge Pressley, who made the following decree, to wit:

These cases having been heard together on exceptions to the report of the referee, after argument of counsel, it is ordered that the exceptions of the defendant, C. P. Turner, executor of L. A. Turner, to the report of the referee be sustained. That so much of the report as finds against him be set aside, that as to him the complaint herein be dismissed, and the defendant, C. P. Turner, executor of L. A. Turner, have judgment against the plaintiff for his costs and disbursements.

From which said decree the plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, upon the grounds that his Honor erred—

1. In sustaining the exceptions of the defendant to the report of the referee.

2. In refusing to confirm said referee's report, and give judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

*598

*Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. Evins & Bomar and Duncan & Cleveland, for respondent.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The plaintiff has appealed from a judgment sustaining exceptions to the report of the referee and dismissing the complaint. The question turns on the construction and effect of a decree of the Ordinary, made June 22d, 1860, upon a settlement of the estate of Elijah Turner, to which L. A. Turner and John Turner, his executors, and all other persons in interest, were parties. The decree is as follows: "It appears from the foregoing statements that some of the legatees have received largely over their shares; it is necessary, therefore, that they pay to the executors the amounts so overpaid, with interest, from October, 22d, 1859; when this is done, it is ordered that the executors pay to those who have not received their full shares the amounts found to be due them in the foregoing statement, with interest, from October 22d, 1859." The Circuit judge, overruling the referee, held that this obligation of the executors to pay was, under this obligation, altogether conditional upon their receiving back the amounts thus overpaid and decreed to be restored. It appears that L. A. Turner, one of the executors bound by this decree, died shortly after it was pronounced, and that such repayments as had been made under the decree by way of restoring the amounts overpaid, were actually paid to the surviving executor, and hence the court concluded that the defendant, the executor of this deceased executor, was not liable under the terms of the decree.

The question is, whether the decree created an absolute or a conditional obligation on the part of the executors. It is clear that postponing the time of payment until a future event that was certain to occur, did not prevent the obligation from being absolute. According to the form of this decree, the time of payment was fixed when the over-payments should be refunded. We are not at liberty, however, to overlook the nature of the *obligation imposed by this decree in putting a construction on its language. It established the proposition that there had been a devastavit affecting both of the executors, thus laying a ground for personal liability, and its object was to afford a remedy for this devastavit. It is entirely inconsistent with this object to hold that the executors are only liable on this condition as to the extent of the repayment of the money. Such a construction must be avoided if it can be done consistently with the terms of the decree. In order to sustain the conclusion of the Circuit Court it would be necessary to hold that neither of the executors was liable for any sum until the whole of the over-payment was refunded, notwithstanding part thereof might have been already refunded and in the hands of the executors; and, also, that only the executor who received this fund could be called upon to distribute it. If we are to look to the form of the decree alone, and pay no regard to its purpose, then it may be that the contingency on which the executors are to pay is a single event, namely, the last payment on the full amount to be returned. In that case the liability could not arise until the last dollar was paid, and no provision was made for distributing such sums as may have already been collected by the executors under the decree. Such a construction is manifestly absurd. It was clearly intended that if the executors should not collect the whole amount required to be refunded that they should at the least distribute so much as they had in fact collected. This shows that the decree must be read in reference to its obvious purpose, and as the parties are in a court of equity in a case based upon this decree it can well be done. Looking with that purpose, it is clear that as there had been a devastavit it must have been intended that the whole amount should be paid absolutely at same time by the executors. This conclusion is consistent with the argument of the decree that the executors should pay the whole sum overpaid, and not only such sum as they receive by way of refunding the amount over-paid, and, also, that they should pay interest on the whole sum over-paid from a day prior to the decree, although allowed to reimburse themselves pro tanto out of interest paid on the sums refunded. The conclusion must then be that it was intended to allow a reasonable time for the executors to call in the over-payments, and when such reasonable time had elapsed *that they should make the payments adjudged absolutely against them by the decree. No question is made as to the sufficiency of the time that has elapsed to satisfy such construction, and, therefore, the executors must be regarded as personally indebted at the date of the decree in the amount adjudged due for such overpayment, although payable at a future day. This view would render the estate of the deceased executors liable for the amount adjudged by said decree.

*599

*600

It follows that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the report of the referee confirmed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for a judgment in accordance with the report of the referee.

Decree reversed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

12 S. C. 600

(Case No. 844†)

FRANCIS ARNOLD v. JESSE HOUSE AND J. E. DENT.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Judgment ⟸872.]

A judgment which was valid in its origin, but fraudulently renewed for more than the balance remaining unpaid thereon, will be sustained for the amount actually due.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Miller v. Wroton, 82 S. C. 107, 63 S. E. 62, 449.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1641; Dec. Dig. ⟸872.]

† This case is inserted in advance of its proper place in the order of filing so as to complete, in this volume, the publication of all cases heard prior to November Term, 1879.

[2. Interest ⟸19.]

A purchaser at sheriff's sale is liable for interest from day of sale on so much of his bid as is applicable to judgments not his own.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. ⟸19.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⟸1008.]

The findings of fact by the Circuit Court will not be disturbed unless the evidence manifestly and plainly indicates a different result.††

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3955; Dec. Dig. ⟸1008.]

Before Pressley, J., Richland, November, 1878.

Hon. THOMAS THOMSON, judge of the Eighth Circuit, sat at the hearing of this case in the place of Associate Justice HASKELL, who had been one of the counsel in the cause.

On March 31st, 1858, Jesse House obtained a judgment against Jacob H. Ledingham, in the Court of Common Pleas for Richland district, for $800 and costs. October 1st, 1859, a payment was made upon the execution in the case. February *17th, 1865, all the records and papers in the offices of clerk of the court and sheriff for this district were destroyed with the court-house in the burning of the city of Columbia.

*601

In 1866 or 1867, Francis Arnold advanced to Kinard money to pay the debts of Falls & Kinard, of which firm Kinard was survivor, it being agreed at the time that assets of the firm sufficient to repay the sum advanced should be transferred to Arnold. Jacob H. Ledingham, a debtor by open account to the firm, at the request of Kinard, executed his note for the amount of his indebtedness, payable to Arnold, to whom it was soon afterwards delivered, in pursuance of the above agreement. Upon this note judgment was obtained by Arnold against Ledingham, and execution issued in October, 1870.

Meantime, to wit, in January, 1869, House employed counsel to institute proper proceedings to have his judgment restored and revived, under the authority of the acts of the general assembly authorizing the substitution of records destroyed during the late war. 13 Stat. 384, 411. Action was promptly commenced, House stating that the credit of October 1st, 1859, was $300 and costs; Ledingham resisted upon the ground that the proper credit was $550. The case never came to a hearing, House alleging from no fault of his.

In January, 1875, a tract of land belonging to Ledingham was sold by J. E. Dent, sheriff, under the Arnold judgment, and was bid off by a daughter of Ledingham for $1251. She subsequently assigned her bid to House. After the sale and before this transfer of bid, Ledingham under hand and seal acknowledged the recovery of the House judgment, and that there was a credit thereon of $300 of date October 1st, 1859, and consented that the record be restored and judgment substituted for balance due. The amount of Miss Ledingham's bid was credited on House's judgment, and deed given by the sheriff to House, as soon as the order of the court, substituting the judgment, was obtained.

††See note at end of this case.

This action was commenced in August, 1877, to have the deed of Sheriff Dent to House canceled and the lands resold, or to have the money paid by House and applied to the Arnold judgment, upon the ground that it was fraudulently restored for a *sum largely in excess of the amount actually due. As to the correct credit upon the House judgment, and as to whether the consent given by Ledingham to House was in consideration of promises of benefit to Ledingham or his family, there was testimony pro et contra. The referee, to whom were referred all the issues, concluded "that the proceeding by which House's record was restored, has not the stamp of that bona fides which is necessary to sustain it." The report of the referee, Hon. F. W. Fickling, concluded as follows:

*602

I find, therefore, as conclusions of law—

1. That the fifth section of the act of September 20th, 1866, does embrace judgments and decrees.

2. That the plaintiff, Francis Arnold, is a creditor without notice, in the contemplation of that act.

3. That the judgment of House against Ledingham is, as against the judgment of Francis Arnold against Jacob H. Ledingham, fraudulent and void.

4. That even if not tainted with fraud, the judgment of House against Ledingham, resting on admissions of Ledingham, made after execution levied and lien established in the case of Arnold against Ledingham, cannot divert the lien of the latter judgment, but would in any event be postponed to that judgment.

And I find the following conclusions of fact—

1. That there was paid on the judgment of House against Ledingham, on the first day of October, 1859, the sum of $500 and the costs.

2. That the substituted judgment of House against Ledingham was not obtained in good faith, and as to the judgment of Arnold against Ledingham is fraudulent and void.

And the report gave judgment against House in favor of Arnold for the amount of his bid with interest, and on failure to pay, a resale of the land, &c.

Upon exceptions to this report, Judge Pressley rendered the following decree:

The act of assembly of 1865 makes provision for perpetuating the testimony concerning lost deeds and other papers; also, for substituting new records of judgments and decrees, which have been lost or destroyed.

*603

*An abstract of these substitutes was to be entered, in proper abstract books, but no time was fixed within which that was to be done, nor did the act require that deeds and mortgages should be again recorded if the previous record thereof had been destroyed.

The fifth section of the act of 1866 remedies these defects by providing that "all written instruments of which a record is required by law, and of which the record has been lost, but the original preserved, and the substitutes, provided in said act for such originals, in case of their loss, shall be recorded within six months from the ratification of this act, otherwise they shall not prevail as liens against subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration, nor creditors without "notice."

It seems clear to me that the words of the above section include judgments, and require them to be recorded within the time therein limited. It has been questioned whether the word "subsequent" applied to "creditors" as well as "purchasers." I have no doubt that it does; and further, that it means creditors subsequent to the date of the said act; just as in the case of an unrecorded mortgage, which does not prevail against a purchaser subsequent to its date, even though he may have been precedent to the date fixed by law for recording such mortgage.

As the defendant, House, did not within the time required get an order of the court to substitute a new record of his judgment, the next question is, whether Arnold is a creditor without notice. His debtor, Ledingham, was originally the debtor of Falls & Kinard, and his debt to them was contracted in 1860, whilst the record of the said lost judgment yet existed. They, therefore, had such legal notice of the said judgment as would affect them and their assignee of the said debt. But, after careful examination of the testimony, I think that Arnold is not a mere assignee. In 1866 he advanced money to Falls & Kinard, they agreeing to pay the said advances in good notes of their debtors, made payable to Arnold. As soon as such notes equal to the amount advanced were delivered to him, that discharged his claim on the remaining assets of Falls & Kinard. Pursuant to said agreement, in February, 1867, they procured from Ledingham his note payable to Arnold, which he then accepted with other notes *of the same character. And thus, at that time, for valuable consideration, he became the creditor of Ledingham, without notice of the said lost judgment.

*604

In 1870 Arnold obtained judgment against Ledingham on the said note, and the execution thereon was levied on the land in question in December, 1874. Before the sale in January ensuing, House gave notice of his judgment, and was about to stay the sale. Thereupon it was agreed by Arnold, through his attorneys, that their bid for the land should be the amount then claimed by House, and that the purchase money should remain with the sheriff until the determination of the steps to establish the existence of the House judgment. That determination was had in February, 1875, and then House claimed and received from the sheriff a conveyance of the land, crediting the purchase money upon his said judgment. The referee, without any proof on the point, reports that Arnold did not have notice of the said settlement. But I think that notice to him may and must be presumed from the circumstances of the case; he had levied upon the land in question, and had been prevented from receiving the purchase money by the said notice from House; he had also agreed that the said purchase money should remain with the sheriff until the determination by the court on House's application for renewal of his judgment. Under such circumstances it cannot be doubted that he must have watched the progress of that application and knew of its determination. When, therefore, he permitted House to make the said settlement with the sheriff, that was an abandonment of the contest, and having done that, he cannot now, after so long a lapse of time, set up the claim that he was then a creditor without notice, and as such having rights superior to those of House.

But though Arnold, by his said waiver, has lost the priority which he might have maintained, yet he may still dispute the amount of House's judgment. Only lately did he discover that there was collusion between House and Ledingham, whereby the amount of the said judgment was fixed at a larger sum than then remained unpaid thereon. The referee reports that there was such collusion, and that the true amount then unpaid was only $826.86. I adopt his conclusion, not because the testimony *is entirely satisfactory to me, but because it is contradictory, and the referee, who personally examined some of the witnesses, can estimate the value of their testimony better than I can.

*605

The referee also reports that, because of the said collusion, the said judgment should be entirely set aside as fraudulent; but I do not concur with him in this. It was free from all taint of fraud when first entered in 1858, and I find no authority for setting aside a judgment, valid in its origin, because by collusion between the parties thereto it was afterward renewed for more than remained unpaid thereon.

The defendant, House, by taking the place of the bidder, and by his settlement with the sheriff, 1875, gained, and, under this decree, is allowed to retain, very substantial benefit. I therefore hold him liable as purchaser of the said land at the price fixed at that time. On that basis there is a balance of $424.24 due by him, according to the report of the referee, after allowing him the true amount of his judgment.

It is therefore adjudged and decreed, that the defendant, Jesse House, pay to the plaintiff, Francis Arnold, the said sum of $424.24, and the costs of this case; and, upon his failure to pay the same within thirty days after this decree is filed, that plaintiff have leave to enter judgment against him under this decree, and to issue execution thereon.

From this decree, both parties appealed. The plaintiff's exceptions are as follows:

1. Because, it is respectfully submitted, his Honor erred in deciding that, although the lien of the plaintiff's judgment was prior to that of the defendant, House, and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the lands of the judgment debtor, yet the plaintiff was to be deprived of the rights incident to his superior lien, because he was "to be presumed" to have notice of the "settlement" between the sheriff and House—and this contrary to the report of the referee, notwithstanding that there was not a tittle of evidence that the plaintiff had any notice, and notwithstanding that no third person could in any manner be affected by a decree restoring the parties to their legal rights.

2. Because his Honor erred in deciding that any agreement *was made by the plaintiff, through his attorneys, in respect to the bid to be made upon the land, or the purchase money, or any other matter whatsoever.

*606

3. Because his Honor erred in decreeing that the substituted record of the judgment in favor of the defendant, House, should stand for the sum of $826.86, notwithstanding the same was procured by fraud and collusion.

4. Because his Honor erred in failing to charge the defendant, House, with interest upon the unpaid purchase money of the land from the day of sale.

5. Because the said decree authorizes no more than a judgment for money against the defendant, House; whereas, it is submitted the plaintiff was clearly entitled to the security of the land for the payment of his prior judgment, or any amount due thereon.

6. Because the report of the referee should have been confirmed.

The defendant, House's, exceptions are as follows:

1. Because his Honor should have held that the fifth section of the act of 1866 did not embrace within its limitations "judgment and decrees," but had reference (1) to "instruments in writing," the originals of which had been preserved; (2) or, in case of the loss of such originals, to be certified copies of any such "instruments in writing" as had been preserved; (3) and in case of there being neither original nor certified copy of such "instruments in writing" in existence, then to such substituted lost "instruments in writing" as are provided for in the third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh sections of the act of 1865.

2. Because his Honor should have decided that the plaintiff was not a subsequent creditor by the transactions between himself and Kinard, but was an antecedent creditor, occupying no better position than his assignee, in whose shoes he stands.

Mr. L. E. Le Conte, for plaintiff.
Messrs. Pope & Haskell, for defendants.

*607

*March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

THOMSON, A. A. J. The plaintiff recovered, October 26th, 1870, judgment against Jacob H. Ledingham for the sum of $1029.54. Jesse House, one of the defendants, obtained a judgment in 1858, against the same party, for the sum of $800. The record of Jesse House's judgment was lost, and it was restored by a new record substituted therefor, by order of the court. The plaintiff alleged that the judgment of Jesse House was fraudulent, or set up for a fraudulent purpose, and should be postponed to his. A tract of land of Jacob H. Ledingham had been sold by the sheriff, under execution, for the sum of $1251, and was purchased by a party who transferred the bid to Jesse House. Jesse House did not pay the money to the sheriff, but claimed that the sum should be applied to his execution, and credited thereon. The plaintiff insisted that no credit should be allowed Jesse House, and that all the purchase money should be paid to the sheriff. All the issues in the case were submitted to a referee. The referee made his report, and held the judgment of Jesse House fraudulent in its renewal or restoration as a record; and even were it free from all taint of fraud in this particular, still void and of no effect as against the judgment of the plaintiff. In this view the referee was not sustained by the Circuit judge, who held a judgment "valid in its origin" could not be set aside, because it was afterwards renewed for more than remained unpaid thereon. It does not follow that an improper use of a valid security destroys the proper right under the security itself. The defect must exist in the security which is impaired by the fraudulent purpose or intent entering into the elements of the contract. The Southwestern Railroad Bank attempted to obtain an unfair preference out of the assets of a failing debtor, the Ocmulgee Bank. The effort entirely failed, and the assignment given by the latter bank to the former was set aside as against the provisions of law. But upon an attempt to exclude the debt of the Southwestern Railroad Bank from its proper share of the assets of the Ocmulgee Bank, the court held the action of the Southwestern Railroad Bank did not operate as a forfeiture of its debt also. The court said there was no principle of equity which exacts this penalty. A party can be per*mitted to derive no advantage from his own wrong. This seems the extent of the rule. Johnston v. Southwestern Railroad Bank, 3 Strob. Eq. 330. Upon this point there was no error in the Circuit decree.

*608

For what sum, then, should the judgment of Jesse House stand? Upon this point the Circuit Court affirmed the referee's finding, which stated as unpaid thereon the sum of $826.86. Deducting this sum, with costs from the purchase money, a balance of $424.24 was found in the hands of House, for which the presiding judge gave a decree.

Jesse House became the actual purchaser of the land, and the sheriff executed a deed to him. He leased the land for one year to Jacob H. Ledingham, for the sum of $300. He thus obtained the profits of the property, the value of which was represented in part by money retained in his hands. This money retained was Arnold's, and should have been paid to the sheriff for the plaintiff's use. By assuming the bid and taking the title he contracted with the sheriff to pay the money into his office, or at least so much thereof as he was not entitled to have credited on his judgment. Being in the uninterrupted use of the whole land, and making profit therefrom, he should account for interest on so much of the purchase money as was not his own. Hampton v. Eigleberger, 2 Bail. 520.

The sheriff at his sales may be regarded the agent of both parties, and his entry a liquidation of the sum bid. The sum is thus rendered certain. Leman v. Blackwood, Harper 219.

Other questions were presented by the exceptions on appeal, in relation to which there was either a concurrence in the views of the Circuit judge, or which did not affect the conclusions reached by the court in the case.

This court, in its exercise of the powers of review, will not disturb the findings of the Circuit Court unless it be manifest that the evidence plainly points out another and different result from that attained by the presiding judge. Clarke v. Jenkins, 3 Rich. Eq. 338; Austin v. Kinsman, 1 S. C. 97.

Interest should be allowed the plaintiff on the sum of money decreed to him from the time the money should have been paid *by House in the sheriff's office, and the decree of the Circuit Court is modified accordingly.

*609

The judgment of the Circuit Court, modified as above, is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

NOTE BY THE REPORTER

[For the convenience of the profession, it is purposed to group together the decisions of this court since the adoption of the constitution of 1868, determining the power of the Supreme Court to review on appeal findings of fact by the courts below, and the rules which govern the exercise of such power.

The chart of their powers is contained in Article IV., Section 4, of the constitution, which reads as follows: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and shall constitute a court for the correction of errors at law, under such regulations as the general assembly may, by law, prescribe."

First. Appeals from the Court of General Sessions, and from the common law side of the Court of Common Pleas, are governed by the same principles, so far as the jurisdiction of this court is concerned. In either case the verdict of a jury cannot be set aside on appeal for error of fact. This is fully supported by the authorities, and there is no case to the contrary. In the leading case of State v. Bailey, 1 S. C. 1, the authority of the former Court of Appeals in this state, and of the Court of King's Bench in England, and of this court under the constitution of 1868, are considered, and the conclusion stated, that under Article IV., Section 4, of the present constitution, this court is without jurisdiction, and hence has no power to grant a new trial where it is asked upon the ground that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence; that such right rests exclusively with the Circuit judge. In State v. Cardoza, 11 S. C. 195, the point was made that where there is no evidence to sustain a verdict, *that it may be set aside here as being necessarily based upon matters outside the case; but the court, in the strongest language, reaffirmed the decision in Bailey's case. The same principle has been recognized in civil cases of common law cognizance; this court cannot sustain the appeal. Floyd v. Abney, 1 S. C. 114; Elmore v. Scurry, Id. 139; Winsmith v. Walker, 5 S. C. 473; Bardin v. Drafts, 10 S. C. 493; Warren v. Lagrone, ante 51.

*610

If the damages awarded by the jury are excessive, this court cannot interfere. Craven v. Rose, 3 S. C. 72; Joplin v. Carrier, 11 S. C. 327. The power to grant relief in such cases rests exclusively with the Circuit judge, whose decision is final. If he refuses to grant a new trial, when the motion is made upon the ground that the verdict is against the evidence or unsupported by it, such refusal cannot be here reviewed. Abrahams v. Kelly, 2 S. C. 235; Gibbes v. Elliott, 8 S. C. 50; Clarke v. Harper, Id. 256. In Winsmith v. Dewberry, unreported case, No. 774, under the judge's charge, the verdict was absolutely without evidence to support it; but from the same judge's refusal to grant a new trial, the appeal was dismissed. Where a new trial is refused in cases alleging that the verdict awarded excessive damages, the same rule has been uniformly applied. Brickman v. Railroad Co., 8 S. C. 173; Steele v. Railroad Co., 11 S. C. 589. An order by the Circuit judge granting a new trial in such cases, is equally beyond the interference of this court. Byrd v. Small, 2 S. C. 388; Massey v. Adams, 3 S. C. 254; Potts v. Bonds, 10 S. C. 498.

Where in a common law action a referee decides the questions of fact, and his findings are confirmed by the Circuit judge, the report stands as the verdict of a jury and cannot be here reviewed, unless it is made to appear that the evidence is incompetent in point of law to support the conclusions of the referee; and that had the case been tried by a jury, the presiding judge would have been justified in directing a verdict to the contrary. But if the evidence is sufficient to entitle the referee to pass upon the questions as matters of fact, then his findings of fact do not constitute errors of law, and this court cannot set them aside. Kirkland v. Cureton, 4 S. C. 122; Gilliland, Howell & Co. v. Gasque, 6 S. C. 406. Where tried by the Circuit judge, without referee or jury, his decision upon the facts is not appealable, unless the judgment is totally devoid of facts to sustain it, thus *involving error of law, which this court may correct. Whaley v. Bank of Charleston, 5 S. C. 189. Where the evidence is insufficient in law to sustain the action, the Circuit judge's refusal of a motion made by the defendant for a non-suit, is error of law, reviewable on appeal. In such case the cause must be remanded, as this court cannot dismiss the complaint for insufficiency of evidence. Willis v. Knox, 5 S. C. 474. But when there is any evidence at all in the case, it should be submitted to the jury—a non-suit would be erroneous. Holley v. Walker, 7 S. C. 142.

*611

From this statement of the cases, it will be seen that in jury causes this court cannot grant a new trial except for error of law; that where there is no legal evidence to sustain the demand for judgment, it would be error of law to refuse a motion for nonsuit, but not where there is any evidence, however slight in support of such demand; that this court cannot review the decision of the Circuit judge, either granting or refusing a new trial, upon grounds involving questions of fact only; that when the case is tried by a Circuit judge without a jury, or upon the report of a referee, his findings of fact are not reviewable on appeal, where there is any evidence to sustain them, but if wholly unsupported by any evidence in the cause, they would be error of law; and the reasoning which has led to the conclusion last stated, induces the belief that whenever the point is raised this court will hold that the refusal of the presiding judge to direct a verdict, where there is no evidence to the contrary, is error of law.

Second. In "cases of chancery," this court is not limited to a correction of errors of law, but has appellate jurisdiction, and may, therefore, review and reverse findings of fact by the courts below. The only limitation upon their power in this regard are the rules laid down by their own adjudications. This was suggested in State v. Bailey, supra, acknowledged in several subsequent cases, and expressly determined in the leading case of Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. 531, at the hearing of which, Moses, C. J., was absent, but to which he signified his assent in the subsequent case of Whaley v. Bank, 5 S. C. 201.

Questions of fact, then, in "cases of a class of which the Court of Chancery could entertain jurisdiction at the time of the adoption of the constitution" of 1868, may be reviewed here, subject to the principles of the decided cases. Such questions have *come up under four aspects: (1.) Where the conclusions of the Circuit judge confirm those of a referee; (2.) Where they are derived from testimony taken before him in court; (3.) Where they are based upon testimony submitted to him in writing; and (4.) Where the Circuit judge reverses the findings of fact by a referee, who was required to report his conclusions from the evidence.

*612

1. Where the Circuit judge has concurred in the findings of fact by a referee, this court will not reverse them, except on clear or overbearing evidence. Blackwell v. Searles, 1 S. C. 116. This rule has been repeatedly re-affirmed in the same or similar language. In Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 548, the phraseology is, "unless it is without any testimony to sustain it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence." The rule has been uniform and unquestioned; the only difficulty lies in its application. Where the findings have depended upon direct testimony, involving the accuracy or credibility of witnesses, they have been invariably sustained. Barrett v. Cochran, 11 S. C. 29; Johnson v. Henagan, Id. 93; Fraser & Dill v. Charleston, Id. 486. Where the conclusions were drawn inferentially from the facts proven, the rule has caused a dismissal of the appeal in Austin v. Kinsman, 1 S. C. 97; Blackwell v. Searles, Id. 116; Hinton v. Kennedy, 3 S. C. 459; Eakin v. Knox, 6 S. C. 14; Richardson v. Chappell, Id. 146; Singleton v. Lowndes, 9 S. C. 465; Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 527; and also in Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 6 S. C. 290, which is assumed to be an equity case, as the Supreme Court does not question their right to review the findings of fact by the court below. Concurrent findings by referee and Circuit judge have been reversed in the following cases: Billings v. Clinton, 6 S. C. 90; Zimmerman v. Autley, Id. 379; Arthur v. Anderson, 9 S. C. 234; Annely v. De Saussure, ante 488. The correctness of the rule is not questioned in these cases, as will be observed by reading the cases themselves. In Billings v. Clinton it was considered that the testimony was not legally sufficient to establish the fact found, and that to other testimony greater weight was attached than was permitted by law. In Zimmerman v. Autley the court say: "Had they, in drawing their conclusions as to the facts of the case passed upon, all the questions of fact involved and put at issue by the pleadings, and properly applied *the rules of law having a bearing on the case, according to the established practice of this court, their conclusions would not ordinarily be disturbed." And the court proceed to point out the error of the referee in basing his findings of fact upon one badge of fraud only, overlooking other badges clearly disclosed by the evidence, and that the judgment did not follow necessarily from the facts found. In Arthur v. Anderson it was treated as an error of law, involving "the sufficiency of the evidence as it regards its character and tendency to establish the conclusions derived from it by the court below." Annely v. De Saussure remains to be considered. In this case the findings of fact by the referee (who was soon afterwards elevated to the bench) were concurred in by the Circuit judge and approved by one of the judges of the Supreme Court. The Chief Justice who delivered the opinion of the court reversing the findings below, while evidently differing with the referee, puts the reversal upon legal grounds. The associate justice whose concurrence made a reversal the judgment of this court, gives no assent to the legal position of the Chief Justice, but finds in the case "a total lack of evidence" to sustain the conclusions below. The reversal was thus reached by a majority of the court, one of whom put it upon a legal principle to which there was no assent, and the other upon a conclusion of fact upon which he alone was willing to rest it. And the third justice dissenting agrees with referee and Circuit judge. If the majority of the court had overruled the findings below as involving errors of fact only, notwithstanding the assent given to such findings by one of their associates, the profession would find it difficult to learn the limitations within which the rule was applied; and it would be not easily reconciled with the language in Hinton v. Kennedy, supra, that "the onus is on the appellant to show from the facts in evidence that there is no reasonable doubt of the error alleged." The rule itself, however, stands; and to obtain a reversal of the concurrent findings of fact by referee and Circuit judge it will be necessary to convince this court that such findings are without evidence to sustain them, or are manifestly against the weight of the evidence.

*613

2. Where the evidence is taken in open court in the presence of the presiding judge without a referee or jury, his conclusions therefrom stand upon as strong ground, as they do under the *head last above discussed. It does not appear that any of the cases now under consideration involved direct testimony upon the facts found; the conclusions seem to have been inferentially drawn from the testimony. In Burris v. Whitner, 3 S. C. 510, the findings of fact were sustained, there being "no clear proof to contradict his conclusions." They were also sustained in Mayer v. Blease, 4 S. C. 10, the court saying they "must stand unless shown to be so entirely erroneous as to justify our interference by impressions from the evidence altogether contrary to his own." The same result was reached in Means v. Feaster, Id. 249, where it is said: "If there was evidence sufficient to warrant the judgment of the court below on the facts, we should not overrule it, even if a close and careful examination might lead us to believe that the weight was the other way." In Lucken v. Wichman, 5 S. C. 411, the appeal was dismissed. Moses, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Where a decree resting alone on facts is sought to be reversed, the contestant must show that it is clearly erroneous. The obligation thus imposed upon him is necessarily a light one, for if the error is clear, there will be no difficulty in exposing it." In Daniels v. Moses, ante 138, it is recognized as the "established rule of this court to accept the conclusion of the Circuit judge where there is any evidence to sustain it. And in Glenn v. Shannon, ante 570, it is ruled that a finding of fact by a referee in an equity cause tried before him is conclusive, unless without evidence to sustain it, or manifestly against the overbearing weight of the evidence; and the appeal was dismissed. In reversing the Circuit decree in Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. 531, a case heard, it would appear, partly on written and partly on oral testimony, this court say that their conclusion was reached "not upon doubtful proof, but by a clear and overwhelming mass of testimony met by no contradiction such as the nature of the testimony demanded." This is said as to one only of the questions of fact involved, but the same reasoning is applied to the others, and clear error is pointed out. Featherston v. Norris, 7 S. C. 472, simply determines the legal bearing of the facts found to be different from that given to them by the Circuit judge. And in Shaw v. Cunningham, 9 S. C. 271, the facts are not stated. The case was remanded to the Circuit Court to have a question of fact passed upon by a jury, this court not being willing to over*rule the judgment of the court below, but "not satisfied of the sufficiency of the evidence adduced to support his conclusion."

*614

*615

3. Where the conclusions of the Circuit judge are drawn from written testimony submitted to him, unaided by the findings of a referee, or the verdict of a jury upon issues ordered, the rule is substantially the same. Such appears to be the case of Livingston v. Wells, 8 S. C. 347, in which Willard, A. J., draws no distinction between cases heard primarily by the Circuit judge upon oral or written testimony, and cases heard upon exceptions to a referee's report. In sustaining the facts as found, he thus speaks, (p. 356): "In order to set aside the conclusions of the Circuit Court as to the force and effect of evidence upon an appeal in cases of equitable cognizance, it is necessary to show that such conclusions are inconsistent with or unsupported by the clear force of the evidence from which they are drawn. * * * It must appear that the conclusions of the Circuit Court are clearly wrong. * * * The presumptions in favor of the correctness of the Circuit decree must be completely rebutted on considerations arising from the evidence, if it appears that there was contradictory testimony, in order to reconcile which the character and position of the witnesses must be considered as presenting a question of credibility. * * * If it appears that conclusions of fact inferentially drawn from the testimony enter into the determinations as to matters of fact, the appellate court usually leaves these conclusions undisturbed, unless found to be inconsistent with inferences that are regarded by the court as irresistibly arising from such evidence. In a word, the clear result of undisputed testimony must point to a conclusion different from that which the Circuit Court has drawn from it, before it will be disturbed on appeal." This seems to be quite as strong language as that which is to be found in the cases above considered. In State, ex rel. Cathcart, v. Columbia, ante 371, a finding of fact by the Circuit Court against the appellants upon whom lay the burden of proof was sustained, there being no overbearing testimony to the contrary. Fraser v. Davie, 11 S. C. 56, was heard almost wholly on testimony in writing. This court overrules the Circuit judge, because a contrary conclusion rested on clear and indisputable grounds.

They hold his finding erroneous "as unsupported by the proper legal effect of the proofs and allegations." And in overruling him upon another *point they say: "the testimony is so clear and conclusive, that it does not need comment or illustration."

*616

4. Where the Circuit judge reverses the findings of fact by a referee, a different principle governs. Five cases of this class may be found in the current series of reports, viz.: Dewitt v. Atkinson, 6 S. C. 140; Perry v. Sullivan Man. Co., Id. 310; Roach v. Ivey, 7 S. C. 434; Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. C. 36; Thorpe v. Thorpe, ante 154. The case of Pool v. Dial, 10 S. C. 440, has reference only to the powers of a Circuit judge over the referee's report. Dewitt v. Atkinson is the leading case under this head. While, as stated in the subsequent case of Thorpe v. Thorpe, the Circuit judge must in every equity case reach and state his own conclusions of fact, nevertheless where such conclusions are derived wholly from testimony submitted to him in writing, and they are different from those drawn by the referee from that same testimony taken by him in person, the Circuit judge's opportunities of discovering error in the referee's findings of fact, are the same as those afforded this court, and the rules laid down under the three preceding heads of this note do not apply. This court will fully examine the testimony in such cases, and will sustain referee or Circuit judge according to the impressions thence derived. This is the doctrine of Dewitt v. Atkinson. In all of these cases, except Thorpe v. Thorpe, the referee was sustained and the Circuit decree reversed. But in each one of them, the judgment reached was the result of an examination of the testimony, to the same extent as were the conclusions of the Circuit Court.

Six cases only have been passed over, and they need to be separately considered, as it cannot be determined under what head they should fall. Leaphart v. Leaphart, 1 S. C. 199, was referred to the commissioner in equity to ascertain and report; but his findings are not stated, and, in the opinion of this court, allusion is made to a witness who was examined before the Chancellor. The appellants, regarding the testimony as unsatisfactory and conflicting, asked this court to order an issue to be tried by a jury, but it was refused, and the Circuit decree was confirmed. In Williams v. Beard, 1 S. C. 309, and in Womack v. Austin, Id. 421, it does not appear how the testimony was taken, but the conclusion of the Circuit judge was confirmed, there being "no overbearing weight of evidence against it." In Smith & Gibson

*617

v. *Pate, 3 S. C. 204, it cannot be certainly said how the evidence was taken. The decision of the Circuit judge in favor of plaintiffs was reversed, and an issue upon the main point of fact was ordered by the Supreme Court to be submitted to a jury, because of the "absence of all proof" to sustain it. Upon the certified verdict of the jury resolving the issues in favor of the defendant, this court dismissed the action. In Anderson v. Earle, 9 S. C. 460, we are not informed how the case was heard, what the decision of the Circuit judge was, or whether this court agreed or disagreed with him. In Arnold v. House [12 S. C. 600] the principal case, to which this note is appended, questions of fact found by the referee were confirmed in part by the Circuit judge and in part reversed, and both classes were brought here on appeal. The opinion of the court does not enable us to say which were approved and which were deemed immaterial, nor to which their remarks applied. From this review of cases of equitable cognizance, we find—

1. That in all cases of appeal from findings of fact by a Circuit judge, confirming the same findings by a referee, or deduced from testimony taken orally before the judge, or from evidence submitted to him in writing for his original findings, the burden is upon the appellant to show clear error in the Circuit decree, by reason of an entire absence of evidence to support it, or because opposed to the manifest weight of testimony in the cause. But where, in the judgment of this court, there is such clear error, the Circuit decree will be reversed.

2. In cases of difference of opinion between the judge and a referee upon the facts, this court will examine the Circuit decree, and either adopt or reject it, as the facts may appear to warrant, to the same extent as a Circuit judge passes upon the report of a referee.

It is believed that every case contained in the twelve volumes of the new series of South Carolina Reports, in which this court has been called upon to review questions of fact determined in the courts below, will be found under its proper head in this note. It will be observed that the Supreme Court have, as yet, laid down no rule governing its review of findings of fact by a Court of Probate; nor has it yet been determined whether a different rule would be applied to cases coming up from the Court of Probate, exercising the powers heretofore belonging to *Ordinaries, from the rule which should govern cases arising in that court under the enlarged jurisdiction conferred upon it by the constitution of 1868, and which, before that time, were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Equity.

*618

REPORTER.]

REPORTS OF CASES

HEARD AND DETERMINED BY THE SUPREME COURT

OF

SOUTH CAROLINA

VOLUME XIII

FROM NOVEMBER, 1879, TO APRIL, 1880, INCLUSIVE

BY ROBERT W. SHAND

STATE REPORTER

JERSEY CITY, N. J.
FREDERICK D. LINN & CO., LAW PUBLISHERS AND BOOKSELLERS
1881

ANNOTATED EDITION

ST. PAUL
WEST PUBLISHING CO.
1916

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1881, by FREDERICK D. LINN & CO.,
In the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

(13 S.CAR.)

JUDGES AND OTHER LAW OFFICERS

DURING THE PERIOD COMPRISED IN THIS VOLUME

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

CHIEF JUSTICE.

HON. A. J. WILLARD.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICES.

HON. HENRY McIVER, † HON. SAMUEL McGOWAN.

CIRCUIT JUDGES.

FIRST CIRCUIT,	HON. B. C. PRESSLEY.
SECOND "	" A. P. ALDRICH.
THIRD "	" T. B. FRASER.
FOURTH "	" J. H. HUDSON.
FIFTH "	" J. B. KERSHAW.
SIXTH "	" T. J. MACKEY.
SEVENTH "	" W. H. WALLACE.
EIGHTH "	" THOMAS THOMSON.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

HON. LEROY F. YOUMANS.

SOLICITORS.

1st Circuit.—W. ST. J. JERVEY.	5th Circuit.—JOHN R. ABNEY.
2d Circuit.—F. H. GANTT.	6th Circuit.—T. C. GASTON.
3d Circuit.—M. J. HIRSCH.	7th Circuit.—B. W. BALL.
4th Circuit.—W. W. SELLERS.	8th Circuit.—J. S. COTHRAN.

CLERK OF THE SUPREME COURT.

A. M. BOOZER.

† Elected December 11th, 1879, as successor to Hon. A. C. Haskell, resigned.

LIST OF ATTORNEYS

ENROLLED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA DURING THE YEAR 1880

ABNEY, B. L.....Edgefield.
BEAN, THOS. L.....Augusta, Ga.
BEARD, W. J.....Manning.
BELLINGER, G. DUNCAN.....Barnwell.
BENET, W. C.....Abbeville.
BOGGS, JULIUS E.....Pickens.
BOYLE, CHARLES.....Summerville.
BREEDEN, S. M.....Bennettsville.
BROWN, GEO. W.....Darlington.
BUCHANAN, OSMUND W.....Winnsboro'.
CALHOUN, WM. P.....Abbeville.
CAMPBELL, THOS. A.....Laurens.
CAPPELMANN, J. D.....Charleston.
CASTON, ROBT. T.....Cheraw.
CHISOLM, J. BACHMAN.....Charleston.
CONNORS, CHAS. T.....Lancaster.
COVINGTON, F. F.....Bennettsville.
DARGAN, W. F.....Darlington.
DAVIS, JAMES E.....Aiken.
DE VORE, J. W.....Edgefield.
DUFFIE, A. M.....Blackstock.
ELLIOTT, HENRY S.....Beaufort.
EMANUEL, P. A.....Aiken.
EVANS, D. D.....Darlington.
FARLEY, HUGH L.....Spartanburg.
FOWLS, S. B.....Newberry.
GARY, ERNEST.....Edgefield.
GIBSON, HIRAM A. H.....Walhalla.
GOGGANS, JAMES K. P.....Newberry.
GRAHAM, S. J.....Abbeville.
GRIFFIN, J. S.....Colleton.
HALTIWANGER, GEO. D.....Columbia.
HAMMOND, M. C.....Aiken.
HENDERSON, E. P.....Aiken.
HOBBS JNO. F.....Lexington.
HOLLETT, RHODERICK P.....Columbia.
INGRAM, W. H.....Clarendon.
JOHNSON, H. L.....Williston.
JOHNSON, JAMES W.....Marion.
KENNEDY, E. J.....Chesterfield.
LEE, R. D.....Sumter.
LYNCH, R. A.....Columbia.
MAYBIN, ROBT. C.....Newberry.
MAYFIELD, WM. D.....Greenville.
MCDONALD, J. E.....Winnsboro'.
MCIVER, EDWARD.....Cheraw.
MCNEIL, JNO. M.....Chester.
MELTON, PRESTON L.....Columbia.
MEYNARDIE, C. W.....Chester.
MOORE, ERNEST.....Lancaster.
MORGAN, FRANCIS T.....Chester.
MULLER, J. A.....Lexington.
MURRAY, E. B.....Anderson.
MURRAY, JR., J. S.....Anderson
NIX, J. T.....Greenville.
NORRIS, F. W.....Edgefield.
OUTZS, W. D.....Edgefield.
PEARSON, JOHN H.....Columbia.
PERRIN, L. W.....Abbeville.
PIERSON, ROBT. M.....Kingstree.
PORTER, FRANK L.....Kingstree.
RAWLS, R. R.....Union.
RAYSON, T. M.....Orangeburg.
REED, J. OTEY.....Colleton.
SESSIONS, JOSEPH.....Georgetown.
SHANNON, JR., W. M.....Camden.
SHELOR, JOSEPH W.....Walhalla.
SHEPPARD, LUTHER W.....Edgefield.
SIMONS, J. ANCRUM.....Charleston.
SPAIN, T. H.....Darlington.
STUART, J. A.....Abbeville.
THOMAS, JR., JNO. P.....Columbia.
THOMAS, W. D.....Bennettsville.
TILLINGHAST, WM. S.....Hampton.
TRACY, C. C.....Walterboro'.
WARDLAW, COLUMBUS.....Anderson.
WARDLAW, F. H.....Edgefield.
WILLIAMS, WM. H.....Greenville.
WILLIAMSON, R. C.....Darlington.
WILSON, JOHN S.....Manning.
WILSON, J. STANYARNE.....York.
WOODWARD, CHAS. L.....Edgefield.
ZEAGLER, DAVID A.....Anderson.

TABLE OF CASES REPORTED

	Page
Adger v. Pringle	33
Adrian v. Lane	183
Allen v. Allen	512
Armstrong v. Craig	371
Balle v. Moseley	439
Barrett v. Bath Paper Co.	128
Barrett v. Watts	441
Beattie v. Pool	379
Black v. White	37
Bonham v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co.	267
Bull v. Rowe	355
Carolina Nat. Bank v. Wallace	347
Carrigan v. Bozeman	376
Carroll v. Still	430
Charles v. Charles	385
Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Earle	44
Clark v. Smith	585
Claussen v. Fultz	476
Cleveland v. Cohrs	397
Coleman v. Heller	491
Congdon v. Morgan	190
Cothran v. Knox	496
Crane v. Moses	43
Crane v. Moses	561
Cureton v. Mills	409
Diercks v. Roberts	338
Douglass v. Craig	371
Duncan v. Heller	94
Earle v. Cureton	19
Elder v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co.	279
Farrars, Ex parte	254
Fraser v. City of Charleston	533
Garrett v. Dial	254
Garvin v. Garvin	160
Gibbes v. Greenville & C. R. Co.	228
Godbold v. Godbold	601
Graham v. Moore	115
Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co.	467
Johnstone v. Manigault	403
Kapp v. Loyns	288
Lawrence v. Grambling	120
Lee v. Buck	178
McComb v. Woodbury	479
McCrosky v. Parks	90
McGrath v. Barnes	328
Mason v. Johnson	20
Mills v. Greenville & C. R. Co.	97
Minnick v. Fort	215
Mitchell v. Nelson	105
Mitchell v. Pinckney	203
Moore v. Parker	486
Murray v. Earle	87
Nimmons v. Stewart	445
Phinney v. Johnson	25
Reynolds v. Witte	5
Scott v. Carpenter	44
State v. Belcher	459
State v. Branham	389
State v. Corley	1
State v. Edwards	30
State v. Jackson	344
State v. McGreer	464
State v. McKettrick	439
State v. McNinch	452
State v. Stephens	285
State v. Washington	453
State v. Wilder	344
State v. Williams	546
State ex rel. Attorney General v. Greenville & C. R. Co.	228
State ex rel. Attorney General v. Hagood	46
State ex rel. Attorney General v. Savannah & C. R. Co.	467
State ex rel. Brown v. Chester & L. N. G. R. Co.	290
State ex rel. Jones v. Boles	283
State ex rel. McCall v. Cohen	198
State ex rel. Marshall v. Starling	262
Stroman v. O'Cain	100
Suber v. Allen	317
Swearingen, Ex parte	74
Terry v. Calnan	220
Thompson v. Wofford	216
Trenholm v. Wilson	174
Tucker v. Tucker	318
Verner v. Downs	449
Villalonga v. Hicks	163
Watson v. Columbia Bridge Co.	433
Westfield v. Westfield	482

UNREPORTED CASES

From January 8th to November 22d, 1881

No. 799. Russell & Co. v. Follin.
" 803. Scott v. Bryant.
" 804. Wilson v. Babb.
" 810. Ex parte Swearingen (order.)
" 811. Watts v. Cook.
" 814. Jay v. Thomson.
" 816. Wilson v. Richey.
" 838. State, ex rel. Fickling, v. Starling.
" 839. State, ex rel. Altee, v. Starling.
" 840. State, ex rel. Roach, v. Starling.
" 843. Childs v. Frazee.
" 852. C. C. & A. R. R. Co. v. Earle.
" 860. Capital B. & L. Association v. Thompson.
" 861. Mechanics B. & L. Association v. Senn.
No. 868. Hamilton v. Schefer.
" 869. State v. Bradberry.
" 877. Detheridge v. Earle.
" 878. State v. Myers.
" 879. Detheridge v. Earle.
" 884. Nathan v. Woodberry.
" 886. Symmes v. Symmes.
" 894. Thomas v. Perrin.
" 910. Boozer v. Roach.
" 911. Mobley v. Mobley.
" 920. Norton v. Livingston.
" 921. Benedict v. Neagle.
" 922. Cheshire v. Quattlebaum.
" 932. Peoples Bank v. Pritchett.
" 942. Witherspoon v. Adickes.

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT DURING THE PERIOD COMPRISED IN THIS VOLUME

HON. A. J. WILLARD, CHIEF JUSTICE.
HON. HENRY McIVER, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE.
HON. SAMUEL McGOWAN,† ASSOCIATE JUSTICE.

*(Case No. 786.)

STATE v. CORLEY.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Larceny ⟸2.]

So much of Chapter CXXIX., Section 12, of General Statutes, as relates to live stock, is repealed by the third section of the act of March 22d, 1878. 16 Stat. 631.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Branham, 13 S. C. 394; State v. Moore, 30 S. C. 74, 8 S. E. 437.

For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. ⟸2.]

[2. Criminal Law ⟸94.]

Since this statute, the larceny of a cow, although below the value of $20, is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, and is within the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 137–166; Dec. Dig. ⟸94.]

[3. Criminal Law ⟸889.]

Where the jury return an incomplete verdict, the judge may, before it is recorded and before the jury have dispersed, direct them to retire to their rooms to reconsider it; and a subsequent verdict is valid.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Anderson, 24 S. C. 114; Devore v. Geiger, 41 S. C. 140, 19 S. E. 288.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2112; Dec. Dig. ⟸889.]

Before Fraser, J., Orangeburg, May, 1879.

The defendant, Erwin Corley, was indicted for stealing a cow of the value of $12. One count laid the property in a person *named, and another count in some person or persons to the jurors unknown. The jury, after retiring, dispersed for the night by the consent of the solicitor and defendant's counsel, and returned into court the next morning their sealed verdict, which read, "guilty of killing an unknown cow," and was signed by the foreman. The presiding judge held that the verdict was incomplete, and directed the jury to retire and reconsider it. To this defendant excepted. The jury returned with a verdict of guilty. Defendant objected to its publication or record, and, being overruled, excepted.

*2

Defendant moved in arrest of judgment upon the grounds, (1) that by reason of the value of the cow being laid under $20, the court had no jurisdiction of the alleged crime; and (2) that the verdict first rendered amounted to a verdict of acquittal. The motion was overruled, and the prisoner was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary and to pay a fine of $1. Defendant appealed.

Messrs. Knowlton & Lathrop, for appellant.

The crime charged is petit larcency, under Chapter CXXIX., Section 12, of General Statutes. 14 Rich. 163. This section is not repealed by act of 1878. Repeals by implication are not favored, and if two acts can stand together, they shall do so. 1 Bl. Com. 90; Broom's Leg. Max. 29; 14 Rich. 247. There are no negative words nor repealing clause in the act of 1878, hence it should be held applicable only where the live stock is of the value of $20, other cases being governed by the former law. These acts are in pari materia, and should be taken and construed together. 1 Kent 463; Dwar. on Stat. 569; 2 Bail. 554. For other rules of construction applicable to this case, 1 Kent 464; 4 Bl. Com. 229; Dwar. on Stat. 770; 2 S. C. 404; and 6 Id. 464, were cited.

†The cases in which the name of Associate Justice McGowan does not appear, were heard before his qualification.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, for respondent.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. The defendant was convicted in the Court of General Sessions of larceny, in stealing a cow of the value of $12. *A motion in arrest of judgment was made, upon the ground that the Court of General Sessions had no jurisdiction of the offence charged, and, upon that motion being refused by the Circuit Court, it is renewed here by this appeal.

*3

The solution of this question depends entirely upon the determination of the question, whether so much of Section 12, Chapter CXXIX., of the General Statutes, as relates to the larceny of live stock, is repealed by the act of March 22d, 1878. 16 Stat. 631. That act does not, in express terms, repeal the section above referred to, and, if it operates as a repeal, it must be by implication. While it is quite true that repeals by implication are not favored, it is equally true that one act may repeal another by implication only. A striking instance of this, followed by the most unlooked-for results, may be found in the repeal of the act of 1789, prescribing the punishment for cow-stealing, by the act of 1866. State v. Thomas, 14 Rich. 163. There must, however, be a necessary implication; for, to repeal a statute by implication, there must be such a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new law and of the old, that they cannot be reconciled. Potter's Dwar. on Stat. 154, et seq. Every affirmative statute is a repeal of a precedent affirmative statute where its matter is so clearly repugnant that it necessarily implies a negative. 1 Bl. Com. 89. So, too, where a statute covers the subject matter of a former statute, and prescribes different penalties from those enumerated in the old law, it is, by necessary implication, a repeal of the former statute. Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. (U. S.) 429 [14 L. Ed. 210]. But, after all, the real question is, what was the intention of the law-making power, as it may be gathered from the terms of the statute? Now, to apply these principles to the act under consideration. Its title is an act to amend the criminal law, showing that the intention of the legislature was to introduce some change in that branch of the law, either by adding to or altering it. On looking into the special provisions of the act, we do not find anything that may be called an addition to the criminal law—no new offence being created, and no new modes of procedure being prescribed, but we only find provision for altering what had before been the law, and that, too, in the single matter of the measure of punishment prescribed for *certain offences. The first section provides for an increase of the punishment for the offences of arson and rape; the second for an increase of the punishment for the offence of burglary at common law; and the third for an increase of the punishment in cases of larceny of live stock. Now, when it is remembered that the criminal jurisdiction of a justice of the peace or other inferior tribunal, is measured only by the nature and amount of the punishment, and not by the nature of the offence, (Const., Art. I., § 19; Art. IV., § 22,) and when we find the general assembly amending the criminal law for the sole purpose of increasing the punishment prescribed for certain offences, by which increase the limits assigned to the jurisdiction of "a justice of the peace or other officer authorized by law" are exceeded, the conclusion is irresistible that the general assembly must have intended to place such offences beyond the jurisdiction of those inferior tribunals.

*4

Again, here is an affirmative statute which, by its terms, necessarily implies a negative. It prescribes that "any person found guilty of the larceny of any horse, mule, cow, hog or any other live stock, shall suffer imprisonment in the state penitentiary," &c. It necessarily negatives the idea that a person found guilty of such an offence could be lawfully punished in any other way. The language is, "any horse, mule, cow," &c., not any such animal above or below a specified value; and it is difficult to understand by what authority a court of justice could interpolate into the statutes, as the argument of appellant necessarily demands, the words "of or above the value of twenty dollars."

It seems also that it has always been the policy of this state to treat the larceny of certain domesticated animals as a distinct and separate subject matter from the larceny of other species of property, as is evidenced by the various acts in relation to horse, cow and hog-stealing. Now this act of March 22d, 1878, is a new statute, covering the whole subject matter of the larceny of such animals, and prescribes different penalties from those provided for in the former laws on the same subject, and hence, under the rule laid down in Norris v. Crocker, supra, the latter must be regarded as a repeal of the former.

The other ground of appeal seems to have been abandoned; *and very properly, too, as it is manifest that it could not be sustained. The power of the court to allow a jury to correct informalities in their verdict before it is recorded, and before the jury have dispersed, is undoubted.

*5

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. 5

(Case No. 791.)

REYNOLDS v. WITTE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Principal and Agent ⟸158.]

Where money of a principal was lent by his agents and the notes of the borrower were secured by a deposit of negotiable collaterals which were fraudulently misappropriated by the agents, the principal is responsible for their value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 593, 595; Dec. Dig. ⟸158.]

[2. Principal and Agent ⟸158.]

A principal is civilly responsible for the fraudulent act of his agent, where the act is done in the course of the agency, and by virtue of the authority as agent.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in City Council of Charleston v. Ryan, 22 S. C. 348, 53 Am. Rep. 713; Myers v. Whiteheart, 24 S. C. 202; Cobb v. Columbia & C. R. Co., 37 S. C. 200, 15 S. E. 878; Rucker v. Smoke, 37 S. C. 380, 16 S. E. 40, 34 Am. St. Rep. 758; Whaley v. Duncan, 47 S. C. 147, 25 S. E. 54; Hutchison v. Rock Hill Real Estate & Loan Co., 65 S. C. 75, 43 S. E. 295; Mitchell v. Leech, 69 S. C. 421, 48 S. E. 290, 66 L. R. A. 723, 104 Am. St. Rep. 811; Bank of Spartanburg v. Mahon, 75 S. C. 258, 55 S. E. 529; Williams v. Tolbert, 76 S. C. 217, 56 S. E. 908; J. C. Stevenson Co. v. Bethea, 79 S. C. 492, 61 S. E. 99; Brown v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 82 S. C. 175, 63 S. E. 744; Huestess v. South Atlantic Life Ins. Co., 88 S. C. 41, 70 S. E. 403; Abbott v. Sumter Lumber Co., 93 S. C. 144, 76 S. E. 146; Robertson v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 95 S. C. 364, 78 S. E. 977; Black v. State Co., 99 S. C. 467, 83 S. E. 1089.

For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 589–598; Dec. Dig. ⟸158.]

[3. Pledges ⟸48; Trover and Conversion ⟸46.]

The borrower having offered to pay the notes at their maturity, the principal is liable for the market value of the collaterals at that date.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gregg v. Bank of Columbia, 72 S. C. 463, 52 S. E. 195, 110 Am. St. Rep. 633; Davis v. Reynolds, 91 S. C. 442, 74 S. E. 827.

For other cases, see Pledges, Cent. Dig. § 117; Dec. Dig. ⟸48; Trover and Conversion, Cent. Dig. § 263; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, November, 1878.

This was a controversy without action between Mark Reynolds and C. O. Witte. The facts agreed upon state neither more nor less than is sufficient for a proper understanding of the case. They are as follows:

Facts.—1. The plaintiff is a planter, residing on his plantation in Sumter county, and the defendant resides in Charleston county.

2. The plaintiff having as his factors and agents in the city of Charleston the firm of J. M. Caldwell & Sons, sent to them, in the year 1869, certain sums of money to be invested by them for him.

3. J. M. Caldwell & Sons, acting as agents for the plaintiff, *lent this money to defendant, and took from him notes with collateral security.

*6

The notes were renewed from time to time. The last were in the words and figures following:

"Charleston, S. C., December 3d, 1874.

"$1000.

"Twelve months after date, I promise to pay to Dr. M. Reynolds, or order, one thousand dollars, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, I having deposited against this note two bonds of the city of Memphis, guaranteed by the Memphis and Charleston railroad, for $1000 each.

"Nos. 1283, 1054.

"(Signed,) Chas. O. Witte."

"Charleston, S. C., May 20th, 1875.

"Twelve months after date, I promise to pay to Dr. M. Reynolds, or his order, three thousand dollars for value received, and interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable quarterly.

"Against payment of this note I have delivered to Messrs. J. M. Caldwell & Sons, his agents, the following bonds as collateral security: three bonds city of Savannah, six per cent., $500 each; two bonds city of Memphis, six per cent., guaranteed by Memphis and Charleston railroad, $1000 each; two bonds city of Savannah, seven per cent., one $500 and one $1000. All of which I authorize him, or his agents, James M. Caldwell & Sons, to sell in case of non-payment of this my note at maturity.

"(Signed,) Chas. O. Witte."

"Charleston, S. C., May 23d, 1875.

"Twelve months after date, I promise to pay to the order of Messrs. James M. Caldwell & Sons, against the surrender of $4000 city of Savannah bonds delivered by me as collateral security, three thousand dollars, and interest at the rate of eight per centum per annum, payable quarterly, for value received.

"$3000.

"(Signed,) Chas. O. Witte."

*7

*4. The defendant, when the loan was first made and the first notes were given, delivered to J. M. Caldwell & Sons the bonds specified in the notes above copied.

5. The bonds were coupon bonds not yet due, and payable to bearer.

6. Defendant paid the interest regularly on the notes to J. M. Caldwell & Sons, and when he desired to collect the coupons on the pledged bonds, obtained the coupons from J. M. Caldwell & Sons for that purpose.

7. The bonds remained in the possession of J. M. Caldwell & Sons during the life of J. M. Caldwell, the senior partner; and after his death continued in possession of his son and son-in-law, who continued the business in the same firm name, and remained the agents of plaintiff, collecting the interest on these notes.

8. Defendant became desirous of paying his notes, and offered to do so at maturity, whereupon it was discovered that J. M. Caldwell & Sons had, sometime previous thereto, fraudulently pledged the said bonds, and raised money on them. The bonds will not pay the debt for which they are pledged. J. M. Caldwell & Sons are bankrupt.

9. The former firm of J. M. Caldwell & Sons bore an excellent reputation; up to the time of the discovery of this transaction the character of the new firm was good.

At the date of the maturity of the notes the bonds were worth, say, city of Savannah bonds, eighty-five cents; Memphis city bonds, thirty cents.

When the suit was commenced they were worth, city of Savannah bonds, sixty-five cents; Memphis city bonds, thirty cents.

At the present time they are worth, city of Savannah bonds, fifty-nine cents; Memphis city bonds, thirty-six and a half cents.

10. The notes being past due, the plaintiff demanded payment from the defendant.

11. The defendant refuses payment unless the plaintiff will contemporaneously therewith deliver to him the bonds which were left as collateral security for the notes, or account to him for their value.

*8

*Questions.—I. Under these circumstances, is the plaintiff liable to the defendant for the value of the collaterals given to secure the payment of said notes?

II. If this be answered in the affirmative, at what date should this valuation be made; at the maturing of the notes, or at the beginning of this suit, or at the rendition of the judgment?

Decree.

This case is submitted to me upon an agreed statement of facts under the provisions of Section 389 of the code of procedure.

The case of Scott, Williams & Co. v. Crews, 2 S. C. 533, recognizes the doctrine laid down in all the authorities, that the plaintiff in this case is chargeable on the pledge of the securities of the defendant only as the bailee of a pledge, and in this species of bailment all that can be required of the bailee is ordinary care and diligence. "A pledge," says the court, "is made on a consideration which promises gain to the bailor and the bailee. The one obtains the use of the money borrowed, and the other procures a security for that which he has loaned. Hence, in regard to the mutual advantage incident to the bailment, the bailee, in the preservation of the articles pledged, is only liable for ordinary negligence, because nothing is required of him beyond ordinary diligence."

The law does not require that the pledgee should retain custody of the pledge. He may deliver it to a stranger for safe keeping. Story on Bail., § 324; Talty v. Freedman's Sav. Bank, 93 U. S. 325 [23 L. Ed. 886].

In the exercise of the diligence required of the bailee in this case, the employment of an agent in the care of the property was necessary. The securities pledged were coupon bonds payable to bearer, the title to which passes by delivery. It would have been negligence on the part of Dr. Reynolds to have kept them in the country house where he resides, and where they would have been exposed to risk of loss from robbery or destruction by fire. The agreed statements of facts show that it was in the contemplation of all the parties to this transaction that the securities should remain in the hands of

*9

Caldwell & Sons. *They had been in the custody of that firm, with the knowledge of the defendant and without objection on his part, from the year 1869, when the loan was first made, down to the last renewal of the notes in 1875—a period of over five years.

When the employment of an agent in the care of the property is necessary, the principal will not be liable for loss, if he exercises due care in the choice of an agent. 2 Parsons on Cont. 110.

In this case, negligence on the part of the plaintiff has not been alleged. On the contrary, it is conceded that up to the time when the misappropriation of these securities was discovered, the character of the agents employed by the plaintiff had been unexceptionable.

The sole question in this case is whether the plaintiff is liable for the willful misappropriation of the defendant's securities by his agents, in the absence of all fault on his part. The law seems to be well settled, that while the principal is liable for the negligence of his servant, he is not liable for the criminal acts willfully committed by him, such acts not being within the scope of his authority. Story on Bail., §§ 87, 407; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479; Gibblin v. McMullin, 2 Priv. Council 338.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that under the statement of facts, as agreed upon and submitted to me, the plaintiff is not liable for the loss of the defendant's collaterals.

It is, therefore, ordered that judgment be entered against the defendant in the sum of $9156.17, with costs, and that the plaintiff have execution therefor.

The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court from this decision of the Circuit judge.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for appellant.

The Circuit judge has overlooked the peculiar phraseology of the note of May 23d, 1875—against the surrender, &c. Here the obligation to pay is dependent upon the surrender of the bonds.

The precise question presented in this case has never been decided, so far as we can find. In Scott & Co. v. Crews, 2 S. C. 522, the act was not committed by the agents of the depositor. In Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass

*10
479, the bailment was gratuitous. *the subject matter never entered into the business of the bank, and was not under the control of the officer who stole it. So, also, in Scott v. Bank, 72 Penna. 471. See Bank v. Boyd, 44 Md. 47, (22 Am. R. 40), and the comments on Foster v. Essex Bank in Morse on Banking 65. The Circuit decision puts the plaintiff in the position of a bailee, and holding him to the responsibility of a bailee for ordinary care, excuses him. He is not responsible, because, contrary to reasonable expectation, his agent proved to be a fraud. What is ordinary care in a bailee will depend on the nature of the subject matter of the bailment. 60 N. Y. 278. Caldwell & Sons were not bankers, nor were they agents of a security company. They were cotton factors and commission merchants. Plaintiff's right of possession during the currency of these notes, was absolute. Reynolds had a large power of disposition over these bonds. He could have pledged them to another, and such person could hold them under such pledge, even against the first owner. Story on Bail., § 324; 3 Otto 325.

We submit that the true view is that Caldwell & Sons held as agents of the plaintiff, and that when they used them as they did they acted in the course of their employment as such agents, and within the scope of the authority with which the conduct of the plaintiff had clothed them. The whole business was managed through these agents, and plaintiff knew of the negotiability of the bonds and of their possession by Caldwell & Sons. He is responsible for their act, although he did not authorize it. In the language of Benjamin, Q. C., 9 Moak 210, the Circuit judge "has failed to distinguish between the authority to commit a fraudulent act, and the authority to transact the business, in the course of which the fraudulent act was committed." In our case the action of the agents was the result of the powers with which plaintiff had clothed them, and he is responsible. Story on Agency, § 452; 1 Bl. Com. 432; 40 N. Y. 453; 25 N. Y. 596.

Now what is the scope of the authority of the agent? It can only be measured by his apparent authority, and parties dealing with him may reasonably conclude that the control which he exercises in and about the subject matter of the agency, is the extent of the authority. 15 East 43; 6 Rich. 497; 10
*11
Rich. *337; 11 Rich. Eq. 344; 46 N. Y. 325; 7 C. B. (N. S.) 400; 7 H. & N. 603; 2 H. & C. 175.

When defendant parted with his collaterals, he lost, for the time, all control over them. Story on Bail., § 311; L. R., 1 Q. B. 618. Plaintiff should have preserved them for us, but he placed them in such position as made their loss possible. He certainly could not recover them from the purchasers from his agents. The loss is thus traced directly to the action of Reynolds. His act not only deprived us of the security which those bonds gave, but it has also left us without remedy as against the present holders of the bonds.

Mr. S. Lord, for respondent.

The plaintiff and defendant stood to each other in the relation of pledgor and pledgee. The general property remains in the bailor; only a special property passes to the bailee. Non-payment of debt, when due, does not, of itself, work a forfeiture. 12 Johns. 147; 4 Denio 227; 2 Caines' Cas. 200. This rule applies to negotiable securities as well as to any other kind of property.

The pledgee impliedly stipulates that he will take ordinary care of the things pledged. He is not bound for the exactest care and diligence required of a borrower, and he is liable for a greater degree of care than the law exacts of a depositary without reward. Edw. on Bail., § 234. He is not liable for loss by fire or theft, if kept with ordinary diligence. 2 Kent 580, 581; 2 Ld. Raym. 909; 58 Me. 275; 34 Md. 235; 62 Penna. St. 47; Edw. on Bail. 236; 2 Barb. 326; 9 Wend. 268. These principles are recognized and applied in 2 S. C. 522.

Attention has been called to the peculiar phraseology of one of the notes. "Words alone should not be permitted to govern and destroy the design and intent." 2 S. C. 457. In construing a contract, the court will look to the motives and the object. 2 Gill. & J. 382. It is manifest here that the object was to pledge the bonds for the payment of the note, and that the expressions are unusual; used by one not familiar with our language. Certainly plaintiff's agents had no authority to make him an insurer *against loss. 58 Me. 276; 56 Me. 121; W. Jones 179; Chitty on Cont. 735, note i.
*12

As pawnee, plaintiff might employ agent to keep collaterals for him. 93 U. S. 324; Story on Bail., §§ 324–327. In this case it was proper for him to commit their custody to an agent, using reasonable care in the selection. 2 Parsons on Cont. 110, note t. It is conceded that the agents had always borne excellent reputation. Defendant shared in this confidence, and authorized the agents to sell his bonds if he defaulted in his payment. It was in contemplation of both parties that Caldwell & Sons should retain the collaterals for the mutual convenience of both parties. They were really the agents of both parties. Edw. on Bail., § 50; 38 Me. 55; 8 Allen 512; 6 Cal. 643.

We come to the discussion of the only question in the case on which doubts can be entertained. The loss was occasioned by the fraud or felony of Caldwell & Sons, and the point, then, is narrowed to this consideration—whether the plaintiff is answerable, in law, for the fraudulent conversion by his agents of the defendant's securities. It is now a well-established rule that masters are responsible for injuries done by the negligence of their servants, while acting within the scope of their employment, but never for injuries willfully committed, where they have other purposes than executing their masters' orders; unless the masters were guilty of negligence in appointing the servants or in the particular act. Story on Agency, § 456; Story on Bail., § 402; 1 Esp. 315; 1 East 106; 17 Mass. 479; Law R. 2 P. C. 317; 99 Mass. 605; 19 Ohio St. 110; 70 Penna. St. 119. The only difference here is, that it was not a gratuitous bailment, but that is unimportant, since the question is as to the liability of the principal in the absence of all negligence, on his part, for the fraud of his agent. The master is only liable for the willful act of his servant, where the servant acts in ignorance of facts, (Edw. on Bail., § 391,) and where there has been subsequent ratification. 13 Mees. & W. 834; Cro. Eliz. 824; 2 N. Y. 479; 1 Bl. Com. 429.

There is no pretence of express authority given by plaintiff to do this wrong, or of any subsequent assent or knowledge. The *wrong done was wholly outside the limits of the agency. 8 Ad. & E. 512; 6 T. R. 659.

*13

It should not be forgotten that defendant knew of the risks he assumed when he selected for his collaterals negotiable securities. Plaintiff probably knew nothing of the kind of security he had taken.

January 7th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This case was submitted on Circuit upon an agreed statement of facts, under the provisions of Section 389 of the code of procedure, which is a part of the record and need not be re-stated here. The statement submitted contains copies of the notes sued on, a description of the bonds pledged by the defendant as collateral security for his notes, as well as the value of said bonds at three different periods of time —at the maturity of the notes, at the time when the suit was brought and at the rendition of the judgment. Under the circumstances stated, two questions are submitted for the judgment of the court:

First. Is the plaintiff liable for the value of the collaterals given to secure the payment of said notes?

Second. If this be decided in the affirmative, at what date should their valuation be made—at the maturity of the notes, the beginning of the suit, or the rendition of the judgment?

The Circuit judge decided the first question in the negative, which disposed also of the second, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the whole amount of his notes, principal and interest, exonerating him from all accountability for the loss of defendant's collaterals by the fraudulent appropriation of his agents. The defendant alleges error in that judgment and appeals to this court.

The three notes of plaintiff upon which judgment has been rendered are not identical in form, and it is insisted that the same principles of law as to the proposed set-off of the collaterals may not apply to all of them. Two of the notes are made payable to the plaintiff, Reynolds, and the other to "the order of Messrs. James M. Caldwell & Sons," styled agents of Reynolds. Each of the notes in its terms differs somewhat from the *others; but it is manifest that the intention in all was the same—to pledge the bonds described as collateral security for the notes respectively, and, from the view taken by the court, it is unnecessary to consider the particulars in which they differ from each other.

*14

The bonds were coupon bonds, payable to bearer. The title was transferable by mere delivery, and when Caldwell & Sons, having legal possession, transferred them to innocent bona fide holders, they were gone beyond the reach of either Reynolds or Witte; so far as the true owner is concerned, and for all the purposes of this case, they were destroyed by the fraudulent act of Caldwell & Sons. Gourdin v. Reid, 6 Rich. 497; Carmichael v. Buck, 10 Rich. 337 [70 Am. Dec. 226]; State Bank v. Cox, 11 Rich. Eq. 344 [78 Am. Dec. 458]; McNeil v. Tenth National Bank, 46 N. Y. 325; Swan v. North British Australian Company, 7 Hurlst. & Nor. 603.

Caldwell & Sons are now bankrupt, and the question is upon whom the loss of the collaterals must fall—upon Witte, who owned them and pledged them to Reynolds to secure his debt to him, or upon Reynolds, whose agents fraudulently appropriated them. The case presents an example of double agency. As to the collaterals, Reynolds was the agent of Witte of that class known as bailee, and Caldwell & Sons were the agents, factors, of Reynolds. The question of the liability of Reynolds to Witte must be determined either by his own acts or those of his agents for which he is properly responsible. The judgment below exonerates Reynolds from all responsibility in the first place, upon the ground that he did no act himself which should charge him with the loss of the bonds; that, as bailee of a pledge, his only duty was to take proper care of the property pledged, which he claims to have done; that in the transaction of the business, and the proper care of the bonds, it was necessary to appoint an agent, and, having selected agents, then of good character, and entrusted the bonds to them, he was in no way liable for their subsequent acts; that the one act of appointing agents of good character at that time was the discharge of his whole duty in the matter. The facts submitted do not show that this was one of those cases in which the agency of a third party was so necessary that the principal must be excused from all responsibility for the acts of *the agent after his appointment, provided only he used proper care in the appointment. The transaction was simply one of lending money—taking notes therefor and collaterals to secure them. That might have been done by Reynolds in person as well as by his agents. Nor is it perceived that agents were necessary for the safe keeping of the collaterals. That does not appear to have been the purpose of Reynolds. The result has shown that in all probability they would have been as safe in Sumter county in the possession of Reynolds as in the city of Charleston in the possession of Caldwell & Sons. The agency was not necessary, but simply convenient.

*15

There is nothing to distinguish this from the ordinary case where one, for convenience, employs another to act as his agent in a particular business, or to exempt Reynolds and Caldwell & Sons from the principles which ordinarily attach to the relation of principal and agent. Of all these principles there is not one more important than that which makes the act of the agent, within the scope of his authority, the act of the principal—"qui facit per alium, facit per se." Caldwell & Sons were the agents of Reynolds, and they misappropriated, and thereby, for the purpose of this case, destroyed the collaterals of Witte. Is Reynolds liable for that act? If Reynolds himself had done the act there can be no doubt that he would have been liable to Witte. Then what is his responsibility when not done by himself, but by his agents? Must the result to Witte be different for the reason that Reynolds chose to perform his part of the business through agents selected by himself? If Caldwell & Sons as the agents of Reynolds had lost these collaterals by negligence merely, if they had left their safe unlocked and in consequence the bonds had been stolen, it is conceded that Reynolds would have been liable; but it is insisted that he should not be held liable for the loss occasioned by their "criminal act willfully committed."

The Circuit judge says: "The only question in the case is whether the plaintiff is liable for the willful misappropriation of the defendant's securities by his agent in the absence of all fault on his part. The law seems to be well settled that whilst the principal is liable for the negligence of his agent, he is not liable *for the criminal acts willfully committed by him—such acts not being within the scope of his agency."

*16

It may be true that, generally, the principal is not liable criminally for the acts of his agent done without his authority, nor civilly to third persons with whom he has no privity for his willful trespasses.

This is not a criminal but a civil claim to charge Reynolds with the value of the collateral appropriated by Caldwell & Sons. It is difficult to understand upon what ground the principal should be held liable for the negligence of his agent and not for his fraud, where the act is done or omitted to be done to the very property as to which the agency exists and in the course of the agency. Fraud by which the property is lost is generally considered one of the forms of gross negligence. What is the proper understanding of the phrase "within the scope of the agency?" Does "the scope" include negligence and exclude fraud? It cannot properly be restricted to what the parties intended in the creation of the agency, for that would also exclude negligence, as no agent is appointed for the purpose of being negligent, any more than for the purpose of acting fraudulently. The question cannot be determined by the authority intended to be conferred by the principal. We must distinguish between the authority to commit a fraudulent act and the authority to transact the business in the course of which the fraudulent act was committed. Tested by reference to the intention of the principal, neither negligence nor fraud is within "the scope of the agency;" but tested by the connection of the act with the property and business of the agency, fraud in taking the very property is as much "within the scope of the agency" as negligence in allowing others to take it. The proper inquiry is, whether the act was done in the course of the agency and by virtue of the authority as agent. If it was, then the principal is responsible, whether the act was merely negligent or fraudulent. Here the fraudulent act was the appropriation of the very property of the agency—without which agency they would not have had possession of the property and could not have done the act.

We have not had our attention directed to any decided case precisely in point, nor have we been able to find one, but the *principles announced by eminent judges and elementary writers fully cover the point.

*17

In the case of Scott, Williams & Co. v. Joseph Crews, 2 S. C. 522, the defendant, Crews, borrowed money from the plaintiffs, bankers, gave them notes for the money, and secured them by pledging as collateral bills of the bank of the state. These bills were not fraudulently appropriated by the bank, but were taken from its vaults by robbery. The question was simply one of negligence as bailees, and upon that issue the plaintiffs were held not liable.

The case of Foster et al., Executors, v.

President and Directors of the Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 478, comes much nearer the precise point involved here. A special deposit of $50,000 of gold was made, which was stolen by the cashier and the chief clerk of the bank. The corporation was exonerated from responsibility, upon the grounds that it was a gratuitous deposit without compensation, but for safe keeping merely, and the theft was not the act of the corporation, but the unauthorized act of the cashier and clerk, outside of their business as officers, and therefore as mere strangers. The whole case shows that if the corporation, through its proper officers and as its own act, had fraudulently appropriated the money, the court would have held them liable. Chief Justice Parker, in delivering the judgment of the court, states the principle as well as its qualifications. He says: "It was contended by one of the counsel for the plaintiff, as a proposition universally true, that the principal is civilly answerable for all frauds done by his agents; and he is supported in the use of this language by a doctrine of Lord Kenyon, in the case of Doe v. Martin; and also by Lord Ellenborough in 1 Camp. 127, and yet it must strike the mind of every man of sense that this universal proposition will admit of, and, indeed, upon principles of common sense, actually requires qualifications. No one will suppose, if my servant commits a fraud relative to a subject that does not concern his duty to me, that I shall be civilly answerable for such fraud. If I send him to market and he steps into a shop and steals, or, upon false pretences, cheats the shop-keeper of his goods, I think that all mankind would agree that I am not answerable for the goods he may thus unlawfully acquire. The *proposition can be true only when the agent or servant is, while committing the fraud, acting in the business of his principal or master."

*18

In Story on Bailments, it is said: "But good faith alone is not sufficient. If there is any loss occasioned by their negligence or mistake or inadvertence, which might fairly have been guarded against by ordinary diligence, they will be held responsible therefor; and, a fortiori, they will be held responsible when they are guilty of any misfeasance."

In Smith's Mercantile Law it is said: "The principal has been thought to be responsible, not merely for the negligence, but for the deliberate fraud of his agent committed in the execution of his employment, though without the principal's authority, as, for instance, by selling false jewels for true ones." The reason given for this by Lord C. J. Holt, appears a sensible one. "Seeing," says he, "that some one must be loser by the deceit, it is more reasonable that he who employs and confides in the deceiver, should be the loser than a stranger. Such, certainly, was the opinion of the Roman lawyers."

The principle is well stated in Story on Agency, Section 452: "It is a general doctrine of law that, although the principal is not ordinarily liable (for he sometimes is) in a criminal suit for the acts or misdeeds of his agent, unless, indeed, he has authorized or co-operated in them, yet he is held liable to third persons in a civil suit for the frauds, deceits, concealments, misrepresentations, negligences and other malfeasances, misfeasances and omissions of duty of his agent, in the course of his employment, although the principal did not authorize or justify or participate in, or indeed know of such misconduct, or even if he forbade the acts or disapproved of them. In all such cases the rule applies respondeat superior; and it is founded upon public policy and convenience, for in no other way could there be any safety to third persons in their dealings, either directly with the principal or indirectly with him, through the instrumentality of agents. In every such case the principal holds out his agent as competent and fit to be trusted, and thereby, in effect, he warrants his fidelity and good conduct in all matters within the scope of the agency."

1. The first question submitted is decided in the affirmative.

*19

*2. As to the second question, it is adjudged that the valuation of the collaterals be made at the time of the maturity of the notes sued on. At that time the defendant offered to pay the notes and take up his collaterals, and upon his non-delivery of the collaterals upon demand, the obligation of Reynolds became fixed.

The judgment below is reversed and a new trial ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 19

(Case No. 797.)

EARLE v. CURETON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Costs ⊂⊃144.]

A judgment for costs entered against one who was a surety for the costs of the action, without any proceedings against the surety to charge him upon his obligation, is wholly void.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hill v. Thomas, 19 S. C. 235.

For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 559; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃144.]

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, July, 1879.

Action by William E. Earle against P. D. Cureton, to recover possession of a tract of land purchased at sheriff's sale, under judgment entered in the case of Detheridge v. Earle, for costs taxed against Detheridge, for which Cureton was surety. It did not appear that there was any summons, rule or notice served upon Cureton that such judgment would be taken. The Circuit judge charged the jury that so long as the judgment and execution remained of force, the sheriff had authority to sell; that the judgment is presumed to be right and regular until set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. Defendant excepted. Verdict for plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

Mr. E. F. Stokes, for appellant.

Mr. J. S. Cothran, for respondent.

*20

*January 8th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. Detheridge sued Earle on a promissory note, and being a non-resident, Cureton became his surety for costs. A judgment was entered up against both Detheridge and Cureton, his surety, and execution issued thereunder. Under this execution the lands in suit belonging to Cureton were sold and purchased by Earle, who took a sheriff's deed therefor. Earle, as the purchaser of the land, now sues for its possession, and exhibits the judgment against Detheridge and Cureton and the execution and sheriff's deed thereunder. The judgment record shows that the only position that Cureton occupied in relation to the action in which such judgment was recovered, was that of surety for costs of the plaintiff. It does not appear that Cureton has been summoned to answer or show cause why he should not be charged on his obligation as surety, and has had an opportunity to defend the same. On the contrary it excludes the idea of any regular proceeding to charge Cureton. Under such circumstances the judgment is wholly void, and cannot afford any ground for the title which Earle makes to the land in suit.

The obligation of Cureton in this case did not waive the right of defence or furnish any authority for taking a judgment against him without a regular proceeding to charge him thereunder. The judgment of the court reversing the judgment below, has already been entered.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 20

(Case No. 793.)

MASON v. JOHNSON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Reference ⟸58.]

Referees have the same power as the courts to allow amendments to a pleading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 89, 90; Dec. Dig. ⟸58.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸87.]

Amendments within the power of the court to grant are not ordinarily reviewable on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Trumbo v. Finley, 18 S. C. 315; Green v. Iredell, 31 S. C. 593, 10 S. E. 545.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 582; Dec. Dig. ⟸87.]

*21

[3. Reference ⟸58.]

*A referee, to whom it is referred to decide all issues of fact and report, may allow defendant at the trial to amend his answer by pleading the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 575, 9 S. E. 684.

For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 90; Dec. Dig. ⟸58.]

[4. Limitation of Actions ⟸47, 102.]

A settlement by a guardian with his ward, after the ward's majority, purporting to be in full and claiming a balance due by the ward, made in the presence of the judge of probate and upon which the guardian receives from such officer his discharge as guardian, gives currency to the statute of limitations. Distinction drawn between this case and Renwick v. Smith, 11 S. C. 294.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 258, 505; Dec. Dig. ⟸47, 102.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, June, 1879.

Action by Miles P. Mason against Elias Johnson, on guardianship bond, commenced February 3d, 1879. The case was referred to S. J. Simpson, Esq., as "special referee to take testimony and decide all issues of fact arising herein and that he do report the same to this court."

At the reference, before any testimony was taken, motion was made by defendant for leave to amend his answer by setting up as a defence the statute of limitations. Plaintiff objected, but the referee allowed the amendment; and plaintiff excepted. The following are the findings of fact by the referee:

The defendant was appointed guardian of the plaintiff in 1858, and made his returns regularly to the then Ordinary until 1868. The ward (the plaintiff) came of age August, 1868.

In November, 1868, defendant and plaintiff agreed, to avoid the necessity of filing petition, giving notice, &c., to come into the Probate Court to have a final settlement of the guardianship matters. In compliance with this agreement they did meet in the Probate judge's office, November, 1868, neither party being represented by counsel. On that day the defendant made his final return as guardian and upon the same sheet, after making up a statement of the accounts, the Probate judge made the following decree: "It is decreed that Miles P. Mason refund to his guardian, Elias Johnson, the sum of money in U. S. A. currency equal to $60.85 confederate money at the time the guardian bonded his ward's money."

The plaintiff testified that he did not consent to anything that was done on that occasion. The referee is satisfied that the plaintiff did agree with defendant to be present, that he was present *while settlement was being made up and that he heard the decree read over to him by the Probate judge.

*22

Afterwards, when defendant offered to turn over to him (plaintiff) the confederate bonds which had been allowed as an investment in making up the settlement, the plaintiff then said he had no use for them and arose in anger and left the room.

In September, 1869, the Probate judge, after hearing his petition, granted the defendant a final discharge as guardian. After this settlement and decree, up to the time of the commencement of this suit, the plaintiff made no complaint to the defendant, nor ever expressed any dissatisfaction on account of the decree except as above stated immediately after the decree was read over to him.

The Circuit judge sustained the action of the referee in allowing the amendment to defendant's answer, and dismissed the complaint, upon the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. Plaintiff appealed.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

The Court of Probate is a court of limited jurisdiction, and was, therefore, without authority to make the decree of November, 1868. Freem. on Void Jud. Sales, §§ 4, 8; Freem. on Judg., § 517; 8 Pet. 436; 1 Bail. 457; 10 S. C. 349; Const., Art. IV., § 20; 4 S. C. 353; 20 Wall. 375; Cooley on Const. Lim. *68; 5 S. C. 117; 6 Id. 462; 1 Strob. 1.

The statute is no bar to this action, which seeks to collect the amount due by a guardian, who is a trustee, to his ward. The statute could only avail where the answer alleged, which it does not here, that there had been a disavowal of the trust. But if such allegation had been made it would not avail; no right whatever can be acquired under a void decree, nor will it give currency to the statute. Freem. on Judg., § 117; 2 Hill Ch. 232; 5 Rich. Eq. 31; 11 S. C. 294. And the statute does not run in favor of the trustee after a disavowal, if the cestui que trust be under undue influence. 24 Ga. 217, 558; 3 Jones Eq. 248; 2 Hill Ch. 71; Id. 286; 1 S. C. 423.

The Circuit judge did not, himself, allow the amendment—he approved the referee's action. The referee had no such power.

*23

*Section 296 of the code has no bearing upon a reference like this. 3 Wait Prac. 323, 324; 12 S. C. 154; Edw. on Ref. 33; Hoff. on Ref. 28; 32 Barb. 557; 6 Abb. Pr. R. 214; 8 Hun. 81; Voorh. Code 351, § 173, note e; 19 How. Pr. 273; 35 How. Pr. 321; 5 S. C. 288.

The discharge granted the guardian cannot affect appellant's rights, as he had no notice of the application. Spears Eq. 435; 3 S. C. 394; 7 S. C. 60. If correct, defendant should not have leave to amend. 9 S. C. 376; 2 Strob. 160; 1 Brev. 164.

Mr. J. W. Carlisle, for respondent.

A motion for leave to amend is within the discretion of the court, and not appealable. 9 S. C. 330; 38 N. Y. 206. Referees have full power to grant amendments. 22 How. Pr. 481; 31 Id. 164; Code, § 296; 10 S. C. 98. And statute of limitations may be pleaded by amended answer. 4 Wait Prac. 652, 661; 44 How. Pr. 317. The statute is a bar to this action. The settlement and the discharge are both disavowals of the trust. 1 Strob. Eq. 79; 3 Id. 42; 4 Rich. Eq. 60; 14 Id. 176; 4 Strob. Eq. 197; 11 S. C. 294.

January 8th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The only questions raised by this appeal are: 1. Whether the Circuit judge erred in sustaining the action of the referee in allowing the defendant to amend his answer at the opening of the reference, by adding thereto the plea of the statute of limitations. 2. Whether such plea was a bar to the action.

Referees have the same power to allow amendments to any pleading as the court has, (Code, § 296,) and, ordinarily, a motion for leave to amend is addressed to the discretion of the court and is not appealable, provided the amendment is such as it is within the power of the court to grant. Chichester v. Hastie, 9 S. C. 330; Richtmeyer v. Remsen, 38 N. Y. 206. While at one time it seemed to be thought by the courts of New York that they had no power, upon the trial, to allow the defendant to amend by pleading the statute of limitations, the latter and more approved opinion is otherwise. 4 Wait Pr. 652; Gilchrist v. Gilchrist, 44 How. Pr. 317.

*24

*The next inquiry is, whether the statute was a bar to the action. "If a trustee does an act purporting to be a termination of the trust; if he has a settlement which is intended to be in full; if he settles as to part and claims the residue in his own right; if he denies the trust in the presence of the cestui que trust, these acts, or any of them, will so far disturb and dissolve the strictly fiduciary relations between the trustee and his cestui que trust as that the statute of limitations will commence to run from the date of such acts." Brockington v. Camlin, 4 Strob. Eq. 189; recognized and approved in Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 63; and again in Colburn v. Holland, 14 Rich. Eq. 241. Now in this case the settlement made in the office of the judge of probate, between the guardian and his ward, several months after the latter had attained his majority, followed up by the order of the judge of probate for the final discharge of the guardian, unquestionably indicated, in the most unequivocal manner, the purpose of the guardian to terminate the fiduciary relations previously existing, and as this action was not brought within the statutory period, thereafter it must be held to be barred.

Whether the Court of Probate had jurisdiction of an action brought by a ward, after attaining his majority, against his guardian for an account, was not considered by the court below, and is not before us for determination. For the validity of the bar of the statute does not rest upon the fact that a decree had been made by a court of competent jurisdiction, but simply upon the fact that there had been a settlement, which, if it had been made by a private individual as a mutual friend of, or an arbitrator between, the parties, would have given currency to the statute, as it was an act purporting to be a termination of the trust, and so intended by the parties. This case differs from that of Renwick v. Smith, 11 S. C. 294, and other cases of that class, in the important fact that it did not appear, in that case, that the parties sought to be affected by it had any notice of the settlement or final return relied upon, while here the plaintiff was present when the settlement was made, and was fully cognizant of the result.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *25

*(Case No. 800.)

PHINNEY v. JOHNSON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Dower ⇐63.]

A widow is not affected by the bar of dower provided in Chapter LXXXV., Section 10, of General Statutes, as to lands of which her husband died seized, unless she has accepted a distributive share of her husband's lands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 199; Dec. Dig. ⇐63.]

[2. Dower ⇐63.]

A widow is not estopped from claiming dower in lands sold under execution against herself as administratrix of her deceased husband, and upon which valuable improvements were subsequently erected with her knowledge, notice of the existence of her claim of dower having been had by the purchasers and being chargeable upon them from their title deeds.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Marines v. Goblet, 31 S. C. 154, 155, 9 S. E. 803, 17 Am. St. Rep. 22; Gaston v. Brandenburg, 42 S. C. 351, 20 S. E. 157.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 202; Dec. Dig. ⇐63.]

[3. Dower ⇐63.]

It is of no concern to the purchaser of such land whether or not the widow has fully administered the personal estate, or has received her full distributive share thereof.†

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 202; Dec. Dig. ⇐63.]

Before Wallace, J., Fairfield, September, 1879.

This was a petition in the Court of Probate by Mary T. Phinney against William Johnson for dower in lands of which her husband died seized, and which had been sold under a judgment obtained against her as administratrix of her husband's estate. The husband died in May, 1862, action was commenced in March, 1867, judgment entered January, 1868, sale made by sheriff April 5th, 1868, to Seigler, conveyed by Seigler to W. R. Robertson March, 1869, W. R. R. to T. R. Robertson October, 1870, and T. R. R. to this defendant February, 1877. These several deeds all referred back, in terms, to the sheriff's deed, which described the land as the property of "James M. Phinney, now in the hands or under the control of Mary T. Phinney, administratrix, to be administered." The action for dower was commenced April 5th, 1878.

The defences set up by the answer were, that petitioner was not entitled to her dower because she had already accepted a *share of her husband's estate under the provisions of the statutes of this state for the distribution of intestates' estates; that she had induced defendant and those from whom he derived title to suppose, by the course of her administration, her conduct, delay and laches, that she had elected not to claim dower; that the several purchasers had greatly improved and enhanced the value of the lot of land, and that the petitioner well knowing that large and valuable improvements were being erected, gave no notice that she intended to claim dower in the premises, and thereby she has estopped herself from now setting up her claim of dower.

*26

The judge of probate held that the administratrix had not yet been discharged from her administration; that she had never accepted a share of her husband's estate under the statute of distributions; and that the several purchasers had knowledge of the existence of the petitioner's claim of dower; and that the petitioner had not, by any conduct upon her part, estopped herself from setting up her claim for dower. The writ was ordered to issue.

Upon appeal to the Circuit Court it was held that W. R. Robertson did not have knowledge of petitioner's claim, but had never had any intimation that she did not intend to make such claim. In all other respects the decree below was confirmed.

Appeal was then taken to this court upon the grounds that there was error in the findings, that petitioner had never accepted a distributive share of her husband's estate;

† When Evans v. Pierson, 9 Rich. 9, was decided, the act of 1791, (5 Stat. 163,) was of force. This act is substantially re-enacted in Chapter LXXXV. of the General Statutes, with the very important omission of Section 2. The distribution of personalty is now governed by Chapter LXXXVIII., Section 15, of General Statutes. The opinion here, therefore, deals with the law as it now stands, and not with the act of 1791.

that she had not been guilty of laches, negligence or unreasonable delay in the prosecution of her claim; that she had not by any conduct on her part estopped herself from asserting this claim; and that she was entitled to have her dower admeasured.

[For subsequent opinion, see 15 S. C. 158.]

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

1. The claim of dower in this case ought not to be favored. The widow remains silent, as far as purchasers of the property are concerned, for ten years lacking one day; she acted as if she had elected to take under the statute, and not claim dower; her administration was such as to lead any one to infer that she had elected not to claim dower; from 1862 till the end of the war *it was her interest so to elect, as she had a surplus of $3000 to pay $700 of debt; she paid unsealed debts, leaving a sealed debt unpaid, thus virtually assuming that the funds on hand would pay that debt, and leave it to her interest not to claim dower; she actually takes possession of all the personal property, and uses it as her own till petition for dower filed—this, too, when that property is such as to be worn out by seventeen years' use; she never applied for leave to sell the personal property which she kept, and never made any return but the one.

*27

2. Her acts and her non-acts amount to an election. These are utterly inconsistent with any other supposition than that she originally made up her mind not to claim dower. Her de facto election was not induced by any fraud, as in 10 Rich. 159, where the jury found "fraud had been practiced upon her." An election may be implied. 2 Scrib. on Dower 258, § 49. Id. 484, where use of property was held to be an election.

3. Her silence under the facts proven was a constructive fraud. Besides not setting up any claim she allows valuable improvements to be placed upon the lot, which she must have known and seen. Her dower is to be given her in all these improvements. 4 S. C. 7. Hence she should have spoken, and having kept silent, should not be allowed now to set up so unrighteous a claim. Bigelow on Estoppel 501, 502, note, and 511, 578.

4. The respondent is estopped from claiming dower. The doctrine of estoppel applies to claims of dowers. 2 Scrib. on Dower 251, 252, 253. Her administration, her silence, her allowing improvements without giving warning, and the whole history of this case, make the strongest case of estoppel, not in deed, that can be conceived to arise.

The court will observe that the respondent does not deny that she knew of these improvements being made; also that the appellant, Wm. Johnson, who paid $5000 for this property, lives in Charlotte, N. C.

Mr. J. S. Reynolds, for respondent.

The demandant is said to be barred of her dower by the acceptance of a distributive share in the personalty. Could she elect? As administratrix, she was trustee for creditors, and the *personalty in her hands became depreciated to an amount insufficient to pay debts; an election was thus beyond her power. Did she elect? There is no testimony to show anything like a distribution. A waste of assets would be a devastavit, not an election. If she is held to have made election, then she gets absolutely nothing from her husband's estate.

*28

But what is an election? Acquiescence is not. 2 Desaus. 299. It cannot be compelled until the estate is settled. 2 McC. Ch. 280; 2 Rich. Eq. 237. See, too, 3 Rich. Eq. 282; 10 Rich. 159. Whether there has been an election is a question of fact. 2 McM. 215; 10 Rich. 159.

As to demandant's negligence, laches, &c., see 2 Mill Const. R. 64; 9 Rich. 395; 10 S. C. 451.

Upon the matter of estoppel—she said nothing to mislead—knowledge of her claim was possessed by the purchasers as well as by herself; that knowledge was derived from their own title deeds. 3 Strob. Eq. 42; 4 Rich. Eq. 92; 4 S. C. 257; Wade on Notice, §§ 308, 309. The rule of caveat emptor applies. 6 Rich. 362. The sufficiency of notice is a question of fact, (2 Bail. 298; 6 S. C. 146; Wade on Notice, § 85,) and has been resolved against defendant.

January 9th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This is an appeal from a Circuit decree, affirming a decree of the Probate Court, awarding dower to the demandant, M. T. Phinney, out of lands of which her husband died seized, now in the hands of the respondent, Johnson. The husband of the demandant died in 1862, and she took out letters of administration in the same year. The estate consisted partly of personalty, that went into the hands of the demandant as administratrix, that has never been fully administered, and partly of this land in suit. This land was sold in 1868, under a judgment rendered against the demandant as administratrix, and is held by the respondent under the sheriff's title, made through such sale, and has been improved in the hands of the purchasers by the erection of buildings thereon. It is contended that the demandant has elected to take a distributive share of the estate *of her husband in lieu of dower, or, at all events, that she is estopped from denying such election by lapse of time and conduct on her part amounting to a representation that such election had been made.

*29

The provision of law under which it is claimed that the demandant is barred, is as follows, (Gen. Stat. 441, § 10): "In all cases where provision is made by this chapter for the widow of a person dying intestate, the same shall, if accepted, be considered in lieu of and in bar of dower." The chapter referred to here relates exclusively to the distribution of the lands of intestates, the distribution of personalty being governed by the provisions of a subsequent title and chapter. Unless, then, it appears that the demandant has received a distributive share of the lands of her deceased husband, she cannot be regarded as directly affected by the bar of dower provided in this act. It does not appear that she has received such a provision, or that there are any lands of her husband out of which she could receive such provision, other than the lands in suit. As these lands have been sold to pay the debts of the estate, it is manifest that she has derived no such benefit from them.

Is she, then, estopped from claiming dower at the present time? The ground alleged is her silence while improvements were being made on the premises with knowledge of such improvements, coupled with lapse of time, and having, as administratrix, the personalty of the estate of her decedent not fully administered, and failure to make annual returns. The foundation of equitable estoppel is the ignorance of the party seeking its benefit, induced by the conduct of the party against whom it is asserted. The Probate judge has found that the purchasers who successively took title under the sheriff's deed, "had knowledge of the existence of the petitioner's claim of dower in the lands sold." In addition to this finding, it must be assumed that these parties knew the nature of the title they held, and, consequently, that the lands held by them were those of which the decedent died seized. Knowledge of the demandant's claim of dower is presumable from this fact. They are also chargeable with knowledge of the fact that taking these lands for the debts of the estate, precluded the demandant from that provision in *the lands of her husband that alone could, under the statute, bar her claim of dower.

*30

The possession of the personal estate unadministered, is immaterial to the present question. The respondent has no concern in the administration of the estate, as far as appears, and it is of no importance to him whether the estate was well or ill administered. Assuming that the demandant had full enjoyment of her distributive share of the personalty, that would not bar her right of dower in the lands of which her husband died seized.

It follows that there is no error in the Circuit decree, and it should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. 30

(Case No. 801.)

STATE v. EDWARDS.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Criminal Law ⟸407.]

The judge charged the jury that if a party hears a criminal charge against himself made in his presence, and says nothing, it is an admission on his part, and in the eye of the law the party accepts that charge as his confession. Held, that the charge was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Richardson, 47 S. C. 170, 25 S. E. 220, 35 L. R. A. 238; State v. Major, 70 S. C. 389, 50 S. E. 13; State v. Sudduth, 74 S. C. 501, 54 S. E. 1013.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 898; Dec. Dig. ⟸407.]

[2. Criminal Law ⟸381.]

The weight and effect of proof of good character in cases of larceny, considered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Barth, 25 S. C. 180, 60 Am. Rep. 496.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 846; Dec. Dig. ⟸381.]

[This case is also cited in State v. Sudduth, 74 S. C. 498, 54 S. E. 1013, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Thomson, J., Spartanburg, October, 1879.

Indictment for burglary and grand larceny.

Rodgers, after his arrest, made a full confession of his own guilt and said, in the presence and hearing of the other defendants, that they were present aiding and participating in the larceny; to this statement of Rodgers there was no dissent by any of the other defendants, one of them then remarking to the prosecutor: "We know you have got us, and we want you to be as light as you can." The others heard this remark, but said nothing. There was also a written confession signed by all the defendants, but which they, with the exception of Rodgers, said had been signed when they were in liquor, and for the sole pur*pose of avoiding the expense of a prosecution. There was evidence as to the good character of all of the defendants except Rodgers. The charge of the presiding judge, so far as it is reviewed here, is given in the opinion of the court. Rodgers was convicted of burglary and grand larceny, Griffin was acquitted, and the other defendants were convicted of grand larceny. Motion in arrest of judgment and for new trial was refused, and the convicted defendants were sentenced. All except Rodgers appealed upon the several grounds taken on motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment.

*31

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellants.

It was error to charge that the silence of the appellants, when Rodgers made his confession, was an admission of guilt on their part. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 197, and note a; 1 Whart. on Crim. Law, § 696. There was error in charging that testimony as to good character can have no weight, except in doubtful cases. 3 Greenl. on Ev., § 25; 1 Whart. on Crim. Law, §§ 643, 644.

Mr. Solicitor Ball, contra.

Good character avails only in doubtful cases. 3 Strob. 517. Confession is inferred from silence. Rosc. Crim. Ev. 53, (7th ed.). Like other confessions, it is an acknowledgment to be considered by the jury.

January 9th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. James Edwards, John Draper, Henry Draper, John Rodgers, Samuel Griffin and Prince Donnough, were indicted for burglary and grand larceny. Rodgers was convicted of "burglary and grand larceny." Griffin was acquitted, and the other parties convicted of grand larceny and sentenced accordingly. The grounds of appeal affect the conviction of the parties, other than Rodgers and Griffin.

The leading objection to the verdict against the parties convicted of grand larceny, turns on the fact that the confession of Rodgers was introduced, and it was shown that the other parties indicted were present when the confession was made, and did not *deny its truth. The Circuit judge charged "that if a party hears a criminal charge against himself, and made in his presence, and says nothing, it is an admission on his part, and, in the eye of the law, the party accepts that charge as his confession." The effect of this charge was to give the silence of the parties the legal force and effect of confession of guilt. It must, in this respect, be distinguished from the proposition that the conduct of parties under accusation of crime may be given to the jury, as circumstances to be weighed in connection with the question of guilt or innocence. To give the silence of parties such legal effect, is equivalent to holding that every person accused of crime by any person, regardless of time, place or circumstance, is bound to deny such accusation and affirm his innocence. It is clear that the law imposes no such obligation on a party accused; but, on the contrary, it is his right to stand mute, and the burden of showing the guilt is on those that make the accusation.

*32

Where civil rights are alone concerned the silence of a party is often construed as assent to be bound by an obligation, and the equity is ground of estoppel. In both of these cases an obligation or duty to speak, coupled with an injury to the party to whom such obligation or duty is due, by reason of such silence, is the foundation of the rule. Both of these elements are lacking in the case of the silence of a party standing accused of crime.

As the verdict against the parties other than Rodgers and Griffin must be set aside in consequence of the erroneous charge just considered, it will not be necessary to examine the questions that grow out of the form of the verdict, especially as they have arisen out of accidental circumstances that may not again occur.

The charge that "good character can have no weight except in doubtful cases" might have the effect under some circumstances to divert the attention of the jury from the real importance of evidence of good character. The hearing of such evidence is directly upon the intent or motive to be ascribed to the conduct of the party, and the proof of good character may have the effect to call for a higher degree of certainty in the proofs of the conduct of the party than could be requisite if a notoriously bad character was shown. If a person of undoubted *character is seen in the act of lifting goods from the counter of a store, an intent to steal could not be made out against such proof of character on testimony that might be abundantly sufficient to convict a notorious thief. While, therefore, the charge is not in itself necessarily erroneous, it is apparent that it might become so under circumstances easy to conceive. Its bearing in the present case need not be considered, as the case is disposed of on other grounds.

*33

The verdict, as it regards all the parties convicted, except Rodgers, must be set aside, and a new trial granted.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 33

(Case No. 802.)

ADGER & CO. v. PRINGLE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃1191.]

A Circuit decree, which gave full directions for its execution, having been affirmed on appeal, and the remittitur filed in the court below, no further order or judgment from the Circuit Court is necessary.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Prater, 27 S. C. 601, 4 S. E. 562; State v. Cornell, 70 S. C. 414, 50 S. E. 22.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4646; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃1191.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃118.]

If such order were required, its omission would involve a question of regularity and not of jurisdiction, and would not be appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 813–822; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃ 118.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃1219.]

Further proceedings by the Circuit Court under such decree, are not affected by the pendency of a motion before the Chief Justice to withdraw the remittitur and for leave to file a petition for rehearing, there being no order staying proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Dunovant, 16 S. C. 300.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4720; Dec. Dig. ⟸1219.]

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, June, 1879.

The Circuit decree referred to in the opinion, will be found at length in 11 S. C. 527, where the case, upon its first hearing, is fully reported. After the dismissal of that appeal, the remittitur, announcing the result, was filed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court for Charleston county. Thereafter, Mr. Bryan, the referee, filed the following report:

The undersigned, heretofore appointed special referee in this case, begs leave respectfully to report.

*34

*That in accordance with the decree of this honorable court, bearing date May 1st, 1878, as affirmed by the Supreme Court, he has paid out of the funds in his hands, realized from the sale of the White House and Greefield plantations, sold as the property of the estate of the late John Julius Izard Pringle, the principal and interest due upon the Gadsden and Lide bonds. There being not sufficient funds in his hands to fully pay and satisfy said bonds, he has paid the same ratably and in proportion, as follows. * * *

At a reference held for the purpose of making the distribution as above reported, the counsel for A. G. Rice, made the following objections, which were overruled, and the funds distributed as above stated.

"The defendant objects to the action of the referee in taking cognizance of the case of Adger v. Pringle, because—

"1. The referee officially knows that the case was carried by the appeals out of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court into the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and the referee can only be officially informed of its restoration to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, by a copy of the order of the Circuit Court, making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the Circuit Court; and because—

"2. The parties in the cause are entitled to be heard in the Circuit Court, on the motion for such order as to the judgment of the Supreme Court.

"3. That the judgment of the Supreme Court sustains as debts to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the descended lands, the amounts due upon the lost bonds of the ancestor, John Julius Izard Pringle, at the date of the death, which bond has never yet been stated before the referee or the Circuit or Supreme Court, and, when stated, the parties affected by it are entitled to notice and opportunity to claim, as payments on account, whatever sums (with interest on such payments, if interest is allowed, on the debts,) have been paid by the heirs upon the new bonds set up as collaterals to the lost bonds.

"4. That the construction put upon the judgment of the Supreme Court by the solicitors of Lide and Gadsden, differs materially from the construction put upon it by the counsel for A. G. *Rice, and the Circuit Court is the proper tribunal to pass upon that question.

*35

"5. The judgment of the Supreme Court subjects the proceeds of the lands descended and mortgaged to the payment by the heirs of the debt of the ancestor, just as the land was liable. The land was liable only subject to the right of dower of Mrs. Jane Pringle, viz., one-sixth of the fee simple value. This right having been conveyed by Mrs. Pringle in the mortgage, those who are secured by the mortgage are entitled to claim the one-sixth of the proceeds."

The question of costs has not been passed upon.

After this report was filed and on June 14th, 1879, counsel for Rice gave notice to other counsel, and served copy of petition to Supreme Court for review, and of motion to be made before the Hon. A. J. Willard, Chief Justice, for leave to file such petition, and for an order withdrawing the remittitur. On June 20th such motion was made. Before any decision thereupon, but with knowledge that such motion had been made, the Circuit judge, by order dated June 26th, confirmed the report of the referee, affirmed his acts and discharged him from all further responsibility.

To this order exceptions were taken by defendant Rice, for the purpose of appealing, upon the grounds set forth in the referee's report, and upon the additional ground that motion to recall remittitur and file petition for review, was then under advisement by the Supreme Court.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for appellants, cited No. 20, Rules of Supreme Court; 1 Wait Dig. 108, No. 430; 52 N. Y. 653; 1 Abb. 262; 3 Cr. 330; 8 T. R. 424; Wait An. Code 24; 51 Barb. 493; 1 Bouv. L. Dict., tit. "Judgment;" 5 Rich. Eq. 166; 3 Rich. Eq. 466; 8 S. C. 344.

Mr. S. Lord, Jr., contra.

January 9th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This cause was, at a prior term of this court, heard on appeal from the Circuit decree, and that decree was *affirmed. The remittitur of this court was issued and filed in the Circuit Court April 30th, 1879. In pursuance of the directions of this decree so affirmed, the referee thereby designated proceeded to carry out the provisions of that decree, and accordingly filed his report. No exceptions appear to have been filed to that report, and it must accordingly be regarded as entirely conformable to the decree on which it was based. This report was confirmed by the Circuit decree, which is now appealed from. The objection to the Circuit decree can only be considered on the ground of alleged irregularity, for there being no exceptions to the report of the referee, and the merits not being considered in this decree apart from the question of confirming the report, we cannot regard the merits as open before us.

*36

The objection to the decree is that no order or judgment had been entered on the remittitur previous to the action by the referee under the decree. It is contended that there should have been an order making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the Circuit Court, and that, until such order was made, the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction to proceed with the case. If the judgment of the Circuit Court had been varied or modified, there would be ground for an order making the judgment of the Supreme Court that of the Circuit Court, but such was not the case. No authority has been shown as rendering it necessary that an affirmed judgment should be supported by such an order, and there is no reason for such a conclusion. It is unimportant to consider the authorities that have been cited to show that a judgment of the appellate court cannot be enforced by execution, as a judgment of the Circuit Court, until made such by a competent order for that purpose, for that proposition has no relation to a case where a court is proceeding to carry out the principles of its own decree, with a view to a final decree that has been affirmed on appeal.

It is altogether a misapprehension to affirm lack of jurisdiction in the Circuit Court for want of such an order. It had its record in the cause before it with the affirmation of the Supreme Court upon it. The decree affirmed pointed out the means by which it was to be carried out and executed, namely, through the action and report of a referee, named for that purpose. No necessity *existed for an application to the court to enable the referee to perform the duties required by the decree. If such an order as the appellant contends for had been required, its omission would not involve a question of jurisdiction, but merely one of regularity, not affecting the merits, and which, as such, could not be brought here by appeal.

*37

It is contended that knowledge was brought down to the Circuit judge that a proceeding was pending preliminary to asking a review of the former judgment of this court in the case. As there was no stay of proceedings, the Circuit judge was not bound to take notice of such application.

The appeal should be dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 37

(Case No. 805.)

BLACK v. WHITE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸213; Limitation of Actions ⟸145.]

An administrator put upon his inventory of notes, &c., a due-bill given by himself to his intestate twelve years before his death. Held, that this was not a new promise, and that the claim was barred by the state of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 752; Dec. Dig. ⟸213; Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 590; Dec. Dig. ⟸145.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⟸473, 474.]

An administrator sued for an accounting may, without formally pleading the statute of limitations by answer, rely upon it as relieving him from liability to account for a due-bill given by himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2048; Dec. Dig. ⟸473, 474.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⟸213.]

A claim of an intestate against her administrator, barred by the statute of limitations, is not paid by operation of law when letters of administration are granted. The rule applies only to legal and not to moral obligations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 749–753; Dec. Dig. ⟸213.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⟸1008.]

Concurrent findings of fact by judge of probate and Circuit judge will not be disturbed unless shown to be clearly erroneous.†

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Speer v. Meschine, 46 S. C. 511, 24 S. E. 329; In re Solomons' Estate, 74 S. C. 191, 54 S. E. 207.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3960; Dec. Dig. ⟸1008.]

[5. Frauds, Statute of ⟸26.]

Plea of the statute of frauds overruled, the undertaking being original and not collateral.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 35; Dec. Dig. ⟸26.]

[Courts ⟸202.]

†In a note to Arnold v. House, 12 S. C. 617, it is said that "the Supreme Court have as yet laid down no rule governing its review of findings of fact by a Court of Probate. Besides this case of Black v. White, my attention has been called to an unreported case filed April 14th, 1879, No. 706, Gunning v. Erwin, in which this court say: "The Probate Court was the proper tribunal for determining such questions of fact in the first instance; and having the witnesses before it had the best opportunity of judging of the weight that should attach to the testimony of the witnesses, and of drawing proper inferences of fact. The Circuit Court ought not to disturb the findings of the Probate Court on questions of fact of that nature unless clear ground is afforded for that purpose." REPORTER.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3379; Courts, Dec. Dig. ⟸202.]

[6. Limitation of Actions ⟸197.]

Bar of the statute of limitations held to have been prevented by repeated acknowledgments to different persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 722–726; Dec. Dig. ⟸197.]

*38

*Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, June, 1879.

Action for accounting by Laura C. Black and Ophelia Briggs, distributees of the estate of Susan White, against W. H. White and J. H. McMillan, administrators of said estate, commenced by petition in the Court of Probate for Spartanburg county, in May, 1877. Susan White died intestate in December, 1875. The inventory returned by the administrators of notes, accounts, &c., held by the intestate, included a due-bill given by W. H. White to Susan White in 1863; the appraisers marked it "doubtful." The defendants did not, by answer, plead the statute of limitations, as relieving them from accounting for this due-bill.

In April, 1871, a decree was rendered in favor of Susan White against W. H. White as administrator of Henry White. There was testimony to the effect that this decree had been subsequently paid.

The administrator, J. H. McMillan, rendered a claim of $500 for services alleged to have been rendered Susan White during her lifetime from 1868 to 1875. The services were principally performed upon the lands of Susan White's mother, with whom she resided, but there was testimony to the effect that they were done at Susan White's special request and upon her promise to pay for them; and also that she had to several persons at various times up to a short period before her death, acknowledged her liability to pay for these services. To this claim the petitioners formally pleaded the statutes of frauds and of limitations.

George W. Nicholls, Esq., judge of probate, held that the due-bill was barred by the statute of limitations, that the decree *was paid, and that the estate of Susan White was indebted to J. H. McMillan in the sum of $500; that this claim was due primarily by Susan White and that it was not barred by the statute of limitations.

*39

Exceptions were taken to this decree, which, upon appeal to the Circuit Court, were all overruled. The petitioners then appealed to this court, alleging error in the decree in the following particulars, to wit:

1. In refusing to charge W. H. White, one of the administrators, with the due-bill and interest charged against him in the inventory.

2. In refusing to charge W. H. White, one of the administrators, with the share due Susan White's estate from the estate of Henry White, deceased, of which last-named estate said W. H. White was also administrator.

3. In allowing a charge of J. H. McMillan, one of the administrators, for the sum of $500 in gold against the estate of his intestate.

4. In overruling the plea of the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations against said last-mentioned claim.

5. In overruling appellants' objections as to admissibility of certain testimony for the administrators, to which said rulings exceptions were duly taken.

6. In failing to report that there was no evidence sufficient or proper to show that W. H. White had paid the decree against him in favor of W. H. White.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellants.

Messrs. J. W. Carlisle and S. J. Simpson, contra.

January 13th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. These proceedings were originally instituted in the Court of Probate for the purpose of obtaining from the defendants an account of their administration of the assets of the intestate, Susan White. Three questions arose: 1st. Whether the defendant, White, should be charged with the amount of a *due-bill given by him to the intestate in 1863 and found among the papers of the intestate. 2d. Whether the same defendant should be charged with the amount of a decree which had been rendered against him as administrator of one Henry White in favor of Susan White in her lifetime. 3d. Whether a claim for $500, set up by the defendant, McMillan, for services rendered his intestate, Susan White, in her lifetime, should be allowed. The judge of probate determined each and all of these questions in favor of the defendants, and upon appeal to the Circuit Court his decree was affirmed. The same questions are now brought here by appeal from the judgment of the Circuit Court.

*40

The ground upon which the defendant, W. H. White, was relieved from liability for the due-bill was that it was barred by the statute of limitations at the time he administered upon the estate of the intestate, Susan White. It is contended, however, by the appellants that this claim was taken out of the operation of the statute of limitations by reason of the fact that the said W. H. White had allowed the due-bill to be inserted in the inventory and appraisement of his intestate's estate, and that this amounted to such an implied promise to pay it as would prevent the bar of the statute. The fact is conceded that at the time of the death of the intestate, and, of course, at the time of making the inventory and appraisement, the bar of the statute was complete. Hence any promise which is relied upon to take the case out of the statute must be such as would sustain an action founded on such promise; for, after the statutory period has run out, the right of action on the original note is gone, and the action, if maintainable at all, must be brought upon the new promise. Smith v. Caldwell, 15 Rich. 365; Hayes v. Clinkscales, 9 S. C. 450. Such new promise may be implied as well as expressed, but it must amount to an unqualified admission of a subsisting legal liability and must be established by evidence unambiguous and full. Deloach v. Turner, 6 Rich. 125.

The practical question then is, does the fact that the defendant, White, allowed the due-bill to be entered upon the inventory of his intestate's estate, amount to such an implied promise to pay the debt as would support an action? We do not think so. It cannot be regarded as an unqualified admission of a subsisting *legal liability. The due-bill was found among the papers of the intestate, and was to be regarded as her property, and whether of any legal value or not, it was the duty of the administrator to have it inserted in the inventory. It was not for him to determine its value, or whether it was enforceable by legal process, any more than in the case of other choses in action belonging to his intestate's estate. His duty required that he should insert them all in the inventory, and whether he was to be charged with the amounts secured by them would depend upon whether it could be shown, when called upon to account, that they were collectible.

*41

The objection raised by the appellants that the administrator cannot avail himself of the bar of the statute, because he did not formally plead it, would be entitled to great weight were this an action upon the due-bill in question, but we do not think it applies to the present proceeding. The defendant does not rely upon the bar of the statute to protect himself from the payment of a debt which is sought to be recovered from him, for the object of this proceeding is to require the defendant to account for certain assets which have gone into his hands, and to make him liable it must appear not only that the assets have gone into his hands, but that they have been, by the use of diligence, collected; and he relies upon the statute for the purpose of showing that this particular chose in action could not have been, by the utmost diligence, collected, as the right of action upon it was barred before it came into the hands of the defendant. Undoubtedly if it was sought to make him liable for the note of a third person, he might, without specially pleading the statute, be permitted to show that such note was not collectible, because it was barred by the statute of limitations. Just so here, we see no reason why he cannot show, without specially pleading the statute, that he ought not to be charged with the amount of this due-bill, because, by reason of the bar of the statute, it was not collectible.

Again, it was urged that the respondent was concluded by the rule that "whenever the character of payer and payee of any debt or obligation is blended in the same individual, by operation of law the debt is paid and the amount is cash in hand on the *accounts of the payee to the credit of the party entitled to the fund." Griffin v. Bonham, 9 Rich. Eq. 77. The reason of this rule seems to be, that when the same person unites in himself the character of both debtor and creditor, as the debt is no longer collectible by process of law, being incapable of suing himself, it must be regarded as paid by operation of law. Hence, the debt spoken of in the rule must be a debt which is enforceable by legal process. It must be a legal, and not a mere moral obligation. Now, in this case, when the defendant, White, became administrator the debt evidenced by the due-bill no longer constituted a legal obligation, but was only a moral obligation, which would constitute a sufficient consideration to support a new promise, but which, of itself, furnished no legal cause of action. The rule contended for cannot, therefore, be applied.

*42

The next question is so wholly a question of fact that under the well-established rule of this court, we will not disturb the concurrent finding of the judge of probate and the Circuit judge unless shown to be manifestly erroneous, which has not been done in this case.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the propriety of allowing the claim of the administrator, McMillan. This, too, depends, in large measure, upon a question of fact, and we see no ground for interfering with the concurring judgment of the judge of probate and the Circuit judge. It is contended, however, that the plea of the statute of frauds is fatal to this claim. The court below, however, finds as matter of fact that this was an original and not a collateral undertaking on the part of the intestate, Susan White; and this finding, we think, fully supported by the evidence and conclusive of the case. The plea of the statute of frauds cannot be sustained. Nor is there any ground upon which the plea of the statute of limitations to any portion of this claim can be allowed. The intestate acknowledged it from time to time, to different persons, up to a very short period before her death, and this was sufficient to prevent the bar of the statute.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

13 S. C. *43

*(Case No. 806.)

CRANE, BOYLSTON & CO. v. MOSES.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐424.]

The law requiring notice of appeal to be served upon the clerk of the Circuit Court, was repealed by implication by act of December 19th, 1878, 16 Stat. 698.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2154; Dec. Dig. ⇐424.]

2. Distinction drawn between this case and Kibler v. McIlwaine, 12 S. C. 555.

Motion to dismiss appeal upon the ground that notice of the appeal was not served upon the clerk of the Circuit Court, as required by Section 353 of the code of procedure.

Messrs. W. W. Harllee and E. W. Moise, for motion.

Mr. J. T. Walsh, contra.

January 15th, 1880. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. The appeal in this case was taken since February 1st, A. D. 1879, and is accordingly affected by the provisions of the act of December 19th, 1878. 16 Stat. 698. That act does not require the notice of appeal to be served upon the clerk, and as it assumes to prescribe the mode of appealing, as well as the time within which an appeal may be taken, it must be regarded as having repealed the pre-existing provisions of law requiring such notices to be served upon the clerk. This repeal does not interfere with the provisions prescribing the mode by which its record on the appeal is to be prepared and transmitted to this court, as now prescribed by law and the rules of this court, except so far as specifically modified by the act in question. In Kibler v. McIlwaine, 12 S. C. 555, the appeal was taken before the day in which the act in question took effect, and accordingly the decree in that case is not applicable to the present question.

The motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that notice of the appeal was not served upon the clerk, has been already denied.

13 S. C. *44

*(Case No. 807.)

SCOTT v. CARPENTER.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Appeal and Error ⇐434.]

The respondent is entitled to a dismissal of the appeal when the appellant fails to appear upon the call of the cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2183; Dec. Dig. ⇐434.]

Motion to dismiss appeal. The case is sufficiently stated in the order of the court.

January 16th, 1880. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. The appellants having failed to appear, the respondent moved for the dismissal of the appeal. Under Rule No. 11 of this court, the respondent is entitled to a dismissal of the appeal without argument when the appellant fails to appear upon the call of the cause.

The appeal must be dismissed.

13 S. C. 44

(Case No. 808.)

C., C. & A. RAILROAD CO. v. EARLE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Costs ⇐246.]

This court has no original jurisdiction to require from the appellant, who has removed to another state, security for the costs of his appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 948; Dec. Dig. ⇐246.]

[2. Costs ⇐109.]

Security for the costs of a case, including the costs of appeal, could be required by the Circuit Court only from an absent plaintiff, and not from one who is made a party defendant to an action of interpleader. Semble.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 439–461; Dec. Dig. ⇐109.]

Motion for security for costs of appeal. The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court. For a report of this case upon its hearing, see No. 852, and also see 12 S. C. 53.

Mr. F. W. McMaster, for motion.

Mr. J. P. Carroll, contra.

*45

*January 19th, 1880. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. This is a motion on the part of Thompson Earle, one of the defendants, to require Owen Smith, survivor of Owen Smith & Co., his co-defendant, who has appealed from a decree in the case, to give security for the costs of appeal, should the said appeal be dismissed. He basis his motion on his affidavit that "since the commencement of this action Owen Smith has removed from this state and is now residing in the town of Asheville, North Carolina; that he owns no property in the state, and that it was not until within the last four months that deponent was informed that the said Owen Smith was no longer a resident of South Carolina."

The case is on the appeal docket of the Fifth Circuit, but it does not appear here what was the precise nature of the proceedings, except that it was an action in the nature of a bill of interpleader by the plaintiff, and the contest was between the defendants. Nor does it appear when the decree appealed from was rendered, before or after the appellant left the state.

The motion is a novel one. We know of no law or practice authorizing this court, upon an original motion, to require security for costs from a party appealing, whether he is at the time a resident or has left the state after the commencement of the action. The appellant must conform to the law regulating appeals, and when he has done so he is entitled to have his appeal heard. It is no part of that law that he should give security for the costs of appeal in case he leaves the state after the commencement of the action. The code of procedure, Section 339, required security for costs as a condition of appeal, but that has been repealed (15 Stat. 501), showing that it is against the spirit of the law of the state to obstruct appeals, by requiring, in advance, security for the costs of appeal, as distinct from the general costs of the case.

An order requiring security for costs is administrative in its character and belongs exclusively to the court below. In that court the rule of court, which gives the form, allows it only where the plaintiff resides beyond the limits of the state. Here both the appellant and respondent are defendants. Neither of them, as actors, originated the proceeding, but both were brought *into court by process at the instance of another party. When the plaintiff, who is the actor, is absent from the state, and the objection is made in proper time in the Circuit Court, security for costs, which will include appeal costs, may be allowed; but when an order is made below, and the motion is first made here only for costs on appeal, this court has no original jurisdiction of the subject.

*46

The motion is refused.

---

13 S. C. 46

(Case No. 809.)

STATE, ex relatione THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. HAGOOD.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Statutes ⟸60, 285.]

When the constitution prescribes certain requisites in the enactment of a statute, the court may look behind the seal of the state, the approval of the governor and the signatures of the presiding officers of the general assembly, to ascertain whether the constitutional requirements have been complied with.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Information against Jager, 29 S. C. 443, 7 S. E. 605; State ex rel. Hoover v. Town Council of Chester, 39 S. C. 308, 17 S. E. 752; State v. Town Council of Chester, 39 S. C. 313, 17 S. E. 752; State ex rel. Lindsey v. Tollison, 100 S. C. 172, 84 S. E. 820.

For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 53, 384; Dec. Dig. ⟸60, 285.]

[2. Statutes ⟸15.]

An act of the legislature, as ratified by the two houses and approved by the governor, is not valid unless it has had three readings on three several days in each branch of the general assembly. Const., Art. XI., § 21.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. ⟸15.]

[3. Statutes ⟸23.]

Where a specific tax levy, without having passed the general assembly, is inserted in the enrolled copy of a bill which has passed, and the enrolled bill is ratified and approved, such levy has not the force of a law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 26, 27; Dec. Dig. ⟸23.]

[4. Statutes ⟸39.]

Where a bill providing for a tax levy of four and one-half mills, passes both branches of the general assembly, but the enrolled copy for ratification has the one-half changed to "three-quarters," so as to read "four and three-quarters mills," in which form it is ratified and approved—Held, that there was no authority to levy a tax of either four and one-half or four and three-quarters mills. McGowan, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Curtis v. Renneker, 34 S. C. 492, 13 S. E. 664; Bray v. City Council of Florence, 62 S. C. 63, 39 S. E. 810; State ex rel. Piedmont Mfg. Co. v. Goldsmith, 96 S. C. 489, 81 S. E. 147.

For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. ⟸39.]

5. State v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150 [16 Am. Rep. 647] doubted by McIver, A. J.

This was an original application, on January 15th, 1880, by the Hon. Le Roy F. Youmans, attorney-general, for a writ of mandamus to compel the Hon. Johnson Hagood, comptroller-general, to proceed with the levy of taxes under the act of December 24th, 1879: 17 Stat. 115.

The petition set forth the following matters:

1. That on December 24th, 1879, William D.

*47

Simpson, gov*ernor of the State of South Carolina, approved and signed an act of the general assembly of this state, entitled "An act to raise supplies and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing 1st November, 1879," which act had had the great seal of the state affixed to it, and had been signed in the senate and house by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives.

2. That it is the duty of the comptroller-general of this state to annually notify each county auditor of the rate per centum authorized by law to be levied for the various state purposes, and to prepare and transmit to each county auditor the necessary forms and instructions to carry into effect the provisions of the tax laws, which forms and instructions are required to be obeyed by all county, town and municipal officers.

3. That although it is the official duty, by statute, of Johnson Hagood, as comptroller-general, to perform the acts hereinbefore stated, for the purpose of carrying into effect the act of Assembly in Paragraph 1, hereinbefore mentioned, yet the said Johnson Hagood has refused and still refuses so to do, unless herein directed by judicial authority.

4. That unless the said Johnson Hagood does perform the said duties of the office of comptroller-general, the entire machinery of the state for raising revenue and paying appropriations will be paralyzed, to the great and irreparable detriment of the State of South Carolina.

An order was signed requiring the said Hagood to show cause forthwith why a writ of mandamus should not issue as prayed for.

The return was then filed, which was as follows:

1. Johnson Hagood, comptroller-general of said state, upon whom an order of this honorable court has been served, requiring him to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, as prayed for by the petition herein, for cause shows: That he admits that he has refused and still refuses to proceed, as comptroller-general, under the alleged act of the general assembly, entitled "An act to raise supplies and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing 1st

*48

November, 1879;" rati*fied and approved December 24th, 1879, as stated in said petition, for the following reasons:

2. That the alleged act, as ratified and approved purports to levy a tax of four and three-quarters mills in the first section thereof, and purports to authorize the county commissioners of Charleston county to levy a tax sufficient to raise the sum of $3000 for the Charleston military in the second section thereof; whereas the act, as it passed the senate and house of representatives, purported to levy a tax of only four and a half mills in the first section thereof, and did not contain any provision whatever, authorizing the levy of any tax for the Charleston military.

That the said act, when sent, after its passage in the house, to the senate, purported to authorize a levy of a tax of four and a half mills in the first section thereof, and the senate amended the said section by striking out the words "a half," and inserting in lieu thereof "three-quarters," in which amendment the house refused to concur, and the senate receded therefrom.

That the senate amended the second section thereof, by inserting therein the following provision: "That the county commissioners of Charleston county be, and are hereby authorized and required to levy a tax upon all the taxable property of said county sufficient to raise the sum of three thousand dollars, which tax shall be paid at the same time with other taxes. The proceeds arising therefrom shall be held by the treasurer of said county, subject to the draft of the major-general commanding the first division, and shall by him be apportioned, as follows: the one-tenth thereof, for the use of the militia in said county without the city of Charleston; another tenth thereof to the use of the first regiment of the national guard; and the remaining eight-tenths to be equally divided amongst the companies composing the fourth brigade, by companies."

In which amendment the house refused to concur and the senate receded therefrom, all of which fully appears in the journals of the senate and house of representatives. Wherefore it being in the apprehension of this respondent, involved in the gravest doubt whether the said alleged act has been passed in accordance with the requirements of the constitution, and has *authorized any notification whatever to the county auditors of the state by this respondent as comptroller-general, and even, if so authorizing, whether this respondent should include in such notification any rate per centum as authorized by law, to be levied for the various state purposes; and if so, what rate; and whether he should include in such notification the provision as to the Charleston military in the second section of said act hereinbefore specially set forth: this respondent has felt it not to be in the line of his official duty to proceed in any manner under the said alleged act, save under sanction of the proper judicial tribunal.

*49

Wherefore this respondent submits himself to the order of this court in the premises.

This return was verified and was not traversed; the matters therein stated were admitted to be true.

Mr. Youmans, attorney-general, for the relator.

We make no charge of contumacy against the comptroller-general. The matter being involved in doubt, it was not proper for him to proceed, nor for the governor to convene the legislature, without legal sanction.

The particular question here is novel only in the instance, but may be solved by legal formula and under well-established principles of law.

It is the highest exercise of the powers of courts in the American States, to declare an act unconstitutional. No more of an act should be declared unconstitutional than is clearly so, and that being stricken out, the remainder must be sustained. The only objection to this act is that one-quarter mill additional has been added on in the first section, and the Charleston military tax levy in another section. Strike both out and the remainder stands.

Prima facie it is the duty of the comptroller-general to execute the act as it stands on the statute-book. But under decision in Blackwell v. Barnwell, or State v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150, the court can go behind the signatures and the great seal, which seems to be the American rule; and we agree that that case is the law of this. See to same point, 4

*50

Otto 260. The courts, however, will *not interfere, unless the departure from the constitution is patent and plain. Fletcher v.

Peck. 6 Cr. 87, and other cases say so. They also say part may be good and part bad, and only the bad will be declared unconstitutional. There is difficulty sometimes in separating good from bad, but where, the bad being stricken out, the good part remaining is capable of execution, it must stand; the whole must fall only where the two are so interdependent that it cannot be presumed that the legislature would enact one without the other. Sedg. on Const. Law 413; Cooley Const. Lim. 177.

The precise constitutional objection here is in Article II., Section 21, of the constitution, where the ratification of an act is prescribed. This act passed the general assembly with a tax levy of four and one-half mills; there was added at the ratification an additional one-quarter mill and the Charleston military tax levy. Both of these additions, we concede, must go. Here lies our trouble, but we will show that the four and three-quarters mills is capable of separation, and that if it can be, it must be. State v. Copeland, 3 R. I. 36; and compare 13 Rich. 498 with 14 Rich. 129. So, too, in Homestead Cases. Courts hold same words good as to future contracts, but void as to past. See, too, 14 Pick. 96. We do not think four and three-quarters can stand; we do think that four and one-half can; that they are separable, that the one-quarter is not necessarily dependent on the four and one-half. The journals show that there was no struggle for diminution; the senate proposed to amend by substituting "three-quarters" for "one-half" and the house did not concur. This shows that a foreign substance, one-quarter mill, was attempted to be added, and did slip in at the ratification. This proves that the four and three-quarters mills is separable. Nothing on earth is so exactly separable as numbers, and hence mathematics is a certain and exact science. The one-quarter mill here was simply an addition which may be taken off. In approving the four and three-quarters mills, the governor approved the four and one-half mills, for majus minus continet. It cannot be said that the governor approved the greater tax, but might have vetoed the lesser. Such a course by the executive would be unparalleled; it is for the legislature to determine what *the tax levy shall be. Even if the amounts were grossly disproportioned, the greater would include the less.

*51

Mr. J. T. Rhett, for respondent.

We accept the law strictly as laid down in State v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150, and confirmed in 4 Otto 260, and 3 R. I. 33. In our case all of the facts are fully stated in the return and admitted. As to the Charleston military tax levy, that is clearly within the decision of Blackwell v. Barnwell. As to the four and three-quarters mills, not being constitutionally passed, the whole act goes with it. 2 S. C. 157, 160; Cooley Const. Lim. (1st ed.), ch. VII., § 6, pp. 178, 179. The four and three-quarters mills tax levy is clearly not good in whole; is it in part? One view is that the "four" not being changed at all, neither the "one-half" nor the "three-quarters" is valid, but being lopped off, the act stands good for four mills. This sticks too much to the letter, and cannot be a proper one unless it would fit other figures; as, for instance, a substitution of five for four and one-half. This view ignores the fact that four and three-quarters is as much an entity as five or one. Another view, and that of the attorney-general, is, that the law should be enforced for four and one-half, leaving out the one-quarter mill erroneously added. To do this, you must go beyond the decision in Blackwell v. Barnwell, which simply struck out and then went back to a pre-existing law; you must replace words, and thus legislate and not adjudicate. You must also ignore the governor's right of veto, or explain it away by saying that his approval of the greater was an approval of the lesser number. This is a fanciful and mathematical view scarcely conceivable in the intent of the constitution.

Again, words are the expression of thoughts, and thoughts, whether in one word or more, are no more divisible in the mathematical sense claimed for any effectual purpose connected with the thought itself, than words are divisible in letters for any effectual purpose connected with the word itself. Four and three-quarters is a fixed quantity, an entity; a thought in itself complete and absolutely single.

*52

*January 26th, 1879. The judgment of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This was an application for a mandamus to compel the comptroller-general to notify each county auditor in the state of the rate per centum of the tax authorized by law to be levied for various state purposes, and to prepare and transmit to each county auditor the necessary forms and instructions to carry into effect the provisions of the act to raise supplies, &c., approved December 24th, 1879. The return of the comptroller-general, which is not traversed, and which must, therefore, be taken to be true, raises two legal questions. First, as to the validity of the first section of the act fixing the amount to be levied for general state purposes; and, Second, as to the validity of the provision in the second section for the military organizations in the county of Charleston.

A majority of the court having reached the conclusion that the error in the first section is fatal to the validity of that section, and the court having unanimously reached the conclusion that so much of the second section as makes provision for the Charleston military organizations is without the force of law, it is ordered that the motion for mandamus be refused.

The following opinions were subsequently filed in this case:

WILLARD, C. J. The relator asks for a writ of mandamus to compel the performance of certain duties imposed by law upon the comptroller-general where an act has been passed directing the imposition of a general tax, looking to the enforcement of such law.

No question is raised as to the propriety of the remedy, in the event that it shall be held that authority exists for the performance of the duties sought to be enforced.

The single question propounded is, whether the act entitled "An act to raise supplies and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing 1st November, 1879," is authority for proceedings on the part of the executive officers to levy and collect a tax for state purposes.

It appears by the pleadings, and also by the journals of the general assembly, that the act, as passed by the two houses, di*rected a tax of four and one-half mills, but that the act, as ratified and published, directs the imposition of a tax of four and three-quarters mills.

*53

It cannot be questioned that the amount of tax is a material part of the act, and that it cannot be enforced unless that amount is ascertained to have been fixed by the act. It is obvious that the legislature did not intend to leave the amount of the tax to be ascertained by the executive officers of the government, if such a delegation of authority is permissible; but that it was intended that the amount of the levy should be ascertained by the law itself. We must, therefore, inquire whether the act itself has ascertained the amount of tax to be levied in a conclusive and binding form.

It cannot be questioned that, independently of constitutional authority vested in this court, enabling it to look into the actual proceedings of the bodies composing the general assembly, to ascertain the fact of compliance with some constitutional requirement on which the validity of the law depends, the evidence afforded by the certificates of the presiding officers, the great seal affixed to it, and the approval of the governor, must be regarded as conclusive evidence of the action of the legislative body. Such was the law of England, from which our ideas of the force and effect of statutes were derived, and it has become embodied in our jurisprudence. It is then only when we can point to constitutional authority for the purpose that we can demand other evidence of the authenticity of an act, than that which is afforded by the customary modes of authentication.

Section 21, Article II., of the constitution of this state, provides as follows: "No bill shall have the force of law until it shall have been read three times and on three several days in each house, has had the great seal of the state affixed to it, and has been signed in the senate-house by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives." It cannot be denied that the existence of each one of these requisites is essential to the validity of an act. State v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150 [16 Am. Rep. 647]. It is not enough that the great seal shall be affixed, and that the presiding officers of the two houses shall affix their signatures, *but, in addition to this, the bill must have had its three readings on three several days in each house.

*54

It will not be disputed that the courts are competent to ascertain and declare effectively whether the constitutional conditions, on which the force of an act depends, exist. To perform this duty it is necessary to ascertain the existence of the fact of the three readings, and, applying the rules that govern all judicial proceedings, such inquiry must be made in accordance with the rules of evidence that belong to the subject, according to its nature. In the present case, if we come to the conclusion that the act, as published, is not identical with the bill from which it originated, we are relieved from all intricate questions as to the nature of the proofs available for such an inquiry; for the facts admitted upon the pleadings, and the journals of the houses, read with the original bill, sustaining that statement of facts, show that the act, as ratified, was not read three times in each house on three several days. If such was the case, then the constitution denies, in express terms, the force of law to such bill, and the act, as ratified, stands as though it never existed in the form of a bill before the two houses, and is not effective as a law. If such be found to be the case, our competency and duty so to declare are manifest.

The question then arises, whether want of identity between a ratified act and the bill in which it claims to have originated, is fatal to such ratification. Stating this question in this broad manner places it beyond a doubt. If the legislative bodies enact one law and the presiding officers and the custodian of the great seal publish another, of a totally different nature, to allow force to such publication would defeat all the objects intended by the constitution. It would be placing the homage due to the great seal before the constitution, and all the practical safeguards devised by the experience of popular government for the protection of the people; it would be giving a legal stone, though ornamented with the arms of the state, for the constitutional bread of efficient protection. Fictions of law are often convenient when dynastic interests are to be upheld against the reason that commends popular rights, but have no place in interpreting the great *instrument from which all governmental power springs, and by which its efficacy is to be tested. Of what avail are all the safeguards of liberty and property, with their carefully-studied provisions, giving form to legislative procedure, if the custodian of the great seal and the presiding officers of the two houses of the general assembly can, by an arbitrary act, divide between themselves public property and public power? That such efficacy should be ascribed to the great seal in England, is easily understood, for the imposition of that seal was considered as a personal act of the sovereign, who, according to legal ideas, could not do wrong, but that such a doctrine could have any advocacy in a government that professes to be one of laws and not of personal authority, is not readily accounted for.

*55

The attorney-general has placed the case of the relators on ground that allows full force to the considerations that have just been stated; but whether he has distinguished the case successfully from one in which the ratified act is totally different from the bill as passed, remains to be examined.

It would follow, from what has been already stated, that the act, as ratified, must, to have the force of law, be substantially identical with the bill that received its several readings in the houses. What, then, is the test of such identity? Many cases may be supposed that would give rise to nice questions as to what deviations affect the question of identity and what do not, but the present case is free from any such difficulty. It is the highest prerogative of the legislative body to impose taxes and prescribe limits to the burden of taxation. The value and importance of this prerogative is expressed by the cost in blood and treasure of the establishment of the authority of the house of commons of Great Britain as the constitutional means of expressing the popular will. The quantity that the people shall be taxed is of the very life and essence of an act raising supplies for the maintenance of the government. It was not the abstract right of imposing taxes that was the matter of contest between Charles I. and the house of commons, but to what extent and in what manner such taxes should be imposed. At this day the vital question involved in every supply bill is, how much shall the people be taxed? To say, then, that a bill authorizing taxa*tion to a specified amount and an act fixing a different amount are identical is to hold that the amount of the tax is an immaterial part of the bill, and to contradict both public history and reason. It follows that the bill in the present case that authorized a tax of four and one-half mills was not identical with the act before us that assumes to impose a tax of four and three-quarters mills, and the act as it stands cannot have the force of law, for want of the requisite readings in the two houses of the general assembly. It was contended, however, that the quarter mill may be rejected as something superadded to the amount of the tax directed by the bill as passed, which, not having been a part of the bill, may be rejected from the ratified act, leaving the amount of four and one-half mills valid and capable of enforcement. We have not been pointed to any authority for thus disintegrating the provisions of a law and rejecting part and retaining the residue. State v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150 [16 Am. Rep. 647], is an authority for rejecting some independent provision of an act that may be severed from the other provisions of an act without affecting their efficacy, where such independent part has failed to receive constitutional enactment; but it does not go to the extent of holding that the words of an act may be changed to express the real intention of the legislature that has been imperfectly expressed in the ratified act. It is contended that the declaration of an intent to impose a tax of four and one-half mills is embraced within the direction to levy a tax of four and three-quarters mills, and that all that is necessary is to reject the excess. This argument is placed on the ground that a numerical statement is in its nature severable into its parts so that a portion of the sum stated may be good and another portion bad. It is true that the subject of a numerical statement may be regarded as in its nature divisible with reference to a known unit, but the verbal statement of that sum is not for that reason necessarily divisible. The one is a question of arithmetic and the other of logic. It cannot be claimed that the court can re-state the language of an act to make it agree with some possible conclusion as to its intention as affecting the subject matter of the act. The language declaring the intent of an act is as much beyond our power as the subject to which that declaration relates, and it would violate the principles of *law to change the phraseology of a statute to make it conform to the assumed purpose of the law-giver in any other way than as warranted by the rules of construction. It is not contended and cannot be claimed that the present difficulty can be overcome in conformity with the principles of construction. The proposition is, in its real nature, that we should reform the language of the statute to give it efficacy under the constitution, and that cannot be done consistently with the principles of law that bind the court. It is to be regretted that this court has no power to obviate the inconveniences that must arise from the conclusions that have been stated; but usurpation by the court of authority for that purpose would tend to inflict a permanent injury upon the balance of authority established between the legislature and the courts, while the inconveniences that result from adhering to a clear and simple line of duty will be temporary at the most.

*56

*57

The ratified act does not appear to have received the constitutional sanction of the general assembly, and cannot be reformed in the manner claimed by the relators. The motion should be dismissed.

McIVER, A. J. The question in this case is as to the validity of the act passed at the last regular session of the general assembly, entitled "An act to raise supplies and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing first of November, 1879."

It is conceded that the act as enrolled and signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives, approved by the governor, and to which the seal of the state has been affixed, provides in its first section for the levy of a tax of four and three-quarters mills on the dollar, exclusive of the public school tax, for the purpose of defraying the current expenses of the state government, &c., and in its second section authorizes and requires the county commissioners of Charleston county to levy a tax sufficient to raise the sum of $3000 for the use of the military organizations in that county; but that an inspection of the journals of the general assembly, in connection with the original bill, will show that by the act as it actually passed the two houses, the amount authorized to be levied in the first section, was four and one-half, instead of four and three *quarters mills, and that there was no provision therein authorizing the levy of any tax for the benefit of the Charleston military organizations. Upon this state of facts, if the case of the State v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150 [16 Am. Rep. 647], is to be regarded as good law, and it must be so regarded until it is overruled by proper authority, I think it is conclusive of the question now before the court. In that case the Supreme Court held that where the journals of the general assembly showed that by the act as it passed both houses "Blackville" was the place designated for holding the Courts of General Sessions and Common Pleas for Barnwell county, while by the act as enrolled and signed by the presiding officers of the two houses and approved by the governor, "Barnwell" was the place designated for that purpose, that so much of the act as related to that particular matter, inasmuch as it was not connected with or dependent upon any other part of the act, was a nullity and the balance of the act good. This was upon the ground that, under the constitution, it was necessary to the validity of a law not only that it should pass both branches of the general assembly but that it should also receive the approval of the governor, except in those cases provided for in Section 22 of Article III. of the constitution, which did not apply to the case then in hand. Now, as in that case, the portion of the act designating Blackville as the place for holding the courts had not received the approval of the governor it could not be the law, and as that portion of the act, as enrolled, which designated Barnwell as the place for holding the courts, had not passed the two houses it could not be law, and hence the whole attempt of legislating upon that subject proved abortive and the law remained as it was before. So, in this case, the attempt to fix by law the amount of the tax to be levied for the current expenses of the state government, as well as the attempt to provide for the levy of a tax for the benefit of the military organizations in the county of Charleston, has proved wholly abortive for the same reason which was held to have produced that result in the case of State v. Platt. The amount at which the general tax levy was fixed by one branch of the law-making power—the two houses composing the general assembly—is different from that which received the approval of the other branch—the executive—and neither, there*fore, can have the force of law, as there is no pretence that the act in question became a law, notwithstanding the failure of the governor to approve it, in the manner prescribed by Section 22 of Article III. of the constitution. The act cannot be regarded as authorizing a levy of four and one-half mills, because the governor has never approved such an amount; nor can it authorize a levy of four and three-quarters mills, because the general assembly has never given its assent to the levy of such an amount.

*58

*59

It will not do to say that four and one-half being less than four and three-quarters, must necessarily be included in it, and as the governor has approved the greater amount he must be regarded as including in such approval the lesser amount also. Such an attempt to apply mathematical principles to moral questions will almost invariably lead to erroneous conclusions. It does not by any means follow that the approval of the larger number necessarily includes the approval of the smaller. For suppose, if such a supposition is permissible, that a legislature should pass an act to raise supplies which provided for a levy of one-tenth of a mill, and the act as approved by the governor should provide for a levy of a reasonable amount—say four mills—could it with any propriety be argued that the governor had thereby approved a levy ridiculously small and manifestly insufficient for the purposes set forth? True, this may be regarded as an extreme supposition, but if the proposition that the approval of the greater number necessarily involves the idea of the approval of the lesser number, be true in any case, resting as it does upon mathematical principles, it must be true in all cases.

Take another illustration. Suppose the legislature were to pass an act fixing the age at which one should pass from infancy to majority at fifteen years, and the act as approved by the governor should fix that age at twenty years, would it follow that because he approved twenty he thereby approved fifteen—that number being included in twenty, just as four and one-half is here alleged to be included in four and three-quarters? It must be remembered also that the very purpose of the section of the act now under consideration was to fix the amount of the tax to be levied, and when the different branches of the law-making power *have declared for different amounts, I am unable to understand how either declaration can be regarded as law.

*60

By the same course of reasoning it could be shown that the provision for the Charleston military organizations is open to the same objections.

It seems to me, therefore, that, unless the case of State v. Platt is overruled, which the majority of the court are not now disposed to do, the first section of the act in question as well as that portion of the second section which purports to authorize the levy of a tax for the support of the Charleston military organizations must be regarded as without the force of law.

I think, however, that the case of State v. Platt cannot be sustained, either upon principle or authority, but that on the contrary it is opposed to the decided weight of authority and establishes a rule which may, in some cases, produce disastrous results, and that it should be overruled.

The true rule, in my judgment, is that when an act has been enrolled, has had the great seal of the state affixed to it, has been signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives and has been approved by the governor, it imports absolute verity; that its terms can only be finally ascertained by an inspection of the enrolled act, and that it is not competent to go behind it, and alter its terms either by entries in the journals of the two houses or any other evidence. Its constitutionality may, of course, be inquired into, both for the purpose of determining whether any of its admitted provisions are in conflict with the constitution, either state or federal, and also for the purpose of determining whether the journals show what the constitution requires they shall show in regard to acts for certain purposes; for instance, where an act purports to authorize the contracting of a public debt, whether the act was passed by a two-thirds vote taken by yeas and nays—because, by the express terms of the constitution, no such law can take effect until it has been passed by such a vote, which is required "to be recorded, by yeas and nays, on the journals of each house." Hence, if the journals fail to show such a record there is an absence of one constitutional requirement, which is just as fatal as if the act had not been signed by the president of the senate or speaker of *the house or had not been approved by the governor. But as we have decided in Grand Lodge of A. F. M. v. City of Charleston, the mere fact that the journals fail to show that a bill has been read three times, on three several days in each house, does not invalidate the act, because, while the constitution does require that it shall be so read, it does not require that the fact that it has been so read shall be so recorded on the journals, and hence the omission of such record cannot affect the constitutionality of the act.

*61

The same doctrine has been held even in the State of Illinois (Supervisors of Schuyler County v. People, 25 Ill. 181,) a state whose decisions seem to be mainly relied upon to show that it is competent for the courts to look behind the act as enrolled and ratified, and by an inspection of the journals, or other evidence, determine whether any of its provisions have failed to receive the assent of the legislature.

But the proposition to examine the journals for the purpose of ascertaining whether certain words, clauses or sections which appear in the act as enrolled and ratified and approved by the governor, were in the original bill at the time it passed either or both houses, is a very different thing from looking into the journals for the purpose of ascertaining whether they contain such entries as are required by the constitution to be recorded therein. The journals are not made evidence for such a purpose by the constitution, they are not made so by any statute, they were not so regarded in England—a country from whence we have derived not only our fundamental rules of evidence, but a country whose parliament furnishes the model upon which the legislative assemblies of the United States have been constructed. Cush. Law and Practice of Leg. Assemb., § 197.

In King v. Arundel, Hob. 109, it was held that the journal "hath no power to satisfy, destroy or weaken the act, which being a high record must be tried only by itself." But while it is conceded that such is the rule in England, it is argued that it cannot be applied here, where we have a written constitution. I am unable to perceive how this can affect the question unless it could be shown that our constitution contains some provision *which would have the effect of altering the rule, and none such can be found.

*62

The constitution in Article II., Section 26, does require that each house shall keep a journal of its own proceedings; but it does not prescribe what shall be therein entered except in certain instances. For example, in Section 24 of the same article, where it requires that "in all elections by the general assembly, or either house thereof, the members shall vote viva voce, and their votes thus given shall be entered upon the journal of the house to which they respectively belong," and in Section 7 of Article IX., where it requires that the vote upon a bill to authorize the contracting of a public debt shall be taken by yeas and nays and recorded on the journal. But there is no requirement that the terms of a bill shall be entered on the journal; and, as matter of fact, the provisions of a bill are never spread upon the journal, but only its title and the amendments proposed, and this is oftentimes done in such an imperfect and unintelligible manner as to render it necessary to refer to something else to make them intelligible. As, for example, in this very case, where, without reference to the original bill, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to tell what was the amendment to the first section.

It appears to me, too, that the decided weight of authority in this country is in favor of the English rule. In Pangborn v. Young, 32 N. J. 29, decided in 1866, the question was discussed with great ability and learning, and the conclusion was reached that, both upon principle and authority, it was not competent for a court to go behind the act as ratified and approved by the governor, and inspect the journals with a view to ascertain whether the act as actually voted upon and passed, contained different terms from that which had been ratified, approved by the governor and filed in the office of the secretary of state. The same doctrine has been held in Connecticut, in 1849; Eld v. Gorham, 20 Conn. 8. In Maryland, in 1858, Fouke v. Fleming & Douglass, 13 Md. 392, and again in 1870, in Mayor v. Harwood, 32 Md. 471; though the court in that state, in the subsequent cases of Berry v. Baltimore and Dunn Point Railroad Company, 41 Md. 446, decided in 1875, and Legg v. Mayor, 42 Md. 203, decided also in 1875, while not overruling the two *cases first mentioned do seem disposed to take a somewhat different view of the question. In Indiana, in 1869, in Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514. In New York, in 1865, in People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 269. In Louisiana, in 1871, in La. State Lottery Co. v. Richoux, 23 La. Ann. 743. In Nevada, in 1875, in State v. Swift, 10 Nev. 176. In the Nevada case, which is one of the most recent decisions upon the point that I have been able to find, the American authorities are elaborately reviewed. In that case it is said that question "appears to have been decided in fifteen states; in nine states, viz., Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Missouri, Iowa, North Carolina, Indiana, California, the old rule is upheld. In six states, viz., Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, South Carolina, Minnesota and New Hampshire, it is repudiated. In Michigan there are dicta in favor of the new departure. In Ohio and Kentucky the question has been noticed but its decision waived. In Mississippi the court divided on the question." The learned judge then proceeds to show that the decisions in the six states above alluded to, with the exception perhaps of those of New Hampshire, either ignore all precedents or are rested upon authorities which have either been overruled or do not establish the position which they are cited to support. Not having access to all the cases he refers to I have not been able to verify his assertion, but so far as I have been able to prosecute my researches I find his assertion, in the main, sustained. It is very manifest that the decision in this state does not purport to rest upon the authority of any decided cases, as not a single one is referred to. The Illinois cases, which seem to be principally relied upon to support the new rule, do not, as it seems to me, furnish that support. The constitution of that state, adopted in 1848, which was of force at the time the earlier cases were decided, as well as that adopted in 1870, which is now and was of force at the time the later decisions were rendered, provides (the italics being mine) that on the final passage of all bills, the vote shall be by ayes and noes, and shall be entered on the journal, and no bill shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of the members elected to each house," differing in this respect very materially from the constitution of this state. Now the Illinois cases which are relied upon as sup*porting the new rule, all seem to be cases in which the question was whether it was competent to resort to the journals for the purpose of showing that this constitutional requirement had not been complied with.

*63

*64

They therefore may rest upon the same principle which has been adopted here, viz., that where the constitution requires, in express terms, that in order to make an act valid, certain entries must be made upon the journals, the absence of such entries is fatal to the act. But the same court, as we have seen above, in the case of Supervisors of Schuyler County v. People, has held that the fact that the journals fail to show that a certain bill was read three times on three several days, does not affect its constitutionality, because, while the three readings are required by the constitution, the fact that it has been so read is not required to be entered on the journals. This distinction seems to be recognized in the case of Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85, decided in 1871, where the decision was placed upon the ground that as the constitution of that state, then in force, like the constitution of Illinois above quoted, required all bills to be passed by a vote taken by ayes and noes, which must be entered on the journals, the court could look to the journals to see if this constitutional requirement had been complied with.

It seems to me that the English rule is supported by the decided weight of authority in this country, and as is abundantly shown in the able and elaborate opinion of the Chief Justice of New Jersey, in the case of Pangborn v. Young, supra, to which especial attention is invited, that it is founded upon well-settled principles and is recommended by every consideration of public policy.

It is an entire mistake to suppose that this rule rests upon the idea that any peculiar sanctity should be attached to the great seal of the state. The question to be determined, in cases of this kind, is one of fact: what are the terms which have been used by the legislature in a statute—not what the construction of admitted terms should be, nor whether certain requirements of the constitution have been complied with, which are questions clearly within the scope of judicial cognizance. If an act as enrolled, signed by the presiding officers of the two houses, with *the seal of the state attached, and bearing upon its face the approval of the governor, is not to be regarded as conclusive of the terms which it contains, then, indeed, is the question as to what is the written law of the land involved in the greatest uncertainty. If courts can go behind such an act and inquire whether each and every word of it has actually received the assent of the legislature, then the question very naturally arises how far can they go, and what kinds of evidence may be resorted to? Are the journals conclusive, or can they, as is said to have been done in one of the Illinois cases (Turley v. County of Logan, 17 Ill. 151,) receive parol evidence "and on recollection of members, and by the manuscript notes of the clerk," amend the journals and thereby alter the terms of the enrolled act? If so, then rights which depend upon a statute are held by the most shifting and uncertain tenure. There is no mode by which the question as to whether a statute actually contains or should contain certain terms, can be finally tested and definitely set at rest, if the rule established by the case of State v. Platt is allowed to prevail. When the question is as to the construction of the terms used in a statute, whether terms are in conflict with any constitutional provision, or whether the journals show what the constitution requires that they shall show, a decision in one case, being a decision of a question of law, would be binding in all subsequent cases; but when the question is whether certain words or clauses which are found in a statute which has been duly enrolled, ratified and approved, actually received the assent of the legislative will, a decision in one case would not be conclusive in another like case, between different parties, because it would depend upon the solution of a question of fact, and the decision of such a question could only bind the parties to such case and their privies. When the question arises again between different parties it would be entirely open, and the result might be that in one case the statute would be held to contain certain provisions, while in another the reverse might be decided. So that what was supposed to be law one day, in one county, would not be law the next day in another county. But if it should be argued that the journals are to be regarded as conclusive and that no other evidence can be received, then the question very naturally *arises, why should the journals, made up, as they are, hastily, amidst the excitement and confusion incident to most legislative bodies, by subordinate officers of the two branches of the general assembly, be entitled to any more credit than the enrolled act, reported by committees of the bodies themselves as correctly enrolled and ready for ratification, and authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers?

*65

*66

Why should the journals, which are kept by a subordinate officer, be any more entitled to respect than the work of another subordinate, supervized as it is required to be by committees of the two houses and authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers? If anything, the latter would seem to be entitled to the higher degree of credit.

It will not do to say that the journals are read over daily in the presence of the members and are adopted by them as correct, for to say nothing of the weight which this suggestion would probably have in the minds of those who are familiar with the usual custom of legislative bodies in this regard, it is very certain that the journals of the last day of the session, which are apt to contain some of the most important proceedings, are not so read over, even in theory, and cannot, therefore, be said to have received the approval of the members. Nor will it do to say that the rule contended for leaves the legislation of the country at the mercy of a careless or dishonest engrossing clerk, for if the committee on enrolled bills do their duty, as every court is bound to assume that they will, there can be no danger of any improper or careless addition to, or omission from the bills as they actually have been passed.

No rule that can be devised will prove absolutely perfect, and the great matter is to have a certain definite rule, capable of easy application, which is best calculated to effect the end in view. The practical question, therefore, is, whether it is better to adhere to the rule which has prevailed for ages in the country from which our jurisprudence has been mainly derived, and which, having worked well there, has been adopted by a number of the states of this Union, and which undoubtedly has the merit of being simple, definite and easy of application, or shall we adopt another which undoubtedly tends to render the law uncertain, *which has not, as yet, assumed any definite shape, and which will be attended by the gravest inconveniences and perhaps dangers by opening the door for frauds and affording the strongest temptation to tamper with the journals of the legislature?

*67

The new rule, as it may be called, certainly has not, as yet, assumed any definite shape, for although it is said in Berry v. Baltimore and Duna Point Railroad Company, 41 Md. 446, in speaking of the cases in which the new rule has been adopted that "they all seem to concur in maintaining that no statute, having the proper forms of authentication, can be impeached or questioned upon mere parol evidence," yet, as we have seen in the case of Turly v. County of Logan, above referred to, parol evidence was received to amend the journals and thereby correct the enrolled act. So, also, in Gardner v. Collector, 6 Wall. 511 [18 L. Ed. 890], the Supreme Court of the United States said that in a question of this kind "the judges who are called upon to decide it, have a right to resort to any source of information, which in its nature, is capable of conveying to the judicial mind a clear and satisfactory answer to such a question"—language which would surely warrant a resort to parol evidence. And in the case of State v. Platt no such limitation of the rule is to be found. On the contrary, that case holds that resort may be had to the journals or other appropriate evidence, which, certainly, does not necessarily forbid a resort to parol evidence. Indeed, few, if any, of the cases undertake to prescribe what kind of evidence should be received for the purpose of correcting the terms of an enrolled act, and therefore, it seems to me, the question may be regarded as still an open one.

While, therefore, I have been compelled by the view which I take of the case of State v. Platt to concur in the result reached by the CHIEF JUSTICE in this case, I have thought it to be my duty to place on record the grounds of my dissatisfaction with the rule established by that case.

McGOWAN, A. J. This is a petition by the attorney-general of the state against the comptroller-general for a writ of mandamus commanding him forthwith to notify each county auditor of the rate per centum authorized by "An act to raise supplies *and make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing 1st November, 1879," and approved 24th December, 1879.

*68

Under the law, it is the duty of the comptroller-general, as the head of the fiscal department of the government, to have enforced acts of the legislature which levy taxes, and to issue to subordinate officers in that department all instructions and forms necessary for that purpose. But for the reason which appears in his return, the comptroller-general refuses to have said act carried into effect; wherefore the attorney-general filed this petition for mandamus to compel him to do so.

The return is not traversed and must be taken to be true. It contains the following statement of facts:

"That the alleged act, as ratified and approved, purports to levy a tax of four and three-quarters mills in the first section thereof, and purports to authorize the county commissioners of Charleston county to levy a tax sufficient to raise the sum of three thousand dollars for the Charleston military in the second section thereof; whereas the act, as it passed the senate and house of representatives, purported to raise a tax of only four and one-half mills in the first section thereof, and did not contain any provision whatever authorizing the levy of any tax for the Charleston military.

"That the said act, when sent, after its passage in the house, to the senate, purported to authorize a levy of a tax of four and one-half mills in the first section thereof, and the senate amended the said section by striking out the words 'one-half' and inserting in lieu thereof 'three-quarters,' in which amendment the house refused to concur and the senate receded therefrom. That the senate amended the second section thereof by inserting the provision for the Charleston military, (copied in full,) in which amendment the house refused to concur and the senate receded therefrom; all of which fully appears in the journals of the senate and house of representatives," &c.

Upon these facts, admitted and confirmed by the journals, the question is purely one of law, whether the act referred to is constitutional and valid in whole or in part, for if it is, the mandamus must be granted to enforce it, and otherwise not.

The act is found among the archives in the office of the sec*retary of state with other public acts passed at the last session, signed by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives, approved and signed by the governor, and having attached the great seal of the state.

*69

It is a record of a very solemn character, and must be regarded as constitutional, certainly until the contrary clearly appears. It may be assailed, and whether it is what it purports to be, a valid law under the constitution, is a judicial question. The courts have the right to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional in whole or in part, but that right should be exercised with great caution. It is a solemn act to declare that that body to whom the people have committed the sovereign function of making the laws, have disregarded the limitations imposed upon them, and it should only be done in cases where the constitution has been clearly, palpably and plainly violated, and then only to the extent of such violation.

It is not suggested that the act under consideration is unconstitutional because it violates any principle in regard to the subject matter, such as impairing the obligation of contracts, &c., but that as it was enrolled and now stands upon the statute-book, it was not, in two of its most important parts, passed by the legislature according to the forms of the constitution, and is therefore not law.

The constitution declares as follows: Article II., Section 21—"No bill shall have the force of law until it shall have been read three times and on three several days in each house, has had the great seal of the state affixed to it, and has been signed in the senate-house by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives."

Article III., Section 22—"Every bill or joint resolution which shall have passed the general assembly, except on a question of adjournment, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor, and if he approve it he shall sign it; if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it shall have originated, which shall enter the objections at large on its journals and proceed to consider it," &c.

Most of the states of the Union have constitutions with provisions more or less similar to those in our constitution above *quoted. In many of them the question has been much discussed, whether an act regular in form, signed by the proper officers of each house, approved by the governor, and having attached to it the great seal of the state, constitutes a record from a co-ordinate branch of the government so solemn as to make it conclusive evidence of the passage of the act as enrolled; or whether the journals of each branch of the legislature may be considered and treated as authentic records of the proceedings of the legislature, to ascertain whether the two houses, in fact, concurred in the passage of the act. In this discussion it is conceded, on both sides, that in England an act of parliament proves itself, and is not subject to judicial inquiry—that the act, as enrolled by the clerk of parliament, so long as it existed, was held to import absolute verity. There are two distinct currents of opinion in the states having written constitutions—one holding that it is not only legal but wise to adhere to the old English rule, and the other that the judiciary department may, and indeed must, look beyond the seal and inquire whether that which purports to be law has been passed in the manner prescribed by the constitution. The states seem to be about equally divided upon the subject. In New Jersey, Nevada and some others, the old English rule is upheld. In Illinois, New Hampshire, Minnesota, Alabama and others, the opposite view is taken. In this conflict of opinion South Carolina has ranged herself with the latter class and in favor of what may be called the American doctrine on the subject. In considering the effect of the provisions of our constitution already cited, this court, in the case of State ex rel. Attorney-General, v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150 [16 Am. Rep. 647] has held "that the enrolled act, duly authenticated, as the constitution requires, and approved and signed by the governor, is not conclusive evidence of the terms of a bill as it passed the houses of the general assembly; but the journals of the houses, or other appropriate evidence, may be received to show what those terms were, and whenever it appears that the enrolled act differs from the bill as it passed, in a substantial matter, the judiciary department of the state may declare the whole act, or the part affected by the change, unconstitutional and void."

*70

According to the well-established rule of stare decisis, the *principles here announced are law in South Carolina, and they must decide this case.

*71

Let us apply them to the act under consideration. It appears in the most conclusive manner—in fact it is admitted—that the act as ratified, and the bill as it passed the two houses, "differ" in two important particulars. The one levied in the first section four and one-half mills, and nothing in the second section, for the Charleston military; the other levied, in the first section, four and three-quarters mills, and in the second section provided a tax to raise $3000 for the Charleston military. It is not denied that the particulars in which they "differ" are substantial; then it must follow, from the case of Platt, that we may declare the whole act, or the part affected by the change, unconstitutional and void. These new provisions were not passed in the manner prescribed by the constitution, but are mere interpolations, and we have no hesitation in holding that, to the extent of these interpolations, the act is unconstitutional and void, and that no mandamus should be issued to enforce the act, so far as they are concerned.

Then how does the act stand with these provisions declared null? Is the remainder binding as law, or does that necessarily have the effect of invalidating the whole act or of the whole section in which the bad parts adhered? If that is the law, it must be so declared; but it would be a strange and unfortunate result that, even after the interpolations are annulled, they should have the effect of destroying that which, but for their presence, would be regular and valid.

It is said, in more than one of our decided cases, that it is the business of the court to give effect to the intention of the legislature when it can be ascertained, and not to lend too ready an ear to hinder or subvert it. Here the intention of the legislature is in no way doubtful. They intended to levy a tax of four and one-half mills in the first section, and to authorize no levy for the Charleston military in the second. That was expressed in the bill as it passed both houses, and if the effect of declaring null the interpolations can be limited to those parts, the act will stand as it passed the houses and express the exact intention of the legislature.

*72

*The supply and appropriation act, from its very nature, has many different provisions, distinct from each other. It has one general purpose, but in carrying out that purpose separate and distinct subjects are introduced; and it would seem reasonable that if one of these limbs should be unsound it might be amputated without destroying the whole body. It is no new thing in South Carolina that part of an act should be declared to be unconstitutional and the other part remain unaffected.

The constitution of the state was adopted by the people as a whole, uno flatu, yet parts of it have been declared void, leaving the remainder in full operation. Calhoun v. Calhoun, 2 S. C. 283; Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125. The act of the legislature known as the stay law, has been declared unconstitutional in part (State v. Carew, 13 Rich. 498 [91 Am. Dec. 245]) and the remainder declared constitutional in another case. Wardlaw v. Buzzard, 15 Rich. 158 [94 Am. Dec. 148].

An act of the legislature contained, among others, a provision that the court for Barnwell county should be held at Barnwell courthouse. That part as to the place where the court should be held was declared bad, and the remainder of the act left in full operation. In that case it is said "the residue of the act beyond that portion held by us not to be of force as law, is unaffected thereby, inasmuch as that is a distinct and independent matter, in no way affecting the scope and efficiency of the act, according to the intention of the law-maker." Accepting this principle as the test, there is no doubt that the declaring null the provision for the Charleston military in the second section, leaves unaffected the remainder of that section and the act, inasmuch as that is clearly a distinct and independent matter. The integrity of the act is not affected, for it is left in that respect as it stood originally.

Can we affirm the same as to the portion of the first section which remains, after declaring null the bad quarter mill injected into it? This is the most difficult question in the case, and it must be determined by the fact whether the interpolation can be eliminated from the act as a separate and independent matter. The enrolled act reads "four and three-quarters mills." We have already declared that one-quarter mill of that is bad, and if the bad quarter mill had been added by a separate clause like this, *and one-quarter mill in addition thereto, leaving the original text, four and one-half mills, unchanged, there would be no difficulty, for then the supplemented sentence might be declared void and still leave the remainder of the sentence as law, reading four and one-half mills. But the original text expressing numbers, the addition was made, not by a separate sentence, but by simply changing the arithmetical expression four and one-half to four and three-quarters. The addition made was, in effect, precisely equivalent to making it by a separate sentence. The difficulty arises, not from the nature of the thing, but from the manner in which it is expressed. We do not understand that the matter expressed in the enrolled act, "four and three-quarter mills," is an indivisible unity, but, as we know, is only the manner of expressing at least two other quantities, "four and one-half" and "one-quarter," as to both of which we have a distinct conception. The history of this matter itself shows that it is divisible. As the bill passed the houses, it read four and one-half mills—in some way one-quarter mill was added, so that it now reads "four and three-quarters mills." These are clearly distinct and separate. Is it possible that the bad quarter mill cannot be eliminated only because of the phraseology in which it was incorporated? The law aims at the substance of things. Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, p. 178, says: "The constitutional and unconstitutional provisions may even be contained in the same section, and yet be perfectly distinct and separable, so that the first may stand though the last fall." The quarter mill added is "distinct and separable," although it is not expressed separately, but is included in the compound arithmetical phrase "four and three-quarters mills."

*73

A motion to strike out and insert is an entirety, and, if it is not passed, nothing is stricken out. It is not proposed to insert anything in the act that is disclaimed as beyond the jurisdiction of the court, but, in effect, to restore it as it passed the houses, and thus give effect to the clear intention of the law-makers. I can see no insuperable difficulty in declaring it null and void as to one-quarter mill, and as law to the extent of four and one-half mills.

I am of opinion that the writ of manda-mus should be granted *to enforce so much of the act as is herein declared to have the force of law, viz., the levy in the first section, to the extent of four and one-half mills; and the second section, except the provision for the Charleston military.

*74

Application refused.

---

13 S. C. 74

(Case No. 812.)

Ex parte SWEARINGEN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Extradition ⊂=24.]

Whenever the governor of a state demands of the governor of another state the body of a person as a fugitive from justice, producing at the same time a copy of indictment found or affidavit made, certified to be authentic by the demanding governor, and showing that the person demanded is charged with the commission of some crime in the state from which he has fled, it is the duty of the governor upon whom the demand is made to cause the arrest and delivery of the person demanded. Willard, C. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Massee, 95 S. C. 323, 79 S. E. 97, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 781.

For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⟸24.]

[2. Extradition ⟸24.]

It cannot be objected to such arrest and delivery that the prosecution was instituted and the affidavit made by a citizen of this state, in the state where the crime was alleged to have been committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⟸24.]

[3. Extradition ⟸32.]

The absence of an affidavit charging the prisoner to be a fugitive from justice, is not fatal to the requisition. Willard, C. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. ⟸32.]

[4. Extradition ⟸30.]

The term "flee from justice" in Article IV., Section 2, of the Constitution of the United States includes cases where a citizen of one state commits a crime in another state and then returns to his home.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. ⟸30.]

[5. Extradition ⟸36.]

Where a prisoner is in the hands of the sheriff under a mandate issued by the governor of this state in pursuance of a requisition from the governor of Georgia, and such mandate requires the delivery of the prisoner to an agent of the governor of Georgia, the prisoner will not be discharged because that the mandate contains no order for his arrest.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Moscato, 44 S. C. 337, 22 S. E. 308.

For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. ⟸36.]

Original application to this court by John C. Swearingen for discharge from custody under writ of habeas corpus. The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. W. Gary, for petitioner.

The petitioner is not a fugitive from justice. Burr. L. Dict.; 2 Carter 396; 1 Archb.

*75

Cr. Pr. & Pl. 140. There must be an *actual fleeing from justice, and of this the governor of the state of whom the demand is made, as well as of the state making it, should be satisfied. This is commonly shown by affidavit. 6 Penna. L. J. 412; 6 Am. Jur. 226; Lewis Cr. L. 266; Hurd on Hab. Corp. 606; 12 Am. L. R. 603. Has the governor of South Carolina followed the practice in such cases, or complied with act of 1793? Under the act of congress, on its provisions being complied with, the governor is required to order him to be arrested. 1 Hill 327. The representations of the executive of the demanding state are of no effect unless supported by a duly authenticated copy of the indictment found or affidavit made. The warrant is void without these, and should show on its face that they had been produced to the executive. 9 Tex. 635; 1 Archb. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 140, 141; 9 Wend. 212; 1 Sand. 701; 1 Hill 346. The paper issued by Governor Simpson was clearly not a warrant. What is a warrant and what an arrest? Burr. L. Dict. The governor being an executive officer cannot issue a warrant. 24 How. 104; 31 Vt. 299; Const. U. S., Art. XIV., § 1; Const. S. C., Art. I., § 26.

Mr. Solicitor Abney and Mr. S. Dutcher, solicitor-general of Georgia, contra.

February 14th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. In compliance with petition of the prisoner alleging that he is unlawfully detained in the custody of John C. Gaston, sheriff of Edgefield county, he was brought before this court under a writ of habeas corpus, and now claims his discharge upon various grounds, which will be hereinafter more particularly noticed. The return of the sheriff to the writ states that the petitioner is detained by virtue of a mandate from the governor of this state issued in pursuance of a requisition from the governor of Georgia demanding the petitioner as a fugitive from justice, requiring him to deliver the petitioner to one John R. Ivey, the agent of the State of Georgia, and craves reference to these papers—the requisition from the governor of Georgia and the mandate of the governor of this state—as part *of the return. The requisition shows that the petitioner stands charged with the crime of riot, committed in the State of Georgia, and that he is demanded as a fugitive from justice. A copy of an affidavit made before a magistrate in the State of Georgia, duly authenticated by the governor of that state, accompanies the requisition, in which the petitioner is charged with having committed the crime of riot in Georgia.

*76

The constitution of the United States, Article IV., Section 2, provides that, "A person charged in any state with treason, felony or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime." For several years after the adoption of the constitution of the United States there was no legislation providing the mode by which this clause of the constitution should be carried into effect, and as a natural consequence controversies arose between the states in regard to this matter, one of which, between Pennsylvania and Virginia, doubtless gave rise to the passage of the act of 1793, (Rev. Stat. U. S., § 5278 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 10126]) prescribing the mode of carrying this clause of the constitution into effect; for when the governor of Virginia declined to comply with the requisition from the governor of Pennsylvania, the latter sent all the papers to President Washington, calling especial attention to the objections of the authorities of the State of Virginia based on the necessity of future legislation upon the subject, and suggesting that the matter be brought to the attention of congress. The president referred the papers to his attorney-general, Mr. Randolph, who gave an elaborate opinion as to the proper construction of the clause of the constitution in question, from which the necessity for further legislation was apparent. The president accordingly brought the attention of congress to the matter by a message in November, 1792, and in the following February the act of 1793, above cited, was passed. That act, so far as it is necessary for the purpose of this case to state, in substance provides that whenever the executive authority of a state shall demand any person as a fugitive from justice of the executive authority of any state to which such person shall have fled, and shall produce a copy of *an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any state charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime in the state from which the demand proceeds, certified as authentic by the governor of the state from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the governor of the state to which such person has fled to cause such person to be arrested and secured and delivered to the agent of the state from which such demand proceeds. It will be observed that three things are necessary to be done by the governor of the state making the demand. 1st. He must demand the person as a fugitive from justice. 2d. He must produce a copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of a state, showing that the person demanded is charged with having committed some crime in the state from which he has fled. 3d. Such copy of the indictment, or affidavit, must be certified as authentic by the governor of the state making the demand. The only inquiry, therefore, in this case, is, whether these requirements of the act of congress have been complied with; for, if so, the governor of this state was not only authorized, but was required to issue his mandate requiring the arrest of the petitioner and his delivery to the agent of the State of Georgia. As Taney, C. J., says in Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 104 [16 L. Ed. 717]: "It will be observed that the judicial acts which are necessary to authorize the demand are plainly specified in the act of congress, and the certificate of the executive authority is made conclusive as to their verity when presented to the executive of the state where the fugitive is found. He has no right to look behind them, or to look into the character of the crime specified in this judicial proceeding."

*77

An examination of the papers referred to in the return satisfies us that all of the requirements of the act of congress have been fully complied with, and that the petitioner is not unlawfully detained in the custody of the said John T. Gaston. The requisition shows, upon its face, that the petitioner is demanded as a fugitive from justice, and the copy of the affidavit accompanying it, duly authenticated by the governor of Georgia, shows that the petitioner stands charged with the crime of riot, committed in the State of Georgia.

*78

*It only remains to consider the grounds upon which the motion for the discharge of the petitioner has been urged. The first ground taken was that the person who originated the prosecution in the State of Georgia was not a citizen of that state, and having no interest in the enforcement of the laws, and not contributing anything in the way of taxes to the expenses of courts of justice in Georgia, could not lawfully commence a prosecution there. It is quite sufficient to say that we are not at liberty to consider such a question. The authorities of the State of Georgia have undoubtedly recognized the fact that a prosecution has been lawfully commenced in that state, and it is not for us to question it. Whether the charge has been made in proper legal form, or whether it can be sustained by legal evidence, are questions which belong exclusively to the tribunals of the state where the crime is alleged to have been committed, as they alone have jurisdiction to determine whether the laws of such state have been violated. Even, however, were the point raised a matter within our jurisdiction, we are altogether unable to discover any valid reason why a citizen of South Carolina may not commence a prosecution in the State of Georgia for an offence committed within the territorial limits of that state.

The next ground taken was, that the absence of an affidavit that the petitioner was a fugitive from justice is fatal to the requisition. A sufficient answer to this is, that the act of congress which was passed for the express purposes of prescribing the steps to be taken in order to carry into effect this provision of the constitution does not require any such affidavit. And in this connection it is not unimportant to remember that this was one of the grounds upon which Mr. Attorney-General Randolph, in his opinion above referred to, regarded the requisition of the governor of Pennsylvania upon the governor of Virginia as defective, and yet, though this opinion, coming from the highest law officer of the government, was before the congress which in large measure was composed of those who participated in framing the constitution, when they passed the act of 1793, and doubtless prompted the passage of such act, yet they deliberately omitted from such act any provision requiring an affidavit that the person demanded is a fugitive from justice, for the reason, perhaps, *that in most, if not in all, cases that fact would sufficiently appear from the papers required by the act of 1793, and from the necessary course of proceedings in executing the provisions of the act. It is very true that the constitution does seem to contemplate, as one of the conditions of the right to demand, that the person demanded shall not only be charged with a crime committed in another state, but that he shall also be a fugitive from the justice of such state. But while the act of congress expressly prescribes the mode by which the fact that the person demanded is charged with crime shall be authenticated, it does not prescribe any mode by which the fact that he is a fugitive from justice shall be authenticated.

*79

If, therefore, it is necessary that such fact shall be made to appear, it certainly is not essential that it shall be proven by an affidavit certified by the governor of the state making the demand, as authentic. Indeed, the governor's authentication of such an affidavit would have no force and effect here, as that is not the mode prescribed by law for the authentication of the records and judicial proceedings of another state, and the only reason why the governor's authentication of the indictment or affidavit showing that the person demanded is charged with crime is sufficient, is that it is expressly so provided by the act of 1793. It follows, therefore, that if the fact that the person demanded is a fugitive from justice must be proven, it must be by some evidence other than that which would be furnished by an affidavit authenticated by the governor of the state making the demand. Whether evidence of such fact is necessary, and how it ought to be adduced, we do not think it necessary, in this case, to inquire, for we think it sufficiently appears from the papers before us that, prima facie at least, the petitioner is a fugitive from justice, in the sense of those terms as used in the constitution of the United States. The copy of the affidavit accompanying the requisition, which is duly authenticated in the manner prescribed by the act of congress, and which we are bound to assume as at least prima facie true, shows that the petitioner committed the offense of riot in the State of Georgia, and this is sufficient to show that he was then in that state, and his appearance here, as well as his statements in his petition, shows that he was afterwards found in this state, *and this, in our judgment, is quite sufficient to show that he is a fugitive from justice in the sense of those terms as used in the constitution, for, manifestly, those terms were intended to embrace not only a case where a party after committing a crime actually flees, in the literal sense of that term, from the state where such crime was committed, but also a case where a citizen of one state, who, within the territorial limits of another state, commits a crime, and then simply returns to his own home. The object of the constitution was to enable a state whose laws had been violated, to secure the arrest of the person charged with such violation, even though such person might be beyond the reach of the ordinary process of such state. In addition to this, while the petitioner does say, in his petition, that "he is not conscious of having committed any offence against the laws of the State of Georgia or of this state, and that he is not, and never has been, a fugitive from justice from the State of Georgia," he does not deny that he was in the State of Georgia at the time when and place where, by the affidavit, he is charged with having committed the crime of riot, and his denial that he is a fugitive from justice must be regarded as a mere denial of a legal conclusion, and not a denial of the fact that he was in the State of Georgia at the time when and the place where the crime was alleged to have been committed. It may be remarked, however, that to allow the existence of this fact to be put in issue before the courts of the state upon which the demand is made, would, in many if not most instances, draw after it the right to inquire into the merits, the very thing which the constitution and the act of congress was designed to prevent. For if a party, when in custody in this state under a warrant of extradition, could, upon an application for his discharge under a writ of habeas corpus, by his own affidavit or otherwise, raise the question as to whether he was in the state where he was alleged to have committed a crime at the time when and the place where such crime was alleged to have been committed, it is perfectly manifest that the tribunals of this state, which have no jurisdiction whatever of the offence charged, would thereby be called upon to determine the sufficiency of at least one ground of defence, that of alibi, which the party charged would be at liberty to set up, and would, to that extent, be *entering upon the trial of a case of which they confessedly have no jurisdiction.

*80

*81

It seems to us that the true rule is that when a requisition comes to the governor of this state for any person found in this state, which shows upon its face that all the requirements of the act of congress have been complied with, it is the duty of the proper authorities of this state to recognize the statements of fact made therein as true, and to surrender to the agent of the state making the demand the person demanded, in the fullest confidence that he will receive ample justice at the hands of the authorities of such state. The very fact that there is no mode of enforcing the performance of the duty imposed upon the governor of the state upon which the demand is made, by mandamus or otherwise, (Kentucky v. Dennison, supra) makes it all the more obligatory that he should be scrupulously exact and prompt in the performance of such duty, and the courts should not lend their aid to defeat the provisions of the constitution so essential to the preservation of that good will which ought always to exist between sister states, by demanding more than is required by the act of congress.

The views hereinbefore presented are, we think, amply supported by the following cases: Kingsbury's case, 106 Mass. 223; Clark's case, 9 Wend. 212; In re Voorhees, 32 N. J. 141; Johnston v. Riley, 13 Ga. 133, as well as by an elaborate article upon the subject of extradition between states, in Am. L. Rev., (Jan., 1879,) vol. XIII., p. 181.

The case of In re Jackson, decided in the United States District Court for the Western District of Michigan, and reported in Am. L. Rev., (April, 1878,) vol. XII., p. 602, seems to have been mainly relied upon by the counsel for the petitioner, and does seem at first view to maintain the proposition contended for by him. But aside from the fact that this decision is not authority which is of any binding force here, a close examination of the case will show that it does not really sustain the position of the counsel under the facts presented in the case now before the court. In that case Jackson was in the custody of the agent of the State of Massachusetts, and in his return to the writ of habeas corpus he sets up the warrant issued by the governor of *Michigan as the cause of the petitioner's detention. The objection to the warrant was that it did not state that it had been satisfactorily shown to the governor of Michigan that Jackson had fled from the State of Massachusetts or from justice, and the only question considered by the judge was whether such a statement in the warrant was sufficient proof of the fact that Jackson was a fugitive from justice. He manifestly did not have before him the evidence which we have in this case, viz., the copy of the affidavit showing that the person demanded is charged with crime, and if he had, would probably have come to the same conclusion which we have reached. For he says: "Unless it be shown that the relator was in Massachusetts at or about the time when the offence is charged to have been committed, and has since that time departed that state, there would be no just or legal ground for saying he had fled from justice in Massachusetts." Here, as we have seen, these facts do appear from the copy affidavit accompanying the requisition and from the other proceedings in the case. The judge cites and relies upon the case of Ex parte Thornton, 9 Tex. 635, but admits that the exact point now made was not raised in the case. The question in that case was as to the sufficiency of the governor's warrant, which merely recited that it had been represented by the governor of Arkansas that Thornton stands charged with the crime of forgery, but failed to state that such representation was accompanied by an authenticated copy of an indictment or affidavit charging Thornton with the crime, and so far as we can see, from the statement which is made of the case, in the opinion of the District judge, not having access to the book of reports in which the case is contained, no question whatever as to the necessity of proving that the person demanded is a fugitive from justice was raised. The case of Ex parte Smith, 3 McLean 121 [Fed. Cas. No. 12,968], is also cited and relied upon. In that case the requisition was made by the governor of Missouri on the governor of Illinois, the state in which Smith lived. From the affidavit on which the proceedings were founded it appeared that the affiant, while sitting in his house, in Missouri, was shot at, with intent to kill, and that the affiant believed that Smith was "accessory before the fact of the intended murder," but it nowhere appeared in the affidavit *that Smith had fled from or had ever been in the State of Missouri, for it might be entirely true that he was an accessory before the fact, and yet never have left his home in Missouri. The court held that it should have appeared distinctly in the affidavit that "Smith had committed a crime, and that he committed it in Missouri." This case, therefore, so far from being in conflict with, sustains the view which we have adopted. Here the affidavit does show that Swearingen committed a crime and that he committed it in Georgia.

*82

*83

Another ground taken is that even if the requisition from the governor of Georgia be, in every respect, in conformity with law, yet the mandate issued by the governor of this state was insufficient to authorize the arrest of the petitioner, inasmuch as it does not, in express terms, order the arrest of the petitioner, but only directs that he be delivered to the agent of the State of Georgia. We do not think it at all important to inquire whether the mandate was sufficient to authorize the arrest of the petitioner. The petitioner claims that he is illegally detained in the custody of the sheriff, and the only question before us is not as to the legality of his arrest, but as to the legality of his detention, and the cause shown for that is the mandate of the governor of this state, issued in pursuance of a requisition from the governor of Georgia. If that requisition is in conformity to the provisions of the act of congress, as we have already ascertained it to be, the mandate of the governor of this state to deliver the petitioner to the agent of the State of Georgia necessarily follows, and it matters not in this inquiry how the sheriff originally acquired the custody of the petitioner. Dow's case, 18 Penna. St. 37. When he is brought before us the return shows that he is now in custody by a lawful warrant for a lawful purpose.

We are unable to see any ground upon which the petitioner could claim his discharge. His motion has, therefore, been heretofore refused, and an order remanding him granted.

McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

WILLARD, C. J. I am unable to concur with the majority of the court. In my judgment, the provision of the constitution *under which the demand for the rendition of the relator is made, confers upon the state of which the demand is made authority to determine whether the conditions on which the right to demand a fugitive from justice exist. One of these conditions is, that it shall appear that the person demanded has fled from justice to the state of which the demand is made. Unless the congress of the United States have, in a competent and effective manner, prescribed otherwise, the question arising under the constitution is a judicial question. It involves the existence of a condition on which the liberty of the citizen depends, and therefore is, in its nature, judicial. No statute of this state prescribes the authority by which this fact is to be determined. There is nothing, then, to prevent the court from inquiring whether the conditions exist warranting the interference that is claimed with the liberty of the relator, unless the act of congress provides in a competent manner for the mode of ascertaining whether the person demanded is a fugitive from justice, and that fact must be established conformably to the laws of this state where it is questioned in a court of competent jurisdiction. The act of congress is entirely silent as to the proper means of establishing the fact that the person demanded has fled from justice, and, indeed, does not render it necessary that the executive of the state making the demand should affirm the existence of such fact. Under these circumstances, as it is not competent for congress to dispense with the constitutional requirement in this respect, it must be concluded that the question of the authority of the laws of the state, in ascertaining the proper mode of exercising the power conferred by the constitution, remains unaffected by the act of congress, and that such was the intention of that act.

*84

It is necessary, therefore, that the demandant state should show in some competent manner that the relator has fled from justice. As this court has a general competency by habeas corpus to inquire into the validity of any claim to deprive a citizen of his liberty, this proceeding being of that nature, it is the duty of the demandant state to establish before us the fact that the relator has fled from justice in the sense of the constitution.

I am of the opinion that this has not been done. It is the duty of the demandant state to allege the facts upon which the *right of demand depends. The requisition of the governor of Georgia does not, in my judgment, affirm in a competent manner the important jurisdictional fact that the relator has fled from justice as the constitution prescribes. The requisition merely states that it has been represented to the governor of that state that the relator has fled from justice from that state; but it is not stated that such representations are satisfactory to the governor making the demand, or that he believes such representations to be true.

*85

There is, in my judgment, an equal defect as it regards the proof demandable of the State of Georgia. The process under which it is sought to deprive the relator of his liberty is in derogation of the common law, and every fact necessary to warrant it is jurisdictional, and must be both alleged and proven. The competency of the proof must be determined by the laws of this state, where there is no conflicting rule established by competent authority displacing these laws. The only evidence on the part of the demandant state to which our attention has been called for the purpose of proving that the relator has fled from justice, is contained in the affidavit taken in Georgia before a magistrate of that state, which constitutes the charge made against the relator in the Criminal Court of Georgia, a copy of which only is before us, having been transmitted by the governor of Georgia. It is clear that a copy of an affidavit sworn in the State of Georgia before a person not competent to administer an oath, so as to make competent testimony to be used before the courts of this state, is, in itself, incompetent proof of any fact in which the liability of the citizen depends in the courts. Before testimony can subserve such a purpose, it must, except in a restricted class of cases, to which the present does not belong, be given under the sanction of an oath, carrying with it the penal consequences of false swearing. The proof in question can only be received where it is made such by competent authority. It will not be pretended that the act of congress makes the copy of the indictment or affidavit transmitted by the demandant state proof of any fact beyond that, that the relator has been charged with crime in the State of Georgia.

It certainly does make the requisition of the governor of *Georgia, when accompanied by a true copy of the indictment or affidavit constituting the charge, competent proof that such charge had been made in the state, but beyond that it does not accredit the copy affidavit with authority as proof in the courts of this state. It may be said that the affidavit in question only inferentially states that the relator was in the State of Georgia at the time when the alleged offence was committed, such inferences being based on the formal expressions that constitute the allegations of time and venue material to the certainty of the charges, and that if it was conceded that the affidavit was competent for any purpose other than that of proving the existence and nature of the charge that was made by means of it, still it lacks the certainty material to the allegation of a fact on which the claim to interfere with the liberty of a citizen depends; but as I am satisfied that the affidavit is incompetent as proof of any fact except as to the existence and nature of the charge made in Georgia, it is unnecessary to comment on this particular defect of the proof sought to be obtained from the affidavit.

*86

In my judgment it was for the demandant state to affirm and establish the fact that the relator had fled from justice, and if it be true that the relator has not traversed that fact, that circumstance is immaterial, as he was not bound to traverse it until it was alleged in a competent manner. One cannot be prejudiced by his silence except when the law compels him to speak, and the relator had a perfect right to remain silent and cast upon the demandant state the onus of showing its right to interfere with his liberty.

There are certain legal conclusions that arise from the very foundation of our ideas of judicial administration, so rooted in principle and sanctioned by a common sense of justice that even the construction of statutes and constitutions must yield to their irresistible force. It is such a conviction that leads me to the conclusions that have already been stated. Is it possible that a state would, by its judicial authority, surrender to another state one of its citizens, to be tried on a charge of crime, where it appears that the crime was of such a nature that it could not have been committed, unless the party charged with such offence was personally present in the state at the time of the alleged com*mission of the offence, and when it further appears that such citizen had never been in the state where, it is alleged, such offence was committed! Such a proposition coming from a state neglecting so important a public duty could only be regarded as an abdication of its dignity and authority, either through neglect of duty or timidity in discharging it. So it would be equally reprehensible to dispense with the sanctions of the rules of evidence that govern the administration of justice, in order to yield a mere perfunctory obedience to the requirements of the act of congress, when it is called upon, in my judgment, to perform an important judicial act, no less than that of applying to the citizen the safeguard of liberty, secured by the constitution of the United States itself.

*87

In my judgment there is not competent proof to warrant the surrender of the relator to the public authorities of the State of Georgia.

Motion refused.

---

13 S. C. 87

(Case No. 813.)

MURRAY v. EARLE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Mechanics' Liens ⟸99.]

Where a contractor undertakes to build a house and to furnish all labor, materials, &c., at his own cost, a mechanic employed by him without the owner's consent, has, for his labor, no lien on the building erected. Semble.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gray v. Walker, 16 S. C. 148; Geddes v. Bowden, 19 S. C. 8.

For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 131, 132; Dec. Dig. ⟸99.]

[2. Mechanics' Liens ⟸207.]

Where a mechanic, before commencing work upon a building in course of construction, agreed with the owner that he would look only to the contractor for his pay, he thereby waived any right which the law might otherwise have given him, to a lien upon such building.

[Ed Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 381; Dec. Dig. ⟸207.]

Before Hudson, J., Greenville, November, 1878.

Petition under mechanics' lien law, commenced by J. W. Murray against Sallie F. Earle. The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

*88

*Mr. W. L. Wait, for appellant, cited Gen. Stat., ch. CXX., § 10; Potter's Dwar. 196; 4 Gray, 289; 5 Heath 409; 5 Dutcher 415; 1 Id. 474; 2 McC. 218; Phillips on Mech. Liens 57, 58, 124; Sodini v. Winter, 32 Md. 130.

Mr. A. Blythe, for respondent, cited Gen. Stat., ch. CXX., § 47; Phillips on Mech. Liens, §§ 40–62, 117, 123, 272, 273; 18 Wall. 549, 623.

February 18th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was a proceeding to enforce a mechanics' lien which the petitioner claimed had attached upon a certain building erected for the respondent, as well as upon the lot of land on which it stood. The facts were that one W. A. Hudson, by a contract in writing, agreed with T. T. Earle, the husband of the respondent, to "erect and finish" the building in question, and "at his own cost and charges to provide all manner of materials and labor, scaffolding and implements of every description for the due performance of all the work." While the building was being erected T. T. Earle conveyed the property to the respondent, but, as her agent, continued the contract with Hudson. The work done by the petitioner, for which the lien was claimed, was done under a contract with Hudson, to which neither Earle or his wife were parties. There is no allegation in the petition that the labor performed by the petitioner was done by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of, the owner of the property upon which the lien was claimed, or by virtue of an agrement with, or by the consent of, any person having authority from, or rightfully acting for, such owner in procuring or furnishing such labor, but, on the contrary, the respondent, in her answer alleges "that the petitioner worked upon said building by virtue of his agreement with the contractor, the said W. A. Hudson, and not by virtue of any agreement or consent of this respondent, or by virtue of any agreement or consent of the said T. T. Earle, the former owner of the aforesaid lot, or by virtue of any agreement with any person rightfully acting for this respondent or the said T. T. Earle;" and these allegations *seem to be fully sustained by the evidence. Under this state of facts it may well be doubted whether the petitioner, a mere sub-contractor, could acquire a lien under the provisions of our statute upon the subject. Gen. Stat., ch. CXX., § 7, p. 550. For it will be observed, that in order to entitle a person to the lien provided for in that section, there must be not only a debt due for labor performed upon the structure upon which the lien is claimed, but it must be a debt due "by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of the owner of, such building of structure," or by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of some person "having authority from, or rightfully acting, for such owner in procuring or furnishing such labor." Hence it is difficult to understand how in this case the petitioner could establish his lien. The labor which he performed upon the building was not performed by virtue of any agreement with either the owner or her authorized agent, or by their consent. Under the written contract Hudson was bound to furnish all such labor at his own cost, and the owner had nothing whatever to do with it. But as this point does not seem to have been raised in the court below, it is perhaps better that we should not rest our decision upon this ground.

*89

It seems that before any work was done by Murray, the respondent, by her agent, gave him verbal notice that she would not be responsible for any labor he might perform upon the building, whereupon the petitioner expressly agreed, before the commencement of his work, "to look to the contractor, Hudson, for his pay, and to no other source," and this agreement the Circuit judge held "was a waiver of any right to a lien upon the building which the law might otherwise have given to the petitioner." We concur with the Circuit judge. While the statute does provide that the notice shall be in writing it is very manifest that this provision is intended for the benefit solely of the mechanic, and he may, if he chooses, waive it, just as it has been frequently held in regard to tender—that while nothing but gold and silver (and now legal tender notes, perhaps,) would be a legal tender, yet if a tender is made in bank notes it is good unless objected to at the time on account of its not being made in gold or silver, upon the ground that the party, by not *objecting at the time to the tender on account of its being made in bank notes instead of in coin, is construed to have waived his right to demand coin. So here the petitioner might have refused to receive the verbal notice and demanded one in writing, but he not only did not do so, but on the contrary, by his express agreement to look alone to Hudson for his pay, practically dispensed with the written notice. It is argued here that this agreement upon the part of the petitioner was without consideration, and therefore a nullity. We do not so regard it. It is not at all unlikely that, but for this agreement, the respondent would have given the written notice required by the statute, and if she was induced not to do so by this agreement on the part of the petitioner, that would constitute a sufficient consideration, which may be not only a benefit to the person who makes the promise, but also a loss or disadvantage to the person to whom the promise is made, as, for example, forbearance to sue. This case differs materially from the case of Sodini v. Winter, 32 Md. 130, cited and much relied upon by the appellant. In that case the conversation relied upon as a waiver of the lien took place after the materials were furnished, and therefore after the right to the lien had attached, while here the agreement which was relied upon as a waiver, was made before any work was done, and hence before any right to a lien could have attached.

*90

Under this view of the case the other suggestions by the ground of appeal cannot properly arise, and therefore need not be considered.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 90

(Case No. 815.)

McCROSKY v. PARKS.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Infants ⇐112.]

A decree not appealed from is binding upon infants properly made parties defendant thereto, although the guardian ad litem, who answered formally, *was appointed upon the motion of the complainant's solicitor. Such decree cannot be questioned in collateral proceedings.

*91

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tederall v. Bouknight, 25 S. C. 283; Robertson v. Blair & Co., 56 S. C. 106, 34 S. E. 11, 76 Am. St. Rep. 543.

For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. ⟸112.]

2. The principle decided in Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C. 308, approved.

[This case is also cited in Robertson v. Blair & Co., 56 S. C. 96, 34 S. E. 11, 76 Am. St. Rep. 543, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Fraser, J., Abbeville, April, 1879.

This was an action brought in 1877, by B. B. McCrosky and Irene C., his wife, and Flora P. McCrosky, against John T. Parks and Elizabeth C. Upton, administrators of the estate of John G. Barrett, the sureties on the administration bond, two infant children of John G. Barrett, and others. Irene C. McCrosky and F. P. McCrosky were children of the intestate. The action was for an accounting of the intestate's estate, and there was also a prayer that certain proceedings had in the Court of Equity for Abbeville district in 1868 be held no bar against the accounting here demanded. These proceedings were set up in the answers as a bar to this action: that the matters here complained of had been there adjudicated.

The equity proceedings of 1868 were as follows: Elizabeth C. Upton, widow of John G. Barrett, and administratrix upon his estate, with her husband, W. A. Upton, filed their bill of complaint against John T. Parks, a brother of Elizabeth C., and her co-administrator, offering to account themselves and demanding from Parks an accounting, and praying for a final settlement of the estate. The four children of the intestate, all infants, were made parties defendant and were served with process. A guardian ad litem was appointed for them upon the nomination of the complainants' solicitor, and such guardian put in a formal answer. The commissioner in equity, by his report, relieved E. C. Upton and also John T. Parks, of liability to account for large sums of confederate money received by them, and also for the purchase money of negro slaves bought by them at the estate sale in 1864. To this report no exceptions were taken, and in July, 1868, it was confirmed by Chancellor Carroll, and made the decree of the court. No appeal was taken.

This is a sufficient statement of the case under the view taken of it by this court.

The Circuit judge held that the decree of 1868 was binding *upon the infant parties thereto, and that the matters here brought to the attention of the court, were res adjudicata. The plaintiffs appealed upon the grounds, inter alia:

*92

1. That his Honor erred in decreeing that the infant defendants were properly made parties to the equity suit of 1868, and hence were bound by the decree of Chancellor Carroll, although the guardian ad litem, who represented them, was appointed by the solicitor of the complainants, whose interests were adverse.

2. That whether the infant defendants were properly made parties or not, they were entitled to a day after coming of age, to show cause, if any, against the decree, and that the plea of res adjudicata has no application to infants until that opportunity is given, and that his Honor erred in deciding to the contrary.

Messrs. Lee & Blake, for appellants.

To what extent judgments are conclusive is considered in 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 474; 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 528; 1 Hill Ch. 14. But it is only binding upon parties and privies. 1 Stark. on Ev. 217; 1 Bail. 242. As to its conclusiveness upon infants. 9 Rich. Eq. 324; 4 Rich. Eq. 411; 5 Id. 197; 7 Id. 43. Process is served upon an infant as upon an adult. 1 Daniell's Ch. Pr. 500. But he must appear by guardian. Ib. 205; 1 Smith Ch. Pr. 254; and see particularly 3 S. C. 308, and note the difference between that case and this in appointing a guardian. A guardian should never be appointed upon the nomination of an adverse party. 8 Pet. 128; 2 Paige 304; 2 Hoff. Ch. Pr. 173; 7 Rich. Eq. 43. In this case, the whole proceeding was perfunctory; no testimony was taken, as to the rights of the infants—two counsel represented all parties—formal answers, formal accounting, formal report and formal decree. There has been no transfer of interests, no sales; the decree can be opened without prejudice to the rights of any.

Besides: the infants are entitled to a day after coming of age to show cause against the decree. 3 Bac. Ab. 614, 615; Bing. on Inf. 115; 1 P. Wms. 736; 1 Daniell's Ch. Pl. & Pr. 311; 2 Kent 245; 3 Johns. Ch. 368; 3 M. & K. 409; 1 Desaus. 109, 125, 201; 3 Id. 18; 4 Id. 86. The infant is not bound to wait until he comes of age, but may apply for that purpose as soon as *he thinks fit, and may do this by bill of review, rehearing, or by original bill, alleging specially the errors in the former decree. 1 P. Wms. 736; 3 Bac. Ab. 614; 1 Daniell's Ch. Pr. & Pl. 211. The procedure in this case has been by original bill.

*93

Mr. S. McGowan and Mr. E. G. Graydon, contra.

February 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. We are entirely satisfied with the conclusions of the Circuit judge. The question of the binding efficacy of a decree to which infants are parties, is substantially disposed of by Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C.

308. The effort in that case was to get rid of a decree or final order upon a petition for the sale of infants' estate, upon grounds including the objection that the infants were not properly made parties. The foundation of the argument on which the judgment of the court in that case rested, was this proposition —that when infants are properly made parties to a bill in equity, they are bound by a decree made upon such bill, and cannot impeach it, collaterally or otherwise, than by a direct appeal therefrom. The same rule was there applied to cases coming into the Court of Chancery by a petition for the sale of an infant's estate. It is clear that if a decree against infants in a suit to which they are duly made parties binds them to the extent of divesting them of their title to real estate, it will bind them in all other respects in the same manner as it would bind adult parties.

The argument of the appellants merely amounts to an objection to the decree by which it is held that they are bound on the ground of error and irregularity. Such objections to the decree can only be taken upon appeal therefrom, and cannot be heard in a proceeding merely collateral thereto, such as is the present suit.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *94

*(Case No. 817.)

DUNCAN & SHUMATE v. HELLER.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Guaranty ⟸7.]

A written offer to guarantee the debt of another in consideration of forbearance to the principal debtor, is not a complete contract, nor binding upon the writer until notice of acceptance is given to him, even though forbearance is afterwards granted. Thomas v. Croft, 1 Strob. 40.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⟸7.]

[2. Guaranty ⟸7.]

Notice of acceptance by the creditor to the debtor, who delivers the letter of guaranty, is not notice to the guarantor, there being no proof of agency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⟸7.]

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, July, 1879.

The case is stated in the opinion of the court. One of the plaintiffs testified that Elizabeth Heller brought the letter to him from her brother at a time when witness was about to foreclose his mortgage; that he told her he would accept the proposition and grant the time asked for, which he did; that in consequence of this letter he forbore to foreclose his mortgage, and that the indulgence would not have been granted but for this letter; that in consequence of the subsequent depreciation of real estate he had lost his debt.

Verdict was for plaintiffs. Defendant, J. B. Heller, appealed.

Mr. A. C. Garlington, for appellant, relied upon Pars. on Cont. 448–450; 1 Chitty on Cont. 15, 16; Thomas v. Croft, 1 Strob. 40.

Mr. W. E. Earle, contra.

The letter is a clear undertaking to pay the debt. Chitty on Cont. 86. The intention is clear, and that is sufficient. 2 Pars. on Cont. 5; 2 S. C. 414. If any ambiguity, the construction must be most strongly against maker. Chitty on Cont. 98; 8 Port. 497; 5 Rep. 7, b; Plowd. 287; 19 Vt. 202; 3 B. & P. 399; 9 East 15; 6 Bing. 244; 3 M. & P. 136. The letter is to be understood as the other party had a right to understand it. 11 Vt. 493; 31 N. Y. 294. In the construction of an instru*ment there is no difference between guarantor and principal. 13 N. Y. 232. Whether the plaintiffs accepted was left to the jury, and their verdict is final. Acceptance is necessary, but notice is not, where a debt already existing is secured and notice is not asked for. 2 Pars. on Cont. 14; 24 Wend. 35; 6 Hill (N. Y.) 543. But notice was given to the debtor, who, by bearing the letter to the plaintiffs, became her brother's agent. As to what constitutes a guaranty, and as to acceptance and notice, see 2 S. C. 414; 1 Strob. 40.

*95

February 21st, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The plaintiffs by this action sought to charge the appellant, J. B. Heller, as guarantor, by virtue of a letter of which the following is a copy:

"Newberry, S. C., February 9th, 1877.

"Shumate & Duncan—Gentlemen: My sister, Elizabeth Heller, informs me that she is due you some one hundred dollars, for which you have a mortgage on her land, and she fears that you intend to push the matter. She has been down to see me to get help, and I am sorry to say that at the present time I am not able to help her, but if you will wait with her until next fall I will try and take up the mortgage. Hoping that you will consent to wait until fall, I remain yours respectfully. J. B. Heller."

There was no evidence that J. B. Heller had ever been notified by the plaintiffs of their acceptance of his offer to guarantee the payment of the note of Elizabeth Heller, if indeed the terms of the letter be regarded as sufficient to amount to such an offer. This we think was fatal to the plaintiffs' case. While there may be a contrariety of decisions as to the necessity for notice of acceptance of a guaranty, we think the rule adopted by Parsons in his work on Contracts, vol. II., p. 14, is the correct one, viz., that every guarantor is entitled to notice of the acceptance of his guaranty, unless the transaction is such that of itself it gives him the requisite notice.

*96

Here, putting a construction *upon the terms of the letter most favorable to the plaintiffs' case, it is very obvious that it was not an absolute and complete guaranty, but only an offer to guarantee upon condition that the plaintiffs would wait with the principal debtor until the fall. Until that offer was accepted the contract was not complete and the defendant incurred no liability. The fact that forbearance was in fact exercised cannot alter the case. The forbearance which alone could constitute the consideration of the contract upon which the appellant was sued, would not constitute such consideration unless the plaintiffs bound themselves at the time the letter was received to extend such forbearance, even though they may have in fact afterward granted such indulgence. Thomas v. Croft, 1 Strob. 40.

It is argued here that even if notice to the appellant that his offer to guarantee would be accepted, was necessary, that such notice was in fact given to the appellant through his agent, Elizabeth Heller. A sufficient answer to this is that there is no evidence whatever that she was the agent of the appellant. The mere fact that she carried the letter to the plaintiffs cannot be sufficient to make her the agent of the appellant, for if so, in most if not all cases the rule which requires notice of the acceptance of the guaranty would be evaded, as the principal debtor ordinarily delivers the letter of guaranty to the person to whom it is addressed, and he of course knows whether the guaranty is accepted and acted upon. If, therefore, the mere fact that he carries the letter is sufficient to constitute him the agent of the guarantor, so that his knowledge will be imputed to the guarantor also, then the rule which requires notice to the guarantor, and which is solely for his benefit, so as to enable him to take such steps as he may deem necessary to indemnify himself against the risk which he has assumed, becomes practically nugatory.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial is ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *97

*(Case No. 818.)

MILLS v. G. & C. R. R. COMPANY.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Waters and Water Courses ⇐=171.]

The breaking of a culvert under the embankment of defendant's road, in a freshet, having caused an accumulation of water, which, the embankment being opened, overflowed plaintiff's land to his damage, the Circuit judge charged the jury that if the servants of the defendant let off the water, the defendant was liable for the actual damage therefrom ensuing to the plaintiff, no matter how much care and caution they exercised. Held erroneous, and that the defendant was not liable unless guilty of negligence in setting free the accumulated water.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Henry v. Southern Ry., 93 S. C. 130, 75 S. E. 1018.

For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 216; Dec. Dig. ⇐=171.]

[This case is also cited in Patton v. McCants, 29 S. C. 597, 6 S. E. 848, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Mackey, J., Greenville, April, 1878.

Action by Otis T. Mills against the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company for damage done to his crops of corn, &c., in June, 1876. Action commenced October, 1876.

Brushy creek, near the city of Greenville, passed through a culvert under an embankment, over which the track of the defendant company passed. During a freshet in the month of June, 1876, the culvert fell in, and the flow of the stream being thereby obstructed, the water accumulated in large quantities up the channel of the creek and on the lands adjacent, and covered a highway. Several days afterwards the road-master, with his employés, cut an opening in the embankment, through which the water passed off, slowly at first, but with increasing volume as the opening was enlarged by the action of the waters, when it flowed with the force of a freshet; and damage was thereby done to the lands of the plaintiff below. It was for such damage that this action was brought. The testimony showed that the freshet which broke the culvert was extraordinary.

The presiding judge ruled, during the examination of a witness, that "it makes no difference how the company let the water off; whether the greatest possible care was exercised. If the company let the water off and it flowed upon plaintiff's lands and damaged the same, the company is liable." And he charged the jury that if the company's agents let off the water and damage *ensued to the plaintiff's land, the defendant is liable for the actual damage sustained, no matter how much care and caution they exercised. To this ruling and charge the defendant excepted.

*98

Verdict for plaintiff for $375. The defendant appealed, alleging error in the ruling and charge, to which exceptions were taken.

Mr. I. M. Bryan, for appellant.

The company, by its charter, had the right to construct the dam or embankment, bound only to the exercise of ordinary care that it should not injure others, but not liable for injuries arising from extraordinary causes. The testimony shows that the culvert was amply sufficient for even more than ordinary storms. 8 Bush 404; 27 L. J. Exch. 417; 12 Me. 238; 56 Penna. St. 445; Angell on Water-courses, § 348; Sherm. & Redf. on Neg., §§ 445–576. These authorities show that the company were not responsible for the presence or accumulation of the large body of water above their embankment, and that the same came about by the operation of the vis major. Finding the water there after the storm was over, what was the defendant's duty in the premises? They were common carriers and bearers of the mail; the water was backed over a public highway leading into the city of Greenville, and covered the lands of third parties. It was their duty to let this water off, exercising as much care and caution as possible; if carelessly done, the defendants were liable; otherwise, not. Had the floods carried away the embankment and injured the plaintiff's lands, the company would clearly not be liable. This case should be distinguished from the class of which Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R., 1 Exch. 265, and 3 H. L. 330, is a leading authority. But in our case the defendants did not turn loose a dangerous element which had been introduced by themselves upon the premises; the rule in our case is ex damno sine injuria non oritur actio. 2 W. Bl. 898; 8 B. & C. 360; 16 Ark. 308; Hill & Den. 193; 8 Wis. 255; 1 Add. on Torts 3. Again: Necessitas inducit privilegium quoad juria privata. In such cases the owner is liable only in the absence of ordinary care. 5 Vt. 371; 10 Allen 306; Angell on Water-courses, § 337.

*99

*No counsel appeared for respondent.

February 25th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The action was for damages to the plaintiff's land by water flowing in a natural water-course, but in unusual quantities, due, as alleged, to the following facts: The water-course in question had become choked up at a point above the plaintiff's land, where it passes the embankment for the defendant's railroad, by a culvert, and an extraordinary accumulation of water had been occasioned. The defendant's servants made an opening by which the water thus accumulated should flow into the water-course below the obstruction, and thus flow along its natural channel. The flow of water thus caused was alleged to have occasioned the damage complained of.

The charge of the Circuit judge dispensed with the necessity of a finding of negligence on the part of the defendants and placed the plaintiff's right of recovery on two facts, namely, that it should appear that the defendant's servants discharged the accumulated water into the water-course, and that such water caused the damage in question.

The cause of the damage was water in a natural water-course moving in obedience to its own laws; it was not, therefore, a case of actual trespass. The question, then, was whether the damage was consequential to an unlawful act of the defendants or their servants acting under their authority. It is the concurrence of damage and injury that constitutes the only ground of defendant's liability. The plaintiff could not sustain injury unless the act of the defendants, either in its nature or the mode of its performance, was unlawful. Removing an obstruction to the flow of water in a natural water-course, on the defendant's land, is in itself a lawful act, and as such no ground for alleging injury. When a lawful act is performed, which, in its nature, is liable to occasion injury to the person or property of another, the law charges the party performing such act with the duty of exercising care and skill in its performance. The neglect of this duty is legal negligence, and it is in a legal sense the proximate cause of any damage directly resulting from it, although such *damage is immediately occasioned by the operation of natural laws.

*100

The question for the jury was, then, whether the defendants were guilty of negligence in the mode in which the accumulated water was set free in the water-course. It was error to place the liability of the defendants on grounds that rendered it unnecessary for the jury to inquire as to the existence of such negligence.

There must be a new trial.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s concurred.

---

13 S. C. 100

(Case No. 819.)

STROMAN v. O'CAIN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇐46.]

Where A receives money from B under written promise to apply it to a debt due by B to a third person, and fails so to apply it, a cause of action for its recovery accrues to B against A within a reasonable time thereafter; and the pleadings and the referee having here fixed twelve months as such reasonable time, the statute of limitations commenced to run in A's favor at the expiration of the twelve months.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 242; Dec. Dig. ⇐46.]

[2. Limitation of Actions ⇐102.]

This is not one of those technical trusts to which the statute of limitations does not apply.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Boyd v. Munro, 32 S. C. 253, 10 S. E. 963.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 494–505; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

[3. Limitation of Actions ⇐66.]

In such case no demand is necessary. Cases considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 361; Dec. Dig. ⇐66.]

[This case is also cited in Strong v. Weir, 47 S. C. 322, 25 S. E. 157, without specific application.]

Before Kershaw, J., Orangeburg, October, 1878.

This was an action for the recovery of money commenced September 12th, 1874, by Joshua G. W. Stroman against W. A. O'Cain and others, administrators of J. H. O'Cain, and A. B. Smith. By consent it was referred to a referee in connection with a creditor's suit. The complaint alleged as its cause of action the following instrument of writing:

"November 25th, 1868.

"Received of Mr. J. G. W. Stroman the full sum of four *hundred dollars as his agents, to be kept in our possession, he losing the interest, for the purpose of paying a certain claim in the sheriff's office against him as surety for P. C. Stroman to E. V. Snell, now to est. of S. G. Fair.

*101

(Signed) "J. H. O'Cain.
"A. B. Smith."

The complaint alleged that twelve months was a reasonable time for the execution of said trust, but that the money had never been paid over, and demanded judgment for $400, with interest from November 25th, 1869. The administrators of J. H. O'Cain put in a general denial. A. B. Smith, by answer, alleged that the money had all been received by J. H. O'Cain, admitted that twelve months was a reasonable time for the execution of the trust, and plead the statute of limitations as a bar to the action.

C. B. Glover, Esq., the referee, found the facts to be as stated in the complaint, that twelve months was a reasonable time within which to execute the trust, and that the statute of limitations was a bar to the action against Smith.

The plaintiff excepted to the referee's conclusion of law as to the statute of limitations. The Circuit judge sustained the exception, and ordered judgment against the defendant, Smith.

The defendant, Smith, appealed to this court upon the grounds: (1.) Because the facts, as found by the referee, to which there was no exception by the plaintiff, do not establish any liability on the part of the defendant, Smith. (2.) Because the statute of limitations was a bar to the recovery of the plaintiff.

Mr. M. Glover, for appellant.

(Upon the plea of the statute of limitations, his argument was as follows:)

The plea of the statute is a bar to the recovery. This is a legal demand, and the statute commenced to run when plaintiff might sue. The complaint says twelve months was a reasonable time, the answer admits it, and the referee finds it; there was then a breach of duty, and plaintiff could sue. He recognizes it by demanding interest from November 25th, 1869. 7 Johns. *Ch. 111; 2 Rich. 133; Angell on Lim., § 178; 2 Chitty on Cont. 1062; 4 Pet. 172; 66 Penna. St. 192; Cheves 22.

*102

No demand was necessary. 2 Chitty on Cont. 1071; 7 Pick. 214; 9 S. & R. 11; 24 Wend. 203. If demand is necessary, none has been proven and action is premature.

Mr. S. Dibble, contra, contended that there was no cause of action until demand made, but that the writ was a sufficient demand; and cited 1 Hill Ch. 67; 2 Bail. 51; 1 Taunt. 572; 1 N. & McC. 214; 2 McC. 246; 7 Johns. Ch. 111; Perry on Trusts, § 863.

February 25th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The only question in this case is whether the statute of limitations is a bar to the action as against the appellant, Smith, he alone having interposed the plea of the statute.

To determine this question it is only necessary to ascertain when the cause of action accrued. If, by the terms of the obligation, the money received from the plaintiff was to have been paid over on a certain specified day, there can be but little doubt that a failure to pay the money on that day would have forthwith subjected the defendants to an action, and nothing more would have been necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover than to prove the agreement to pay on that day and the failure so to do. Here no specific time was fixed for paying the money, and in such case it is conceded that the law prescribes that it shall be done within a reasonable time. Twelve months has been ascertained to be such reasonable time by the referee, and no exception has been taken to his finding. Indeed, the plaintiff in his complaint alleges that twelve months was a reasonable time for the performance of the obligation, evidenced by the receipt, and demands interest after the expiration of that time. The case, then, may be regarded as practically an action on a contract by which the defendants obligated themselves to pay the amount named on November 25th, 1869, twelve months after the date of the obligation, toward the purpose specified in the receipt. It must be manifest that upon such a contract a cause of action *would immediately accrue upon a failure to pay on that day, and therefore the statute would then commence to run.

*103

It is very obvious that this is not one of those technical trusts to which the statute does not apply, but that it is a specific agreement to do a certain thing at a certain time; for, as we have seen, though the time is not expressly designated in the contract sued upon, yet the law has ascertained the time, and when so ascertained it is as if it were so expressly stated in the contract. As is said in Estes v. Stokes, 2 Rich. 133: "Every man who receives money to be paid to another or to be applied to a particular purpose is, to some extent, a trustee; but when he fails to perform his undertaking an action will immediately lie, and from that time the statute will commence to run." And as it is said in Lever v. Lever, 1 Hill Eq. 62, the very fact that an action at law will lie shows that it is not one of those technical, express, continuing trusts to which the statute of limitations does not apply.

It is argued, however, that until a demand has been made no cause of action would accrue, and several cases have been cited by respondent to sustain this proposition, which will be hereinafter considered. This may be true in the case of a sheriff or other public officer, or a factor, or a general agent who collects or receives money under a contract, either express or implied, to hold the same subject to the order of the person for whom it is collected or received. Hence, until such order is given or demand is made for it, the officer, factor or agent holds the money for the person to whom it belongs and there is no breach of duty and consequently no cause of action for such breach until there is a failure to comply with the demand. But when one person receives money from another under an agreement to apply the same to a specified purpose at a specified time, a failure to comply with the terms of such agreement is a breach of contract for which an action will immediately lie, and there is no more necessity for a demand than there would be in a case where one person agrees to pay another a sum of money, or to do any other act, at a certain time, and fails so to do.

The cases relied upon by the respondent will next be considered. Wright v. Hamilton, 2 Bail. 51 [21 Am. Dec. 513], was an action against the sheriff for money collected by him as such for the plaintiff, and the *court said: "By the exigency of the writ he was bound to have the money before the court, at its return, to render to the plaintiff. Now if the plaintiff was not there to demand or receive it, he could not maintain an action, for no wrong had been done him. * * * It was not the duty of the sheriff to pursue the party entitled wheresoever he might be." Hence, until the money was demanded of the sheriff and payment refused, there was no breach of duty on his part and no cause of action could accrue against him. The case of Treasurers v. Moore, 1 N. & McC. 214, was likewise an action for money collected by a sheriff, in which the court said "there can be no violation of the obligation of a sheriff to pay over money collected by him until it is withheld and until it is demanded of him. The evidence of that fact is wanting, for it certainly is not the duty of a sheriff to traverse the world in pursuit of an individual whose money he may have collected." The question in both of these cases was as to the time when interest would commence to run on money collected by a sheriff under process of the law, and it was held that interest would not commence to run until demand and refusal—manifestly for the reason that the sheriff's duty only required him to collect and safely keep the money, subject to the order of the person for whom it may be collected, and of course, therefore, until such order is given or demand made, there could be no breach of duty on the part of the sheriff and no cause of action against him.

*104

The case of Topham v. Bradick, 1 Taunt. 572, was a case where the plaintiff had consigned goods to a firm to be sold and disposed of on his account. It was held that the statute of limitations would not commence to run until demand and refusal to pay, for the very good reason that until such demand there could have been no breach of duty on the part of the defendants, for until then their only duty was safely to keep the plaintiff's money ready to be accounted for, whenever called upon to do so. Lever v. Lever, 1 Hill Eq. 62, is also cited by the respondent, but in that case the evidence showed a continuing agency or trust, by which the father was to have the management and control of his son's entire estate, to transact all of his business and provide for him generally, upon the ground of the son's mental weakness *and want of education. The bill was for an accounting, brought by the son against the executor of the father, to which the plea of the statute was interposed. The court held that the statute would not commence to run until demand, because until there was a refusal by the father to comply with some demand of the son, there was no cause of action, as by the very terms of the arrangement the father was to retain the possession and control of the son's property and income and apply it to the uses of the son. Hence there could be no cause of action, and the statute could not commence to run until there was a failure to comply with these terms. It will thus be seen that the difference between these cases and the one now under consideration is, that in these cases there was no duty or obligation to pay until called upon, while in the case now before us there was both a duty and obligation to pay on a day certain.

*105

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial is ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. 105

(Case No. 820.)

MITCHELL v. NELSON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Landlord and Tenant ⟸152.]

The owner of a rice plantation rented it in December for the ensuing year, under a written agreement that $1000, to be advanced in equal parts by himself and his tenant, should be expended in improving the place, so as to enable the tenant to make a crop, the amount advanced by the tenant to be a credit on the rent until such $1000 had been expended in repairs, if so much were necessary; and that if such amount should be insufficient to make such repairs thorough, the owner would advance something more, so as to render the repairs complete; and the tenant agreed to return the plantation in good order at the end of the year. In April an unusually high tide broke the river banks and flooded a portion of the plantation, and the mending of this break was necessary to the making of the crop, and also to the preservation of the plantation, and required a large expenditure of money. Held, that under their agreement the owner was liable for this expenditure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 540; Dec. Dig. ⟸152.]

*106

*Before Fraser, J., Charleston, July, 1879.

Action by Charles T. Mitchell against Peter Nelson and William F. Colcock, Jr., commenced in January, 1879. The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

This case was heard by me, by consent of counsel, in open court, without a jury, at the term of the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county, ending July 11th, 1879.

On December 28th, 1877, the plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement, in writing in reference to the rent of a certain plantation on Cooper river, in Charleston county, known as "Buck Hall," for the year 1878, which is as follows, to wit:

"State of South Carolina.—Memorandum of an agreement made and concluded between C. T. Mitchell, of the first part, and Messrs. Nelson & Colcock, of the second part, this 28th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1877, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part does hereby agree to hire to the party of the second part, all that plantation called 'Buck Hall,' on the east side 'of the western branch of Cooper river,' containing about 175 acres, more or less, of rice land, with all the high lands attached, until 1st January, 1879, for the sum of one thousand dollars; said party of the second part agrees to cultivate the place with rice, on their own account and risk, and for their benefit. The party of the first part agrees to allow the party of the second part to appropriate the amount, say one thousand dollars, in improving the trunks and banks on said place, provided so much be necessary, to enable the party of the second part to make a crop. The party of the second part agrees to advance one-half of the amount, say five hundred dollars ($500), in equal amounts with the party of the first part, until the sum of one thousand dollars ($1000) has been expended in making the repairs aforementioned, provided so much be necessary; and the party of the first part further agrees that should one thousand dollars ($1000) prove insufficient to make the repairs aforesaid thorough, he will advance something more, on being advised, so far as to render the repairs complete, and to furnish a flat, at his own expense, to enable the party of the first *part to do the work of repairs. The party of the second part agree to pay the balance of rent, say five hundred dollars ($500), on the 1st January, 1879, and to return the plantation to the owner, on said day in good order.

*107

(Signed) "C. T. Mitchell.
(Signed) "Nelson & Colcock.

"Witness:
(Signed) "S. W. Fisher.
(Signed) "John B. Milliken."

It seemed to be conceded that the word "first" on the sixth line (the last line on page 106,) from the bottom of this agreement, should have been written "second." That defendants entered into possession of said plantation and proceeded to repair and plant rice on the same. Up to the time of the high tide in April, 1879, defendants had expended $752.55 in repairs, according to the contract, of which plaintiff furnished $500 and defendant the balance, and defendants afterwards expended a sufficient sum to make the whole amount ($937.72). During the month of April sixty-eight acres were planted in rice, and the rice made on it was, at the proper time, gathered by defendants. At the high tide in April occurred a break in the dam, out of which this controversy has arisen. By this break one hundred acres of the land were overflowed, and when this break was repaired it was too late to plant this portion of the land. This break was not caused by any defect of the trunks or ordinary leak in the dam itself, or by its being cut away by water running over it, but I infer from the testimony that it was caused by the heavy pressure of water at an unusually high tide, which caused the foundation of the dam to give way; that there were no indications beforehand which pointed to any special danger to this point of the dam, or which showed that any repairs were necessary for it; that very soon after the break, April 22d, 1878, defendants notified plaintiff of the condition of affairs, and requested an advance of money to make the repairs. This request was refused, except on condition that defendants would give security for the return of the money, and thus do the work at the expense of defendants. That this condition being declined, *the plaintiff proceeded at his own expense to repair the dam, expending thereon at this break about $3000.

*108

This break in the dam was not such as is most common, but was caused by a state of things to which prudent rice planters on Cooper river look when making their estimate of their prospect of success as planters. It is to recover this amount thus expended that this action is brought, on the ground that defendants, Nelson & Colcock, agreed to return the plantation to the owner on January 1st, 1879, in "good order." The demand for judgment is for the amounts thus expended, and it is admitted that the bill of particulars contains only about $3000, which is claimed, the other items being expenditures for other purposes.

If this were an ordinary contract to rent the plantation to the defendants for one year, without any further covenants on the part of plaintiff, I would hold that the agreement to turn over in "good order," carried with it an obligation to do everything necessary to enable the tenant so to "turn over" in "good order." I would also hold that the cause of disaster in this case is not such as would exempt the defendants from their liability on such a contract to repair. The contract in this case, however, contains other covenants on the part of plaintiff, and the liability of defendants depends upon the performance by plaintiff of his part of the contract. What are those covenants on part of plaintiff? An examination of the contract shows that the plaintiff agreed to allow the defendants "to appropriate $1000 in improving the trunks and banks," if so much be necessary, to enable the defendants "to make a crop," and if $1000 "prove insufficient to make the repairs aforesaid thorough, he will advance something more on being advised, so as to render the repairs complete." The amount which plaintiff agreed to advance was $500, the defendants were to advance $500 out of the rent for the year, and then the plaintiff agreed to advance "something more" for this purpose—a very indefinite sum, certainly. It is unreasonable to hold that the defendants were bound to provide against such disasters as this break in the dam in April, 1878, by their agreement to turn over in "good order," and that plaintiff was not bound to provide against the same disaster by his agreement to furnish the means to put the plantation in *proper repair "to enable defendants to make a crop." In point of fact the plantation was never in such order, and the fact was shown by the condition of things when one hundred acres were rendered unfit for cultivation in 1878, and the plaintiff's agreement covered the period not only of planting, but making the crop, not until April, but until October or November. If the break had occurred after this period when the crops had been gathered, the condition of the parties would have been changed, and defendants might then have been liable under their agreement "to turn over" in good order, "to pay for repairs."

*109

It was the duty of defendants, after they had information of the break, or if there had been any danger apparent, to advise the plaintiff, so that he could furnish the money according to his contract, and defendants have done their duty in this respect. It seems clear that the advisement of plaintiff, as to the necessity of furnishing something more, was to depend on information gained by experience after the expenditure of $1000.

The answer seems to admit, in one of its clauses, that the plantation was "put in order for the making of a crop," but there is no admission that the repairs were so "thorough" and "complete" as is contemplated by the written agreement, as shown by other averments in the answer. This is a case in which the parties in this court stand upon their covenants, and in the view taken by the court of this agreement, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover on the contract to "turn over" the plantation in "good order" the amount expended by him in repairs, and the complaint is dismissed with costs.

The plaintiff appealed upon the grounds—

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that, under the covenants in the lease, the plaintiff was bound to make the repairs.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding that the defendants were not bound to make the rapairs.

3. Because, by the common law, and by their covenants in the lease, the defendants were bound to keep the premises in repair, and to return the plantation to the owner in good order; and, having failed to make the repairs needed, they were liable to re*imburse the plaintiff for the moneys expended by him in that behalf, and his Honor should have so decided.

*110

4. Because his Honor erred, through misapprehension, in stating that it was admitted that only $3000 were expended by plaintiff on the repairs in question, a larger sum having been so laid out.

5. Because the decree is contrary to law.

Mr. W. H. Brawley, for appellant.

Mr. T. G. Barker, for respondents.

The defendants were not bound, by common law, to mend this break, at an expenditure three times their rent. It was the act of God or inevitable accident, and not voluntary or permissive waste. 4 Kent 77; Smith's Land. & Ten. 195, 248; Add. on Torts, §§ 319, 321; 10 B. & C. 312; 4 Otto 68; Broom's Leg. Max. 50, 69. The stern measure of responsibility established in 1 Dyer 10, because of the lessee's express covenant, has been extended in the interest of landlords in some cases, loosely, to cases of agreements, not so solemn in the eye of the old common law as a covenant by deed indented, and in some of the United States it has been held that wherever, by express contract, the tenant has bound himself to repair, and does not take care to stipulate against the act of God, he will be held bound to rebuild in case of destruction of the premises by fire or tempest. But it has not been so held in South Carolina, and the leaning of the courts has been the other way. 4 McC. 447. The plaintiff relies on our agreement to return in good order. But this is only implied, and the authorities above cited show that a liability to rebuild can only arise from express covenant to repair. We say further, that we did return in good order, as these words only mean a covenant against voluntary waste. 4 Otto 68. If such construction were tenable, it is dependent upon plaintiffs' previous covenants to repair. Taylor's Land. & Ten., § 360; 69 E. C. L. R. 916.

Mr. Brawley, in reply.

It is clear that the repairs were to be made by the lessee. As the repairs necessary for planting were to be judged of and made *by the lessees, and as the lessor has not failed in any part of his covenant to furnish the money to repair "when advised," the defendants cannot escape from their express covenant to "return in good order." 3 Ves., J. 38, note 2; 16 M. & W. 541; 16 Mass. 238. They were to repair, and the lessor was to pay a certain sum and "something more," which was not called for and could not mean three times the sum fixed. The rule is that "if the lessee covenant to repair and restore the premises or to surrender them in good condition or in terms to that effect, he will be bound to make good his covenant and rebuild the premises if destroyed, and in the meantime to pay his rent, though the loss may have happened without his fault." 1 Washb. on Real Prop. 441, 446; Story's Eq. Jur., § 101; Taylor's Land. & Ten., §§ 357, 364. According to the testimony, the usage is for the tenant to repair. 2 Phil. Ev. 787, 796; 9 Wheat. 582; 2 Parsons on Cont. 536-539. The lessor has performed his covenant; the lessees have failed to perform theirs, for they are bound to make all repairs necessary during their term. 4 Cush. 385. Such breaks were ordinary incidents, and therefore not the act of God. If they were of rare occurrence, they should have been stipulated against, and not having been, the lessees are bound by their contract to return in good order. Story's Eq. Jur., § 101; Dyer 33 a; 2 Saund. 422, note; 6 T. R. 650, 750; Arden v. Pullen, 10 M. & W.; 2 N. Y. 86; 4 McC. 431; 2 Parsons on Cont. 672.

*111

February 25th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The appeal in this case brings up only the rulings of the Circuit judge as to matters of law. The whole case turns on the question of the construction of a lease of lands for rice planting. If by the construction of the lease the lessee was only bound to advance a certain sum in making repairs, from whatever cause the necessity for such repairs might arise, whether before the commencement of the lease or during its continuance, then the Circuit judge properly held that the plaintiff could not recover. The agreement is set forth in the opinion of the Circuit judge, and the conclusion of fact there stated must *be regarded as conclusive on the present appeal, where not affected by errors which we are called upon by the appeal to consider. Plaintiff claims to have expended on the leased premises, during the term of the lease, a large sum of money, and demands that such expenditure be repaid by defendants. Such a demand, to be sustained, must have a foundation in the contract of the parties. No agreement affecting the subject, made subsequent to the lease, has been established, so the demand must be determined by the terms of the lease itself.

*112

The question arises, then, was the lessee, by the terms of the lease, bound to advance more than $500 in repairs, from whatever cause the necessity for such repairs might arise? It is not contended that the necessity for such repairs arose from any misconduct on the part of the defendants. The lease contains a covenant to return the plantation in good order. It will not be necessary to consider what would have been the right of the parties if they had been wholly dependent on the covenant to return in good order. The lease contains a specific agreement as to repairs, and the duties imposed by such specific agreement must be considered in construing the covenant to return in good order. If, then, it should appear that the duty of the lessee to repair is limited in a particular manner by the special agreement, the general covenant must be sustained to that limit, otherwise the agreement could not stand together as a whole, but would be inconsistent with itself.

The part of the lease important to the question is as follows: "The party of the first part agrees to allow the party of the second part to appropriate the amount, say $1000, in improving the branches and banks on said place, provided so much be necessary to enable the party of the second part to make a crop. The party of the second part agrees to advance one-half of the amount ($500) in equal amount with the party of the first part until the sum of one thousand dollars ($1000) has been expended in making the repairs aforementioned, provided so much be necessary; and the party of the first part further agrees, that should one thousand dollars ($1000) prove insufficient to make the repairs aforesaid thorough, he will advance something more, on being advised, so far as to render the repairs complete, and to *furnish a flat at his own expense to enable the party of the first part to do the work of repairs. The party of the second part agrees to pay the balance of the rent on the 1st day of January, 1879, and to return the plantation to the owner on said day in good repair."

*113

According to this agreement a sum of $1000 was to be made up to make the repairs, the plaintiff contributing to that sum $500 and the defendants a like sum. The advance made by the defendants was to be credited on account of the annual rent of $1000, and the balance on the rent was to be paid by the defendants at the expiration of the lease. The defendants nowhere covenant expressly that they will make the whole repairs that might be necessary independent of the sufficiency of the sum supplied under the contract for that purpose, and their agreement in that respect cannot be extended by implication, because such implication would conflict with the agreement of the plaintiff to extend the amount of $1000 to an indefinite amount beyond that sum. For this purpose it is unimportant to inquire whether the contract contemplates merely a small advance or such as circumstances might render necessary, for in either case the idea that further improvements should call for further advances, whether large or small, on the part of the plaintiff, and for no such advance on the part of the defendants, is in irreconcilable conflict with an implication that the defendant was bound to indefinite repairs. This conclusion is aided by the circumstances that the agreement, considered at large, recognizes the duty of repair as resting on the plaintiff, and only demands of the defendants an advance payment of rent. It follows, then, that if the class of repairs upon which the plaintiff claims to have expended the money demanded of the defendants, are embraced in those repairs that are the subject of the special agreement, then the limit of the duty of repair imposed by the lease on the defendants was to the expenditure of such sums as should be supplied by the plaintiff for that purpose, including the limited advance to be made by themselves.

The agreement speaks, in one place, of the subject of the special expenditure as "improvements," and in another place as *"repairs," so that it must be concluded that all needed improvements and repairs were intended to be provided for. The improvements and repairs to be made are not confined by any expression whatever to cases where the necessity of the cause existed at the date of the lease. It is not competent to insert such a limitation in the language on the ground afforded by the evidence in the case, that a large amount of repairs were called for at the date of the lease, as that would be making a contract for the parties rather than interpreting the contract made by themselves. The object of such improvements and repairs is stated, namely, "to enable the party of the second part to make a crop." To make a crop is to plant, cultivate and harvest it, and we must understand the contract to use it in that sense. It is competent to look to the object of an agreement to define and limit the means proper for attaining that object where no particular means are specified or excluded.

*114

The question, then, presents itself whether an injury sustained by the premises after the date of the lease of such a nature as to interfere with the making of a crop, would have been a proper object for the expenditure of the fund specially applicable to improvements and repairs. It is clear that it would have been. Such being the case, it must be concluded that the repairs made by the plaintiff in their nature belong to the class provided for in the special agreement.

Whether the necessity for these repairs arises from an ordinary or extraordinary casualty is immaterial, for the agreement draws no such distinction, and the rights of the parties must be determined by the agreement alone.

In view of the foregoing conclusions it is unnecessary to consider the limit of the plaintiff's obligation to make repairs, for the defendants' obligation being limited the plaintiff's demand in excess of that limitation must fail. Nor is it necessary to put a precise construction on the covenant to return in good order, it being sufficient for the purposes of the present case to say that that covenant did not impose any general obligation to make repairs in excess of what had been provided for in that part of the agreement that professed specially to deal with that subject.

*115

*It is clear that the conclusions of the Circuit judge are correct. The appeal must be dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 115

(Case No. 821.)

GRAHAM v. MOORE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Wills ⇐603.]

By the will of a testator who died in 1810, a tract of land was devised to A, and if A should die not having any male heir, then to B: and by a subsequent clause the land devised was not to be alienated nor conveyed by A nor his heirs, but should, at his death, descend to his oldest male heir and so on in regular succession. A having issue a son, conveyed the land, and afterwards during A's lifetime the son died without having had issue. Held, a fee conditional in A, and that his vendee took a good title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1354; Dec. Dig. ⇐603.]

[2. Wills ⟸603.]

The grandson of A, the son of his deceased daughter, having survived him, doubted whether A died without a male heir within the intention of the testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1351–1359; Dec. Dig. ⟸603.]

[3. Trial ⟸136.]

Where a case depends solely upon questions of law, it is the duty of the Circuit judge to direct a verdict.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hillhouse v. Jennings, 60 S. C. 401, 38 S. E. 596.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 318, 320, 321, 323–327; Dec. Dig. ⟸136.]

[4. Wills ⟸625.]

[Cited in Powers v. Bullwinkle, 33 S. C. 301, 11 S. E. 971, to the point that there may be a valid executory devise upon a fee conditional.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1447–1451; Dec. Dig. ⟸625.]

[This case is also cited in Mangum v. Piester, 16 S. C. 327, as to the interpretation of the phrase "die without issue."]

Before Pressley, J., Abbeville, September, 1879.

Action commenced in September, 1877, by A. J. Graham against W. H. Moore, for the recovery of a tract of land. Both parties claimed under the will of James Graham, the elder, who died in January, 1816, the plaintiff under deed from William Graham, the brother of James Graham, Jr., executed after the death of James Graham, Jr., and the defendant under deed dated January 11th, 1877, from John W. Moore, who purchased from James Graham, Jr., December 5th, 1844. The defendant also claimed by adverse possession. James Graham, Jr., died in September, 1875. On December 5th, 1844, James Graham, Jr., had a son, but this son died without issue in his father's lifetime. At the time of James Graham, Jr.'s, death, his sole heir was a *grandson, the son of a deceased daughter. The land in dispute is embraced within the terms "all other lands not hereafter mentioned," used in the will. The will is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

*116

The presiding judge held that the will of James Graham (after the death of his wife and son William) gave an absolute estate to James Graham, grandson, a fee defeasible, but that the contingency upon which the remainder to "his brother William" was to take effect had not happened; and that having had a son Valentine, who died before his father, at the age of sixteen years, the sale and conveyance by James Graham, grandson, to John W. Moore conveyed good title; and he directed the jury to find for the defendant. To all of this charge and direction, the plaintiff excepted.

Verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant.

No words of limitation necessary to create a fee by devise. Gen. Stat. 443. The last clause in a will revokes the first where inconsistent. 1 Hill Ch. 360. Limitations to a class successively are valid, where they must necessarily take, if at all, within the required limits. Lewis on Perp. 421–423. It must take effect within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. 12 Rich. 396. The oldest male heir is designatio personæ, who takes by purchase and not by descent, thus avoiding the rule in Shelley's case. The person thus described took a contingent remainder, for the son of James Graham, Jr., was not in esse when the limitation took effect. The contingent remaindermen were barred by the alienation, and the estate at his death revoked to testator's heirs. 10 S. C. 376; Dud. Eq. 115. In 11 Rich. Eq. 527 and 12 S. C. 168, the person who was to take at the termination of the life-estate were in being at the time the limitation to the life-tenant took effect. The rule distinguishing vested from contingent remainders will be found in 1 Strob. Eq. 43; 13 Rich. Eq. 114. The Circuit judge held that defendant could not claim by adverse possession upon the authority of Rich. Eq. Cas. 361; 2 Rich. Eq. 259; 4 Johns. 390; 2 Wend. 357. In this will the latter clause controls the *first. If plaintiff is entitled to any portion of this land, by purchase from one of testator's heirs, he should recover that portion. 1 McC. 161.

*117

Mr. O. T. Calhoun, same side.

Mr. S. McGowan, contra.

February 27th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This case depends upon the construction of the will of James Graham, Sr., and the question is, whether the attempted limitation over to William Graham, after the devise to James, the grandson, is good. In one clause of the will the testator declares as follows: "And my will is that at my son William's death, the above-mentioned plantation and all other lands not hereafter mentioned, shall be vested in and be the property of my grandson, James Graham, and son of William Graham; and if the said James Graham should die not having any male heir, then and in that case the above lands to be the property of his brother, William Graham." After making several similar devises to others of his grandsons, the testator proceeds as follows: "And my will is, and be it well understood, that the before-mentioned lands that is hereby willed to the before-mentioned legatees, shall not be alienated or conveyed by them nor their heirs, but shall, at each of their deaths, descend to each of their oldest male heirs, and so on in regular succession."

The clauses in the will are not numbered, but as these two, which are above quoted, are the only ones which throw any light upon the question under consideration, they will, for convenience sake, be referred to as the first and second clauses.

It appears from the evidence that James, the devisee named in the first clause, married and had issue—a son and a daughter by his first wife, and two others, children of a second wife—and after the birth of such issue and before their death, he conveyed the land in dispute to the person under whom the defendant claims. The said James died lately, leaving no child surviving *him, but leaving a grandson, the child of a daughter. After the death of James, William, the remainderman named in the first clause, conveyed the land to the plaintiff.

*118

The provisions of the act of 1853 (12 Stat. 298) cannot be applied to this case, inasmuch as by the express terms of that act its provisions are to be applied only to deeds or other instruments in writing not testamentary, executed after the passage of the act, or to wills of testators dying after that act was passed. Here the testator died long before the passage of the act of 1853, and therefore the inquiry must be what was the estate created in the grandson James, by the terms of the will under consideration, construed by the law as it stood prior to the passage of that act. If the first clause of the will stood alone, it is very obvious that the attempted limitation over to William must fail for remoteness, and the devise to James would create in him a fee simple. The words "shall be vested in and be the property of my grandson James," would, if nothing more were added, undoubtedly give him the fee. For, although this will took effect prior to the passage of the act of 1824, and although there are no words of inheritance in the devise to James, yet it has been settled by repeated adjudications in this state that the provisions of that act simply declare a rule of construction and apply as well to wills taking effect before as to those taking effect after the passage of the act of 1824. Dunlap v. Crawford, 2 McC. Eq. 171; Hall v. Goodwyn, 4 McC. 442; Peyton v. Smith, 4 McC. 476 [17 Am. Dec. 758]; Bowers v. Newman, 2 McM. 472. What, then, is the effect of the superadded words: "and if the said James Graham should die not having any male heir, then and in that case the above lands to be the property of his brother, William Graham." The words "die not having any male heir," must be regarded as not so effectual to tie up the generality of the expression as the words "die not leaving any male heir;" for, as Johnson, Chancellor, in Hay v. Hay, 3 Rich. Eq. 387, in speaking of the word "leaving," says, it is "a word that has been held to indicate the time of the first taker's death, as pointing out the juncture when he leaves (separates or departs from) his issue, who are then left living behind him." And yet, ever since the case of Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 663, the rule has been well established in *England that the words "die leaving no issue," or other equivalent words, would not create a valid limitation over of real estate, but that such limitation, as to that kind of property, would be too remote, as importing an indefinite failure of issue, and not a failure of issue at the time of the death of the first taker. The rule established by that case was adopted in this state and uniformly followed until the legislature saw fit to interpose by passing the act of 1853, which, as we have seen, does not apply in this case. Mazyck v. Vanderhorst, Bail. Eq. 48; Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill Eq. 265; Hay v. Hay, 3 Rich. Eq. 384; Curry v. Sims and Jeter, 11 Rich. 489.

*119

The manifest intention of the second clause of the will above quoted was to create a perpetuity in the male line of the testator, and, as this is contrary to the policy of the law, such a construction is inadmissible. But the two clauses of the will should be read together, and so reading them we have a devise to James, and, at his death, to his oldest male heir, and in case he should die not having any male heir, then over. This would create a fee conditional in James (Whitworth v. Stuckey, 1 Rich. Eq. 404,) and he having alienated after the birth of issue the alienation is good, and not only cuts off the descent to his male heir per formam doni, but defeats the reversion to the testator or his heirs upon the failure of such issue, even though such issue may have died before him. Barksdale v. Gammage, 3 Rich. Eq. 271.

Again: James Graham did have a male heir at the time of his death, a grandson, who was the son of a daughter, and, under the case of Beckham v. De Saussure, 9 Rich. 531, it may well be doubted whether the contingency has happened in which the estate was to go over to William.

It seems to us, therefore, that in any view which may be taken of the case the judgment of the Circuit Court must stand.

So far as the third ground of appeal is concerned, it is only necessary to say that, inasmuch as the case depended solely upon questions of law, it was not only the right but the duty of the Circuit judge to instruct the jury as he did.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

13 S. C. *120

*(Case No. 822.)

LAWRENCE v. GRAMBLING.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐204.]

Objections not raised at the proper time cannot be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1265; Dec. Dig. ⇐204.]

[2. Execution ⇐275.]

A purchaser at sheriff's sale is not affected by irregularities in the execution under which he purchased, especially so in an action to try the title between the purchaser and the defendant in such execution.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Darby & Co. v. Shannon, 19 S. C. 538; Garvin v. Garvin, 21 S. C. 90.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 16, 148, 345, 791–796; Dec. Dig. ⇐275.]

[3. Execution ⇐3.]

The act of 1873 (15 Stat. 495), amends not only the sections of the code therein mentioned, but also other sections containing matter necessarily inconsistent with the amendments introduced by that act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 144; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

[4. Execution ⇐73.]

Since the act of 1873, an execution may be issued without leave at any time within three years after entry of judgment, and with leave upon motion at any time while the judgment remains unsatisfied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 161; Dec. Dig. ⇐73.]

[5. Execution ⇐102.]

If issued without leave after three years have expired, the execution is not void, but only voidable for irregularity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 203; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

[6. Execution ⇐102.]

The want of leave to issue may be supplied by proof of consent, and such consent may be presumed from the failure of defendant to move to have the execution set aside; and a payment upon an execution irregularly issued is proof of actual assent.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McNair v. Ingraham, 21 S. C. 74; Freer v. Tupper, Id. 83.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 203; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

[7. Execution ⇐275.]

A failure by the sheriff to levy on personalty before selling real estate, and defects in the advertisement of the land, do not affect, prejudicially, the purchaser's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 791; Dec. Dig. ⇐275.]

Before Aldrich, J., Spartanburg, March, 1879.

Action commenced February 23d, 1878, by Joseph Lawrence against Henry Grambling, for damages in trespassing upon land. By consent of parties an order was passed directing the issues to embrace the title to the premises as well as damages for the trespasses. Henry Grambling claimed title as the purchaser of the land in dispute at sheriff's sale, as the property of Lawrence. The sale was made under execution in the case of James McMakin v. Joseph Lawrence, judgment by confession in summary process, October, 1859. The petition was not signed nor sealed by the clerk, and there was no mark of entry or filing, but it was enrolled by the clerk, and the taxation of costs was approved and signed by him. The first execution upon this judgment was issued in November, 1859, a second in August, 1866, and a third in February, 1875. These two last executions were not issued *under proceedings by scire facias nor by leave of the court, but were issued and endorsed as alias executions. Under the one of latest date the land was levied upon, and in August, 1867, was sold to Bobo and Cleveland, who afterwards conveyed to the defendant. It was in proof that Lawrence had personal property more than enough to pay the executions. After the sale the plaintiff here paid to the sheriff the balance claimed to be due on the McMakin judgment. The sheriff's deed described the land as three hundred acres, more or less, the same said to be lots Nos. 7 and 8 of a survey made, &c.; this description of the land by lots did not appear in the advertisement.

*121

The defendant's counsel requested the presiding judge to charge—

1. If judgment has been entered previous to the adoption of the code of procedure and execution issued thereon within five years and returned unsatisfied, an alias or pluries execution may issue at any time without application to the court, though five years have elapsed since the issuing of the last execution.

2. If the execution was active at the time of the adoption of the code, it may be renewed at any time afterwards without application to the court.

3. If the purchase by plaintiff was under an execution which, at the time of the sale, had lost its active energy, then the plaintiff's claim must fail, even if the defendant had shown no color of title, and the plaintiff must establish a clear title in himself.

4. That the payment by the plaintiff on the execution of McMakin after the sale by the sheriff to Bobo and Cleveland, was an acknowledgment that the execution was unsatisfied and validated the sale.

All of which request to charge his Honor, the presiding judge, refused.

At the request of the plaintiff's attorneys, the presiding judge then charged the jury—

1. That the execution should have commanded a levy on personalty, and the sheriff should have levied upon such personalty before levying upon and selling real estate.

2. In order to renew the execution under which the land was *sold, it was necessary to obtain the consent of Lawrence on the executions or an order of court.

*122

3. If the jury believed that Lawrence did not give his consent, and no order of court was granted, then the sale under said execution conferred no title on Grambling.

He further charged that if the advertisement and deed do not describe the lands sold by the sheriff, they may be void for uncertainty.

To all of said charges the defendant's counsel excepted.

The jury found for plaintiff the land in dispute and $500 damages, and judgment was entered thereon, and defendant appealed.

[For subsequent opinion, see 19 S. C. 461.]

Mr. J. B. Cleveland, for appellant.

The sheriff's deed, under which appellant holds, conveyed a good title. 9 S. C. 288; 33 How. Pr. 289. The case of Pierce v. Crane, 4 How. 256, is authority sufficient upon this point. The execution was ratified as binding by the payment made on it. What is the object of a renewal by sci. fa.? It is to satisfy the court that its process is still unsatisfied. Payment is an acknowledgment. It can ratify a contract, renew a debt. Why not revive an execution? 11 S. C. 79. It was error to charge that a levy should have been made on personal property before levying upon real estate. 39 Barb. 396; 3 Wait's Act. & Def. 97; 12 Rich. 54; 2 Bail. 421.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

The execution sale under which appellant claims was void. (1.) Because the executions were renewed without authority of law. 15 St. 499, § 15. The renewal of an execution without the sanction of a statute, is impossible. Freem. on Ex'ns, § 66, note; 27 Ill. 540. Section 307 of the code is repealed by act of 1873. Sedg. on Stat. 104–106, 365; 11 Wall. 88; 33 Penna. St. 511; 15 Gray 24. (2.) Because the execution does not describe the judgment. The judgment is for $46.30, with interest from October 28th, 1859; the execution was issued for $48.81, with interest from November 1st, 1859. Freem. on Ex'ns, § 42; 1 Nev. 413; 8 Ired. 221. (3.)

*123

Because the execution should *have commanded a levy on personalty. Freem. on Ex'ns. § 109. (4.) Because the levy was excessive. The land was worth $2000, and there were two lots, and the debt was less than $150. Rorer on Jud. Sales, §§ 398, 402, 586; Kerr on Fr. & Mis. 188; 19 How. 303; Story's Eq., §§ 244, 246; 3 Desaus. 292. (5.) The judgment as proved, will not support the sale of the land, being neither signed, sealed nor filed by the clerk. 2 Mill C. R. 248; 2 Bro. 186; 2 Hill 438.

The sheriff's deed is void for uncertainty, as it does not describe the land sold by the sheriff. Freem. on Ex'ns, § 330; Rorer on Jud. Sales, § 577. The payment afterwards made by Lawrence does not validate the sale. He really paid all the debt, and up to that time Bobo and Cleveland had not complied with their bid. 3 Hill 289; 4 Strob. 293; 2 McC. 264; 1 Rich. Eq. 351. If any of the judge's rulings were correct, and would sustain the verdict, other erroneous rulings would be immaterial. 3 S. C. 58; 5 S. C. 5; 9 S. C. 457; 10 S. C. 247.

March 1st, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This is an action of trespass, but the issues were framed by the consent of parties so as to raise the question whether the plaintiff or the defendant had title to the premises described in the complaint. The questions brought before us by the appeal depend upon the fact that the defendant claimed to have purchased the premises in question at sheriff's sale under a judgment recovered by one McMakin against the plaintiff. The regularity of the execution under which the defendant purchased is questioned. An objection was taken in argument that the judgment on which the execution was issued was not duly proved. It does not appear that any objection was made at the trial to the proof offered to establish this judgment, nor that the objection is raised in either the requests to charge or the charge as reported, and that objection cannot, for that reason, be considered on the present appeal.

The objections to the execution present, as a preliminary inquiry, the question, whether the plaintiff can dispute in this action the regularity of the execution under which the defendant purchased. It will be noticed that the plaintiff, in the pres*ent case, was defendant in the execution under which the land was sold, and the present defendant was not a party thereto.

*124

It is well settled that a purchaser at a sheriff's sale under a judgment cannot be prejudiced by irregularities in the issuing of the execution under which he purchased, where such irregularities do not, in their nature, render the execution void, but merely voidable. Ingram v. Belk, 2 Strob. 207 [47 Am. Dec. 591]. The reason of the rule is that such irregularities may be cured by consent or acquiescence on the part of the defendant in the execution or by amendment against such defendant; and if the defendant in the execution neglects to take advantage of such irregularities in a direct proceeding, neither he nor any one claiming under or through him shall make them available against the purchaser. Williamson v. Farrow, 1 Bail. 611 [21 Am. Dec. 492]. The reason of this rule has the strongest application where the defendant, who has neglected to take advantage of such irregularities in a direct proceeding to set aside the execution, is in possession of the land sold, and claims to hold it against the purchaser under such execution on the ground of the existence of such irregularities. Even third parties, who have no right to a direct proceeding to set aside the execution for irregularity, cannot take advantage of such irregularities as against the purchaser under such execution, (Henry v. Ferguson, 1 Bail., 512; Jackson v. Bartlett, 8 Johns. R. 361,) much less can the defendant in the execution who has such a direct remedy avail himself of such irregularities in a collateral proceeding and against the purchaser.

It remains to be considered, then, whether the objections made by the plaintiff to the execution, allowing them their full force, tend to render the execution wholly void, or merely to show irregularities that are capable of being waived.

The objections to the execution under which the defendant purchased resolve themselves to the single proposition that such execution was not issued upon leave of the court obtained for that purpose, in accordance with the provisions of the code of procedure in force at the time of such issue. The validity of the execution in question, which was issued February 7th, 1875, must be tested by the provisions of the code as it stood under the amendatory act of 1873, (15 Stat.

*125

495,) that amendatory act *having been held valid by this court in Arnold v. McKellar, 9 S. C. 335.

Section 306 of the code was left standing by the amendatory act of 1873, and was only affected by that act to the extent of changing the period of five years mentioned therein to three years. That section clearly displaced the provisions of the act of 1827, (6 Stat. 324,) so far as it related to the time within which execution could be issued without leave of the court obtained therefor. It is in terms made applicable to judgments recovered at any time prior to the code or subsequent thereto. It assumes to modify writs of execution in conformity with the provisions of the code, and prescribes the time within which executions may be issued without leave of this court on all judgments then outstanding, as well as upon such as should be thereafter recovered. It must, therefore, be regarded as the proper rule of ascertaining the time within which an original execution may be issued, as, of course, on all judgments recovered before or after March 1st, 1870.

The act of 1873 does not, in express terms, amend Section 306, but it establishes a provision clearly conflicting with so much of that section as allows five years for the period of time after a judgment within which an execution can be issued without leave of the court first had. It provides (Section 15) "execution may issue upon any judgment or decree within three years from the entry thereof without any revival of the same." This provision must be regarded as amending Section 306 of the code by changing the period of five years into that of three years, for the following reasons: The act of 1873, Section 1, declares, "that the code of procedure, being Title V., Part III., of the General Statutes, be, and the same is hereby amended in the several sections thereof as is hereinafter provided." As the act goes on to name specific sections of the code for the purpose of amendment, the primary sense and understanding would be that only those sections named would be regarded as amended. But this sense may be enlarged in view of the fact that this act treats the code as a whole conformably to its real nature, which is that of a system of procedure. It is presumable that the legislature intended that the amendments should be construed, with the rest *of the code, so as to produce a harmonious construction of the whole. Such being the case, the declaration of the intent to amend "the several sections thereof" should be read as extending to all or any sections that contain any matter necessarily inconsistent with the amendments introduced by the act.

*126

Section 307 of the code provides that after the lapse of five years leave to issue an execution must be obtained on motion, and prescribes the notice that must be given of such motion, and the evidence on which such leave may be granted. This section is not, in express terms, repealed or amended by the act of 1873; although, for the reasons already stated in respect of Section 306, it must be regarded as so far amended as to change the period of five years, stated in it, to three years.

The fifteenth section of the act of 1873 provides for the proper proceeding by which an execution that has lost its active energy may be renewed, but contains a provision conflicting with Section 307 of the code, which must be regarded as still prescribing the means of obtaining an original execution when more than three years have elapsed since the entry of judgment.

Neither the provisions of Sections 306 and 307 of the code, nor those of Section 15 of the act of 1873, prescribe any limit of time within which a motion for leave to issue an original execution, or to revive one whose active energy has expired, must be made; and it must be concluded that any party having a judgment at the adoption of the code or at any time since, can, on motion for leave, issue an execution, whatever might be the lapse of time since the entry of the judgment, provided it is not satisfied of record or by lapse of time. Whether the provisions of the act of 1827 did not interpose a limit beyond which such a motion could not be made need not be considered here, as its provisions were, in that respect, displaced by the unlimited provisions of the code. It follows, the judgment being regarded as unsatisfied, that the execution under which the defendant purchased was capable of being issued in 1875, in some form, either without application to the court, or upon such application. Assuming that it could only be issued upon such application, and no application for that purpose was in fact made, was the execution, for that reason void, or only voidable for irregularity?

*127

*It is very clear that the provisions introduced by the code and the act of 1873, as a substitute for the writ of scire facias, as theretofore used, should be construed as giving to the remedy provided as such substitute the same force and effect, when not otherwise provided, as the proceedings by scire facias. There is nothing in the provisions of the code as it originally stood, or as it now stands under the amendment of 1873, that fixes the consequences that should result from the failure of a party to obtain the leave of the court where such leave is necessary. We must then recur to the former practice to ascertain whether the failure to bring a scire facias, when necessary, rendered the execution issued without such proceeding absolutely void, or merely voidable on the ground of irregularity. This proposition was decided in Ingram v. Belk, 2 Strob. 207 [47 Am. Dec. 591], where it is said that in such cases the execution is merely voidable and not void.

In Guignard v. Glover, Harp. 457, the want of a scire facias was supplied by proof that the defendant in the execution had assented to its issue. This conclusion does not exclude the idea that such consent could have been presumed from the mere fact that the defendant in the execution had taken no steps to set aside the execution, which is the principle that underlies the various cases that have been cited above. One of these cases, stating this doctrine broadly, is relied upon as authority in Guignard v. Glover, and that fact precludes the idea that the court in the last named case intended to limit the application of the rule to a case where there was proof of actual assent on the part of the defendant in the execution.

In the present case there is also proof of the actual assent, for it appears that after the sale of the land in suit a balance remained due upon the execution, which was paid in full by the present plaintiff, thus indicating his contentment with the execution as it stood.

The charge of the Circuit judge, in making the validity of the title of the defendant to depend upon the fact of the plaintiff's consent, was clearly erroneous. The charge was also erroneous in holding that failure to levy on personalty before selling the real estate, and defects in the advertisement of the land, could affect, prejudicially, the defendant's title. Turner v. Mc*Crea, 1 N. & McC. 12. Under the view that has been presented it cannot become material to consider the propositions involved in the requests to charge, as they concern only questions of regularity that cannot affect the defendant's title.

*128

There must be a new trial.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 128

(Case No. 823.)

BARRETT v. BATH PAPER COMPANY.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Execution ⟸249, 250.]

Certain parties, desiring to purchase property in which they had no interest, soon to be sold by the sheriff under executions, entered into an agreement with some of the judgment creditors, that if the property was sold to them for less than enough to satisfy such judgments, they would pay the balance due and take assignments of the judgments; and they afterwards purchased the property at an inadequate price. Held, that this agreement was an interference with full and free competition; and the sale was set aside.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Lancaster & Free, 46 S. C. 280, 24 S. E. 195; Fairy v. Kennedy, 68 S. C. 254, 47 S. E. 138.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 698, 703; Dec. Dig. ⟸249, 250.]

[2. Execution ⟸249.]

If anything tending to prevent the sale from having its full efficacy for the benefit of the vendor is done by the purchaser, such conduct is a fraud on the rights of the vendor, and vitiates the sale. Cases cited.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Reagan v. Bishop, 25 S. C. 590; Herndon v. Gibson, 38 S. C. 361, 17 S. E. 145, 20 L. R. A. 545, 37 Am. St. Rep. 765; Howlett v. Garner, 50 S. C. 12, 27 S. E. 533.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 697–702; Dec. Dig. ⟸249.]

[3. Execution ⟸249.]

The intention to interfere with full competition constitutes the fraud that vitiates the sale; and such intention may be shown by express proof, or may be inferred from an agreement whose tendency is to produce that result.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Cooley, 69 S. C. 155, 48 S. E. 92.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 697–702; Dec. Dig. ⟸249.]

[This case is also cited in Bath South Carolina Paper Co. v. Langley, 23 S. C. 129, as to facts.]

Before Kershaw, J., Aiken, April, 1879.

The case is fully presented in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

This case came on to be heard at the February Term of the Court of Common Pleas of Aiken county, but there not being time to conclude the hearing, the same was concluded by consent of counsel in April, after the courts of the Second Circuit were over. The necessity of completing the business of that Circuit held under advisement, and the early commencement of the courts *of the Third Circuit having conspired to prevent an earlier decision at all comporting with the gravity of the issues involved, and the very protracted and the exhaustive arguments presented by the counsel on either side.

*129

The facts, as I find them, so far as necessary for this decision, are as follows:

The defendant, the Bath South Carolina Paper Mill Company, was duly incorporated in the year 1869, under the provision of the general act of incorporation, passed December 30th, 1866, (13 Stat. 403), and failed to make the annual reports in accordance with the requirements of said act.

On June 11th, 1877, J. Morton Poole & Co. obtained a judgment in Aiken county, against the Bath South Carolina Paper Company for $2292.37, founded upon two promissory notes, bearing date May 1st, 1876. This judgment was duly entered, and on July 9th, 1877, was assigned to James Barrett and James P. Boyce, defendants; the former being president, and the latter a director and stockholder of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company. On June 7th, 1878, execution was taken out on said judgment and levied the next day on all the property of the defendant company, real and personal.

On February 16th, 1878, Gilreath & Peoples obtained a judgment against said company for $762.55, founded on causes of action dated June 28th, 1877. This judgment was duly entered at Aiken, execution issued thereon February 18th, 1878, and a levy was endorsed July 8th, 1878, of all the property of said company. The same day, February 16th, 1878, N. F. Burgess & Co. obtained a judgment against said company for $778.36, on causes of action dated June 28th, 1877, duly entered the same at Aiken, took out execution thereon February 18th, 1878, and a levy was endorsed thereon July 8th, 1878, of all the property of said company.

On April 19th, 1878, the Goodyear Rubber Company obtained a judgment against said Bath South Carolina Paper Company for $162.23, on a cause of action originating September 10th, 1877. Judgment was duly entered, and execution issued thereon April 19th, 1878, on which a levy was endorsed July 8th, 1878, of all the property of the defendant company.

*130

*On April 10th, 1878, Poole & Hunt obtained a judgment against the said company for $2086.50, in a cause of action arising in part July 9th, 1877, and the remainder August 3d, 1877. Judgment was duly entered thereon, execution issued April 19th, 1877, and a levy was endorsed thereon July 8th, 1878, of all said company's property.

H. Waterbury & Co. obtained a judgment against said company June 8th, 1878, for $178.09, on a cause of action dated August 1st, 1877. The judgment was duly entered and execution issued thereon June 27th, 1877, and a levy was endorsed thereon July 8th, 1878, of all the property of said defendant company.

On the same day, June 8th, 1878, the same parties obtained a judgment against said company for $199.32, on a cause of action arising September 26th, 1877. Judgment was duly entered and execution issued thereon June 27th, 1878, upon which a levy was endorsed July 8th, 1878, of all of said company's property.

M. Goldsmith & Son filed in Aiken county, June 15th, 1878, a transcript of a judgment in their favor against said company, obtained at Charleston, for $576. Executions were issued thereon the same day, upon which a levy was endorsed July 8th, 1878, of all defendant's property, and the same was returned nulla bona.

M. Goldsmith & Son, on the same day, June 15th, 1878, filed another transcript of a judgment in their favor against said company, obtained at Charleston for $577.38. An execution was issued thereon the same day, and a levy endorsed July 8th, 1878, of all the said company's property, and the same was returned nulla bona.

All these judgments, except those of Waterbury & Co. and Goldsmith & Son, were obtained by D. S. Henderson, Esq., as attorney for the several plaintiffs therein. The first, that of J. Morton Poole & Co., having been assigned to James Barrett and James P. Boyce, passed out of the control of Mr. Henderson, as attorney.

About May, 1878, the said Henderson examined the affairs of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company, with a view to ascertain how the money could be made for his clients on their several *judgments. In doing so he discovered a condition of things indicated in the following facts:

*131

The Bath South Carolina Paper Company had failed to make the returns required by the charter, and, as a consequence, Mr. Henderson regarded the officers and directors of the said company as individually liable for the debts of the same.

The board of directors of said company, on September 4th, 1871, adopted a resolution to the effect that the president be authorized to have prepared twenty coupon bonds of the denomination of $1000 each, bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually to bearer, at the National Bank of Augusta, and that he be authorized to dispose of said bonds at not less than par, and in such amounts and at such times as may be necessary to meet expenses of repairing the dam. The bonds to be made payable as follows: $4000 in three years, from September 1st, 1871, and the like amount in each year thereafter. The bonds and coupons to be signed by the president. October 30th, 1871, at a meeting of the board of directors of said company, the president was authorized to execute a first mortgage to W. H. Barrett and Robert A. Fleming, as trustees, for the sum of $20,000, to secure the payment of the bonds and interest authorized to be issued by the board of directors, at a meeting held September 4th, 1871.

The mortgage was read and ordered to be spread upon the minutes.

At a meeting of said board of directors, held January 5th, 1872, the president stated that some objection had been made to the mortgage, and the matter had been referred to the attorney to arrange with Mr. Miller, the attorney of the bank, and reported at an early day, and it was resolved that the president be authorized to sell the bonds at his discretion for such price as he may be able to get. Under this mortgage sixteen bonds were issued, of $1000 each, making a total of $16,000 of the first mortgage bonds. This mortgage was executed in the presence of two witnesses and recorded, but was never proved for record, as required by the statutes. This, together with the fact that the same was made by order of the directors, without any vote of the stockholders upon the subject, induced the belief upon the mind of *Mr. Henderson that the mortgage was not a valid lien on the property of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company.

*132

At a meeting of the stockholders of said company, held at Augusta, Ga., May 19th, 1874, the president was authorized and instructed to prepare fifty coupon bonds of $500 each, dated February 24th, 1874, payable in ten years after date to bearer, and bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, to be signed by the president and known as the second mortgage bonds. The president was instructed to execute a second mortgage to John M. Clark and John Craig, or to any other two stockholders, for the sum of $25,000, to secure the payment of the said second mortgage bonds. The president was authorized to dispose of said bonds at such times and at such amounts as he might deem best, but they were not to be sold for less than par, except by the advice and consent of a majority of the board of directors. It was declared the true intent and meaning of the resolution that the first mortgage bonds should be paid at maturity by the proceeds of the second mortgage bonds and other receipts of the company. The second mortgage was signed by the president, in the presence of only one attesting witness, bears date May 19th, 1874, and was promptly recorded in the proper office at Aiken, but does not appear to have been approved for record by the subscribing witness. Thirty-one bonds were issued under this mortgage, aggregating the sum of $15,500. Mr. Henderson was of the opinion that this mortgage constituted no valid lien on the property of the defendant company.

Messrs. Barrett and Boice, assignees of the first judgment against the company, having caused a levy to be made on all the property of the defendants on June 8th, 1878, and Mr. Henderson having satisfied himself that the company would or could not make arrangements for the payment of the judgments under his charge, as attorney determined to inform his clients of the condition of things, so far as known to him. He accordingly wrote all his clients as aforesaid, except the Goodyear Rubber Company, stating the fact that a levy had been made, and expressing his opinion that the first and second mortgages were not valid liens on the property, and proposing two alternative courses *which could be pursued to secure the payment of their judgments, in these words: "First. The property, if free from encumbrances, is very valuable, and I am trying, and very hopeful, too, to get a parcel of moneyed gentlemen, upon my opinion, to risk the purchase of the equity of redemption, in July, at a price sufficient to pay up all our claims, and then to fight the mortgages. If this succeeds we will be all right; otherwise, we must act for ourselves. Second. And then I ask the authority of our clients to file a bill on the equity side of our court to set aside and declare void the mortgages, and restrain the selling until the case can be tried at the September Term. The other judgment creditors will aid us. You will immediately perceive the situation and the necessity for a prompt reply in order to enable me to get a temporary injunction before sale-day." To this he added: "I need not impress upon you the necessity of the secrecy of my views, especially from any one, agent or otherwise, in the interest of the Bath Company." He also stated in effect that the other judgment creditors would aid them in these proceedings, as will be seen.

*133

On June 19th, 1878, Messrs. Hill & Hill, attorneys on behalf of Poole & Hunt, replied to this letter, giving Mr. Henderson authority to file the bill as suggested by him, but expressing the hope that he would succeed in getting the gentlemen referred to to purchase the equity of redemption, &c.

N. F. Burgess & Co., controlling their own judgment and that of Gilreath & Peoples, replied to Mr. Henderson: "We do not wish to incur much expense in the matter, but we are willing to join other creditors in the necessary steps to levy and make our money. So you may proceed with the temporary injunction, and we can await developments, and, of course, stop proceedings at any time we think best. We are decidedly in favor of taking the first step in the matter, and hope you will proceed to do so at once. We think by doing so the matter may be settled. Will write you more fully soon. Hope you will make our money if possible." There was some controversy as to the meaning of the expression in this letter, "the first step." Reading it in the light of surrounding circumstances, and with the letter of Mr. Henderson, to which it is a reply, I think the meaning is plain. That *letter proposed two courses, either of which might be pursued, numbering them first and second. The first was the scheme to form a party to buy the equity of redemption. The second, to institute proceedings to procure an injunction, and asking authority to take that step if the first should not succeed. Replying to this, Burgess & Co. gave the authority asked for in the second proposition, but added: "We are decidedly in favor of taking the first step in the matter, and hope you will proceed to do so at once." It appears quite evident that the reference was to the first proposition made in the letter to which the writer was replying. This view is strengthened by the testimony of Mr. Gilreath, the writer, who says he told Mr. Henderson in a personal interview before the sale, "that he would much prefer to get a party to buy it." Mr. Henderson is, therefore, to be regarded as having the authority of his clients (except the Goodyear Rubber Company) to pursue that course in their behalf.

*134

Mr. W. W. Williams represented, as attorney, the two judgments of Waterbury & Co. against the Bath South Carolina Paper Company. He consulted with Mr. Henderson about taking the judgments, and as to how the money could be made thereon for his clients. Subsequently Mr. Henderson communicated to him, under injunctions of secrecy, his discovery of the defects in the mortgages, and his plan for securing payment of the judgments which he represented, and promised Mr. Williams that if he succeeded in getting his money Williams should get his. Mr. Williams relied on this promise and Mr. Henderson's scheme, and made no further effort to secure the payment of the judgments in his charge.

Mr. Henderson continued his efforts to make up a company to buy the property, upon his opinion of the invalidity of mortgages. At the instance of Mr. Sibley, to whom he had proposed the scheme, C. Richardson Miles, Esq., of Charleston, attorney and counselor-at-law, was consulted, and gave an opinion concurring with that of Mr. Henderson on the subject.

On June 24th, 1878, Mr. Henderson discovered a third mortgage. Its history is as follows:

At an extra or called meeting of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company, held at Bath, South Carolina, February 18th, *1877, it was resolved that the president be empowered to issue a mortgage, to be known as the new first mortgage on the mill property of the company, to the amount of $60,000, with one hundred and twenty bonds, of $500 each, to H. H. Hickman and John M. Clark, as trustee. Said mortgage bonds to be issued as follows, to wit: Bonds No. 1 to 32 inclusive, in exchange or payment of the outstanding first mortgage bonds of the company, amounting to $16,000, and the remainder, from No. 33 to No. 82 inclusive, to be paid in exchange for or payment of the issue of $25,000 of second mortgage bonds, and the remainder, from No. 83 to No. 120, to be delivered by the trustees, at par, for the proportionate share of the assessment, to such stockholders as should accept the proposition made at that meeting to pay a further amount of fifteen per cent. upon their stock in the company in exchange for such bonds. Power was denied to the trustees and directors to use said bonds for any other purpose than as above, and the bonds were to bear interest at ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and the principal was to be payable April 1st, 1888, to the parties who had accepted or should accept, previous to March 15th, 1879, and agree to pay the assessment of twenty-five per cent. on the stock of the company made April 19th, 1876, to whom should be issued preferred stock. These should be delivered for all sums of such stock which should be presented in multiples of $500, or for all further payments on said assessment bonds at par of the $25,000 second mortgage bonds of the company, for which they should receive at par value the bonds of the new issue of first mortgage bonds authorized at that meeting as above.

*135

A further assessment was made of fifteen per cent. on the par value of the stock, and to such of the stockholders as should agree to pay the same in cash, bonds of the new mortgage should in like manner be issued, as provided for the assessment of the twenty-five per cent. of April 19th, 1876. The stockholders who accepted the assessment of April 19th, 1876, should be called on to pay the same prior to April 1st, 1877, and should be charged interest from the time the assessments were due, and interest allowed on all assessments due. That the additional *fifteen per cent. required should be payable five per cent. May 1st, 1877; five per cent. June 1st, 1877; five per cent. July 1st, 1877. Due regard was to be paid to the interest on the assessments, and the exchange bonds, which were to be allowed at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. The parties agreeing to the several assessments were to have the right, if they desired it, to take preferred stock instead of the new bonds for their assessment. The trustees of the new bonds should have authority, by the joint concurrence of the stockholders and trustees, in the opinion that it was best for the interest of the company to sell the bonds from 83 to 120, or so much of them as should not be taken up by the fifteen per cent. assessment, provided such sale should not be below par, for cash, but they were not to have power, nor should the directors or stockholders have power to hypothecate the same.

*136

The mortgage thus provided for was executed by the president of the company in the presence of two witnesses and acknowledged and subscribed before a trial justice of Aiken county, June 29th, 1877, and so certified by the trial justice, without further probate, was recorded in the proper office in Aiken county. Seventy-two bonds of $500 each were issued under this mortgage.

As soon as discovered by Mr. Henderson this mortgage was also submitted by him to Mr. C. R. Miles, who pronounced it "no better than the other two."

Mr. Henderson then went to Augusta and had an interview with the parties with whom he had been negotiating for the purchase of the Bath Mill Company. He told them that his clients did not wish to buy the property. That he wished to secure their money first. That if they desired the property they could bid on it as they saw fit; but that if they purchased for a less sum than the judgments represented by him amounted to, they must pay said judgments in full, which it was agreed were to be assigned to them after such payment, in so far as they should not be satisfied by the sale. The judgments of Waterbury & Co., represented by Mr. Williams, as attorney, were not mentioned by name, but were included in the amount estimated to be required to pay said judgments. A calculation was made *and it was ascertained that the enterprise would cost an outlay of money of $7000 or $8000.

*137

Mr. Henderson, when asked what would be his charge, said he was willing that it should be contingent; said that he would charge one-ninth and in no case less than one-tenth. They then agreed to go into the matter. Mr. Langley took three shares, Mr. Sibley one, Mr. Bailie one, Mr. Schneider two, Mr. Foster one, Mr. Hack one. The money was provided for the purpose and Mr. Henderson was instructed to bid up to $10,000, but not to be restricted to that if he could get the property for $2000 or $3000 more.

A day or two before sale-day in July, Mr. Gilreath, of Gilreath & Peoples and Burgess & Co., visited Aiken and conferred with Mr. Henderson on the subject of the sale. He was informed confidentially of the arrangement that had been made to purchase the property and was assured that his debts would be paid in full. Gilreath asked Mr. Henderson if he had levied under his execution. Mr. Henderson replied that he had not. Mr. Gilreath expressed the wish that he should not so levy. Mr. Gilreath asked what would be done if the sale was put off in July. Henderson explained that in that case he could levy under the other executions. Gilreath said he did not want to levy, but he wanted his money. He did not wish Barrett to think he was the one pushing.

The sale was not made in July, Messrs. Barrett and Boyce having directed its postponement. Their attorney instructed the sheriff to advertise the property again under their execution, for sale-day in August. In order to be sure that the sale should go on at that time, Mr. Henderson directed the sheriff to levy under all his executions, which was accordingly done. The sheriff prepared the advertisement, submitted it to Mr. Henderson, and asked if that was sufficient. Henderson replied, "yes." The advertisement was in the usual form, headed as follows:

James Barrett and James P. Boyce, assignees of Morton Poole & Co., and others v. The Bath South Carolina Paper Company. Executions. It commences: "By virtue of the above executions now on file in this office, I will sell," &c., describing the property by metes and bounds. This advertisement was published *in the county newspaper, as required by law, but notice of the sale was not anywhere posted.

*138

On Saturday, August 3d, the personal property of the Bath company was sold by the sheriff, and the proceeds credited upon the execution of Barrett and Boyce.

On sale-day in August, being Monday, 5th, Mr. Henderson received, before the sale, a telegram from Burgess & Co., instructing him to make the property bring enough to cover their debts, about $1400.

At the sale the sheriff read the advertisement to the assembled crowd. Mr. Croft, attorney for Barrett & Boyce, gave notice of the withdrawal of the authority to sell under their execution. Mr. Henderson instructed the sheriff to proceed to sell under the other executions. Mr. Boykin Wright, attorney for the mortgagees, in their behalf then gave notice of the three mortgages above described, by their amounts and dates, to the sum of $60,000, and also of a royalty claimed to be due of about $15,000, and gave notice that the sale would be made and the purchaser would take subject to the mortgages. The sheriff then got the junior executions and read the title of each. Mr. Henderson then said to the sheriff, "Proceed." Mr. James Aldrich, attorney, had been before consulted by the sheriff, and advised him that he must sell the equity of redemption. The sheriff had also received instructions from Mr. Smythe, the attorney for Goldsmith & Son, to proceed to levy and collect their executions, if he could find any property of the defendant. When instructed by Mr. Henderson to proceed, the sheriff gave notice that he would proceed to sell the equity of redemption, "whatever was left after satisfying the mortgages." The sale then proceeded.

The first bid was $20, by Mr. H. H. Hickman, bidding for Barrett & Boyce, Mr. Henderson acting as the agent of the company which he had organized to purchase; and Mr. Hahn, a merchant of Aiken, also bid, the latter stopping at $2800. Mr. Hickman's last bid was $4600. Mr. Henderson bid $4605, and the property was knocked down to him at that price. It was worth from $60,000 to $100,000. The sheriff was of opinion that if the terms were properly understood, it would bring *$75,000. By direction of Mr. Henderson the bid was put down to William C. Langley, D. B. Hack, James G. Bailie, William C. Sibley, M. F. Foster and E. R. Schneider. Mr. Henderson gave his check for the amount, and the sheriff thereupon duly executed a title deed to the purchasers for the entire property in fee, and the same was duly delivered on the day of sale. The money was applied to the executions in the order of their priority.

*139

The executions of Barrett & Boyce, Gilreath & Peoples, Burgess & Co., and the Goodyear Rubber Company, were paid in full. That of Poole & Hunt was only partially paid. The balance of this judgment and those of Waterbury & Co., were afterwards paid in full by the purchasers, and were assigned to them.

As assignees they commenced an action against James P. Boyce, as the director of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company, to charge him personally with the amounts due in said judgments, on account of the liability created by the charter against the officers and directors of the company for failing to make the annual report required, and have attached the interest of Mr. Boyce in the stock of the Graniteville Manufacturing Company.

The first mortgage trustees, W. H. Barrett and Robert A. Fleming, have instituted this action, making parties the Bath South Carolina Paper Company and the judgment creditors, the trustees under the other mortgages, the purchasers of the real estate, (except Mr. D. S. Henderson, who is not a party) and some of the holders of the bonds issued under the several mortgages. The complainant alleges, inter alia, that all the said creditors of the Bath Paper Compay had actual and express notice of plaintiff's mortgage before giving credit to the company; that no other execution was levied on the said real estate; and that of Morton Poole & Co., assigned to Barrett & Boyce, and no other execution, was specified in the publication of notice of said sale. That authority to sell under the first-named execution was withdrawn, and the sheriff entered levies, and without change of notice in publication, proceeded to *sell the said property, the purchasers and the attorneys of the judgment creditors who participated in the benefits of said sale, having notice of said facts. Recites the combination of the purchasers, substantially as hereinbefore stated, and alleges that it was formed for the purpose of preventing said property from bringing its full value and being fairly bid in at said sale. Alleges that the property was reasonably worth $100,000. Recites the circumstances of the sale, the announcement of the liens by Mr. Wright on their behalf, the announcement of the sheriff that he would sell the property subject to the mortgages, and Mr. Henderson's silence thereupon; and alleges that all the bidders at the sale, except Mr. Henderson, bid with the understanding that only the equity of redemption was selling. That the purchasers now claim to hold the property free from any liens, and that the Bath South Carolina Paper Company owns no other property, and unless the said sale is set aside the mortgage bondholders would lose their entire debt.

*140

The plaintiffs pray that the mortgages be foreclosed, and the equity of redemption be barred against all defendants; that the premises be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of said mortgage debts, according to the rights of said bondholders, and execution awarded for the balance against the Bath South Carolina Paper Company; or, if the court finds the mortgages to be not valid, and existing liens on the property in the hands of the purchasers, it is alleged that the sale is irregular, void, and in fraud of the rights of the plaintiffs, the mortgagees, the bondholders and all their creditors, and pray that the sale be declared void and another sale decreed, and for further relief.

The answer of the purchasers denies the execution and validity of the mortgages; denies that the judgment creditors had notice of the mortgages, and claim as purchasers for valuable consideration without notice; they deny all illegal or improper motives or acts attributed to them, give their own version of the facts, affirm that the junior executions were duly levied on the property, and that the sale was duly and regularly made. They pray that the deeds set forth in the complaint be adjudged invalid, null and void, and that they be delivered up and canceled, and for further relief.

*141

*The judgment creditors, whose debts are paid, answering, state that fact, and claim that they are not necessary or proper parties, and adopt the answer of the purchasers. The others, whose judgments were assigned, claim that they are not necessary or proper parties, and adopt the answer of the purchasers.

Goldsmith & Son deny the validity of the mortgages, and deny notice of them. They admit the purchase at sheriff's sale; say that the price is grossly inadequate; that the bidding was chilled; that there were unlawful combinations affecting the sale, and the conduct of Henderson, Williams and the purchasers, operated as a fraud against said Goldsmith & Son. They aver that the property sold constitutes the entire property of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company. They pray that the complaint be dismissed, so far as it seeks for a judgment of foreclosure, that the sheriff's sale be rescinded, that the purchasers render up their title deed to be canceled, and that the premises be re-sold, and for further relief.

Messrs. Barrett and Boyce admit the allegations of the complaint in respect to the mortgages; admit that they had notice of them, and that all the judgment creditors had notice, as alleged in the complaint. They allege that the transactions of Mr. Henderson, the judgment creditors and the purchasers, had the effect of depreciating the property and forcing the sale at a grossly inadequate price. They ask that the sale be set aside as fraudulent, null and void, tendering back the money received by them, praying a sale for foreclosure of the mortgages, and for further relief.

The answer of John M. Clark, trustee of the second mortgage, is accompanied by a renunciation of the trusteeship of his cotrustee, John Craig, dated September 2d, 1878. The answer admits the allegations of the complaint, and prays for such relief as may be proper. The answer of the trustees of the third mortgage is to the like effect.

The answers of the bondholders admit the allegations of the complaint, set up their bonds as held by them bona fide and for value, and pray for a foreclosure of the mortgages and a general judgment against the company, and for further relief.

*142

*The evidence does not satisfy me that any of the judgment creditors were affected with notice of the mortgages.

There are other facts in evidence, but the foregoing statement contains all that I deem necessary or material to the determination of the issues involved.

Upon these facts I conclude as matter of law—

First. That neither of the said mortgages constitutes a legal and valid lien on the property described therein.

Second. That they are valid and binding agreements for mortgages, which will be enforced as such against the defendant company.

Third. That the sale made by the sheriff of Aiken county of the real estate of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company on August 5th, 1878, is rendered null and void by the circumstances attending it.

Fourth. That the Bath South Carolina Paper Company, the stockholders thereof, the bondholders, and the unpaid creditors, are entitled to be relieved against said sale and to a re-sale of the property, and a distribution of the proceeds thereof, according to their several priorities and equities.

The invalidity of the liens of the mortgages having been conceded by all parties at the hearing, as well as conclusively established by the argument of the counsel representing the purchasers, it is unnecessary that I should sustain the conclusion of law on that point.

The other conclusions arrived at are forced upon me after a protracted and careful review of the facts and the arguments of counsel, and an examination of most of the numerous authorities cited, as well as others not cited at the hearing, and I proceed to give some of the reasons for the judgment I have formed.

The grounds upon which a public sale may be set aside are those of fraud, mistake or public policy. Nothing will be permitted to interfere with the fair competition, which is the life of such a sale; and especially of a sheriff's sale, which is compulsory, under the authority and protection of the court, and in regard to which all parties are held to deal at arm's length. It has been well said that in every public sale, as there are but two leading interests, so there are but two parties—those engaged in *vending and those proposing to purchase the property. These are necessarily antagonistic, because their interests are directly contrary, the one to the other. It is the interest and well-understood intention of the vending party to sell as high, and of the purchasing party to buy as low, as possible. Neither party expects, nor has any right to expect, that his opponent shall make any provision to advance his interest or forego any bona fide arrangement calculated to promote his own interest, for the sake of enhancing his antagonist's, nor in any way to sacrifice any rights which he has in favor of an opposing right, which is neither more just nor more sacred in the eyes of the law than his own. It is the function of the public policy to secure either of these classes. It simply requires that each, in the prosecution of his own interest and in the exercise of his own rights, shall act fairly. A fair competition will be enforced for the benefit of vendors. No trick, no circumvention will be allowed to prevent it. On the other hand, the bidder will be secured against all imposition. All this public policy requires, but no more. Per Johnston, Chancellor, in Carson v. Law, 2 Rich. Eq. 307.

*143

In the language of the learned judge in Smith v. Greenlee, 2 Dev. 128: "A sale at auction is a sale to the best bidder. Its object, a fair price; it means, competition. * * * If this be the rule with regard to auctions instituted by private individuals, a fortiori should it be as to those public auctions, instituted by law for great purposes, such as execution sales, where the object is to secure the creditor, if possible, the satisfaction of his debt, and, at the same time, to obtain for the debtor a fair price for his property." Any act done, therefore, by the purchaser, or to any other party to the sale, which has the effect to prevent competition, chill the bidding, sacrifice the property, or impose upon the purchaser, is against the policy of the law, and will avoid the sale affected by such conduct. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 2 Rich. Eq. 355 [46 Am. Dec. 58]; Dudley v. Odom, 5 S. C. 131 [22 Am. Rep.

61; Thompson v. Davies, 13 Johns. 114; Troup v. Wood, 4 Johns. Ch. 254; Carson v. Law, 2 Rich. Eq. 311.

Among other objectionable circumstances attending the sale, any agreement or combination among bidders, having its foundation in a purpose to impair competition and to obtain the prop*erty at an under value, has been held fatal to such sale. Bidders, however, may combine, if the purpose be to promote the sale, not to prevent competition. Any combination between a number of persons to unite their bids and to purchase property at sheriff's sale jointly, to that extent diminishes the possible number of bidders, since every member of the combination was at liberty to bid at the sale before he became bound by his agreement not to do so. Certainly this does impair, to some extent, the chances of competition at the sale. As said by Judge Spencer, "a public auction is open to every one." Therefore it must be closed to none, or, as he expresses it, "there must be no combination among persons competent to bid, silencing such bidders, for the tendency to sacrifice the debtor's property is inevitable." It is not material that the bidders so silenced should or should not intend to bid. If being at liberty to bid, they are bought off in a way which might prevent a fair competition, the principle applies.

*144

Hence, such combinations are regarded as unlawful and against public policy, and sufficient to avoid a sale where the price is inadequate, the only exception being where the object really was to promote competition, by increasing rather than diminishing the possible number of bidders. This occurs where two or more persons unite in bidding, and are thus enabled to become purchasers, when neither of them could otherwise have participated in the bidding.

An examination of the cases upon this subject will fail to disclose any other principle upon which a purchase at sheriff's sale at an inadequate price, which results from such a combination of bidders, can be sustained. The rule which avoids such contracts is said, in Phippin v. Stickney, 3 Metc. 385, "to apply to all combinations having for their object to stifle fair competition at the bidding, with the design of becoming the purchasers at a price less than the fair value of the property." As already said, every such combination does have the effect of diminishing the number of persons capable of bidding at the sale, and thus may be said to stifle fair competition at the bidding; and the design of the combination in this case was, unquestionably, to secure the purchase of the property at a price less than its fair value. Yet that *inadequacy of price was not in any way caused by the combination, simply as such; but the fact known to the parties that the property, under the circumstances, would sell for an inadequate price, was the real inducement to the combination. A very different case from that where the price is unfavorably affected by such combination.

*145

It does not appear that the object of the combination was to neutralize, as bidders, any of the persons composing it, but rather to avail themselves of circumstances which presented the opportunity of a great speculation, which, perhaps, none of them separately would have undertaken. I am not, therefore, prepared to say that the validity of the sale in this case would be destroyed by the simple fact that there was a combination of persons to bid, followed by a purchase by them at an inadequate price.

There is, however, another view to be taken of the circumstances affecting this combination, which plainly brings it within the inhibitions of the rule. Mr. Henderson, as a condition of the agreement, required the combination to agree that no matter how little the property might sell for, if they became the purchasers they would pay the balance that might remain due on the judgments represented by him and Mr. Williams; undertaking, on his part, that in that case he would secure to them assignments of the judgments so paid.

The judgment creditors, at the time when this combination was formed, were well aware of all the defects in the supposed encumbrances, and knew that the property was worth, under the circumstances, more than would pay all their debts. It is not to be doubted that their interest would have prompted them to intervene at the sale for the purpose of protecting themselves, either by bidding on the property so as to cover their judgments, or by denouncing the mortgages as worthless, secure such competition as would have resulted in a fair and open sale at an adequate price. They were only restrained from such intervention by the assurance of Mr. Henderson that their judgments would be paid through the arrangements which he proposed to make.

There could have been but one motive for the undertaking on the part of the combined purchasers to pay more than the amount at which the property might chance to be knocked down to them, *and that was to neutralize the judgment creditors—to prevent their competition as bidders at the sale, or such other interference on their part as would have removed the cloud which appeared to rest upon the title to the property in question; to prevent their disclosing their secret and thus defeating their intended speculation. In either aspect it was sufficient, under the authorities cited, to avoid the sale.

*146

There is yet another view which, in my opinion, is sufficient to authorize the interference of the court. It is a principle of law that while the purchaser is not bound to communicate any latent facts affecting the value of the property sold, yet he must carefully abstain from any act tending to mislead the vendor or to prevent his discovery of the facts. In this case such efforts were made in order that a purchase might be secured at an under value. In Turner v. Harvey, 1 Jac. 178, it is said that the purchaser must do absolutely nothing to prevent the possible discovery of such secret by the vendor. And it may here be remarked that the term vendor, at a sheriff's sale, includes all those whose interest it is that the property should bring its full value. A single word (it is said in the case cited) having that tendency, is sufficient to avoid a sale under such circumstances. The rule is the same as applied to encumbrances and defects in the title to an estate, as to defects in the estate itself.

Mr. Henderson was one of the purchasers, a party to the agreement, and his associates are involved in all the consequences of his acts. He did take measures to prevent the discovery of the defects in the mortgages from being known to any of the parties interested, and especially any one interested in the Bath South Carolina Paper Company. See his letter to Hill & Hill, his injunction of secrecy upon Mr. Williams, and all other parties to whom he confided his secret; and all the parties taken into the combination were by him required to assume an obligation of secrecy. These were acts intended to prevent the discovery of the real condition of the property, which the law considers unconscientious and sufficient to avoid a sale which has resulted in a great sacrifice.

Again: it was prima facie the interest of the judgment creditors that the property should bring its full value. They were *chiefly represented by Mr. Henderson, their attorney, at this sale; one of them by Mr. Williams. In the presence and hearing of both of these gentlemen an announcement was made at the sale, before the bidding opened, that encumbrances existed affecting the value of the property to the extent of $60,000 and more. This announcement was in direct antagonism to the interests which they appeared to represent. They knew, as matter of fact, that these encumbrances did not exist. They failed to deny the statement to the contrary of the truth as known to them, made in their presence and hearing, which they knew would injuriously affect the price at which the property would sell. Thus challenged to declare the truth, they were bound in all fairness to speak. Their silence contributed to deceive all other parties at the sale, and they and their clients are estopped to deny the facts of the statements made, and with which, by their reticence, they have impressed the transaction.

*147

Mr. Henderson was the known attorney of the plaintiffs in the executions. He was conducting the sale as such; in the eyes of the bidders he was representing parties whose interest it was to have the property bring its full value. He was ostensibly the party of the vendors at the sale. A statement known to him to be false, most injuriously affecting the price of the property, was made in his hearing to all the bidders. He knew that it was believed to be true by all present, except the party for whom he was acting. The interest which he ostensibly represented demanded that he should deny the statement. His failure to do so was equivalent to its adoption as true. Cox v. Buck, 3 Strob. 367; 2 Whart., § 1136, et seq. and notes.

The property was announced to be sold by the sheriff, under and subject to this misstatement of facts, thus corroborated by the silence of the vendors; the parties bidding acted upon it; the property was sold at a great sacrifice in consequence, and Mr. Henderson became the purchaser for the benefit of himself and his associates. This cannot, under the circumstances, be considered a fair sale.

There is yet another view of the case which, in my opinion, would authorize the interference of the court. It seems to me that when a statement is made at a sheriff's sale which is, in fact, *not true, but which remains uncontradicted, and the property is, in consequence, sold at a grossly inadequate price, such a sale ought to be set aside in favor of innocent parties. In this case the statement of Mr. Wright, as to the amount of encumbrances claimed, was largely in excess of the real amount due, even had they been valid liens, and, in point of fact, they did not really exist as liens. This statement, though made in perfectly good faith, was an interference with the bona fides of the sale. It depreciated the property and impaired competition at the sale. Had it been made with fraudulent intent it would have certainly vitiated the sale. Minter v. Dent, 3 Rich. 207. It had all the effect it could have had, if fraudulently made. It was a misrepresentation of fact, however unintentional, and wrought a great wrong upon those interested in the property. It was intended to affect the sale injuriously, though with no conscious purpose of wrong. The parties at the sale acted upon it. It was, in law, a fraud upon the sale, and innocent parties should not be allowed to suffer. The inadequacy of price, considered with reference to this erroneous announcement, is such as to shock the moral sense and outrage the conscience, and the sale ought not to stand. Rorer on Jud. Sales, § 855, note 5. It is not consistent with the public policy that a sale, whose fairness is so vitally impaired by a mistaken announcement, should stand, whether the intent be fraudulent or not. It was urged at the hearing that there is a difference between the cases when the contract is executed and when it is merely executory; that in cases of the former sort the courts will not interfere, unless they be tainted with actual fraud. While this is admitted to have some appearance of authority in the decided cases, yet there are many others in which the principles which have been made the ground of a refusal on the part of the courts to aid in the execution of an executory contract, or confirm a judicial sale when submitted to them for confirmation, have been evoked to set aside a sale made under process. In Hamilton v. Hamilton, the contract was complete, because, as was well said by Chancellor Harper, with us, "on the falling of the hammer and entry of the sale, the purchaser has a right to demand title, as a matter of course," and *the case was expressly decided as on an executed contract. 2 Rich. Eq. 361 [46 Am. Dec. 58].

*148

*149

There are other grounds urged as affecting the validity of the sale which I have not discussed. One, however, I will briefly advert to. It was said that Mr. Henderson, being attorney for the judgment creditors, under whose executions the property was sold, having a duty to perform in respect of the sale, could not become the purchaser. McCelvey v. Thomson, 7 S. C. 185. The whole subject is fully discussed under the head of Fox v. Mackreath, Lead. Cas. Eq., (vol. I.) 172. Mr. Henderson seems to have acted with the knowledge and approval of his clients, and it is only to them that he owes any duty in this respect. They are fully satisfied with his conduct, and none others have a right to complain on this ground.

It would be a fruitless consumption of time and labor, and unnecessarily encumber this decree, to follow the learned counsel on both sides in their able and exhaustive examination of the authorities. The leading cases are those of Hamilton v. Hamilton, and Martin and Walters v. Evans. Upon the principles laid down in these cases and their corollaries, this judgment may well be rested.

The foregoing decision is placed upon the ground of fraud and public policy. I think also the sale should be set aside on the ground of mistake. Certainly all the parties affected by the sale, except the purchasers, were laboring under a delusion, the effect of which was that the property was sold at a grossly inadequate price. The sheriff, the agent of all parties, announced under this mistake that he sold the land subject to the mortgages. All the parties, save one, acted under the same mistake. The purchasers knowing this, did not correct it, but suffered the property to be sacrificed for their benefit. In Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 McC. Ch. 455 [16 Am. Dec. 667], the mortgagee had obtained judgment on a certain bond secured by a mortgage of the property. The sheriff levied on and sold the property, and it was bid off by the mortgagee, who supposed he was acquiring the unincumbered fee. The sale was set aside in favor of the purchaser, on the ground of mistake. In that case there was a simple mistake, without fraud or interference of any one. All parties were honestly mistaken. It was *regarded as a mistake in law, yet the party was relieved. The present is an infinitely stronger case, and there can be no doubt that, under all the circumstances, the injured parties here are entitled to relief.

*150

In conclusion, it is due to the fact that Mr. Henderson, the chief actor in this unfortunate transaction, is a respected and honorable member of the bar, that some opinion should be expressed in regard to his conduct therein. It is a pleasure to the court to declare that the purpose of Mr. Henderson appears to have been free from any consciousness of wrong. The circumstances by which he was impelled to the course pursued, were well calculated to awaken all his zeal in behalf of his clients, and to put him to the employment of all his enterprise, energy and abilities to secure their money. This, throughout, seems to have been his leading, primary and controlling object. The conduct of Messrs. Barrett and Boyce, in relation to the execution held by them, and the publication made in the Chronicle & Constitutionalist, a newspaper of Augusta, of April 28th, 1878, in reference to the proceedings of the annual meeting, and the condition of the affairs of the Bath company, were quite sufficient to arouse the greatest suspicions, and to justify his resort to any lawful methods of securing the interests of his clients, with which he was entrusted. They indicated a general wreck of the affairs of the company, and a disposition of those controlling it to take care of themselves, and no creditor is to be censured or captiously criticised for catching at any plank floating within his reach to save himself. It is due further to say that while no doubt rests on my mind as to the correctness of the conclusions at which I have arrived, yet that condition of assurance has only been reached after some months of patient thought and an earnest investigation of the case, with all the lights afforded by the exhaustive researches and able arguments of eminent counsel. In his zeal, thus inspired by the circumstance, Mr. Henderson might very well have fallen into the mistake he has unintentionally made.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed—

First. That the sale of the real estate of the Bath South Carolina Paper Company, described in the pleadings, made by the sheriff of Aiken county, on August 5th, 1878, be and the same *is hereby set aside and declared null and void, and that the conveyance for the same, made by the said sheriff, be delivered up by the holders thereof to the clerk of this court, and that the same be by him canceled and filed with the records in this case, and that such cancellation be noted in the registry where the said conveyance is recorded.

*151

Second. That the said property be re-sold by the sheriff of Aiken county at public auction, after first duly advertising the same for at least twenty-one days, on the first Monday of October next, or on some convenient sale-day thereafter—if circumstances should prevent a sale on that day—for cash, and that he make title to the purchaser or purchasers for the same, and that the purchaser or purchasers be let into possession of the property on the payment of the purchase money.

Third. That the sheriff pay from the purchase money the costs and expenses of said sale in the first place; and next, that he pay therefrom the costs and disbursements of the plaintiffs, and M. Goldsmith & Sons, defendants, herein to be adjusted by the clerk of the court.

Fourth. That he next pay therefrom to William C. Langley, D. B. Hack, James G. Bailie, William C. Sibley, M. F. Foster and E. R. Schneider, or their attorney, the sum of $4605, that being the sum paid by them as purchasers at the former sale, and applied to the cost of said sale and the satisfaction of the judgments of J. Morton Poole & Co., Gilreath & Peoples, N. F. Burgess & Co., and the Goodyear Rubber Company, and in part of the judgments of Poole & Hunt against the said Bath South Carolina Paper Company, which said judgments are hereby adjudged satisfied to the extent of such application and payment.

Fifth. That he pay from the remainder of the purchase money the balance due on the judgment of Poole & Hunt, also the judgments of H. Waterbury & Co. and M. Goldsmith & Son, according to their order and priority.

Sixth. That he pay all other subsisting judgments against the Bath South Carolina Paper Company, if any there be, according to their order and priority.

Seventh. That after making all the payments hereinbefore directed, he retain the balance of the purchase money, if any, sub*ject to the further order of the court, and any party interested therein may make application at the foot of this judgment for such further order.

*152

Eighth. That the said sheriff report the performance of the duties required of him herein, to the next ensuing term of the court after said sale.

Exceptions by Defendants. Please to take notice that the defendants, W. C. Langley, D. B. Hack, James G. Barrett, W. C. Sibley, M. F. Foster and E. B. Schneider, do except to the decree of his Honor, Judge Kershaw, filed herein, on August 6th, 1879, and do appeal therefrom, and from the judgment based thereon, to the Supreme Court of this state, and ask the reversal of said decree in so far as it orders the sale made by Sheriff Holley, mentioned in the complaint, to be set aside, and the deed of the purchasers to be delivered up and canceled, on the following grounds:

[Here follow sixteen specifications of error in the findings of fact by the Circuit decree.]

The defendants aforesaid further except to the decree of his Honor, the Circuit judge, because he concludes as matter of law upon the facts as follows:

"Third. That the sale made by the sheriff of Aiken county of the real estate of Bath South Carolina Paper Company on August 5th, 1878, is rendered null and void by the circumstances attending it.

"Fourth. That the Bath South Carolina Paper Company, the stockholders thereof, the bondholders, and the unpaid creditors, are entitled to be relieved against the said sale, and to a re-sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds thereof, according to their several priorities and equities."

Whereas, he should have held as matters of law:

1. That the sale cannot be impeached by the Bath company for any irregularities or omissions, because they are estopped by the sheriff's deed.

2. That the sale cannot be impeached by the plaintiffs or the mortgagees; for having been made subject to their mortgages, if their mortgages are valid, they have nothing of which to com*plain; and if their mortgages are invalid, they have no right to object.

*153

3. That the sale can be impeached only by the creditors of the Bath company, and upon grounds which constitute fraud; there having been only two grounds taken in the complaint, viz.: The alleged agreement between the purchasers and the attorney for the judgment creditors; and, the concealment by the purchasers of the defects in the mortgages.

That such an agreement to constitute a fraud must have had the purpose and effect to prevent bidding, or to stifle competition and destroy the fairness of the sale; and his Honor having found "that it does not appear that the object of the combination was to neutralize, as bidders, any persons comprising it;" and "that to secure his clients' money was the leading primary and controlling object of Mr. Henderson, the attorney of the judgment creditors and agent of the purchasers," he should have found that the purpose of the agreement was the protection of the interests of the creditors, and its effect was to procure and induce bidders who would not otherwise have competed.

He should have held as law, it is respectfully submitted, that to constitute a sufficient ground to set aside a sale, even as between vendor and vendee, concealment by the purchaser must have been of facts which were known to him, and which the other parties did not know, and did not have the means of knowing, and facts which it was the duty of the purchaser to disclose.

That in this case the invalidity of the mortgages was, on the part of Mr. Henderson, a matter of legal opinion, based upon information derived from copies of papers, the originals of which were in the possession of the trustees, and their attorney; while, it is respectfully submitted, his Honor erroneously holds that the invalidity of the mortgages was a fact, known to Mr. Henderson, and not known to the other parties.

4. It is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred, in holding, that in this case, Mr. Henderson occupied a position which made it his duty to disclose the opinion which he had formed, and that his failure to make such disclosure vitiates the sale; while it is respectfully submitted that neither the creditors nor *Mr. Henderson occupied any relations of trust or confidence to any of the parties now seeking to avoid the sale, which required the disclosure of such opinion.

*154

5. It is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in holding that Mr. Henderson's efforts to prevent the opinion which he had formed as to the mortgages from being known to others than those to whom he thought fit to communicate it, amounted to an act "tending to mislead the vendors, or to prevent the discovery of the facts," and that such act was sufficient to avoid the sale; whereas, it is submitted that the utmost limit of the rule in such cases is that nothing must be actually done or said, intended or calculated to mislead or deceive.

6. It is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in holding that in consequence of the announcement made at the sale by Mr. Wright, in behalf of the mortgagees, there was such a mistake as constitutes sufficient ground for setting aside the sale; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that the testimony proves that there was no such mistake as constitutes a legal ground for relief, but that the parties now seeking to avoid the sale were guilty of gross negligence and laches, from the consequence of which they seek to relieve themselves at the expense of those who, having purchased under executions of creditors, without notice of the mortgages, are entitled to have their titles and possession protected by the court.

7. That the decree is, in other respects, erroneous in law and contrary to the testimony.

Mr. D. S. Henderson, for appellants.

If, upon a review of the whole testimony, the findings of fact by the Circuit judge are against the weight of the testimony, they should be set aside. 4 S. C. 10; 12 S. C. 154. And his deductions as to motives and intentions are matters of argument only. The Circuit judge vacates the sale on "ground of fraud and public policy," and rests his decree here on 2 Rich. Eq. 296, 355, 368. We accept the rule laid down at page 360. This is also recognized in 5 S. C. 135. Both object and effect must be to stifle competition, and the object must be fraudulent. 3 Rich. Eq. 65; 4 Strob. Eq. 156; 6 Wall. 94. The creditors did not *expect to be bidders; they sought the purchasers—were not sought by them. Mr. Henderson was authorized to bid up to $10,000, if necessary; and he it was who demanded, in return for his information, that his clients should be protected; while, by taking the assignments, the purchasers could re-imburse themselves by suit against the directors. The decree says that the effect was to produce inadequacy of price. What was being sold? Only the equity of redemption at a full valuation, if the mortgages were held to be good. Caveat emptor must be reciprocal. Broom's Leg. Max. 608–9. What the sheriff said at the sale could not affect the interest sold. 13 Geo. 443. The testimony shows that the combination made the property bring a better price. The judgment creditors were forced by the actions of the company to look to themselves alone for protection. All the cases cited by respondents are where the agreement was not to bid.

*155

Again, the Circuit judge, says, that the purchaser must carefully abstain from any act tending to mislead the vendee, or to prevent his discovery of these facts. He says such efforts were made here, but he fails to find any facts to support him, and there are none. The sole authority relied upon does not support him. 1 Jacobs 169. The law of concealment is stated in 2 Kent *484: Kerr on F. & M. 95–97; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 149; 1 Rich. 105; Story on Sales, § 174. If equally open to both parties, no relief will be granted. 37 Ind. 1; 10 Am. 70. There was no fiduciary relations between the parties to this transaction. It should be noticed that the mortgages were in the hands of the mortgagees, while the judgment creditors derived their information from the recorded copies. The Circuit judge says: "And it may here be remarked the term vendor, at a sheriff's sale, includes all those whose interest it is that the property should bring its full value."

No authority is quoted to support this dictum. We differ with the learned judge. The sheriff is the only vendor at such a sale. He is certainly the agent of the parties to an execution, but this is an agency imposed and created by law, and not a voluntary agency; an agency for persons having several and opposing, not joint interests. Any misrepresentations or other *acts of parties to the execution, except the legal vendor, the sheriff, cannot vitiate the sale. 3 Hill 180; 2 Strob. 112; Frem. on Void Jud. Sales 14. From Mr. Henderson's reticence, when statements were made at the sale, the Circuit judge holds him and his clients estopped. If so, it would only be to the claim that $60,000 were due on the mortgages. 3 Strob. But as it was only matter of opinion, the doctrine of estoppel does not apply. Big. on Estop. 431; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 191; 51 Mo. 449; 3 Washb. on R. Prop. 79; 21 Penna. 334. Again, the Circuit judge thinks that a sale at an inadequate price ought to be set aside in favor of innocent parties, when misstatements at a sale remain uncontradicted. The mortgagees were not innocent but grossly negligent parties. 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 147. But the doctrine is not sound. Kerr on F. & M. 61; 15 Minn. 26; 7 Barb. 64; 3 Hill 180. The remaining ground of the decree is mistake. If mistake applies at all to sheriff's sales, mutual mistake does not. 8 S. C. 2. The decree rests on 2 McC. Ch. 455; but see remarks upon that case in 2 Bail. 635, and see 2 S. C. 112; 12 S. C. 488. The facts were equally open to both parties. 2 Bail. 418; 12 S. C. 130; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 146; 2 McC. Ch. 158; 11 R. I. 565; 23 Am. R. 525; 50 Cal. 337; 19 Am. R. 655. It has been asked why Mr. Henderson did not file a bill to have the whole question settled. The answer is because it was not to his clients' interests to do so, the matter not being settled law, (1 Hill Ch. 106; 7 Rich. 509;) and the litigation ensuing would have been at their expense. His clients are satisfied with his course.

*156

Messrs. James Aldrich, Joseph Ganahl, Boykin Wright, G. W. Croft and J. P. Carroll, for respondents.

Their able arguments are omitted as the ground is substantially covered by the Circuit decree, and the opinion of this court.

Mr. C. R. Miles, in reply.

March 3d, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. Certain creditors of the defendant corporation seek, with such defendant, to set aside a sale of the property *of such defendant made by the sheriff under execution, on the ground of alleged misconduct of the purchaser, both before and at the time of the sale, tending to depress the selling price by a combination among bidders to prevent bidding, and by other devices alleged and relied upon, whereby the property sold for a sum grossly inadequate as compared with its actual value. The facts of the case are very fully stated in the Circuit decree and need not be repeated. The leading question grows out of the fact, that, previous to the sale, the defendant corporation was largely indebted. Many judgments had been recovered against such defendant, and debts to a large amount not covered by judgments were outstanding. Prior to the sale, an agreement was made between certain parties, who afterwards became the purchasers, but who at that time had no interest in the property of the defendant corporation, but desired to become bidders at the sheriff's sale of such property, and the owners of several judgments recovered against the defendant corporation, by which it was agreed that such intended purchasers should purchase the property if it did not go beyond a certain sum, and if the sum bid for the property was not sufficient to pay off all the judgments held by the creditors who were parties to the agreement, that the purchaser would purchase said judgments from such creditors, paying the amounts due thereon and taking assignments of the same. This arrangement was carried out. The owners of the judgments provided for in the agreement did not bid at the sale, and the property was struck off to the persons thus agreeing to purchase at a sum much below its actual value.

*157

The leading question in the case is whether this contract tended to, and did, in fact, directly interfere with the competition at the sale in such manner as to diminish the biddings and reduce the sum which, it may be assumed, would have been realized on a free and fair competition.

Nothing is more important to a complete administration of justice than that auction sales should be conducted in a manner likely to secure the fair market value of property disposed of at such sales. In the last resort, such sales become the means of carrying into effect the judgments of the courts, in the great majority of cases, and the administration of justice is as *much concerned in the manner of executing judgments as in the methods by which they are obtained. Competition is the life of auction sales, and if the influence of competition is destroyed or impaired, the auction sale ceases to be a fair test of value. It cannot be pretended that competition at an auction sale is a perfect means of ensuring the sale of property at its value, but it can be affirmed with certainty that anything that impairs the fullness and freedom of that competition tends to impair or destroy the usefulness of such sales and to impair the legal rights of the persons whose property is subjected to such sales. The result of successful bidding is a contract to which the vendor and vendee are parties, the auctioneer being their mutual agent, by whom the contract is evidenced. If then anything is done of a secret nature by the purchaser tending to prevent the sale from having its full efficacy for the benefit of the vendor, it is clear, upon the plainest principles of equality applicable to contracts generally, that such conduct is a fraud on the rights of the vendor, and vitiates the sale.

*158

These principles have been so clearly and firmly settled by the cases in this state and elsewhere, that it is only necessary to make a general reference to them. Carson v. Law, 2 Rich. Eq. 296; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 2 Rich. Eq. 355 [46 Am. Dec. 58]; Martin v. Evans, 2 Rich. Eq. 368; Thrower v. Cureton, 4 Strob. Eq. 155 [53 Am. Dec. 660]; Johnston v. La Motte, 6 Rich. Eq. 347; Jones v. Caswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 29; Thompson v. Davies, 13 Johns. 112; Doolin v. Ward, 6 Johns. 194; Wilbur v. How, 8 Johns. 444; Bexwell v. Christie, 1 Cowp. 395; Howard v. Castle, 6 Term R. 642; Brawley v. Alt, 3 Ves. 620; Smith v. Clarke, 12 Ves. 477; Crowther v. Austin, 2 Car. & P. 208.

It is definitely settled that if two or more persons in a position to become purchasers at such auction sale combine together for the purpose of preventing the property from realizing at such sale the full sum that, upon fair competition, it would be likely to realize at such sale, and one of them becomes the purchaser, the sale is fraudulent and void. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 2 Rich. Eq. 355 [46 Am. Dec. 58]; Martin v. Evans, 2 Rich. Eq. 368; Dudley v. Odom, 5 S. C. 131 [22 Am. Rep. 6]; Jones v. Caswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 329; Thompson v. Davies, 13 Johns. 112; Doolin v. Ward, 6 Johns. 194; Wilbur *v. How, 8 Johns. 444. Phippin v. Stickney, 5 Metc. 384, does not deny the rule as above laid down, but places the effect of such combination in vitiating the sale upon the ground of fraud, and only denies that proof of such fraud existed in the case there presented. Piatt v. Oliver, 1 McLean 295 [Fed. Cas. No. 11,114], turned on a question of pleading that did not involve the present question. There is entire harmony on this question among all the decisions having authoritative weight, and it must be regarded as settled law.

*159

The intention to interfere with full competition is that which constitutes the fraud that vitiates the sale. When this intention appears by express proof, no question of doubt can arise. It is equally clear that if the tendency of the agreement, in legal estimation, is to produce that result, the law will infer a fraudulent intent in the absence of counter evidence. The tendency of a contract and its motive are identical in legal consideration, and the law determines the one from the other, and when nothing is shown tending to intercept or destroy that tendency, it will be assumed to have affected the sale injuriously.

One feature of the agreement before us furnishes indisputable evidence of an intent to prevent full and natural competition at the sale, and this feature has been pointed out by the Circuit decree, and is the principal ground on which it rests. It cannot be denied that parties holding judgments against the defendant corporation, by becoming parties to an agreement by which they would receive the full amount of their judgment without any effort on their part to compete at the sale, lost their motive for competing at such sale. The question whether they would or would not have competed at the sale independently of the agreement in question, is one purely speculative. It has not been shown that it was out of their power to do so if they had chosen to become bidders, leaving the question of the state of their minds on the subject to the merest speculation, that cannot, in its nature, be investigated upon evidence with any legal certainty. We are left to the conclusion that the agreement canceled their interest in bidding, and that in itself, if intended, is a wrong to the vendor. If it had appeared that the purchasers had agreed to pay off and discharge the judgments, it might be said that the defendant corporation was benefited rather than injured by an *agreement that provided for the payment of their judgments, independently of the sum that the property brought, whatever effect that might have in other respects; but as the agreement was that the purchasers should become the owners of the judgments with power to enforce them against any other property of the defendant corporation, the defendant lost the benefit of the competition that might have arisen between the owners of the judgments and the purchaser, without any corresponding advantage whatever. The purchaser cannot be assumed to have had any other interest in the contract than that of purchasing the property at the lowest rate. They do not appear to have been otherwise connected with the sale than through the motive to become the owners of the property sold, and such must be assumed to be the case. In this view their sole interest was to reduce the purchase money, and in making the agreement with the judgment creditors, the natural tendency of which was to neutralize their interest in the biddings, and thus get rid of competition, they must be deemed to have had that object in view. This is conclusive of the correctness of the Circuit decree in holding the sale invalid. It will be unnecessary to consider the other exceptions, involving, as they do, merely additional grounds for supporting the Circuit decree, as the ground already examined is sufficient for that purpose.

*160

The decree must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

13 S. C. 160

(Case No. 824.)

GARVIN v. GARVIN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Judges ⇐24.]

Under Chapter CV., Section 2, of the General Statutes, the presiding judge of the Circuit in which a judgment has been rendered, has jurisdiction to hear and determine a motion made before him within two years thereafter to set aside such judgment as erroneous, and to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. § 93; Dec. Dig. ⇐24.]

Before Hudson, J., Aiken, June, 1879.

*161

*This was a motion noticed by Robert Garvin, May 26th, 1879, to set aside as erroneous a judgment rendered by Judge Reed, at Aiken, in September, 1877, in favor of defendant in an action between Robert Garvin and John Garvin. The motion was based upon affidavits. The motion was heard June 6th, 1879, during term, and refused, upon the ground stated in the opinion of this court. The plaintiff appealed.

[For subsequent opinions, see 14 S. C. 630; 21 S. C. 83; 40 S. C. 435, 19 S. E. 79.]

Mr. P. A. Emanuel, for appellant, contended that the court did have jurisdiction, and cited Gen. Stat., ch. CV., § 2; 1 S. C. 139; 5 S. C. 350; 1 Mill's Const. R. 133; 1 Hill 210; 3 McC. 19; 6 Rich. 492; 2 Bay 333; 2 Rich. 327; 1 Hill 262; 1 McM. 292.

Mr. G. W. Croft and D. S. Henderson, contra, cited 10 S. C. 277, and contended that relief could be granted only by appeal or under Section 197 of the code of procedure.

March 8th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was a motion to vacate or set aside a judgment previously rendered by Judge Reed in this case, and to grant a new trial, upon the ground that such judgment was "erroneous and ought to be set aside." It appears from the "case," as submitted here, that the Circuit judge stated "that before hearing argument upon the motion, he would hear counsel upon the question of the jurisdiction of the court to hear the motion." Such argument having been heard, he held that "it appearing that over one year had elapsed, the period fixed by the code for motions of this character, the court had no jurisdiction; that if the judgment of Judge Reed was erroneous the plaintiff should have appealed to the Supreme Court; that this court has no jurisdiction to correct an error (if any has been made) in the manner and form presented by the plaintiff; that to entertain the plaintiff's motion would, in effect, be assuming an appellate jurisdiction over the judgment of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction; that the only ground for relief that he recognized was in the case of newly-discovered testimony, and, therefore, was compelled to refuse the hearing of argument upon the motion, and ordered that the motion be dismissed, with costs."

*162

*In Section 2 of Chapter CV., (Gen. Stat. 497,) it is provided as follows: "In case a judgment or decree has been or hereafter shall be rendered by a Court of Common Pleas, it shall be lawful for either party, plaintiff or defendant, to move before the presiding judge of the Circuit in which said judgment was obtained, to vacate or set aside said judgment, upon satisfactory proof being made to said judge that said judgment is erroneous and ought to be set aside; and upon said proof being made, the presiding judge is hereby authorized to vacate and set aside such judgment and to order a trial de novo." This, we think, invested the judge below with jurisdiction to hear and determine the motion, and his refusal to do so was, in our judgment, error. It seems to be supposed that the provisions of the section above quoted were superseded by Section 197 of the code of procedure, in which provision is made for relieving a party from a judgment, order or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect, provided such relief be applied for within one year after notice of such judgment, &c., and by those provisions of the code relating to appeals. We are not at liberty so to regard them. The general assembly, after these various provisions were originally enacted, has seen fit to re-enact them all in the general statutes, and unless there is an irreconcilable inconsistency we are not at liberty to regard one of these provisions as a repeal of, or a substitute for, the other. We do not think there is such inconsistency. The provisions of Section 197 of the code are intended to provide relief only in cases where a judgment has been taken against a party through his own mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect, and must be confined to such cases; those provisions of the code in relation to appeals must be regarded as applying only to those cases in which a party seeks from a superior tribunal relief from, or correction of, error committed by an inferior tribunal, while the provisions of Section 2 of Chapter CV., General Statutes, apply only to those cases where relief is sought in the same tribunal from a judgment rendered by such tribunal, which, "upon satisfactory proof," can be shown to be erroneous. It might be difficult, perhaps impossible, to lay down clearly the grounds upon which such relief should be granted, but that is not the *question before us. It is sufficient to say that the section does not confine the relief to cases in which the ground is after-discovered evidence, but authorizes such relief whenever "satisfactory proof" is made that the judgment is erroneous. We are not called upon to consider, and we do not wish it understood that we have undertaken to consider the merits of the application in the case now before the court. The only question before us is, whether the Circuit judge had jurisdiction of the motion, and all that we determine is that he did have such jurisdiction. He was bound to hear the motion and determine whether there was "satisfactory proof" that the judgment, against which relief was sought, was erroneous and ought to be set aside.

*163

The order appealed from is set aside and the case remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary and proper.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 163

(Case No. 825.)

VILLALONGA v. HICKS.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Guardian and Ward ⟸43.]

The judge of probate, holding several bonds payable to himself, secured by mortgages, belonging to an estate in which an infant had an interest, under an arrangement made by all parties concerned, delivered one of the bonds and the mortgage securing it, to the guardian of such infant as a part of his ward's estate, and at the same time, wrote upon the mortgage an assignment of bond and mortgage. Subsequently, the guardian transferred this bond by delivery as collateral security for the payment of a debt due by himself. The ward having afterwards claimed the bond—Held, that it was her property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 190; Dec. Dig. ⟸43.]

[2. Guardian and Ward ⟸72.]

The guardian having died, and a surety upon his guardianship bond having become guardian in his stead—Held, that this did not, by operation of law, effect a payment to the second guardian of the amount due upon this bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 318–321; Dec. Dig. ⟸72.]

Before Kershaw, J., Barnwell, February, 1879.

This was an action instituted in June, 1876, by John L. Villalonga against Sarah A. Hicks,

*164

J. C. Miller and W. H. Kennedy, *upon a bond for the payment of money. Isabella M. Hickson, upon her own petition, was made a party defendant, and claimed the bond as her property.

The estate of John Hickson, deceased, was sold by the judge of probate for Barnwell county, and a portion thereof, called tract No. 1, was purchased by Sarah A. Hicks, who gave her bond with the two sureties, who are defendants here, and a mortgage of the premises, both payable to I. N. Teague, Probate judge. When this bond fell due, the principal obligor, together with the three guardians of the three infant children (the heirs-at-law) of John Hickson, met and agreed that J. W. Wilson, guardian of Isabella M. Hickson, should receive the Hicks bond and mortgage as a part of Isabella's distributive share. The bond and mortgage were then delivered by the Probate judge to J. W. Wilson, the former without any written assignment, but the latter with the endorsement following, to wit: "I having received satisfaction in full of this mortgage and the bond it was intended to secure, of J. W. Wilson, do hereby transfer the same to said J. W. Wilson, guardian. Witness my hand and seal this 27th December, 1870." Signed by the judge of probate. Afterwards, J. W. Wilson transferred, by delivery, this bond to the plaintiff as collateral security for a debt. It was a matter of dispute here, whether or not this debt was contracted upon the faith of this collateral. The referee found that it was not, but that the bond was delivered to secure indebtedness already existing; and his findings were confirmed by the Circuit judge. Villalonga had no actual knowledge of the mortgage, or of the assignment, and did not know that J. W. Wilson was guardian of Miss Hickson, or that the bond belonged to her estate. The mortgage remained in the possession of J. W. Wilson until his death. Le Roy Wilson, who had been a surety on J. W. Wilson's guardianship bond, became sole qualified executor of J. W. Wilson's estate, which he fully administered under the order of the court, in an action instituted by himself, to marshal the assets and settle the estate. Thereafter, Le Roy Wilson became the guardian of Isabella M. Hickson.

*165

*The plaintiff demanded judgment upon the bond. Isabella Hickson, in her answer, by her guardian ad litem, Le Roy Wilson, claimed the bond as her property. The other defendants expressed their readiness to pay the bond to the party entitled to recover upon it. The other facts of the case have no bearing upon the points decided here.

All the issues in the case were referred to Andrew C. Dibble, Esq., as special referee, to hear and determine. His conclusions of law were, inter alia, that the bond in suit and the mortgage securing it, were duly assigned to J. W. Wilson, as guardian of I. M. Hickson, and that they then became the property of the ward, and could not be dealt with except for the benefit of the ward; that the subsequent transfer of the bond was a breach of trust by the guardian; that plaintiff was put upon the inquiry by the terms of the bond—that is, by its being payable to the judge of probate, and was, therefore, chargeable with notice that it belonged to the estate of I. M. Hickson; that Le Roy Wilson, not having become guardian until after the settlement of the estate of J. W. Wilson, he, as guardian, had not been paid, by operation of law, the amount due by his testator, the former guardian; that plaintiff was not entitled to relief against Sarah A. Hicks and her sureties; that I. M. Hickson was entitled to no affirmative relief, having demanded none. The report recommended a dismissal of the complaint with costs.

To all these conclusions, exceptions were taken by the plaintiff, and upon them the Circuit judge rendered his decree as follows:

The issues, both of law and fact, arising in this case, were referred to the referee, and by him decided in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff filed exceptions to the report, which were heard before me at the present term. The report must stand as to facts, unless without evidence to sustain it. Perry v. Sullivan, 6 S. C. 310. In this case, however, it is due to the referee to say that there were circumstances upon which he based his opinion, which appear to the court to furnish reasonable grounds for his findings. The distinction he makes as to the character of the notice is not material, since it manifestly appears *what he means by the terms actual or constructive notice. The questions of law involved, and they were chiefly discussed by the counsel at the beginning, are—

*166

First. Was there sufficient notice brought home to the plaintiff in this case, to have the effect of subordinating his rights in the premises, to those of the defendant, Isabella M. Hickson? Second. Is said defendant precluded from the defence set up on her behalf, on the grounds that the amount due her by her deceased guardian was paid by operation of law, in consequence of the fact that Le Roy Wilson united, in his own person, the office of executor of the deceased guardian, and also the guardianship of said defendant after the death of his testator?

The action here is upon a bond, brought by the plaintiff as assignee. There was no assignment in writing, and plaintiff claimed as transferee by delivery of the bond for value. This would be sufficient to vest in him the beneficial interest and the right of action under the code, if there were no other circumstances to invalidate his claims. The bond, however, was, on its face, payable to the Probate judge of Barnwell county by name. In order to prove his own title, as beneficiary of the bond, plaintiff must derive it from the obligee, mediately or immediately. He must show that it passed from the Probate judge, to whom it was payable, to Wilson, from whom he received it, either by assignment or delivery. In doing this he must necessarily set up, as a part of the proofs of his title, the assignment from the Probate judge to Wilson. That discloses the fact that the bond was the property of Hickson, the infant defendant. The guardian had no right to transfer it in consideration of his own debt, or for his own benefit. The transfer was void upon this ground. Plaintiff is held to have notice of the title under which he claims, and upon which he must stand, in order to entitle himself to the character in which he sues. Furthermore, while a purchaser of a legal estate is protected when he acquires it bona fide, without notice, there is no such protection to one who has only acquired an equitable title. The transferee, by delivery, has only an equitable title. He takes the bond subject to all prior equities, and want of notice will not protect him.

This disposes of the first question involved.

*167

*Second. The estate of the deceased guardian was administered by the court, under the bill to marshal assets, and that suit had been determined by the final judgment therein before Le Roy Wilson succeeded to the guardianship of the infant defendant. He had fully accounted in that action for the estate of his testator, which came into his hands, and his administration had closed before he assumed the guardianship. Therefore, the law invoked does not apply, and cannot avail the plaintiff. If, however, that were out of the case, the doctrine would not apply. The new guardian might have been chargeable prima facie, had he retained the executorship, and the estate had remained unsettled; but he could have discharged himself by setting up the bond as an investment of his ward's money, and pursuing the same in the hands of the plaintiff, wrongfully withheld from him as guardian. The bond would have remained an asset of his ward, to which he would have been entitled to relieve himself from the liability thrown upon him by the operation of the law insisted upon. His ward would have been entitled to it as a portion of her estate; and the sureties to the guardianship bond would have had the right to have it collected and applied in extinguishment of their liability. The case (Rhame v. Lewis, 13 Rich. Eq. 330,) is conclusive authority that the plaintiff took the bond in question subject to the equities affecting it at the time of the transfer, if he had notice of their existence, or of such circumstances as should have put him on inquiry. That he had such notice appears from the circumstance that the title of assignor, which he acquired, cannot be established without leading necessarily to the knowledge of the prior equities.

In general, it will be presumed that every purchaser has investigated the title of his vendor before completing his purchase; and if the title cannot be made out but through a deed, which gives or leads up to notice of a trust, he will be assumed to have notice of that trust, unless it be shown that inquiry was made, and a reasonable excuse given for the non-delivery of the deeds.

But the court will impute fraud, or gross or willful negligence to the purchaser who omits all inquiry into the title of his vendor. Hewitt v. Loosemore, S. L. & E. Rep. 40.

*168

*If, under such circumstances, he choose to remain in indolent ignorance or indifference to the title, it was a voluntary ignorance and indifference, which ought not to be permitted to serve him against the right of the cestui que trust. Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How. 410 [11 L. Ed. 622]. To sustain a plea of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, it must appear that the legal title was purchased, (Brown v. Wood, 6 Rich. Eq. 155,) or, at least, it must appear that the purchaser has the best right to demand a conveyance of the legal title. Medlicott v. O'Donel, 1 Ball & Beat. 171. The plaintiff does not stand in any such position.

It is ordered and adjudged that the exceptions be overruled; that the report be confirmed and be made the judgment of the court; that the complaint be dismissed, and the plaintiff pay the defendants their costs and disbursements—to be adjusted by the clerk.

From this decree plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. Robt. Aldrich, for appellant.

The position relied upon is, that the assignee of a bond for full value, has the undisputed right to collect it; and the fact that the assignor was the guardian of an infant at the time of the assignment, and the bond constituted a part of his ward's estate, makes no difference, provided the assignee had no knowledge of these facts and believed the bond to be the property of the assignor, and there was nothing apparent in the transaction inconsistent with this belief, and to advertise the assignee of the true facts of the case. 13 Rich. Eq. 330. Appellant had no knowledge of the facts here. He is charged with knowledge because the bond was payable to the judge of probate. But he did not see the bond until long after the time when he advanced the money, and it was agreed that it should be delivered. He is charged with notice, however, it is alleged, because it was a part of his title, and reliance is placed upon Adams' Eq. 151, note 1; Story's Eq. Jur., § 400, and 13 Rich. Eq. 330, and 6 S. C. 159. But these authorities do not sustain the conclusion that a bond payable to a judge of probate is notice that the bond has been transferred to a guardian for the use of his ward. Pomeroy on Rem., § 124; 4 Desaus. 87. A purchaser of a bond is not charged *with inquiry into a chain of title, as the decree says. That is good land law, but inapplicable here. Oliver v. Piatt, cited by the Circuit judge, shows this distinction. The facts in this case show that the appellant, by the most diligent inquiry, could not have learned, except from J. W. Wilson, that this bond belonged to Wilson as guardian. To sustain our position, we rely upon Story's Eq. Jur., §§ 410, 410a; 4 Desaus. 474; 1 McC. Ch. 119; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 580; 13 Rich. Eq. 296; 7 Johns. Ch. 150; 96 U. S. 57-8. Fraud, and knowledge of fraud, are never presumed, and cannot here be imputed to the plaintiff. There are marked differences between the case at bar and 11 S. C. 396, 551, relied upon by respondents. Particular attention is directed to case of Hill v. McIntyre, 39 N. H. The testimony clearly shows that the debt intended to be secured by the assignment was not an antecedent debt.

*169

Mr. I. M. Hutson, same side.

It is not claimed that the debt represented by the bond in suit was paid to Le Roy Wilson, as guardian of I. M. Hickson, because he was the executor of J. W. Wilson, but because he was the surety on the guardianship bond. That this relationship, whereby the present guardian became indebted to himself as such because of his suretyship on the defaulting guardian's bond, extinguished the indebtedness of the former guardian, is conclusively established by the authorities. 2 Hill's Ch. 277; McM. Eq. 495; 4 Rich. Eq. 14; 2 Strob. Eq. 206; 6 S. C. 490; 7 S. C. 153. As to the position that Le Roy Wilson, as surety, would be entitled to set up the bond against his principal's estate, and follow it as trust property, it is enough to say that he is not a party to this cause, except as a guardian ad litem; and that no judgment rendered would bind him, and, therefore, none can be given in his favor.

Mr. H. M. Thompson, for respondent.

A guardian has no legal title to the personal or other property of his ward, and consequently can convey none to his transferee; and a sale or transfer by him is voidable at the option of the infant. 3 Rich. Eq. 156;

*170

9 Rich. Eq. 311; 11 S. C. 551. If *more advantageous to the ward to follow the specific property, she has the right to do so. Rich. Eq. Cas. 172. There being no assignment in writing, nor any legal title acquired, the plaintiff took, notice or no notice, subject to the ward's equities. 6 Rich. Eq. 155; 11 S. C. 551. A guardian cannot change the character of a ward's estate without the leave of the court. 1 Hill's Ch. 409. If he does, it must be only when the court would have sanctioned it. 11 S. C. 551. The guardianship bond is merely subsidiary security for the investments required. 9 Rich. Eq. 184. There was enough on the bond to put him upon inquiry, and, therefore, he is chargeable with constructive notice. 13 Rich. Eq. 312; 1 White & Tudor's Lead. Cas. in Eq. 92; Adams' Eq. 151, note 1, 158; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 400. To one who omits inquiring, the court will impute fraud or willful negligence. S. L. & E. Rep. 40; 3 How. 410. There must not only be absence of notice, but it must be bona fide and for a present consideration. 13 Rich Eq. 328; 6 S. C. 159. The character of executor and guardian never merged in Le Roy Wilson. And, as surety, he would be subrogated to all the rights of the ward. Rich. Eq. Cas. 172; 7 Rich. 112; 13 Rich. 312.

March 12th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The action was, in its original form, in the nature of an action at law upon a money bond. But Isabella M. Hickson was, subsequently to the commencement of the action, made a party, and she interposed a defence, alleging, in substance, that the bond in suit is her individual property, improperly transferred by her guardian to the plaintiff. The propriety of making Isabella M. Hickson a party, and the character of her answer, are not questioned before us. The case has, therefore, assumed the character of one in the nature of interpleader between the plaintiff and the defendant Isabella, the other defendants, the obligors on the bond, making no objection to pay the party found entitled to the bond. Although not in form a strict interpleader, the case is such in substance, and the issues *must be disposed of on the principles of interpleader. It is, therefore, an equitable proceeding.

*171

The court is satisfied with the conclusions of fact found by the referee, so far as the same are material to the view of the law of the case here presented. The facts are as follows: The bond in suit was the property of the defendant Isabella, held by J. W. Wilson, her guardian, secured by a mortgage. The bond and mortgage were originally made to the Probate judge officially, by whom the bond was delivered without assignment to the guardian as of the estate of his ward, and at the same time the mortgage was duly assigned to such guardian. Subsequently the guardian transferred the bond without assignment to the plaintiff, Villalonga, as security for a personal indebtedness of the guardian to the said plaintiff. The mortgage was never transferred to the plaintiff.

The transfer of the bond to the guardian passed the beneficial interest in the bond, not to the guardian, but to the ward. Had the bond been assigned in form to the guardian, he would have, no doubt, taken the legal title as trustee for his ward. But as there was no assignment effectual to pass the title directly, it could only pass by operation of law; that is to say, the ward having the beneficial interest would be regarded as clothed with the right of property in the bond, both at law and in equity; prior to the code, in the name of the obligee to her use, and in equity to her own use; and since the code, both at law and in equity, in her own name. It is not material to inquire whether the guardian had authority, as such, to transfer the legal title to the bond to the plaintiff, for he has not done so.

The deposit of the bond as collateral security for his individual debt, could only transfer the title to the bond as by operation of law, but the law will not operate such a transfer of interest as against the clear legal and equitable rights of the party having the best right to the property. Assuming that she had merely an equitable interest in the bond, such as she would have had in case the legal title had been transferred to her guardian, but impressed with a trust in her favor; in that case the only way in which the plaintiff could defeat that equity would be by showing that he had become a bona fide purchaser for value without *notice. But he does not occupy that position, for he has not succeeded in clothing himself with the legal title, and that is of the essence of the equitable defence of purchaser for a valuable consideration. All that he has is an equity as between himself and the guardian, individually. That equity is clearly subordinate to that of the defendant, Isabella, both as it regards its character and the time of its origin. If the legal title was in the guardian as trustee, the equity of the cestui que trust must have been preferred to any that might be created through any act of misconduct on the part of the trustee, for it was impressed upon the legal title from the moment of its creation, and could only be displaced by an equity to which the cestui que trust was, in some respect, subject. An equity claimed through the misconduct of the trustee could not occupy such a position.

*172

But the case is stronger than that supposed, for the defendant Isabella had more than equity. She had the beneficial interest in the bond without any vesting of the legal title in the guardian so as to reduce that beneficial interest to a mere equity. As there was no legal title standing in the way of her beneficial, it was entitled to legal as well as equitable consideration, and, consequently, the defendant Isabella has the legal as well as the best equitable right to the bond and was entitled to recover.

It is contended by the plaintiff that as between the estate of the deceased guardian and the ward there have been transactions that amount, in law, to the payment of the amount covered by this bond in suit. If it had appeared that these transactions, alleged to amount to payment, had taken place prior to the transfer of the bond in suit, from the deceased guardian to the plaintiff, there might be more reason to inquire whether the legal effect of such transactions is such as is claimed for them, for in that case it might well be said that the equity of the ward was extinguished at the time of the transfer of the bond, and that of the plaintiff would remain as the controlling equity; but the fact appears otherwise. The argument in behalf of the plaintiff must rest on one of two assumptions, either that the deceased guardian or his executor had the right to elect to take the bond and become a debtor to the ward for its amount, or that the ward had, in effect, made such an election through the effect of her *appearance in the suit to marshal the assets of the estate of the deceased guardian, brought by his executor and by the decree therein. It is clear that a guardian cannot appropriate the property of his ward by making himself a debtor for the value of such property, so as to invest himself with the title of such property, either in law or in equity. If the ward is bound by transactions amounting to an assent that the guardian shall have the property and become a debtor, then such a transfer of interest may be brought about.

*173

It is contended that under the bill to marshal the assets of the estate of J. W. Wilson, the deceased guardian, brought by Le Roy Wilson, the executor of J. W. Wilson, the account of the deceased guardian with his ward was adjusted on the principle of charging such estate with the amount of the bond assigned to plaintiff, and that the ward being a party to the suit is bound to such mode of statement. It is claimed as a deduction from this that when the transaction assumed the form of a mere indebtedness between the deceased guardian's estate and the ward, in view of the fact that Le Roy Wilson, the present guardian, was surety for J. W. Wilson on his guardian's bond, that the debt became paid by the operation of law. It will not be necessary to examine the soundness of this view, as it does not appear to rest on an adequate basis of fact. It does not appear, from what is disclosed of the accounting in the suit to marshal assets, that this particular bond was brought into the account. The duty of a guardian is to turn over to his ward, specifically, all the property of his ward in his hands and to account for all his pecuniary transactions. It is true that where he has committed waste of his ward's estate, he is bound to account for that; but it does not appear that the accounting established any such devastavit as the basis of the accounting on the part of the deceased guardian's estate. Such fact cannot be presumed; and as the question is one of estoppel upon a record, we are not at liberty to speculate as to what matters may have been affected by such record, but must take it at what appears by it. Under such circumstances we cannot say, from the evidence before us, that the deceased guardian's estate has ever accounted for the value of the bond in *suit, and, consequently, no such effect upon the rights of the ward has been accomplished as that contended for.

*174

The decree of the Circuit Court must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 174

(Case No. 826.)

TRENHOLM v. WILSON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Mortgages ⇐542, 544.]

A tract of land was sold after the death of the mortgagor, under a decree of foreclosure rendered against him during his lifetime; after confirmation of sale, the purchaser demanded possession from the widow of the mortgagor, but she refused to vacate, claiming that the sale was invalid, and that she was entitled to dower. Held, under proceedings by rule, that the purchaser was entitled to be let into possession. McIver, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Winkler, 31 S. C. 179, 9 S. E. 792; Ex parte Qualls, 71 S. C. 92, 50 S. E. 646.

For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1561, 1575; Dec. Dig. ⇐542, 544.]

[2. Equity ⇐441.]

A decree of foreclosure is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and is capable of being enforced after the death of the mortgagor. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Winkler, 31 S. C. 181, 9 S. E. 792.

For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 1062; Dec. Dig. ⇐441.]

[3. Mortgages ⇐542.]

Even if the equity of redemption was not barred under the terms of the decree until actual sale, the only effect would be that parties having the legal title could, in the meantime, redeem. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1561; Dec. Dig. ⇐542.]

[4. Dower ⇐56.]

If the widow was entitled to dower, her possession after forty days was, nevertheless, a trespass. Per Willard, C. J.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cave v. Anderson, 50 S. C. 300, 27 S. E. 693.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 178–188, 197, 198, 206; Dec. Dig. ⇐56.]

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Jenkins, 48 S. C. 325, 26 S. E. 686, and distinguished therefrom, and in Murchison, Executrix v. Miller, 64 S. C. 428, 42 S. E. 177, as an example of the custom of proceeding by rule to show cause in an action for possession.]

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, February, 1879.

In an action by W. L. Trenholm, executor, against John R. Wilson and others, his judgment and mortgage creditors, to foreclose a mortgage, a decree of foreclosure was rendered and the lands were ordered to be sold. Afterwards John R. Wilson died, and after his death the lands were sold under this decree to F. Schaffer, who complied with the terms of sale and received a deed from the sheriff. The sale was afterwards confirmed by order of court. Schaffer then demanded possession of the widow of John R. Wilson, but she refused to surrender the premises.

*175

*He then filed his petition and obtained an order requiring Mrs. Wilson to show cause why the petitioner should not be put into immediate possession. Mrs. Wilson, answering the rule, contended that the sale was invalid, as no proceedings had been taken after the death of John R. Wilson to revive the action or decree, and no notice of the sale had been given to the heirs-at-law, and that she was not a party to the original action; that she had a valid claim of dower in the premises, and that such claim could not be determined under proceedings by rule; and that she had instituted an action for the adjudication of all those questions.

The original action was commenced November 18th, 1876, and notice of pendency of action was filed November 21st, 1876. Decree of foreclosure bore date March 21st, 1878.

The Circuit judge discharged the rule. Schaffer appealed.

Mr. H. A. M. Smith, for appellant.

The proceeding by rule is proper. The court will give possession to the purchaser as against parties to the suit, and their privies and all persons claiming under them. 2 Jones on Mort., §§ 1663, 1664; 19 How. Pr. 491. And the proper method is by petition and order in the cause. 4 Johns. Ch. 609; 21 How. Pr. 34; 8 How. Pr. 35. The death of the mortgagor could not prevent the execution of the decree, and the sale was valid. 2 Jones on Mort., § 1584; 3 Edw. Ch. 394; 56 N. Y. 521. If widow is entitled to dower, that gives her no claim against the purchaser. 2 Bail. 103; 4 Rich. 517. The act of 1791 applies only to foreclosures in law court. The heirs-at-law only took what mortgagor had at the date of his death.

Mr. L. De B. McCrady, contra.

Under act of 1791, title is not divested until actual sale. Riley's Eq. 111. At death of mortgagor title passed to his heirs-at-law, who have not been made parties, and whose equity of redemption has not been barred. They alone can object to the widow's possession. They had no constructive notice, for filing of lis pendens was not followed by service of summons. Code, § 155. The heirs are, therefore, rightfully in possession, and some *of them being minors, the mother is there having the charge of them. At any rate, the proceedings by rule are within the discretion of the court, and the rule has been refused. 1 Rich. Eq. 70. The heirs were entitled to notice to enable them to redeem, and the widow to enable her to require the personal estate to be applied to the debt. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. 21, and 6 Rich. Eq. 210, were also cited for respondent.

*176

March 12th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This was an application by a purchaser at a sale under a decree for foreclosure to be let into possession, and was resisted by the tenant in possession.

The mortgagor died after decree of foreclosure, and his widow has retained possession of the mortgaged premises since his death. The widow claims that she is entitled to dower in the premises and that she cannot be ousted until her dower is assigned. She also objects that there has been no revival of the suit since the decree, and for that reason the sale was invalid and the purchaser not entitled to be let into possession. The Circuit judge refused the motion and the purchaser appeals.

The decree of foreclosure, rendered during the lifetime of the mortgagor, binds all parties to the suit and all others who have acquired an interest in the mortgaged lands since the notice of lis pendens. The widow claims the title in herself. Her possession of the mortgaged premises appears to have been obtained since decree and by the death of her husband. So far as the execution of the decree involved only the sale of the mortgaged premises, it was capable of being enforced after the death of the mortgagor, and without reviver, being in the nature of a proceeding in rem. Hays v. Thomas, 56 N. Y. 521; Harrison v. Simons, 3 Edw. Ch. 394.

A question has been made as to the effect of the death of the mortgagor upon the capacity of the decree for enforcement without reviver, in view of the fact claimed that by the terms of the decree the equity of redemption is not barred until actual sale of the mortgaged premises under it. Assuming this to be the proper construction of the decree, the only effect would be that the persons entitled to take the mortgaged lands at the death of the *mortgagor would be entitled to redeem at any time prior to the actual sale. It is not alleged that any such right of redemption has been exercised or asserted by the parties who succeeded the mortgagor, as it regards the land in suit, nor do such parties resist the appellant's motion to be let into possession as detrimental to such right of redemption. It is not, therefore, necessary to consider the effect of the sale upon the rights of parties occupying that position. The widow of the mortgagor, the only party resisting the appellant, does not assert the possession of an equity of redemption. If she had released her dower to the mortgagee she would be entitled to an equity of redemption. 2 Jones on Mort., § 1067. Her position is, that she is entitled to dower as against the mortgage. Her rights, as claimed, not being subject to the mortgage, she is not compelled to prosecute them through a mere equity of redemption. As to her, the question of the effect of the outstanding right of redemption upon the validity of the sale has no relevancy.

*177

But the question whether the equities of redemption of certain parties remain unbarred, concerns the operation of the decree for a purpose entirely distinct and different from that of giving efficacy to the sale. A sale for foreclosure may be valid and yet subject to unextinguished equities of redemption. The only question here is, was the decree authority for a sale? It is clear upon reason and the authorities that it was.

Assuming the right of the respondent to dower, still she was a mere trespasser on the land of her husband after the expiration of her quarantine. McCully v. Smith, 2 Bail. 103; Lamar v. Scott, 4 Rich. 516. She could not retain the land as against the heirs of her husband until the admeasurement of her dower, much less as against the alienee of her husband. The appellant having title under the husband's mortgage occupies the place of his alienee.

The refusal of the Circuit judge to grant the motion of the appellant was erroneous, and the order dismissing the petition must be set aside and the case remanded for an order conformable to the prayer of the petitioner.

*178

*McGOWAN, A. J. I concur. The widow's possession came through her husband, and she is as much bound by the decree as he would be. This does not touch the question of her dower.

McIVER, A. J. I dissent. According to my view, a purchaser at a judicial sale of land cannot resort to the summary proceeding by rule to eject any persons whom he may find in possession, unless such persons are parties to the action under which the land was sold, or their privies; and, as in this case, it does not appear that Mrs. Wilson was either a party or privy to the action, I think the Circuit judge was right in discharging the rule, and that his order should be affirmed.

Motion granted.

---

13 S. C. 178

(Case No. 827.)

LEE v. BUCK & CO.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⟸15.]

Where two causes affecting, in part, the same property, were heard together, but not consolidated, the failure to appeal from the judgment in one case is no ground for a dismissal of an appeal in the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 60; Dec. Dig. ⟸15.]

[2. Chattel Mortgages ⟸265.]

Certain personal property, including a mule, Kit, was mortgaged to A, and the same property was subsequently mortgaged to B, except Kit, which had been, meantime, sold by the mortgagor to C. Upon default, A and B, in concert, seized the property, including Kit, and sold it for more than enough to satisfy A's mortgage, and A paid the balance to B. Held, that A was liable to account to C out of such balance for the value of Kit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 546; Dec. Dig. ⟸265.]

Before Townsend, J, Horry, June, 1877.

Action commenced November 16th, 1875, by Ethel Lee against William L. Buck, B. L. Beaty, Joseph Todd and others, to recover the value of two mules, Kit and Jack. The claim for the value of Jack was abandoned before the hearing of the appeal.

On December 31st, 1872, W. F. Hardee gave to Joseph Todd, to secure a debt, a mortgage upon four mules, Kit, Jake, Pete *and Jack. On March 10th, 1873, Hardee sold Kit to Ethel Lee for $200, paid by a credit on a past-due note. May 14th, 1873, Hardee mortgaged the mules Jake, Pete and Jack, and also mule Lucy, and one other, and also some other property, to W. L. Buck & Co., to secure a debt. About the last of May, 1873, plaintiff purchased Jack from Hardee for balance due him by Hardee on his note. Hardee died intestate July 21st, 1873, and four days afterwards, Todd and Buck & Co., in concert, seized all of the above property included in either mortgage, except the unnamed mule, and disposed of them as follows: Todd sold Pete and Jake for $200 each, and kept Lucy at $200; W. L. Buck & Co. sold Kit for $200, and kept Jack at $150. Todd being overpaid, turned balance over to Buck & Co.

*179

Joanna R. Hardee administered upon estate of W. F. Hardee, and as administratrix brought her two actions, one against Todd, and the other against Buck & Co., for an account of the proceeds of these sales. While these actions were pending the plaintiff here brought this action. The three cases were referred to the same referee, and it was ordered that Ethel Lee's case should be heard in connection with Joanna Hardee's cases, on the coming in of the referee's reports. Separate judgments were rendered by the Circuit Court. In this case, he confirmed the report of the referee and gave judgment for the defendants. The defendants appealed upon the following grounds, to wit:

1. That the judge erred in holding that Joseph Todd and W. L. Buck & Co., acting in concert, had not only the right to seize and sell the mouse-colored mule Pete, the black mule Jake, the gray mule Jack, and the wagon and harness, which were covered by both mortgages, and which were taken as being worth $615—over $200 more than sufficient to pay the mortgage of Todd—but also the black mule Kit, which was not covered by the mortgage to W. L. Buck & Co., having been sold to plaintiff before the last-named mortgage was given.

2. That the judge erred in holding that the proceeds arising from the mule Kit, made by W. L. Buck & Co., were properly applied to the payment of their debt against the estate of W. F. Hardee, though the mule was not covered by their *mortgage, but had been sold before its execution to the plaintiff.

*180

3. That the judge erred in holding that even Joseph Todd had the right to seize and sell the mule Kit, under his mortgage, until he had seized and sold the other property secured by his mortgage. And it is submitted, that even then he could only do it upon the other property being insufficient to satisfy the debt secured by the same.

The respondents moved to dismiss the appeal because that appellant could not appeal from the judgment in this case, without also appealing from the judgment in the Hardee cases, as both of said judgments must be taken as one.

Mr. W. D. Johnson, for appellant.

Mr. Joseph Walsh, contra.

March 12th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that, by an order of the Circuit Court, this cause was consolidated with two others of such a nature that the result of a judgment for the plaintiff in this case would be required to be harmonized with the conclusions of the court in the two other cases, in order to afford the full measure of justice as between the various parties to the consolidated action. The order in question does not assume to consolidate the cases. Its propriety is not put in issue by the present appeal, and we have only to consider its effect. It directs a reference to the same referee who was acting upon the two other causes, and "that on the coming in of said referee's report that the case shall then be heard in connection with the cases of the aforesaid Joanna Hardee against the above defendants." This was not an order for consolidation, but merely for a common hearing of the three cases. There is, therefore, no ground, in fact, for the objection to the appeal of E. Lee. But even if the causes had been consolidated to the extent of giving a single judgment in the three causes, that would not prevent Lee from appealing from so much and no more of such judg*ment as, in his opinion, was material to the protection of his rights. He was under no obligation to extend his appeal to embrace matters of interest only to the other parties as involving the proper adjustment of their relative rights among themselves in the contingency of the success of Lee upon his appeal. If the result of his appeal might be such as to disturb the rights of the other parties, as among themselves, it was for them to protect themselves against this contingency by such cross-appeals as the nature of the case might require; but it is no part of the duty of an appellant to furnish to the respondents the means of adjusting, as among themselves, such rights as might be disturbed should he succeed in getting judgment on such appeal. The motion to dismiss the appeal must, therefore, be denied.

*181

The facts, so far as they are necessary to an understanding of the question brought up by the appeal, are these: Hardee mortgaged certain personal property, including the mule Kit, to Todd, and subsequently sold the mule Kit, to the plaintiff, Lee. After the sale to plaintiff, Hardee made a mortgage to Buck & Co. of the same property that he had mortgaged to Todd, except the mule Kit, which had, in the meantime, been sold to the plaintiff. Todd and Buck & Co., on the maturity of the mortgages, seized the mortgaged property, including Kit, and sold it, acting in concert for that purpose. The property brought more than enough to satisfy Todd's mortgage debt, and the balance was paid over by Todd to Buck & Co., on account of their mortgage debt. It is contended by the plaintiff that Todd should have exhausted the other mortgaged property before selling the mule Kit, which had been alienated by the mortgagor to the plaintiff, and that as the sale was made in gross, and the whole fund was more than sufficient to pay Todd's mortgage, the balance should be regarded as representing the value of Kit to the extent that might be proper for that purpose. The referee took a different view, and held that "the concert of action of Buck & Co. and Todd, when three of the mules of Hardee, were in both of their respective mortgages, seems to be proper, their valuation of the property sold and claimed fair, and the distribution equitable," and he accordingly recommends judgment for the defendants in the present suit. This conclusion *was sustained by the judgment of the Circuit Court, and that judgment is questioned by the present appeal.

*182

The plaintiff had the right to require that the property mortgaged other than that purchased by him should be sold, and the proceeds applied to the extinguishment of the mortgage before the property he had purchased should be sold. Norton v. Lewis, 3 S. C. 25. No equity that might exist between Todd and Buck & Co., growing out of the fact that Todd's mortgage covered property that could not be reached under Buck & Co's. mortgage, could override the plaintiff's equity, arising from the fact that he was a bona fide purchaser of part of the mortgaged property prior to Buck & Co.'s mortgage. So at law, if Todd had seized the whole mortgaged property and sold it for a sum greater than was necessary to satisfy the mortgage debt, and held a balance, the plaintiff, as purchaser of part of the mortgaged property, could have maintained his action against Todd for so much of such balance as properly represented the value of the property purchased by him subject to the mortgage. If Todd could not have paid over that balance to the mortgagor in disregard of plaintiff's title, of which he had notice, then, for the same reason, he could not pay that amount to Buck & Co., who were mere unsecured creditors of the mortgagor, as it regarded the proceeds of the sale of Kit. It must, therefore, be concluded that the balance remaining in the hands of Todd, after satisfying his mortgage to the extent necessary for that purpose, must be regarded as representing the proceeds of the sale of Kit, and Todd must account therefor to the plaintiff.

The fact that the seizure and sale were the joint act of Todd and Buck & Co., does not affect this conclusion. Each of them must be regarded as acting as the agent of the other as well as in his own right. Buck & Co. could not seize and sell Kit in their own right, and must, therefore, be regarded as acting in that regard as the agents of Todd. Such being the case, Todd would stand in the same relation to the matter as if he had acted in his own behalf. The judgment must be set aside, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for proceedings in conformity with the foregoing conclusions.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. *183

*(Case No. 828.)

ADRIAN & VOLLERS v. LANE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Principal and Agent ⇐119.]

That one acted as agent in selling a tract of land, raises no presumption that he has power, after the contract is executed, to rescind the sale, or to materially modify its terms.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Knight v. Jackson, 36 S. C. 15, 14 S. E. 982; Guess v. South Bound Ry. Co., 40 S. C. 456, 19 S. E. 68.

For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 293, 391–401; Dec. Dig. ⇐119.]

[2. Exchange of Property ⇐4.]

A covenanted with B to deliver seven bales of cotton, in installments, the consideration of which was a parol promise by B to give to A, after the delivery of the cotton, a warranty title to a tract of land. Held, that the covenant to deliver was not dependent upon the promise to convey.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exchange of Property, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. ⇐4; Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1209.]

[This case is also cited in Knight v. Jackson, 36 S. C. 10, 14 S. E. 982, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Kershaw, J., Darlington, October, 1879.

Action by Adrian & Vollers v. Stephen Lane, commenced December 31st, 1878. The case is fully stated in the judgment of the Circuit Court, which is as follows:

This action was for recovery of $500 damages for the non-performance of two contracts, under seal, dated February 16th, 1876, whereby defendant covenanted with plaintiffs (of Wilmington, N. C.,) to deliver to them, at Cartersville, S. C., four bales of cotton, of four hundred and fifty pounds each, by November 1st, 1876, and three bales of like weight by November 1st, 1877. The defendant admitted the contracts as set forth, and their non-performance, but set up as a defence thereto, that the consideration was a parol undertaking to sell to the defendant six hundred acres of land, and make warranty title when the price should be paid; that defendant was soon warned not to take possession of said land, by a party claiming title, whereupon he went to the agent of the plaintiffs, who first negotiated the contract, and, being informed by said agent that the plaintiffs would not give the warranty title first agreed upon, notified him that he would no longer recognize his obligation to the plaintiffs.

The case, by consent of parties, was heard by the court.

The defendant was permitted to open and close.

The defence proved that the obligations were given for the purchase of six hundred acres of land from the plaintiffs, who *were to give defendant good title when the obligation was paid; that the negotiations were with an agent of plaintiffs; that very soon, and before defendant had taken possession, he was warned by one claiming title, not to take possession; that bringing the matters to the notice of the said agent, he informed defendant that plaintiffs would not give the warranty title first agreed upon, and defendant then gave notice that he would not fulfill his obligations, or have anything more to do with the matter; that defendant never took possession, and plaintiffs have not proposed to make titles upon receipt of the amount stipulated. The defence also proved outstanding paramount title to the land which was the subject of this contract, in another party. The plaintiffs offered no testimony, but insisted, as a matter of law, that the defendant was bound to fulfil his obligations before he could claim the performance of the plaintiffs; that the covenants of the parties were distinct and independent of each other.

*184

Finding the facts in accordance with the above-recited proofs, it is my judgment, as a matter of fact, that the obligations of the parties were mutual and dependent on each other; that the plaintiffs, subsequent to the making of the contract, distinctly disclaimed their purpose to perform their part of the contract, that defendant was not put in possession under his purchase, and never had possession; and that there was paramount outstanding title. And, as matter of law, upon this state of facts, I am of the opinion that the defendant may plead outstanding paramount title in another as a successful defence to the plaintiffs' action upon these obligations for the purchase money.

It is therefore ordered that the defendant have judgment for his costs and disbursements to be entered by the clerk of this court.

Plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. G. W. Dargan, for appellant.

First. The declarations of Andrews, subsequent to the execution of the contracts, were admitted in evidence. There is no presumption that an agent to sell has power to rescind. Unless the contrary appears, the presumption is that an agent to sell has no power to rescind. 1 Bail. 648. See, also, 2 Rich.

*185

470; 4 *Strob. 100; 4 Strob. 427; 6 Rich. 221; 7 Rich. 528; 10 Rich. 332, as illustrating the indisposition of our courts to enlarge the implied powers of agents even where the interests of third parties are involved. See, also, 1 Pars. on Cont., *58, et seq., and notes; 5 Wheat. 326. Assuming that the agency of Andrews had not terminated at the time the alleged declarations were made, it does not follow that every declaration made by him in regard to the subject matter in controversy, is binding upon his principal. The declarations of an agent are binding upon the principal only when made as agent, viz., in the discharge of the functions devolved upon him by his agency. In order to bind, declarations must form a part of the res gestæ. 1 Mills' Const. R. 409; 1 Greenl. on Ev., §§ 113, 114, 115, and notes.

From aught that appears to the contrary in this case, Andrews may have spoken simply as an individual, unofficially, and have expressed only his own opinion.

Second. Assuming that the defendant is not discharged, the next inquiry is as to the nature of said contracts.

The promise of the plaintiff to make title after the payment of the obligations of the defendant, cannot fail until the defendant has first performed his duty. The defendant's liability is to be measured by the terms of his agreement. And the pleadings and evidence showing that the plaintiffs were not to perform their said promise until after the defendant had discharged his said obligations, it is respectfully submitted that there was error in holding that the obligation of the defendant was mutual and dependent, and not independent. 2 Pars. on Cont. *527, et seq., and notes; 1 Bail. 217; 2 Mills' Const. R. 56; 42 Miss. 405; 2 Am. R. 601; Id. 671; 42 Miss. 797.

Third. Assuming that the evidence at the trial showed paramount outstanding title in a third party, the defendant is not absolved from his obligations. According to his own evidence, the plaintiffs did not claim to have title when they contracted with him. He made no inquiry in regard to their title, but executed said obligations, relying upon the promise of plaintiffs to make titles when the notes were paid.

Fourth. Its terms being ascertained, the construction of a contract is a question of law. 2 Pars. on Cont. *492, et seq., and notes.

*186

*Mr. B. W. Edwards, contra.

First. If the agent, who transacted the whole matter, acted by authority at any time, he so acted all the time. He stood between the defendant (who knew no one else in the matter) and his principals, and they are bound by all his acts and declarations. For aught we have of proof, his repudiation of the contract after it was made may have been by special instructions from them. This suggestion receives support from the fact that plaintiffs only bring suit after his mouth is closed, more than a year after the time fixed for the final discharge of defendant's obligations.

That the communication to the defendant of the plaintiffs' purpose not to comply with their contract, and his discovery of their inability to do so, justified him in treating the whole contract as broken—especially as he so notified them through their agent. This doctrine is strongly implied in 33 Ind. 54, (reported in 5 Am. R. 477.) And a similar principle underlies the doctrine of the entirety of a contract so abundant in our reports. See 37 Ind. 1, (reported in 10 Am. R. 62.) So the false representation of plaintiffs as to their right to convey, implied in their promise to convey with warranty, was sufficient to justify the defendant in denying his further liability, when the misrepresentation was discovered, and is a good defence to the action.

Second. The covenants between these parties were mutually dependent, and that the plaintiffs cannot recover without proving at least a tender of performance.

This is a question of intent and meaning; and, perhaps, more a question of fact than of law. If so, the presiding judge has found the fact, and this court will not disturb the finding. It is true that the defendant said "the notes were first to be paid, and then titles were to be made." But this was only a form of statement; that titles were not to be made before "the notes" were paid.

The testimony was, as stated by the judge, that the title was to be given when the obligation was paid. It is evident that this is the true construction, from the fact that the covenants of the contracting parties are evidenced by one instrument only, and the consideration of that agreement, which rests in parol, is the cove*nant of the plaintiffs. See 2 Mills' Const. R. 56, and particularly 42 Miss. 797, (reported in 2 Am. R. 671.)

*187

March 12th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an action to recover damages for the breach of two contracts, under seal, executed on the same day, whereby the defendant promised, in one of the said contracts, to deliver to the plaintiffs, at a specified place, four bales of cotton, of a specified weight and quality, on November 1st, 1876, and the other promised to deliver to the plaintiffs, at the same place, three bales of cotton, of like weight and quality, on November 1st, 1877. The defendant, in his answer, admitted the execution of the said contracts, which are spoken of in the testimony as notes, and the nonperformance of the same, but set up as a defence the following: "That said contracts were negotiated with one Col. Andrews, who represented himself as acting for the plaintiffs, and that the consideration was a verbal promise or undertaking that plaintiffs would make titles to defendant of a tract of land in said county of six hundred acres, more or less, and warrant and defend the same unto defendant when payment was made; that soon after the making of said contracts, defendant was notified by another claimant that he had paramount titles to said land, and was warned not to take possession upon pain of being treated as a trespasser; that thereupon defendant declined to take possession of said land, and refused to pay the amount stipulated without better assurances, which plaintiffs declined to give, and the said Andrews, for the plaintiffs, notified defendant that the plaintiffs would not give title with the guaranties first stipulated; that the refusal and inability of plaintiffs to make good and sufficient titles to said land absolved defendant from his obligation —never having been in possession; that defendant is willing, and has ever been, to pay the price stipulated for said land, provided the same can be confirmed to him by unshadowed titles, which plaintiffs have never tendered and which defendant denies they are able to give, and defendant challenges title in plaintiffs at all." It will be observed that there is no allegation and there was no proof that the plaintiffs undertook to deliver possession of the land to the defendant. For *aught that appears it may be that the defendant bought at a risk and knew that he was so buying. Indeed, if we may be allowed to conjecture upon the subject, it would seem from the price agreed to be paid that the land must either have been of a very inferior quality, or that the uncertainty as to the title and the difficulty of obtaining possession very materially reduced its market value. Be that as it may, however, as in the absence of any proof upon the subject, we have no means of determining which would be the correct inference, there is one thing very certain, and that is that all the plaintiffs covenanted on their part to do was to give warranty titles for the land after the notes (so called) were paid; the language of defendant, in his own testimony, being: "The consideration of the said contracts was a verbal promise to convey, with warranty as to title, a certain tract of wood and swamp land when the notes were paid; that the notes were first to be paid, and then titles were to be made." Now, there is no evidence whatever to show that the plaintiffs have ever refused, or declared their purpose to refuse, to give the warranty titles agreed upon, except that which is supposed to be derived from the declarations of Andrews, which will be presently considered; nor is there any evidence to show that the defendant has ever notified the plaintiffs of their inability to obtain possession of the land, or called upon them to make good their agreement to warrant the title. But defendant relies solely upon proof of certain declarations of Andrews, who was dead at the time of the trial, alleged to have been made a short time after the execution of said contracts, to the effect "that the plaintiffs would not make warranty title as originally promised." This testimony was objected to by the plaintiffs, upon the ground that no declaration of Andrews made subsequent to the execution of the contracts sued upon, would be competent until it was shown that, at the time such declarations were made, Andrews was acting as the agent of the plaintiffs and speaking by their authority. The Circuit judge ruled "that, inasmuch as Andrews had negotiated the original contract, the presumption was that his authority as to the matter continued until the contract was executed or consummated, and therefore his declarations were admissible." To this ruling the plaintiffs excepted, and this raises the first ques*tion for our consideration. We think the exception was well taken. The rule that there is no presumption that an agent to sell has power to rescind the sale or materially modify its terms, after it has become an executed contract, is well settled, and is fully sustained by the authorities cited in appellant's brief. Indeed, it does not appear that the declarations here in question even purported to come from Andrews, as agent of the plaintiffs, and may, therefore, have been nothing more than an expression of his individual opinion as to what the plaintiffs would do. Such, indeed, would seem to be the legitimate inference from the testimony of the defendant himself, for, in speaking of this matter, he uses this language: "That Col. Andrews informed him that the plaintiffs would not make warranty title as promised originally: that he did not know whether or not Col. Andrews spoke by authority from plaintiffs, but presumed he did, as he was their agent." He does not even say that Andrews represented himself as speaking for the plaintiffs, or that he inquired whether such was the fact. But it is manifest that he relied upon the presumption which, as we have seen, is not well founded, that because Andrews was the agent of the plaintiffs in making the original contract of the sale, his agency not only continued, but invested him with the power to rescind the sale or materially modify its terms.

*188

*189

The next question to be considered is, whether the covenants of the parties were mutual and dependent or independent. The first rule laid down by Mr. Sergeant Williams, in his elaborate note to the case of Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 310, as a test by which to determine whether the covenants of the several parties to a contract are mutual and dependent or independent, is as follows: "If a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance, for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent." This doctrine is recognized and applied in Carter v. Carter, 1 Bail. 217. Now, in the case under consideration, the money *was to be paid in installments—that is to say, the cotton, which constituted the consideration of the plaintiffs' promise to convey, was to be delivered in installments—a part of it long before the plaintiffs could be called upon to perform their part of the contract, and, according to the evidence of the defendant himself, all of it was to be delivered before the plaintiffs were bound to perform their covenant, for he says "the notes were first to be paid and then titles were to be made." The fact, if indeed such be the fact, that the plaintiffs had no title, or no valid title, to the land at the time the contract was made, or even at the time this action was commenced, cannot alter the case. Their contract was to convey with warranty, and, for aught that appears, (the declarations of Andrews being incompetent evidence,) this they were ready and willing to do upon the payment of the notes, as they are called. For, though having no title when the action was commenced, they might, for the purpose of enabling them to perform their covenant, have acquired title in time to enable them to do so, as in the case of Davis v. Woodward, 2 Mills' Const. R. 56.

*190

Under the view which we have taken of the case, it becomes unimportant to consider the sufficiency of the proof of the outstanding paramount title. The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside, and a new trial is ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 190

(Case No. 829.)

CONGDON, HAZARD & CO. v. MORGAN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Partnership ⇐160.]

A purchased from B his patronage and good will in the towage business, B agreeing further not to engage, directly or indirectly, in such business. Subsequently B entered into a mercantile partnership with C, and C acted as agent for another in procuring towage business for his tug. Held, that B was responsible for all acts of C done under the authority of the firm, or within the scope of the partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 190; Dec. Dig. ⇐160.]

*191

[2. Partnership ⇐160.]

Held further, that if the firm gave their patronage in the towage business to any other than A, or if C, under the authority he possessed as a member of the firm, acted as agent for another tug, it would be a breach of B's covenant, whether he knew of such employment and agency or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 190–300; Dec. Dig. ⇐160.]

[3. Good Will ⇐6.]

All acts of the firm in procuring or employing a tug, were breaches of B's covenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Good Will, Cent. Dig. §§ 2–5; Dec. Dig. ⇐6.]

[4. Trial ⇐256.]

A general charge, within the limits of which the jury may properly find a verdict, but which fails to define accurately the application of the law to the evidence, is not error, there being no prayer for more specific instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 628; Dec. Dig. ⇐256.]

Before Hudson, J., Georgetown, November, 1879.

This action was commenced in May, 1878. The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court. The charge of the judge to the jury was as follows:

Whatever A. J. McQuaid, as a member of the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, did to procure towage for the "Thomas Morgan," would make Arthur Morgan responsible. If the firm of Morgan & McQuaid gave their patronage in the towage business to any than the plaintiffs, whether Morgan knew of it or not, it would be a breach of Morgan's covenant to give his patronage to the plaintiff. McQuaid, acting as the agent of the "Thomas Morgan," (without regard to who was her owner), would be an indirect engagement in the towage business by the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, and hence by Morgan, for Morgan's capital was in the firm, whether he gave the business his personal attention or not. So that if you believe, from the testimony, that the "Thomas Morgan" was brought here and put into the towage business by the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, or, that while here, that firm gave her their patronage in that business, either would be a breach of his covenant by Morgan not to engage directly or indirectly in the towage business, but to give his patronage to the plaintiffs.

If you find that there has been a breach of the contract by the defendant, the next inquiry will be what damages the plaintiffs are entitled to in consequence of such breach. The only actual damage of which they have given any evidence, is the towage price of three vessels, towed by the "Morgan," one for $42, another for $65, and another, if loaded with lumber, for $120, *making $227. But plaintiffs contend that they are certainly entitled to the consideration paid by them, of $4000, with interest thereon from the time of payment. I do not think so. The plaintiffs testified that they are engaged in a general mercantile business, buying rice, distilling turpentine, chartering and loading vessels, and the towage business; and that their business of towage is so interwoven and involved with their general business, that the breach of this contract has inflicted injury on them outside of the towage business, and in respect to their general business, but that they are unable to state the amount of such loss. This is about all the testimony on the subject of damages. In estimating damages, you will first take the sums in evidence, as the price of the towage of the three vessels, and allow such further sum short of $10,000, as, in your view, the plaintiffs may have suffered in their business generally, on account of the breach of this bond. Damages is a question for your consideration entirely.

*192

To this charge, the defendants excepted. Verdict for plaintiff for $6951.34.

Defendants appealed.

Mr. R. Dozier, for appellants.

McQuaid was partner of Morgan, and, as such, was general agent of Morgan within the scope of the partnership. Story on Part., § 101; 3 Kent 40–42. A partner dealing outside of the partnership business is presumed to be acting for himself; and so he must be regarded by all who deal with him. 3 Kent 41–44; Story on Agency, § 125; Sm. Merc. Law 70. Morgan's covenant did not prohibit him from entering into a partnership to carry on a mercantile business; if it did not prevent him, it could not prevent McQuaid. McQuaid, notwithstanding the partnership, could engage in the towage business; and his acts, as such, were not the acts of Morgan. As a partner, he had no right to make towage engagements binding upon the firm. And if such engagements do not bind the firm, they cannot bind an ignorant partner. Story on Part., § 126. But the judge's charge makes Morgan responsible for acts done outside of the partnership, without his consent or knowledge. *Id., §§ 168, 168a, 177. And if McQuaid could act for himself, without prejudice to Morgan, he certainly could act as agent for another.

*193

As to the measure of damages, the learned counsel cited Sedg. on Meas. of Dam, *200, *210, *229; 2 Greenl. on Ev., §§ 254, 256, 261; 1 McM. 115; Sedg. Lead. Cas. 332, 127, 136, 543, 159, 271, 247; 2 Speers 550; 1 Pet. C. C. 86; Dud. 182; 8 Reporter 123, 300, 670; 35 N. Y. 210; 62 Penna. St. 353; 27 Geo. 481; 15 M. & W. 117; 10 S. C. 450; 14 Rich. 186.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

March 12th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This action was upon a money bond, with a condition in the nature of a covenant by which the obligor agreed to withdraw from the towage business in the port of Georgetown, and he would not, "directly or indirectly, engage therein again for and during the period of twenty years;" that a certain tug therein named belonging to the obligor should not be used for that purpose by any person to whom the same might be sold for two years, and should not be used for that purpose by the obligor for twenty years; and the obligor further covenanted to "give his own patronage in the towing business" to the plaintiffs, or the survivor of them, and to "give them his good will in their said business of towage in and for the port, harbor and waters of the said town, for and during the said period."

The complaint alleges a breach and damages resulting therefrom, and demands judgment for the penalty of the bond. The facts of the case, so far as they are necessary to the understanding of the questions of law brought up by the appeal, are as follows: The obligor had, previous to the giving of the bond, been engaged in the towage business, using the tug named in the bond for that purpose, and the plaintiffs, being desirous of carrying on such business, paid a large sum as the actual consideration of the obligation assumed by the defendant, by which it was agreed in substance that the obligor should retire from competi*tion with the plaintiffs in said business, and would give them his good will and patronage. The defendant subsequently became a member of the mercantile firm of Morgan & McQuaid. The son of the obligor undertook to carry on the business of towage at that port during the time to which the covenant related, and McQuaid, the partner of defendant, acted as his agent. The question at issue was whether the defendant was, in law or in fact, implicated directly or indirectly in the conduct of this competition with the business of the plaintiffs, and whether he is answerable for withholding his good will and patronage, contrary to his covenant, from the plaintiffs in the conduct of said business.

*194

The Circuit judge charged "that whatever A. J. McQuaid did, as a member of the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, to procure towage for the Thomas Morgan, would make Arthur Morgan responsible." The Thomas Morgan was the vessel that was introduced in the business subsequently to the bond in competition with the plaintiffs. We must understand this as in effect charging that what McQuaid did with the authority of the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, must be regarded as having the same effect, as it regards the covenant, as if done by the obligor himself, who was a member of said firm.

When a partner acts within the scope of the partnership business, and in the due exercise of the partnership authority, he is the agent of each member of the firm individually, and of all the partners collectively. Such being the case, the act of McQuaid was the act of Arthur Morgan, his partner, when done within the scope of his partnership authority; and if the conduct of the competing business, or the interference with the good will of the business transferred, or the withholding of patronage under the control of the defendant was accomplished through the authority which McQuaid derived from defendant as his partner in any respect, the liability of the defendant is the same as if such acts had been done by him personally.

The ground of the next exception is the charge that "if the firm of Morgan & McQuaid gave their patronage to the towage business to any other than the plaintiffs, whether Morgan knew it or not, that would be a breach of Morgan's covenant to give his patronage to the plaintiffs." The knowledge of Morgan was *immaterial. As his covenant, in this respect, was to perform a positive act, namely, to give his patronage to the plaintiffs, the only material inquiry is whether such act was performed. Ignorance on the part of Morgan of what was done by those acting by his authority cannot be alleged, for he was bound to activity in performing his covenant, and that would involve the duty of informing himself as to the reasonable and proper means of performing his agreement.

*195

The court further charged that "McQuaid, acting as the agent of the Thomas Morgan, (without regard to who was her owner,) would be an indirect engagement in the business by the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, and hence by Morgan, for Morgan's capital was in the firm, whether he gave the business his personal attention or not."

Clearly, the agent, through whom a business is conducted, may, with propriety, be said to be engaged in the business, whether compensated by an interest in the profits of the business or in some other way.

Reading this part of the charge in connection with what preceded it, it is clear that it was intended by the judge, and understood by the jury, that the agency of McQuaid must be under the authority that he possessed as a partner of the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, to have such effect upon Morgan. The point of this part of the charge was that Morgan's personal knowledge was immaterial to the question of the effect of the interest that Morgan & McQuaid had in the agency, conducted by McQuaid. It cannot be assumed that it was either intended or understood that McQuaid's agency, independent of the interest that the firm had in such agency, could produce the effect pointed out by the charge. In this view, this part of the charge is free from error.

Again, the court charged: "If you believe that the Thomas Morgan was brought here and put into the towage business by the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, or that while here, that firm gave her their patronage in that business, either would be a breach of the covenant by Morgan not to engage, directly or indirectly, in the towage business, but to give his patronage to the plaintiffs." This charge was entirely free from error. After making the covenant, the obligor had no right to place himself in such a *position as to be unable to perform his engagements therein contracted; so that even if he had been unable, as a partner of the firm of Morgan & McQuaid, to control the conduct of the business of such firm in harmony with his obligations towards the plaintiffs, that fact would not excuse him. But the ability of Morgan to control the conduct of the partnership has not been put in question, and it must be assumed, that had an effort been made for that purpose, he would have succeeded in so doing.

*196

We find no error in the charge as to the measure of damages. The important part of the charge on this subject, is as follows: "In estimating damages, you will first take the sums in evidence as the price of the towage of three vessels, and allow such further sum short of $10,000, as, in your view, the plaintiffs have suffered in their business generally, on account of the breach of this bond." This charge is viewed by the appellant as violating the rule that confines damages to that which results as the natural consequence of every act complained of, and excludes remote and contingent damages. It does not appear to us that such is the effect of the charge. The inquiry which the charge pointed out to the jury, did not relate to the connection that must exist between the act of wrong and the damages entailed by it in order to satisfy the rules of law, but solely to the character of the subject of damage—that is, the nature of the business, which, under the covenant, could be alleged to have sustained damage. The defendant appears to have contended that only the immediate profits of the business of towage could be made the subject of damage, while the plaintiffs contended, that, through the relations of the towage business to the general mercantile business of the plaintiffs, damage to their general business could be considered. It was for the jury to say whether the towage business, from its nature, and from the mode in which it was conducted in the port of Georgetown, was an accessory of a general mercantile business, or a separate and distinct business by itself. If, in the view and contemplation of the parties, apparent from applying the terms of the covenant to the character of the business to which it related, the business of towage was a valuable feature of a grand mercantile business, then damage to such mercantile *business would be within the intention of the parties, and the jury could have found, where such damage was direct and immediate, that the plaintiffs have "suffered in their business generally, on account of the breach of the bond." It was competent for either of the parties to have obtained the necessary instructions to direct the jury in making such an inquiry, but no such instructions appear to have been sought, and no charge on that point given, so that it must be assumed that the jury had in view the proper understanding of the nature of the inquiry submitted to them in this part of the charge, and the limits under which it was possible for them to say that the plaintiffs had sustained damage in their general business through the breach of the bond. They were instructed to inquire whether the plaintiffs may have "suffered in their business generally, on account of the breach of the bond." Admitting that they could not suffer damages in their business generally, on account of the breach of the bond, unless there was such a connection between their general business and the particular business of towage, according to the intention of the agreement, construed with reference to the nature and customary mode of conducting such business, that an act of wrong committed in violation of the terms of the covenant would naturally and directly inflict damage upon such general business as would be the case where the business of towage was understood and intended as a mere auxiliary to the general business of the firm, still, if the jury properly applied all the legal rules pertinent to such an inquiry, which, it must be assumed, they did, no ground exists to assume that their verdict was improperly influenced by the charge, though exceedingly general in its nature. When a charge is general, as it is in the power of the parties to cause it to be made specific through the medium of proper prayers for instructions; if this is neglected, the charge will be sustained if any reasonable view can be taken of it that will harmonize it with the rules of law. The parties having the right, by properly directing the attention of the Circuit judge to what they deem material propositions of law, to secure an exact and particular application of the rules of law to this evidence, if they do not employ these means, they should not be at liberty to complain *of the indefiniteness of the charge. A general charge is not expected to distinguish accurately the line that separates matters of fact and law. If, then, the charge leaves it to the jury to define for themselves the nature of that damage which the law contemplates as the natural result of the breach of the bond, and the parties are prejudiced thereby, such prejudice must be ascribed to the want of specific instructions, and the want of such instructions in the present case to the absence of prayers for such instructions.

*197

*198

The exceptions must be overruled, and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 198

(Case No. 830.)

STATE, ex rel. McCALL, v. COHEN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Certiorari ⇐28.]

A judgment rendered by an inferior court against a party not brought within its jurisdiction by proper service of process, may be set aside under proceedings by certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 41; Dec. Dig. ⇐28.]

[2. Justices of the Peace ⇐197.]

A motion made before a trial justice to vacate, upon jurisdictional grounds, a judgment rendered by him, does not preclude proceedings by certiorari in the Circuit Court for the same purpose, where the want of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the record.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State ex rel. Nesbitt v. Marshall, 24 S. C. 508, 509, 510; State ex rel. Sawyer v. Fort, Id., 519; Benson v. Carrier, 28 S. C. 121, 5 S. E. 272; State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 594, 12 S. E. 556.

For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 770; Dec. Dig. ⇐197.]

[3. Process ⇐51.]

A service by one styling himself a constable would not be sufficient service, in the absence of a duly authorized appointment in writing for such purpose, there being no regular constables in this state elected as required by the constitution.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tinsley v. Kirby, 17 S. C. 6; Prince v. Dickson, 39 S. C. 483, 18 S. E. 33.

For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 57, 58; Dec. Dig. ⇐51.]

[4. Process ⇐127.]

Proof of service by a constable can be made to appear only by his affidavit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 155, 157; Dec. Dig. ⇐127.]

[5. Appearance ⟸26; Process ⟸67.]

A voluntary appearance, to be binding upon the defendant, under Section 162 of the code of procedure, as the equivalent of personal service, must be made before judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. ⟸26; Process, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. ⟸67.]

[6. Justices of the Peace ⟸82.]

[Where the record of a case decided by a trial justice showed that the following indorsement had been made on the original summons: "Served in person by Calvin Josey, May 7, 1877. Distance, eighteen miles for each"—held, that it failed to show that the defendant had been served with process.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 263; Dec. Dig. ⟸82.]

[7. Judgment ⟸497.]

[Cited in Barron v. Dent, 17 S. C. 80; Cothran v. Knight, 47 S. C. 243, 25 S. E. 142; State of South Carolina ex rel. J. Fraser Lyon, Attorney General, v. State Dispensary Commission, 79 S. C. 321, 60 S. E. 928; State ex rel. People's Bank of Greenville v. Goodwin, County Supervisor, 81 S. C. 428, 62 S. E. 1100; State ex rel. People's Bank of Greenville v. Goodwin, 59 S. E. 37, to the point that if the jurisdictional facts do not appear on the record the judgment is a nullity, wherever and however encountered.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 937, 938; Dec. Dig. ⟸497.]

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, March, 1879.

This was an application to the Circuit Court, in June, 1878, for a writ of certiorari, commanding a trial justice to certify the record of a judgment rendered by him in favor of the defendants *here against the relator, and setting forth several matters upon which it was claimed that the judgment was erroneous, and that the trial justice was without jurisdiction of the case. The judgment was entered May 28th, 1877. In August, 1877, the relator here moved before the trial justice to set aside the judgment upon the ground, inter alia, that no action was ever commenced in the manner required by law. This motion was refused and no appeal was taken. On July 14th, 1877, McCall had written to the trial justice, saying: "The last of April I was handed by one clerk, in Kuker's store, a demand from you to pay, in twenty days, the amount of $14.57, or you would give judgment against me for that amount; never legally served. But the next day, rather than appear at your court, I sent, per express, the amount," &c. The defects in the service of the summons by the constable are fully set forth in the opinion of the court.

*199

The Circuit judge ordered the judgment and executions to be set aside and annulled, with costs; and the defendant appealed.

[For subsequent opinion, see 16 S. C. 445, 42 Am. Rep. 641.]

Mr. R. K. Charles, for appellants.

The writ of certiorari is not a writ of right, and should not be granted when the allegations of error do not appear to be well founded. Such error must be an error of law of a jurisdictional character. 12 S. C. 111. There was another adequate remedy. 16 Stat. 60; 1 Bail. 457; Powell on App. Proc. 349, § 4. The return to the writ exhibits no error of jurisdiction on the face of the proceedings, and this is conclusive in certiorari. Id. 353, § 5. The only alleged jurisdictional error is want of service, but that was cured by his voluntary appearance and motion to set aside the judgment; and appeal was his only remedy. 1 Bail. 294.

Mr. B. O. Townsend, contra.

Trial justices are an inferior court, (2 S. C. 404) and can exercise no jurisdiction not expressly authorized by statute. 5 Cr. 184. When jurisdiction is exceeded, certiorari is the proper remedy. 2 Hill 369; 9 Rich. 292; 12 Rich. 44; 9 S. C. 303; 1 El., B. & E. 100; Hill on New Trials, 692-696; 22 Ill. 333. The trial justice was guilty of usurpation of jurisdiction, appa*rent on the record, in this: that as no constables are elected in Darlington, and no special appointment of constable appears in writing on the record (Gen. Stat. 205, § 2,) for reasons founded on Sections 122 and 161 of the code, the action was not known to have been commenced when the judgment was rendered. The relief granted in this case was proper. Hill on New Trials, ch. XX.

*200

March 15th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The object of this proceeding was to review, by certiorari, a judgment rendered by a trial justice. Such a writ cannot be demanded as a substitute for an appeal, (State v. Steuart, 5 Strob. 29,) and, therefore, if the grounds upon which it was demanded were such as could have been presented by appeal, the writ should not have been granted. But if it appears from the return that the inferior tribunal to which it was directed has undertaken to render judgment in a case of which it had no jurisdiction, or against parties who have not, by proper process, been brought within its jurisdiction, then the writ was properly granted. In this case the allegation is that the trial justice proceeded to render judgment against parties who had not been served with process or otherwise legally been made parties to the action in which the judgment was rendered. It also appears that this question was submitted to the decision of the trial justice by a motion to set aside the judgment; and it is contended that by so doing the respondent, under the rule laid down in State v. Scott, 1 Bail. 294, has precluded himself from raising the question of jurisdiction in this form, and can only do so by appeal from the decision of the trial justice on the motion to set aside the judgment. It is very true that the rule laid down in that case is that where a party submits a question of jurisdiction to the inferior court, its decision of such question has the same binding force as its decision of any other question submitted to it, and that any error in this respect must be corrected in the same manner as any other errors are corrected, viz., by appeal. But the exception to the rule is recognized by the same case; and that is, where the want of jurisdiction is apparent upon the face of the proceedings themselves. So that if the proceedings *before the trial justice in this case fail to show upon their face that the parties against whom the judgment in question was rendered were ever brought within the jurisdiction of the trial justice before the judgment was rendered, then there was such a jurisdictional defect as was reviewable by the Court of Common Pleas under the writ of certiorari, notwithstanding the fact that the party seeking the writ did submit the question of jurisdiction to the trial justice by his motion to set aside the judgment. For the rule in regard to inferior courts is, that "nothing shall be intended to be within the jurisdiction that is not expressly averred so to be." So that if the proceedings show upon their face a want of jurisdiction, or fail to show that which was necessary to confer jurisdiction, the whole is an absolute nullity, and "it is of no consequence in what way the defect is brought to the view of the court." Devall v. Taylor, Cheves 5.

*201

Upon looking into the proceedings it appears that the original summons contains the following endorsement: "Served in person by Calvin Josey, 7th May, 1877. Distance eighteen miles for each." Giving to this very informal return the construction most favorable for the appellants, it only amounts to a return that Calvin Josey, styling himself a constable, personally served each of the defendants on the day stated with a copy of the summons. This, however, is not sufficient. An action cannot be commenced except by the service of a summons, or by delivering it to the sheriff or other officers of the county, with the intent that it shall be actually served, (Code, § 122,) and the only evidence of service is either by certificate of the sheriff, if served by him, or, if by another person, the affidavit of such person, or the written admission of the defendant, (not to mention service by publication, which is wholly inapplicable to the present case.) Code, § 161. The court is bound to take judicial cognizance of the fact that there is no such officer in the state as a regular constable, inasmuch as the constitution provides that such officer "shall be chosen in each county by the qualified electors thereof, in such manner as the general assembly may direct," (Const., Art. IV., § 21,) and the statute book fails to show that any such direction has ever been given. Hence the only authority which Calvin Josey could have for styling himself constable, would be *an appointment, in writing, by a judge, trial justice or coroner, for a particular occasion, (Gen. Stat., ch. XXVI., § 2, 205, as amended by the act of 1873, 15 Stat. 512,) and no such authority appears or is alluded to anywhere in the proceedings. The action, therefore, could not be commenced by the delivery of the summons to Calvin Josey, inasmuch as he does not appear to have been either "the sheriff or other officers of the county," and there is no legal evidence that it was ever served upon any one; for, even if served by Calvin Josey, who, as we have seen, was not an officer, that fact could only be made to appear by his affidavit, which is wanting, as is likewise any evidence of a written admission of service by the defendants, or either of them.

*202

But when we look further into the return to the writ of certiorari and examine the affidavits offered on the hearing of the motion to set aside the judgment, it appears, fully, not only that Calvin Josey did not serve the summons himself, but that he did not know whether it was served by any one else. It seems to us, therefore, that it appears upon the face of the proceedings themselves that the trial justice never acquired jurisdiction in the case against the defendants, and that his judgment against them was, therefore, a nullity, and may be so declared in proceedings by certiorari.

What is termed the voluntary appearance of the defendant on the motion to set aside the judgment, cannot be regarded as equivalent to personal service of the summons, (Code, § 162,) for that, manifestly, has reference to an appearance before judgment is rendered, while here what is called the appearance was after judgment. So, too, the letter written by L. A. McCall to the trial justice, which is treated by that officer as an acknowledgment, in writing, of the service of the summons, is insufficient for that purpose, for that also was written long after the judgment was rendered, and the question is as to whether the trial justice had acquired jurisdiction as against the defendants at the time he rendered judgment against them.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. *203

*(Case No. 831.)

MITCHELL v. PINCKNEY.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Judicial Sales ⇐53.]

In sales of land, particularly by public officers, a warranty cannot be implied; and, therefore, to an action for the purchase money, the defence of failure of consideration growing out of a breach of the contract, cannot be sustained. Cases cited.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in City of Charleston v. Blohme, 15 S. C. 125, 40 Am. Rep. 690; Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 508, 511, 19 S. E. 855, 44 Am. St. Rep. 739.

For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 104–107; Dec. Dig. ⇐53.]

[2. Judicial Sales ⇐53.]

But where there is a misrepresentation as to quantity which misleads a purchaser exercising proper diligence, he is entitled, in an action for the purchase money, to an abatement for the value of the deficiency.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Thompson v. Wofford, 13 S. C. 219; City of Charleston v. Blohme, 15 S. C. 126, 40 Am. Rep. 690; Lessly v. Bowie, 27 S. C. 197, 3 S. E. 199; Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 405, 14 S. E. 829; Godfrey v. E. P. Burton Lumber Co., 88 S. C. 136, 70 S. E. 396.

For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 104–107; Dec. Dig. ⇐53.]

[3. Judicial Sales ⇐53.]

Where, however, the purchaser, after his bid, becomes informed of the deficiency, and then complies with the terms of sale by giving his bond and mortgage and accepting title deeds, he thereby waives such defect.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 515, 19 S. E. 855, 44 Am. St. Rep. 739; People's Bank of Greenville v. Bramlett, 58 S. C. 482, 36 S. E. 912, 79 Am. St. Rep. 855; Coleman v. Whittle, 79 S. C. 216, 60 S. E. 523, 128 Am. St. Rep. 841; Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. McLucas, 87 S. C. 357, 69 S. E. 670.

For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 104–107; Dec. Dig. ⇐53.]

[4. Mortgages ⇐415; Partition ⇐109.]

Having taken possession, the expenditure meanwhile of large sums upon the property, and a notification to the officer who made the sale that an abatement would be claimed on account of the deficiency, does not affect the waiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1220; Dec. Dig. ⇐415; Partition, Cent. Dig. § 388; Dec. Dig. ⇐109.]

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, March, 1879.

Nothing need be added to the statement of the case contained in the opinion of the court, except the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

This cause was heard upon the pleadings and the testimony taken before the referee.

The action is for the foreclosure of a mortgage, given for the purchase money of certain lots of land, with machinery, buildings and structure thereon, known as the Tyler Cotton Press. The defence is a partial failure of consideration.

It appears that on March 19th, A. D. 1874, under certain proceedings had in this court, in a cause entitled Gibbes v. Gourdin and others, several lots of land, with machinery, buildings and structures thereon, known as the Tyler Cotton Press, exhibited upon a plat, were sold at public auction in the city of Charleston, R. Q. Pinckney, a defendant herein, became the purchaser, and went immediately into possession of the property. There was some question whether this was with the consent of the parties. But it does not affect the case.

*204

*Before complying with the terms of sale, which were part cash and a part credit, he placed the muniments of title in the hands of his attorneys for examination.

During the examination it was discovered by the attorneys employed by him that the title of one of the lots, supposed to be a part of the Tyler Cotton Press, was in a third person.

This discovery was communicated to the defendant Pinckney, but was made known to no one of the parties in the suit or their attorneys, who, it is clear from the testimony, knew nothing of it. Notwithstanding this discovery, Pinckney, under the advice of his counsel, complied with the terms of sale, paid in the cash portion of the purchase money, and executed the bonds and mortgage to the full amount of his bid. These are the bonds and mortgage now in suit. The next day he gave notice of the deficiency.

It is the law of this state, that a purchaser, even at public sale for partition, by an officer of the court, may protect himself from any deficiency in the quantity or defect in the title of land, as well as personalty sold, in an action for the recovery of a bond or note for the purchase money. He can avail himself of this defence, if he purchased innocently, without notice of this defect.

As matters of fact, I find in this case that Pinckney had a general knowledge of the Tyler Cotton Press property before the sale, and of the purpose for which it was intended and used. That the plat referred to in the advertisement of sale, and which was a part of the title, in itself contained enough to put him upon the inquiry. That he completed purchase with full knowledge of the alleged defect in the title, after full notice thereof, and notwithstanding such notice, and that he cannot avail himself of such defect in this suit. It is ordered, &c.

From this decree defendant appealed.

Mr. G. R. Walker, for appellant.

The equitable rule is in favor of the purchaser; "that although he can not have a partial interest forced upon him, yet if he entered into the contract in ignorance of the vendor's incapacity to give him the whole, and chooses afterwards to take as much as he can get," he has a right "to insist on that with compensa*tion for the defect." Adams'

*205

Eq. *91, and cases cited in note. This doctrine is the law in this state. 1 Bay 276; 2 Id. 11, 558; 1 McC. 121; 1 N. & McC. 78; 2 Id. 76; 9 Rich. 515; 9 S. C. 287; 17 Ves. 395; Harp. 441. Misrepresentation, when coupled with failure of consideration, is even stronger ground for such recoupment. 1 Bay 277; 2 Bay 17; 4 Reporter 238, 271.

The purchaser having gone into possession in March, having begun repairs, and incurred heavy obligations prior to the discovery of the misrepresentation and deficiency, he could only comply with the terms of sale and ask recoupment. Kerr on F. & M. 338–9.

And courts of equity will certainly relieve from the effects of misrepresentation. Id. 53–4; 1 N. & McC. 81; Waterman on Set-off 570, 571; Rice 325; 1 McC. 121. And such misrepresentation, though unintentional, is, nevertheless, a fraud perpetrated upon the purchaser. Kerr on F. & M. 53–4, 56–68. But the plaintiff knew that she had already sold lot No. 1. The doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to judicial sales where there is mistake, fraud or failure. In partition proceedings the sheriff is the agent of the parties. Cases above cited. See, too, 10 S. C. 164. And the facts clearly show that there has been no waiver by the defendant.

Mr. H. E. Young, contra.

There was no deficiency in the quantity of the land sold. Defendant and his partners bought the Tyler Cotton Press and have got it. 2 Mills' Const. R. 100; Harp. 290; 1 Rich. 491; 2 Id. 485; 2 Strob. 374; 3 Id. 127; Rice's Eq. 55; 1 Rich. Eq. 427; 2 Johns. 37; 6 Binn. 102. If there was deficiency, defendant is entitled to no abatement of price, as the contract was executed with full knowledge of the deficiency. Story's Eq. Jur., § 202; 2 Kent 473; 4 Id. 554; Sudg. on V. & P. 399, 403, 506, 680, 685; 4 N. H. 397; 4 Wall. 232; 2 Wheat. 15; 9 Id. 616; 1 Bay 276; 2 Bay 11; 1 McC. 121; 2 Spears 9; 2 Strob. Eq. 154; 1 Rich. Eq. 409; 6 Rich. 361; 9 Id. 516. Taking possession, as Pinckney did, was a waiver of all objections to the title. Sudg. on V. & P. 168, 398, 506, 682;

*206

L. R., 9 Eq. 51; *2 Exch. 783; 1 Jac. & W. 221; McC. Ch. 405; McM. Eq. 59; 4 Desaus. 134; 3 Strob. Eq. 171; 1 Rich. Eq. 407; 4 Rich. 114, 9 S. C. 35.

Messrs. C. H. Simonton and W. H. Brawley, on same side.

Mr. J. B. Campbell, in reply.

March, 15th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. A. R. Mitchell, Robert Mure, S. Gourdin and James S. Gibbes, as A. R. Mitchell & Co., were the owners of the property in the city of Charleston known as "The Tyler Cotton Press," which consisted of the cotton press proper and several small lots adjacent. All the parties died except J. S. Gibbes, who, as survivor, in order to partition the property, instituted proceedings against the heirs and representatives of his deceased partners, entitled James S. Gibbes v. Anna J. Gourdin and others.

In this case an order was made for the sale of the partnership property, including the cotton press and the lots attached to it. On March 19th, 1874, the referee in the case, A. M. Huger, for the sheriff, C. C. Bowen, had the premises sold at public auction, upon the terms of one-fourth cash and the remainder in three equal annual installments. The sale was made under published advertisement, prepared by the referee "from the best sources in his possession," which was read at the sale, and which, so far as this property is concerned, is as follows: "All that lot, piece or parcel of land, known as the Tyler Cotton Press, with the buildings, tenements, hereditaments, machinery, steam engines, fixtures, presses and appurtenances thereunto belonging, situate, lying and being on East Bay street, Longitude lane and Church street, in the city of Charleston, which said lot of land is made up of several lots of land, and is generally described as follows: Butting and bounding to the east partly on East Bay street, and partly on land belonging to Godard Bailey; to the south, on lands now or late of estate Heilbron and estate Kirkpatrick; to the north, on Longitude lane, on land formerly of Miss Copdeville, and on land formerly of Godard Bailey; and west, on *Church street, and land formerly of estate of Miss Copdeville, measuring and containing on the east line, seventy feet eight inches, on the south line, four hundred and forty-one feet eleven inches, west, on Church street twenty-five feet, on the north line on lot of Miss Copdeville, one hundred and twenty-seven feet eleven inches, then north to Longitude lane, one hundred and forty-six feet six inches, then south twenty-five feet, then easterly again, two hundred and thirty-nine feet three inches; all of which is particularly and accurately described in a plat of five lots situated in Ward 1, belonging to the Tyler Steam Cotton Press Company, made by R. Q. Pinckney in June, 1853, and recorded in Plat Book A No. 1, page 89."

*207

At the sale, the appellant, R. Q. Pinckney, † for himself and others, including James S. Gibbes, the plaintiff, bid off the property, and he now makes defence, insisting on an abatement of the purchase money to the extent of the value of one of the lots connected with the cotton press, and known as lot No. 1, which, he alleges, was embraced in the sale, but as to which the consideration has failed. It is not easy to make the facts clear, as the plat cannot accompany this judgment, but we will endeavor to make them intelligible. The plat referred to was exhibited. It represented the cotton press proper, which was a well-known property, and adjacent thereto other small lots marked Nos. 1 and 2. The lots marked Nos. 3, 4 and 5, as we understand it, were parts of the cotton press proper. The lot No. 1, about which this controversy has arisen, lies in the southeast corner of the premises covered by the plat, is shaded blue, all the other parcels being yellow, and in reference to it, the plat has on its face this memorandum: "Note—Since the above survey was made, the parties interested in the purchase of the lots Nos. 1 and 2 have consented to make the south side of the passage the north boundary of the lot No. 1, which is now shaded blue. Done this day of June 28th, 1853, and signed R. Q. Pinckney."

†The surveyor and the purchaser bear the same name, but are different persons.—REPORTER.

Immediately after the sale, the appellant employed his attorney to look into the titles, and, pending the examination, *took possession of the press and received the proceeds of its business. After controversy, as to who should make the title and several orders on the subject, finally the sheriff executed a deed of the premises, usual in such cases, without warranty, but describing the property in the terms of the advertisement, and left it in the hands of the referee as an escrow, pending the delay incident to the examination of titles. April 14th, the attorney of appellant wrote to the referee, saying: "Our clients have instructed us to pay over to you the first installments of the purchase money on receiving proper deeds of conveyance." A few days after—certainly not later than May 1st—the attorney of appellant discovered that lot No. 1, at the time of the sale, was not the property of the vendors, but, some time before the filing of the proceedings in partition of James S. Gibbes, had been sold to another, whose tenant was in possession. Correspondence was afterwards had as to who should make the title, but no reference was made to the alleged deficiency until June 3d, when notice of it was given to the sheriff by letter, left at his office, which he did not receive until the next day, and possession of lot No. 1, or abatement for its value demanded, which was declined. The next day, June 4th, the appellant, through his attorney—without saying anything about the deficiency—paid to the referee the cash installment with interest from the day of sale and executed for the whole credit portion of the purchase money, four bonds, amounting in the aggregate to $9750, and "mortgage of the premises to secure the same, in compliance with the terms of sale." June 5th, he demanded from the referee possession of lot No. 1, "as we have complied with our part of the terms of sale," and notified him in writing not to assign bonds or distribute the cash which he had paid him the day before. Under this notice, the referee refused to deliver title deed, which had been retained to make endorsements, and offered to return money, bonds and mortgage. Appellant made some application to Judge Graham (it is not before us) to compel the referee to deliver title deed and for abatement, which was dismissed without prejudice, and does not further affect the case. The notice which the appellant had given to the referee not to pay out was "annulled without prejudice," and demand for title deed to the *"Tyler Cotton Press" renewed, which was delivered to him July 2d. The four bonds executed to C. C. Bowen, sheriff, were divided among the parties in interest. One of them was assigned to Miss Anna R. Mitchell, as executrix of A. R. Mitchell, deceased, and upon that she instituted these proceedings to foreclose the mortgage. The appellant, in his answer, renews his claim for "an abatement as a recoupment on the face of the bonds," to the extent of the value of lot No. 1. The Circuit judge refused to allow the defence, and decreed a foreclosure for the whole amount of the unpaid purchase money, and from that decree the appeal comes to this court.

*208

*209

Some of our cases have gone very far in allowing such defences. The grounds upon which they have been placed are not always clear, and sometimes apparently inconsistent. But the view which underlies them all seems to be this: That an action for the price of property is in some sort a proceeding to enforce a contract, and the equitable principle applies of refusing aid to enforce it except in such way as to do justice between the parties. It may be that this tendency has been increased by a desire to prevent multiplicity of suits, and by not always keeping in view the difference between real and personal property. But by whatever cause produced, we are satisfied that these discrepancies are more apparent than real, and that the rulings, as distinguished from the dicta of the cases, can be vindicated upon well-settled principles. The law requires that all contracts concerning the transfer of land shall be in writing. A purchaser must protect himself by covenants. It follows that where there is no express warranty none can be implied. Omission to warrant disproves intention to warrant, and if that could be contradicted by implication it would be not only creating a contract against the intention but proving it by parol. As to land, there can be no such thing as failure of consideration growing out of a breach of contract, or, as it is sometimes expressed, the equitable condition of sale; otherwise there would be, so far as that defence is concerned, no difference between a quit claim and a warranty. We are of opinion that the proper principle is, that in cases without warranty the purchaser, when sued for the purchase money, may set up any defence which is independent of *contract and constitutes a demand against the vendor in the nature of a cross-action, such as fraud or misrepresentation, and that this is the extent to which such defence can go. All the cases can be harmonized upon this principle. A careful examination of them as to real estate in which abatement has been allowed, will show either that there was warranty, or, if no warranty, that there was fraud or misrepresentation. We will not encumber this opinion by citing and commenting upon the cases separately, but adopt the statement of Judge Evans in the case of Evans v. Dendy: "It is now more than half a century since the case of Gray v. Handkinson was decided, and during all that time I do not find a case where the mere failure of consideration without warranty has been set up by way of defence or any action brought to recover back the money—a circumstance from which it may be fairly inferred that it has never been supposed such defence could be made or such action maintained." Means v. Brickell, 2 Hill 657; Evans v. Dendy, 2 Speers 10 [42 Am. Dec. 356] Rogers v. Horn, 6 Rich. 361.

*210

These principles apply with increased force to sales made by public officers. In sheriff's sales under execution, the rule of caveat emptor is absolute, and that is the general doctrine as to judicial sales made under order of court. It is true that in such sales in this state the officer of the court is, in some sense, the agent of the parties, and, while the absolute rule of caveat emptor may not apply as in forced sales, yet it is well settled that in judicial sales of real estate there is no implied warranty. Commissioner v. Thompson, 4 McC. 434; Rorer on Jud. Sales 177, where the authorities are collected. The rule is not so well established where the sale is of personal property, as to which we have adopted the civil law doctrine, "that sound price demands sound property," both in respect to condition and title. The following cases, sometimes relied on to establish the principle of mere failure of consideration as a defence, are in relation to personal property. Com'r of Roads v. Macon & Foot, 2 Brev. 105; Eastland v. Longshorn, 1 N. & McC. 194; Com'r v. Smith, 9 Rich. 520; Parker v. Partlow, 12 Rich. 679; Trimmier v. Thomson, 10 S. C. 189.

Was there in this case such fraud or misrepresentation as will *constitute a good defence? All the cases agree that the proof of such misrepresentations, whether they are fraudulent or unintentional, must "be full, clear and explicit, that they were calculated to influence the party in concluding the contract, and that he acted upon them without examining for himself and exercising his own judgment. The indiscriminate application of the principle without the most satisfactory evidence, would have a tendency to set afloat and derange all contracts." Nothing was said at the sale about title. It is not claimed that there were any misrepresentations unless they were made by the advertisement and plat referred to. These contained no statement as to number of acres, and did not, in express terms, affirm that lot No. 1 then belonged to the parties selling, but the advertisement described the outline by metes and bounds, giving the east line at seventy feet and eight inches, and referred to the plat in these words: "All of which is particularly and accurately described in a plat of five lots, situated in Ward 1, belonging to the Tyler Steam Cotton Press Company." It is not perfectly clear that lot No. 1 was represented as included in the property offered for sale as the cotton press, but it was on the old platt referred to as one of the five mentioned, and the respondent might have so understood it. The mistake was produced by the old plat, still representing lot No. 1, after it had been sold, and to that extent may be regarded as an unintentional misrepresentation.

*211

Did the appellant rely upon that statement in the advertisement, and was he misled and induced by it to make the purchase? The property was to be sold under order of the court. Lot No. 1 was divided from the other property, and was in possession of another. It was marked out by being shaded blue, and was specially referred to by a note on the face of the plat. Under these circumstances it is difficult to resist the impression that the appellant did not exercise ordinary diligence in obtaining the information which the facts suggested and which was at hand—especially as Gibbes, who was to have an interest in the purchase, and who must have known all about the property, was present. But the appellant swears positively that he was ignorant of the facts; that he relied exclusively upon the advertisement, and was deceived by it into the purchase of the property.

*212

*"The Tyler Cotton Press" was the property advertised, and, doubtless, was the principal inducement to the purchase; but if it were represented that lot No. 1 was a part of it, when it was not, we cannot say that the appellant got the property he purchased. He did purchase the cotton press, and he got it; but he purchased it as it was described; and although he might have done so with or without that lot, yet we think it cannot be regarded as nothing more than a part of the description of "the cotton press."

Assuming that there was a mistake in the advertisement, and that the appellant was in ignorance of it at the time he bid off the property, and that he used proper diligence in informing himself, is he now entitled to have an abatement for the value of that lot? We think not. While it may be that he was ignorant at the time of the sale, it is admitted that he had full knowledge of the alleged deficiency on June 4th, when he voluntarily closed the purchase by paying the cash installment and executing bonds and mortgage for the credit portion of the purchase and taking titles. Up to that time the purchase was incomplete. The court confirms judicial sales, and in doing so exercises large powers in correcting errors. Reasonable time is always given for the examination of titles, and, if necessary, a reference will be ordered. From the day of sale up to the day on which he gave his bonds and mortgage and accepted title, the appellant might have refused to comply with his bid, and, if misrepresentation could have been shown, the court would not have decreed against him specific performance.

It seems that he was not willing to relinquish his purchase even after all the facts were known. He said nothing about the deficiency until he complied with the terms of sale and demanded title on June 4th, which was the same, in effect, as if he had bid off the property that day with a full knowledge of the deficiency. He chose to stand to his bargain, indeed insisted upon it, after he had full knowledge, and he cannot be heard to impeach his own bonds, in whole or in part, or to say that he is damaged by misrepresentations when he knew the truth of the matter so represented: "If a vendee becomes acquainted with the fraud before completing his bargain and chooses to go on, a a court of *equity will not help him." Adams' Eq. 177, citing Pratt v. Philbrook, 33 Me. 17; Knuckolls v. Lea, 10 Humph. 577; Scott v. Gamble, 1 Stockt. 218; Whitworth v. Stuckey, 1 Rich. Eq. 409; Murrell v. Murrell, 2 Strob. Eq. 154 [49 Am. Dec. 664]; Maner v. Washington, 3 Strob. Eq. 171; Story's Eq., § 202. Chancellor Caldwell, as the organ of the court in Maner v. Washington, says: "Where neither payment has been made of the purchase money by the one party, nor possession given by the other, a defect in the title of the land bargained and sold has always been held a good ground to resist the specific performance of the contract or to entitle the purchaser to an abatement of the price pro tanto, or to a rescission of the contract. The warranty of a deed conveying the land would often be an insufficient indemnity for the purchase money if the vendee complied with his contract, and was afterwards compelled to give possession to an outstanding paramount title. But if a party, notwithstanding his being informed of the defect, should persist in the completion of his contract, pay the purchase money, accept a deed and take possession of the land, he will be left to his legal remedy on the covenants of his deed, and equity will not relieve him. Even in executory contracts, a purchaser may do acts that amount to a waiver of his right to raise objections to the title, and may be compelled to take such title as the vendor can make without inquiry as to its validity."

*213

But it is urged for the appellant that the compliance with the terms of sale after knowledge, should not operate as a waiver in this case, for the reason that while he was ignorant he had gone into possession and made such expenditures in repairs, that it was too late to recede without a sacrifice: that his condition then left him no other alternative but to carry out the purchase. There is no force in this. It was premature in him to take possession before the title was examined. He knew that in doing so he took the risk, for, in his answer, he says, that he took possession "having full confidence in the integrity of the parties." Taking possession itself, under certain circumstances, amounts to a waiver of the defence here made, and, if so, that could hardly destroy the effect of closing the bargain. One incautious act cannot justify another. Sug.

*214

on V. & P. 398, lays it down that "a *purchaser, by entering into possession, is generally held by that act to have waived the objections to title." The appellant only took possession of the cotton press proper. The lots were not sold separately, but as an entirety—"all that lot, piece or parcel," &c. It is said that he did not take possession under his bid, but by the agreement of the parties. That does not seem to be the proof. Some of the parties were minors, and no one had the right to make any such arrangement for the others. No such waiver was made by any of them.

But it is still further urged for the appellant that at the time he closed the agreement, or rather the day before, he gave notice to the sheriff of the deficiency, and of his determination to insist upon the abatement. Notice cannot alter the case. The waiver does not rest upon the intention of purchaser, as to whether he will or will not make the defence, or whether such intention is known or unknown, but upon the single fact of doing the act with knowledge. It is not suggested that the appellant expressly waived or intended to waive any right which he might suppose that he possessed, for the exact contrary is true; but the waiver was the effect of executing bonds, according to the contract, against any defence to these same bonds, upon grounds then known to him.

Giving the bonds for the whole amount was inconsistent with paying them only in part. Ex parte notice of such intention could not make a new contract. The only contract was the old one, and the appellant could not close it, according to its terms, either with mental reservation or public notice that he intended to pay only according to the facts as he knew them to exist at the time.

The Circuit decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *215

*(Case No. 832.)

MINNICK v. FORT.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Justices of the Peace ⟸150.]

A party may appeal to the Circuit Court from a judgment rendered against him by a trial justice, without making a motion before the trial justice for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 515; Dec. Dig. ⟸150.]

Before Mackey, J., Lexington, September, 1879.

Action by John Minnick against H. A. Fort, administrator, in a trial justice's court. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff, without making motion before the trial justice for a new trial, appealed to the Circuit Court. Because of the failure to make such motion, the Circuit judge dismissed the appeal. Plaintiff then appealed to this court from the order of dismissal.

Mr. W. S. Monteith, for appellant, cited Code, §§ 351, 353, 371; 15 Stat. 874; 16 Stat. 60; Sedg. on Stat. & Const. L. 123–127.

No counsel appeared for respondent.

March 15th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The sole question raised by this appeal is, whether a party can appeal from a judgment rendered by a trial justice without first making a motion before the trial justice for a new trial. The solution of this question depends upon the inquiry whether the act of February 24th, 1876, (16 Stat. 60), which was passed for the purpose of authorizing trial justices to grant new trials, operates as a repeal of the provisions of the code of procedure regulating appeals from an inferior court to the Circuit Court, or so modifies those provisions as to require, as a condition precedent to an appeal, the making of a motion for a new trial. The act in question certainly does not, in express terms, repeal any of such provisions, and there is nothing that we can discover in the terms of the act which would operate as a *repeal by implication—a mode of repeal not favored in law. The only modification of the provisions of the code in reference to such appeals contained in the act, is that found in Section 3, which simply extends the time within which an appeal must be taken from the judgment of a trial justice to five days from the refusal of the motion for a new trial.

*216

Again: the right to grant new trials is conferred upon trial justices in very much the same language as was employed in conferring a similar right upon the Circuit Courts, (Gen. Stat., ch. CV., § 4, 497,) and while there are cases in which a motion for a new trial is the only appropriate remedy, as, for example, in cases where relief is sought against a verdict upon the ground of excessive damages, we do not know that it has ever been held that a motion for a new trial was a necessary condition precedent to the right of appeal from a judgment of the Circuit Court to the Supreme Court.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 216

(Case No. 833.)

THOMPSON v. WOFFORD.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Evidence ⟸386; Partition ⟸109.]

In an action upon a bond given for the purchase money of a tract of land, sold under proceedings in partition, and described in the order of sale, advertisement and deed, as containing one hundred and seventy-five acres, more or less, testimony was offered of verbal declarations made by the sheriff at the time of sale as to the quantity of land in the tract—Held, that the testimony was incompetent.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 405, 14 S. E. 829.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1696; Dec. Dig. ⟸386; Partition, Cent. Dig. § 383; Dec. Dig. ⟸109.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, June, 1879.

This was an action commenced on February 12th, 1879, by W. W. Thompson, as sheriff, against C. P. Wofford and J. K. Jennings, for the foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure the payment of the purchase money of a tract of land sold by the *sheriff under a decree of the court in an action for partition. Defence was failure of consideration to the extent of the balance claimed. The defendant, Wofford, a witness in his own behalf, began to testify as to certain verbal representations made by the sheriff at the time of sale, in reference to the quantity of land, but upon objection made the presiding judge ruled that the testimony was incompetent; and defendants' counsel excepted. The Circuit decree is as follows:

*217

This action was to recover a small balance, claimed to be due, on bond and mortgage, and the defendant resisted payment on the ground of deficiency in the quantity of land, which he had purchased.

Both the advertisement and the sheriff's deed seem to me to state the number of acres in the tract sold as merely part of the description, and I do not, under our statute, which requires the sheriff to make sale in such cases, regard him as having any authority or agency whatever to vary the terms of the decree or of the advertisement. He could not, therefore, affect the rights of the owners of the land by any opinion he may have published, if any, at the sale, as to the number of acres in the tract.

The defendant testified before me that he had previous knowledge of the land he purchased, had lived in that neighborhood and partially surveyed it several years ago; that it was not sold at a price per acre, but the bids were for the tract as a whole. The deed is without warranty, and defendant complied with his bid and took possession without asking any survey to fix the quantity of the land. The late decisions in this state, especially Jones v. Bauskett, 2 Speers 71, and Rogers v. Horn, 6 Rich. 361, settle conclusively that in such case the purchaser must pay the purchase money without abatement for any deficiency of the quantity of land bought by him. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for the amount claimed in his complaint; with leave to apply at chambers for a decree of foreclosure, if that be necessary.

From which decree defendants gave due notice of appeal to the Supreme Court for a new trial, upon the following grounds:

1. Because, as it is respectfully submitted, the presiding judge *erred in refusing to admit testimony in regard to sheriff's representations made at the time of the sale.

*218

2. In holding that the parties to the suit of Julia Levister v. James Levister and others, were not bound by the representations made by the sheriff at the time of the sale.

3. In holding that the defendants, under the circumstances of the case, were not entitled to an abatement in the amount bid by reason of the deficiency in the land.

Mr. E. H. Bobo, for appellants.

The rule of caveat emptor does not apply to sales by the sheriff under a decree for partition, and his representations are admissible as though they were made by the parties themselves. Harp. 441; 1 McC. 121; 9 Rich. 515; 9 S. C. 287. When a certain number of acres are sold, with a description only to fix its locality, it will be considered as a sale of so many acres, and not more or less. 2 McC. 440. There were no metes and bounds here, only boundaries to be fixed by actual survey; and in this differs from 2 Spears 71 and 1 McC. 584. If misrepresentation was intentional or not, defendants are entitled to abatement. 2 Hill 657, and cases therein reviewed. In Harp. 290, 4 McC. 434, 2 Spears 71, and 6 Rich. 361, there was no misrepresentation; and they have been modified by 9 Rich. 515. See, too, 9 S. C. 287.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

The verbal declarations of the sheriff cannot vary the terms of this deed. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 275; 1 Best. on Ev., § 226; 1 McC. 209. A purchaser can assert failure of consideration only when title is defective. 9 S. C. 287; 6 Rich. 361; 9 Rich. 515. Even if sheriff was agent, defendants cannot maintain their defence, because of the description of the land. Harp. 290; 2 Spears 72; Kerr on F. & M. 65, note; Rice's Eq. 55; 8 Rep. 647; 13 Wall. 383.

March 16th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an action to recover a small balance appearing to be due upon a bond given for the purchase money of a tract of land sold by the plaintiff, at a judicial sale made by *him as sheriff. The defense was that the defendant had been induced to purchase by reason of a representation made on the day of sale, that the land contained a greater number of acres than was found to be the fact by a resurvey, and an abatement of the price to the extent of such deficiency was claimed.

*219

It appeared that the land was sold under proceedings for partition, and the record of such proceedings, which was introduced in evidence, showed that the land was described in the complaint as a tract containing one hundred and seventy-five acres, more or less. It was also so described in the advertisement and in the sheriff's deed; and it furthermore appeared that the land was sold as a tract and not by the acre.

At the trial the defendants proposed to prove "certain verbal representations made by the sheriff at the time of the sale in reference to the quantity of the land," which the Circuit judge ruled to be incompetent. To this ruling exception was duly taken, and this constitutes the sole ground of appeal. We agree with the Circuit judge that the proposed testimony was incompetent.

As we have just held in the case of Mitchell v. Pinckney, ante page 203, the true ground upon which purchasers at judicial sales of land can claim an abatement of the price by way of defence to an action for the purchase money, is fraud or misrepresentation; but such misrepresentation must be of such a character as would be likely to mislead, and must, in fact, mislead the purchaser. As was said by Johnson, J., in Means v. Brickell, 2 Hill 665-6, in speaking of this doctrine: "Great care should be taken that in its application it should be confined to its legitimate objects, and that trivial circumstances should not be allowed to set aside or damage written contracts which have been solemnly entered into between the parties, and some useful hints have been thrown out in Frazer v. Harvey, 2 Bail. 270. For example, when the misrepresentation complained of is as to the quality of lands sold, or the quantity, when it has not been ascertained by admeasurement or some other certain rule, or the relative quantities of the different description of highland and swamp and other matters founded merely on opinion; for a purchaser is not liable to be *imposed on by the opinions of the seller; and if he is, when he has the same means of forming an opinion for himself, it is his own folly, from which he cannot and ought not to be relieved."

*220

Now, in this case the verbal representations of the sheriff in regard to the quantity of the land, must either have been a mere expression of his opinion as to the actual number of acres which the tract contained, which would not be competent, (Frazer v. Harvey, 2 Bail. 269,) there being no evidence that any plat was exhibited at the sale by which the land was sold, or such representations would amount to a contradiction of the terms of the sale, as written and published in the advertisement; for, as we have seen, both in the pleadings in the action under which the order of sale was made and in the published advertisement of such sale, the land was represented as containing an uncertain number of acres by the use of the terms "more or less," and certainly the sheriff could not, by any verbal declarations that he might make, contradict those terms. We think it clear, therefore, that, under the circumstances of this case, any verbal representations which the sheriff may have seen fit to make on the day of sale in regard to the quantity of land, were not such as were calculated to mislead a purchaser; and we may add, from the testimony in this case, it is difficult to understand how the purchaser could have been misled in regard to the quantity of the land he was buying by any such representations, as he seems not only to have been a surveyor himself, but to have actually made a partial survey of this very tract before the sale, and, as it is reasonable to suppose, was therefore much better qualified to form an opinion as to the number of acres contained in the tract than the sheriff.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 220

(Case No. 834.)

TERRY v. CALNAN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Banks and Banking ⟸47.]

The charter of a bank contained this section: "That in case of the failure of said bank, each stockholder * * * shall be liable and held bound *individually, for any sum not exceeding the amount of his shares." The bank suspended specie payments, but continued banking operations for more than four years longer. Held, that there was a failure within the meaning of the above-recited section when specie payments were suspended.

*221

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. ⟸47.]

[2. Limitation of Actions ⟸21.]

Held further, that an action against the stockholders for the additional liability imposed by this section, was barred by the statute of limitations in four years after the suspension.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 90–99; Dec. Dig. ⟸21.]

[3. Limitation of Actions ⟸21.]

This liability was a simple contract debt, and not a statute liability.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Parker v. Carolina Savings Bank, 53 S. C. 590, 31 S. E. 673, 69 Am. St. Rep. 888.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 90–99; Dec. Dig. ⟸21.]

Before Thomson, J., Richland, April, 1879.

Action commenced November 12th, 1870, by Harvey Terry against M. J. Calnan, receiver, and the stockholders of the Commercial Bank of Columbia. For a proper understanding of the questions decided by this court, the case is sufficiently stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

This complaint was filed by the billholders against the receiver and the stockholders, for the purpose of having the assets in the hands of the receiver applied, as far as the same would avail, to the payment of the bills held by the plaintiffs, and of recovering the balance due on said bills from the stockholders, by reason of their liability under Section 4 of the charter of the bank. 12 Stat. 212.

This cause, after a hearing before the Circuit Court, was appealed to the Supreme Court, and by that court remanded, with directions for certain issues of fact to be first inquired into before the Circuit Court should decide the case upon its merits. One of these issues was the ascertainment of the date of the failure of the bank. The defendants, who are stockholders, having set up the defence of statute of limitations, the efficacy of which depends upon the date of the failure of the bank, applied for and obtained at a previous term of this court, an order for the referee to report upon the issue of the date of failure. The plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court from this order, and the appeal was not sustained.

The defendants now submit their case upon this one issue of the defence of the statute of limitation as depending on the date of failure of the bank. This defence, if sustained, would render *unnecessary all other inquiries as to facts, and also unnecessary the consideration of all other issues of law raised by the pleading. The referee reports "that the Commercial Bank of Columbia, S. C., suspended specie payments and failed on the 30th day of November, 1860, which fact, together with the evidence taken, is submitted."

*222

To this report the plaintiffs except.

The cause then comes before me for a hearing, without a jury, on April 25th, 1879, upon the report of the referee, the exceptions thereto, and the defence of the statute of limitations set up by the defendants. The right of the plaintiffs to follow the assets of the bank in the hands of the receiver, is not questioned. After hearing the pleadings, the report of the referee, the exceptions thereto, and the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs and the defendants, I have arrived at conclusion as follows upon the issues submitted:

The section of the charter upon which the plaintiffs rely, provides—

"Section IV. That in case of the failure of said bank, each stockholder, copartnership, or body politic having a share or shares in such bank at the time of such failure, or who shall have been interested therein at any time within twelve months previous to such failure, shall be liable and held bound individually for any sum not exceeding twice the amount of his, her or their share or shares."

For the purpose of this decision, I assume that under this section the stockholders are liable to the billholders for the payment of the unredeemed bills held by them, whenever the stockholder had, or was interested in, shares as specified in the section quoted.

The first question to be considered is, when did the bank fail? The referee reports that the failure occurred on November 30th, 1860, and bases his conclusion upon the fact that the testimony establishes that upon that date the bank suspended specie payment, or ceased to pay or redeem its bills with specie. The testimony reported fully establishes this latter fact, and is not disputed by the plaintiffs. The testimony further shows that the suspension was notorious, or, as one of the witnesses states, *"was known to everybody;" the bank never resumed, and after such suspension ceased issuing any of its own bills either for payment or in making loans. Hence, all the bills held by plaintiffs are bills which were issued by the bank, accompanied with the contract of its charter (or, as another court has held, with the contract impressed upon each bill,) that the bank would redeem or pay for such bills, specie, dollar for dollar. Now, upon November 30th, 1860, the bank ceased so redeeming its bills, and failed to make good its contract. Was not this the "failure" contemplated by Section 4? Our opinion is that a failure by the bank to fulfill any obligation or duty, or contract imposed upon it by law, is a failure in the contemplation of this section, rendering the bank or its stockholders liable, as provided in the section. The charter provides penalties to the state for certain of these failures. These penalties the state had a right to remit, and these penalties the general assembly did remit, but any liability incurred to billholders arising out of the contract made by the bank to redeem its bills with specie, the general assembly could not affect by any law it might enact without coming in conflict with Section 10, Article I., of the Constitution of the United States. The general assembly could remit penalties to the state; it could protect the bank from a forfeiture of its charter, but it could not impair the obligation of any contract made by the bank with its billholders.

*223

I regard "failure" as the most comprehensive term that can be used in reference to a bank. A bank is insolvent when it is unable to pay its debts in the course of business; it is bankrupt when it fails to meet its business obligations, or does some act connected therewith declared by law to constitute bankruptcy; and either of the foregoing cases constitute a failure. Besides, a failure on the part of a bank to perform any contract made by it, or imposed by its charter, is a failure; although the bank might be able to perform such contracts, or might have done no act constituting technical bankruptcy. I therefore hold as a matter of law, that a suspension of specie payments by the Commercial Bank constituted, under its charter, a failure, within the meaning of Section 4. In my conclusion I am fully sustained by the reasoning and authorities cited in the decision of the *United States Supreme Court in the case of Godfrey v. The Merchants' Bank of Cheraw, 7 Otto [(97 U. S.) 171, 24 L. Ed. 944]. This case was of a South Carolina bank, with a like charter to that of the Commercial Bank. That this suspension occurred on November 30th, 1860, there can be no doubt; and hence it must be concluded that the bank failed on that day.

*224

The exceptions to the referee's report are, therefore, overruled, and the report is confirmed.

The next question to consider is, whether the defence of the statute set up by the defendants, who are stockholders, be a good defence in bar of the action. That the statute is a good defence, was held by a unanimous court in the case of Carrol v. Green et al, 2 Otto [92 U. S.] 510 [23 L. Ed. 738], where Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion of the court, fully considers a charter the same as that of the Commercial Bank, and all the statutes of limitation of this state, giving full force and effect to the suspension caused by our stay-laws, and the decision of our courts thereon. I concur in the reasoning of, and authorities cited in, that case, and hold that four years would bar the action. In this case the failure occurred on November 30th, 1860, and the action was brought on November 12th, 1870. More than nine years had run. From this deducting the five years' suspension caused by the stay-laws, would leave over four years that the statute had run before action was brought. The plea of the statute must, therefore, be held as a good defence for the defendants, who are stockholders.

It is urged that Section 132 of the code deprives the defendants of the right to avail themselves of the statute.

Whatever might be my view of the effect of that section, it is a sufficient answer to call attention to the fact that the cause of action in this case arose before the passage of the code, and hence, under Section 96, cannot affect this action.

It is, therefore, adjudged and decreed, that the complaint be dismissed upon the merits as to all the defendants who are sued in their capacity as stockholders, and that said defendants have judgment for their costs against the plaintiffs, the same to be taxed by the clerk of this court.

From this judgment the plaintiff appealed to this court.

*225

*Mr. W. W. Montgomery, for appellant.

Messrs. J. H. Rion and F. W. McMaster, contra.

March 20th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The first question to be considered involves the nature of the liability of the stockholders of the Commercial Bank of Columbia, under the following section of the charter of said bank:

"That in case of the failure of said bank, each stockholder, copartnership or body politic, having a share or shares in such bank at the time of such failure, or who shall have been interested therein at any time within twelve months previous to such failure, shall be liable and held bound, individually, for any sum not exceeding the amount of his or her or their shares."

To whom was this liability intended to be incurred? Evidently to the bank or to its proper representative, which would include the receiver appointed upon its insolvency. It certainly could not have been intended that each creditor of the bank, including bill-holders and depositors, should have a separate action against each stockholder individually. The inconveniences of such a remedy is reason for not subjecting the language of the charter to such a construction when any other construction can be found reasonably to effectuate its intent and satisfy its expressions. The language of the section quoted above contemplated liability in a single sum, to be measured in the manner pointed out by the act, and would, therefore, imply liability to a single action for the purpose of enforcing such demand. The object of the provision was to make assets of the bank, in case of failure, for the payment of its debts. A person subscribing for the stock of the bank at its original issue would be compelled to understand the effect of such subscription to be this: That he was absolutely bound to pay up the proportion of the capital represented by his stock, and an equal amount should it become necessary to make good the liability of the bank to pay its debts. He would also understand that he could not discharge *himself of this contingent liability by merely selling and transferring his stock, although if the bank should continue to discharge its obligations for twelve months after such sale, then such contingent liability would cease. A subsequent purchaser of the stock would take it with the same contingent liability.

*226

It is evident that the contingent liability is of the same nature with the primary liability to pay in the capital represented by the stock, and the inference would be that the payment was to be enforced by the same person—namely, by the bank itself. If anything remained unpaid on the original subscription, as where stock had not been paid up, the only way by which the creditor of the bank could reach the amount thus in arrear would be through the bank, by compelling the bank, or its representative, to call in the unpaid subscription as a debt due the bank. The contingent liability stands on the same footing. The stockholder was subjected to a contingent liability to the bank, such contingency being the failure of the bank. That event happening, he became the debtor of the bank in respect of stock presently held by him or held at any time within twelve months prior thereto, and the remedy was primarily in the hands of the bank. It was competent, through a creditor's bill, for the creditors of the bank to compel the bank to call in such assets, and for that purpose the creditor could lay hold of and exercise the remedy of the bank for that purpose, through the medium of a receiver; but the nature of the debt and remedy against the stockholder was not changed thereby.

Was the suspension of specie payments by the bank, in November, 1860, a failure within the sense of the statute? Failure means a failure to meet its current obligations at maturity. Insolvency looks to the liability to pay; failure, to the fact of payment. It is not necessary to say that the statute intended that failure, independently of insolvency, should fix the liability of the stockholders. All that need be said, for the purposes of the present case, is that failure was the outward act that was to stand for evidence that the bank was insolvent. If it should happen that the bank refused without justifiable cause to pay its current obligations at maturity, and had, notwithstanding such fact, sufficient assets to pay its indebtedness, the stockholder *would get the benefit of that part, for his liability depended wholly on insufficiency of assets. At the same time the creditors of the bank, and all others interested, would be justified in assuming that the failure of the bank was by reason of its insolvency.

*227

The failure of the bank to pay its bills on presentation in specie was a failure to meet its current obligations at maturity, and, under the view we take of the statute, is presumptive evidence of insolvency. In the present case that presumption is not rebutted, but, on the contrary, it appears that the bank never did resume specie payments, thus strengthening the conclusion of its insolvency by another unrebutted presumption, namely —that the same cause that occasioned its original failure prevented resumption; that, is insolvency. This view supports the conclusion of the Circuit decree, that the cause of action had its origin in November, 1860.

The question of the operation of the statute depends upon the law as it then stood, making allowance for the suspension of the statute during the period of five years. The debt of the stockholder under this contingent liability must be ranked as a simple contract debt, barred by lapse of four years from the time the cause of action accrued to the commencement of an action for its enforcement. It is a mistake to call the liability of the stockholder a statute liability. The whole object of the provision of the charter was to regulate the relations that should arise between the corporation and its stockholders. The subscription to the stock was a voluntary act that might be performed or declined. The liability that arose from such subscription, although defined by the charter, arose as the voluntary contract of the parties. This is precisely what the law does in fixing the rate of interest on money as affecting contracts demanding interest, but not fixing the rate, and interest computed under the authority of the statute might as well be considered as representing a statute liability as the cause of action in the present case.

The decree correctly holds that the statute is a bar in the present case. The judgment appealed from must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. *228

*(Case No. 835.)

GIBBES v. G. & C. RAILROAD CO.

STATE, ex rel. ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. SAME.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Mortgages ⇐429.]

A mortgage of railroad property was made to one, his heirs and assigns, as trustee for bondholders. Under proceedings for foreclosure, the mortgagee being dead, another trustee was substituted and decree of foreclosure rendered. Afterwards, a petition was filed by a son of the original mortgagee, claiming to be his heir-at-law, and praying to be made a party. Petition dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1268; Dec. Dig. ⇐429.]

[2. Constitutional Law ⇐8.]

Doubted whether ordinances of the convention of 1868 had any legal effect upon then existing statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

[3. Constitutional Law ⇐92, 93.]

Private rights vesting during the war between the states, are protected by the constitution of the United States, and cannot be impaired by an ordinance of the state constitutional convention of 1868.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 175, 198; Dec. Dig. ⇐92, 93.]

[4. Corporations ⇐586; Railroads ⇐143.]

"An act to promote the consolidation of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company," provided in its 4th section for a waiver of the lien of the state on the Blue Ridge railroad property, and in its 5th section, for a like waiver of lien upon the property of the Greenville and Columbia railroad property, and in its 7th section, for the endorsement by the consolidated companies of the bonds of the two companies, consolidating. The two companies not having consolidated, held, that the act never took effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2353; Dec. Dig. ⇐586; Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 449; Dec. Dig. ⇐143.]

[5. Railroads ⇐156.]

Where an act of the general assembly provided that all the property of a railroad company should stand pledged and mortgaged to the state for the payment of certain bonds issued by such company, and guaranteed by the state, such provision constituted a statutory lien for the benefit of the bondholders as well as the state, which no subsequent statute could postpone. Hand v. Railroad Company, (1,) 12 S. C. 314, followed and approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. ⇐156.]

[6. Corporations ⇐566; Railroads ⇐41, 168.]

Where the state guaranteed the bonds of a company, issued in exchange for outstanding mortgage bonds, under a statute which provided that the state should take and retain possession of the bonds so surrendered in exchange as "security to the state, and thereby give the state the lien under the first mortgage until all the bonds now secured by mortgage shall be retired;" all of the mortgage bonds not having been surrendered or exchanged, held, that the state could assert the lien of the mortgage bonds so held by her, together with the coupons thereto attached, as of equal rank with the mortgage bonds not exchanged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2284; Dec. Dig. ⇐566; Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 99, 535; Dec. Dig. ⇐41, 168.]

[7. Corporations ⇐566; Railroads ⇐171.]

A statute authorizing the guarantee by the state of certain bonds of a railroad company to be secured by a statutory lien, was passed in 1861, and the bonds issued and guaranteed under the authority of this act, bore *the caption

*229

"Confederate States of America." In 1866, another act was passed which extended the operation of the act of 1861, and authorized the issue of new bonds in exchange for the C. S. A. bonds, also certificates of indebtedness to pay interest past due on the C. S. A. bonds, and bonds for other indebtedness, all of which were to be in like manner guaranteed. Held, that the C. S. A. bonds, not surrendered, were of superior rank to the bonds issued under the act of 1866, but those issued under act of 1866, in exchange for bonds surrendered, could claim a lien only under the latter act, and stood upon the same footing with all other bonds issued under the act of 1866. Hand v. Railroad Company, (5.) 12 S. C. 315 approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2284; Dec. Dig. ⟸566; Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 575; Dec. Dig. ⟸171.]

[S. Corporations ⟸566; Railroads ⟸171.]

Under an act of the legislature passed in 1869, certificates of indebtedness were authorized to be issued by a railroad company for funding interest due upon its bonds which were secured by a lien under an act of 1866, and which lien was extended by the later act to cover these certificates of indebtedness. Held, that this was a mere substitution, and not a payment, and that the lien of these certificates was superior to that of a mortgage executed between 1866 and 1869.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kaphan v. Ryan, 16 S. C. 360; Warren v. Raymond, 17 S. C. 200; Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co., Id., 258; Nichols v. Briggs, 18 S. C. 484; Plyler v. Elliott, 19 S. C. 264; Groce v. Jenkins, 28 S. C. 175, 5 S. E. 352; Ewbank v. Ewbank, 64 S. C. 438, 42 S. E. 194; Lyles v. Lyles, 71 S. C. 397, 51 S. E. 113.

For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2284; Dec. Dig. ⟸566; Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 574; Dec. Dig. ⟸171.]

[This case is also cited in Peake v. Young, 40 S. C. 59, 18 S. E. 237, without specific application.]

Before Pressley, J., Richland, October, 1878.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the Circuit decree, and again in the opinion of the court. The Circuit decree is as follows:

The reports of the referee and the acts of assembly furnish the facts of these cases, as follows, to wit:

In January, 1854, the defendant mortgaged all its property to C. M. Furman, trustee, to secure $800,000 of its bonds, payable in 1862, 1863 and 1864. Before they became due it had incurred $100,000 other debts; and to enable it to provide for these debts and the mortgage bonds, then almost due, the state, by act of 1861, agreed to guarantee $900,000 new bonds of defendant, and further provided that the first mortgage bonds, which should be exchanged for guaranteed bonds, should stand as security to the state, and thereby give it the lien under the first mortgage until all these bonds should be retired.

By said act the state's guaranty was to be endorsed on $250,000 of the new bonds before any of the old were taken up, and thereafter the disparity was to increase so that only $400,000 of the old bonds would be held by the state, when her guaranty would be on $700,000 of the new bonds.

*230

*This proposed guarantee was made, during the war, up to $700,000, and the guaranteed bonds then issued were entitled "Confederate States of America."

According to the act, they constituted a mortgage to the state on the whole estate of the defendant for its faithful performance of its contract "and the payment of such obligation." The defendant was also required, after the three years, to set apart two per cent. on the amount of the guaranteed bonds for retiring the same.

This was not done, nor did defendant pay, during the war, the interest on either the first mortgage bonds or those guaranteed.

In 1866, the said interest being still unpaid, and the defendant owing $600,000 other debts, besides interest, the state passed an act which authorized its guaranty on $1,500,000 new bonds and certificates of indebtedness of defendant, which were to be applied as follows, to wit:

$700,000 to be exchanged for that amount of guaranteed bonds, which have been issued during the war, and entitled "Confederate States of America;" $200,000 to be exchanged for that amount of first mortgage bonds then outstanding; $350,000 to the payment of interest on the guaranteed and first mortgage bonds, and $250,000 to compromising the remaining debts of defendant at one-third thereof. To the whole of the $1,500,000 bonds and certificates guaranteed under this act, the mortgage of the act of 1861 was equally extended.

The report of the referee shows that holders of $241,000 of first bonds did not exchange them for those authorized by this act; only $200,000 of these should have remained outstanding when the $900,000 guaranty of the state was complete; but of the guaranteed bonds which were executed, $35,000 yet remain unused in the hands of the comptroller-general, and thus the failure to comply with the terms of the act is reduced to $6,000 outstanding first mortgage bonds, which are contested by defendant without sufficient proof.

As to how much of the $700,000 guaranteed under the act *of 1861 was exchanged for those authorized by act of 1866, there is no information in the referee's report or the evidence.

*231

The defendant being again unable to pay interest on its guaranteed and first mortgage bonds for the six months ending July 1st, 1868, the state, by act of February, 1869, authorized its guaranty on $50,000 certificates of indebtedness, to be used for funding said interest, and to these certificates the statutory lien of 1866 was extended. In May, 1867, the defendant executed to C. D. Melton, trustee, a second mortgage, to secure $1,500,000 bonds and certificates of indebtedness thereafter to be issued, and to bear date as issued.

There is no proof before me as to the date of any of said bonds, but it is quite certain that it was after the act of March, 1871, which, to promote the consolidation of the defendant with the Blue Ridge Rail[road] Company, purported to make all statutory and other liens, except existing mortgage encumbrances, subsequent to the said second mortgage.

The 7th section of this act requires that the bonds to be issued by the defendants under its second mortgage shall be endorsed by the proposed consolidated company, but the consolidation was not made, and consequently such of said bonds as were issued are without said endorsement.

Upon the facts above stated, I hold:

1. That the statutory liens, under the acts of 1861, 1866 and 1869, were securities for payment of the bonds therein authorized, not mere indemnities to the state, and therefore it had no right to waive them in favor of the second mortgage.

2. That said waivers, if lawful, never took effect, because the endorsement of the second mortgage bonds by the consolidated company was a condition precedent, and not complied with.

3. That the debts due for necessary repairs, materials and labor for operating the road, pending the litigation in these cases, and which produced income, applied to the payment of interest on the guaranteed and first mortgage bonds, are first to be paid out of the property of defendant.

4. After payment of said debts, the first mortgage bonds outstanding, and those held by the state, with all unpaid interest thereon, are the first lien on said property.

*232

*5. That the portion of the state under this mortgage is for its own indemnity, and is, therefore, equitable assets applicable pro rata to all the bonds it has guaranteed under the acts of 1861, 1866 and 1869.

6. That such of the bonds, if any, guaranteed under act of 1861, as were not exchanged under act of 1866, are the next lien on said property.

7. That the exchange of bonds guaranteed under act of 1861 for those of the act of 1866, was in acceptance of all the provisions of the latter act, and all the bonds issued thereunder have equal rights, and rank next to those, if any, under act of 1861, which were not exchanged; and after those of 1866, the bonds issued under act of 1869 rank next.

8. The second mortgage bonds which have been reported as issued, or which may hereafter be shown to have been lawfully issued, are entitled to the surplus assets after payment of those secured by first mortgage and the said statutory liens.

It is adjudged and decreed, that the foregoing conclusions of law and fact do stand as the judgment of this court. Further, that all orders heretofore made by me, at chambers, and which in my order appointing the receiver, were reserved for this decree, do stand confirmed as part of the same.

It is further ordered, that these cases be referred to the master to take the testimony and report what debts for labor, materials and repairs, not heretofore ordered to be paid, are entitled to payment according to this decree.

Also, what first mortgage bonds are held as indemnity by the state, and the amount of interest due and unpaid thereon.

Also, what bonds guaranteed under act of 1861 were not exchanged for those under act of 1866.

Also, what amount of guaranteed bonds were issued and are now outstanding under the latter act, and what under act of 1869.

Also, what second mortgage bonds, not heretofore proved, are entitled to share in the surplus.

The said master is hereby authorized to apply at chambers for leave to advertise all claimants herein provided for to pre*sent and prove their claims, and for such further orders as may be necessary to effect the purposes of this reference.

*233

From this decree appeals were taken by H. H. De Leon, the trustee under the first mortgage, by W. A. Clark, trustee, under the second mortgage, by bondholders under act of 1861, and by B. B. Furman. The grounds of their appeal are fully considered in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. N. Nathans and A. G. Magrath, for H. H. De Leon, trustee.

Under the act of 1866, the state waived or relinquished the lien under the mortgage reserved to it in the first section of the act of 1861. The state had full control of this mortgage lien, which was wholly for the indemnity of the state. The statutory mortgage to secure the guaranteed bonds enured to the holders of such bonds. The legislature in 1866, did not doubt the validity of the bonds of 1861, because of their date or caption; the doubt was as to the validity of the legislature which passed the act. A change of circumstances made proper a change in the act giving state assistance. Some things were omitted, others added. The legislature then thought a re-enactment necessary, and what they did not re-enact they intended to dispense with. The act of 1866 expresses, in itself, a clear intention that it should be a substitute for the act of 1861. See, too, ordinances of convention. Gen. Stat. LX. The act of 1869, by re-enacting act of 1866 only, treats it as a substitute for act of 1861. And yet the rights given under act of 1861 were preserved in act of 1866 in priority to other liens there created. 22 Cal. 414; 21 Wis. 370.

If the lien under the first mortgage of this company reserved to the state in the act of 1861, is a subsisting indemnity for the protection of the state against liability as guarantor on the bonds of the company, then such indemnity is limited to the amount of principal and interest due on bonds guaranteed by the state under the act of 1861, for which guarantee said indemnity was given, or to the amount of principal and interest due on bonds substituted for said original bonds under the act of 1866. An *indemnity held by a guarantor is limited to protecting him against liability. 1 Jones on Mort., §§ 380, 384; 15 Gray 521.

*234

If the mortgage bonds retired under the act of 1861, and in possession of the state, are a subsisting security for its indemnity against liability as guarantor, and entitled to share ratably with similar bonds outstanding in the proceeds of the property covered by the mortgage, then interest upon the bonds so held as indemnity, can only be claimed from the time the company suspended payment of interest on the guaranteed bonds for which said bonds were exchanged. 21 Wall. 622.

[For subsequent opinion, see In re Fifty-Four First Mortgage Bonds, 15 S. C. 304.]

Messrs. Melton & Wingate, for W. A. Clark, trustee.

The first and second conclusions of law present the question, whether the act of 1871 was effectual to postpone the lien held by the state, so as to give priority to the second mortgage; and this will be conceded, unless it appears. (1.) That the liens were not merely an indemnity to the state, but operated as security for the payment of the bonds to the holder; or, (2.) That the provision of the seventh section, requiring the consolidated company to endorse the bonds then "held" by the two companies, was a condition precedent upon which the waiver depended.

I. The order of the propositions being inverted, we inquire whether there was a condition precedent. What bonds were then held? There is no proof of any being held by either company. The purpose of the act was to promote the consolidation of the companies. The waiver was to enable the companies to secure this end, and must have preceded the consolidation. A condition precedent is one which must be performed before the thing to be obtained can be effectuated. It is usually imported by words clearly mandatory—by proviso, by limitation of time, by negative terms, or by language denoting an intention to make it essential to the thing in view, and clearly to suspend the attainment of this thing until the requirement be performed. But the requirement here is wholly independent of other provisions, and is purely directory. Bouvier's L. Dict.; Cooley on Const. L. 74, 84; Potter's Dwar. 220, et seq., and notes 27–29; Sedg. on Stat. & Const. L. 369, et seq.

*235

*II. Did the state have the right to waive her liens in favor of the second mortgage? This will affirmatively appear unless the acts of 1861 and 1866, creating and preserving the liens in question, are of such effect as to bind subsequent legislatures, and to this extent limit the exercise of the sovereign power of the state. Such limitations are not favored. Bl. Com. 90. Const. U. S., Art. I., § 10, applies to contracts made by a state, but the presumption is that the state was making laws, not contracts, unless the contrary plainly appears. If there is no contract in the acts of 1861 and 1866, between the state and the bondholders, then the validity of the act of 1871 must be conceded. The aid granted here had been before extended to other railroads. It could not have been within the contemplation of the parties to extend the lien which it was the object of the act to remove. Public credit was then the highest security known to the commercial world. To this pledge alone the bondholder then looked; the doubt is an after-thought. The lien to the state as indemnity against its guaranty, was wholly independent of the contract between the company and the bondholders, debtor and creditor. The debt existed first; the lien was afterwards created. 18 Ohio (Gris.) 35; 29 Conn. 25. The right asserted in behalf of the guaranteed bondholder to a participation in the benefit of these liens, does not arise out of express contract. On the contrary, it is asserted as a right founded upon an equitable principle, which, as it is said, gives to the creditor the benefit of any security held by the surety for his indemnity and for the discharge of the debt. This principle, established by a long current of decisions, is conceded, but it remains to be considered whether it partakes, to any extent, of the nature of the contract, so as to vest in the guaranteed bondholder a right beyond the power of legislative control; or, as between parties of any character, a right which attaches to the security in the first instance, in such a way as to place it beyond the control of the parties to the contract; that is to say, the principal debtor and his surety.

This principle has been often referred to the same considerations of equity which have given rise to the doctrines of subrogation and of contribution. In a sense this is true; but they are not identical in their operation and effects. Indeed, it is *rather the converse of subrogation, and the cases in support of these doctrines are quite distinct; the exposition of the doctrine of subrogation appearing in a current of authorities commencing with Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 12; that of contribution finding leading authority in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 78; and the doctrine under discussion which is not distinguished by a name, unless we might import into it that of substitution, is traced to the ancient case of Maure v. Harrison, digested in 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 93, K. 5. The argument will not, at first thought, be traced to the same principle as that which entitles the surety to the right of subrogation; for this is referable to those deliverances of conscience and morals which afford especial protection in equity to him who stands bound merely for accommodation, and without valuable consideration or benefit to himself, and which, upon the same ground, entitles the surety who has paid the debt to have contribution of his co-surety—the equity in each case having become so familiar and well-established as to be regarded rather as a legal principle and enforced as a legal right. But in the last analysis, the principle of which we are in search, may, in its primary application, be traced to the same source, and be found in the conscientious regard of the court for the protection of the surety, and as an incident merely. This protection appears forcibly in several of the later cases. 10 Leigh 206; 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. (3d Am. ed.) 164; 12 Leigh 387; 18 Ohio 46. Apparently in conflict are 9 Cranch 43, 292. But we assert that any equity to the creditor arises subsequently, and because of certain conditions, the insolvency of debtor and surety, or danger arising of a fraudulent diversion of the security. See 1 Johns. Ch. 119, 129; 19 Ves. 349; 2 Johns. Ch. 418; 1 Paige 298, 615; 3 Saund. Ch. 428. These are the authorities upon which the motion of a trust is founded; but they do not touch the question of the surety's right to surrender the security to the debtor, if done in good faith and before insolvency. The State of South Carolina is not insolvent, and cannot be, so long as there is property to be taxed and persons to pay. But there is no question of contract here; it is only an equity. Cases above cited, and 14 Ves. 169; 4 Johns. Ch. 149. Not being a contract, its repeal by the legislature violates no constitutional provision; being for *the indemnity of the surety, it is for him to determine the kind and measure of his indemnity, if he shall deem it to his interest to hold it at all.

*236

*237

This equity of the creditor or surety can attach only to securities in hand, and cannot attach to those which have been disposed of in good faith. 16 Conn. 139; 29 Conn. 25. Before resort was had by the creditor to this security, the second mortgage was created, and their contract is now superior to this mere equity. The case of Hand v. Railroad Company, 12 S. C. 314, was different from this case; there the bond constituted a lien.

Mr. S. Lord, Jr., Mr. J. H. Rion, and Mr. W. H. Brawley, contra.

March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. It will contribute to a clear understanding of these cases to make a short statement of facts out of which the questions arise.

The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company was incorporated by acts of the general assembly in 1845–6 and 1849, for the purpose of building a railroad from Columbia to Greenville, with branches to Abbeville and Anderson. In 1854 the company executed a mortgage to Charles M. Furman, Esq., trustee, of their entire railroad, including "the bed and superstructure, the materials used in the construction, the iron, stations, station-houses, depots, fixtures, workshops and machinery, rolling stock and all the land and real estate belonging to said company," with two inconsiderable exceptions, not important here, to secure bonds of the company which had been and were about to be issued, to the amount of $800,000, for the purpose of completing the road.

In 1861 these bonds, secured as aforesaid, were about to fall due, viz., in 1862, 1863 and 1864. At maturity they might be sued, and the company desired further time. They also desired that the state, which was a large stockholder, should in some way contribute an equivalent for the assessment which had been exacted from the private stockholders, and the following scheme was adopted: The property of the company was improved in value since the mortgage was executed, and the debt was enlarged *by over $100,000, and the time for payment was extended twenty years upon the whole $900,000, which was to be secured by the guaranty of the state, and another lien to be declared by statute to the state in substitution of the first mortgage. The mortgage was to be taken up and the statutory lien become the first. To accomplish these purposes was passed the act of January 28th, 1861, entitled "An act to lend the name and credit of the state to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, in relation to the re-adjustment of their debt." 12 Stat. 885. This act authorized the comptroller-general to endorse bonds of the company to the amount of $900,000, and declared "that as soon as the comptroller-general shall have made any such endorsement on any bond, the whole estate, property and funds within the state which the said company may then possess or shall afterwards acquire, shall thenceforth stand pledged and mortgaged to the state, without any further act or deed on the part of the company, for the faithful and punctual performance on the part of the said company of such contract, and the payment of such obligation in priority and preference of any other debt which the said company may then or any other time owe, except the bond debt now secured by mortgage, which shall enure to the benefit of the state, as hereinafter provided," &c. These endorsed bonds were not to be used by the company for any other purpose than for "funding the debt of $100,000 now due by the company on notes and accounts, and of taking up the bonds of the company already issued and now secured by mortgage," &c. At that time the war was going on, and the transfer of the mortgage debt to the statutory lien went on slowly. Part of the mortgage bonds were never exchanged, and the $700,000 which were issued under the act bore date during the war, and were entitled "Confederate States of America."

*238

In 1866 the war was over, but, as there might be difficulty about the bonds which had been issued during the war, it was determined to re-issue them with another caption; to renew the authority contained in the act of 1861 for issuing the $200,000 which had not been issued, and to put into the form of certificates of indebtedness the interest which had accrued, amounting to $350,000. To accomplish these purposes the act of 1866 was *passed, and thus far the act was substantially a re-enactment of that of 1861, adding nothing to the debt; for the lien was originally for $900,000, as well as the interest which might accrue. But the company had incurred new debts to the extent of $600,000, and the occasion of the passage of this act was taken to make a provision for funding that debt by a compromise of one for three. To do this required $250,000, and, by the fifth section of the act, certificates of indebtedness to that amount were authorized and guaranteed. The act did not assume to create any new statutory lien, but to re-enact and extend that of 1861 so as to cover the whole issue originally authorized and interest, and also the new element of $250,000, and was entitled "An act to alter and amend an act to lend the name and credit of the state to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company in the re-adjustment of their debt." 13 Stat. 395, 427.

*239

In 1867, the company executed a second mortgage of their entire road and property to Cyrus D. Melton, Esq., as trustee, to secure other bonds of the company to the extent of $1,500,000. The state neither authorized her guaranty nor declared a statutory lien to secure these bonds. The mortgage itself, after reciting the first mortgage, the guaranty of the state and the statutory lien arising therefrom, declares in terms that the mortgage "is to be subject to the first mortgage and the statutory lien aforesaid." [See mortgage.]

In 1868, the convention which framed the constitution passed an ordinance which declared "suspended and inoperative, until ratified by the general assembly, all acts, or pretended acts of legislation purporting to have been passed by the general assembly of the state since December 20th, 1860, pledging the faith and credit of the state in aid of corporations, &c. 14 Stat. (Ordinances,) 35.

In 1869, the legislature, upon condition that the company would release its right of exemption from taxation, re-enacted the act of 1866, and a further endorsement of bonds to the amount of $50,000 was authorized to be applied to take up the interest of the mortgage and guaranteed debt becoming due from January 1st, to July 1st, 1868. 14 Stat. 183.

*240

*In 1870, under "An act to provide a sinking fund and the management of the same," the controlling interest owned by the state in the stock of the company was sold, and shortly after a new board of directors assumed control of the affairs of the company, and, it is alleged, issued a large amount of guaranteed bonds without complying with the terms and conditions imposed by law. 14 Stat. 388.

In 1871, the legislature passed an act entitled "An act to promote the consolidation of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company and the Blue Ridge Railroad Company," the fifth section of which, it is claimed, postponed all statutory liens prior to that date in favor of the second mortgage. 14 Stat. 590.

These are the acts under which this litigation arises. There is no testimony before us. The company not being able to pay all their obligations, questions of priority of lien soon arose between the holders of guaranteed bonds and the second mortgage bonds, the latter claiming that the act of 1871, last above referred to, postponed all statutory liens in favor of that of the second mortgage. The case first stated—James S. Gibbes v. The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company and others—was instituted in 1872 by guaranteed bondholders for themselves and other creditors to foreclose mortgages, for relief, &c. The other case mentioned was in the nature of a cross-action by the attorney-general to protect the interest of the state, foreclose mortgage, enjoin creditors, for receiver, &c.

In these cases, heard together, Judge Melton, in 1872, appointed John S. Green, referee, enjoined the creditors of the company from suing, ordered them called in to prove their demands, and that the pleadings should be amended by making Charles M. Furman, trustee under the first mortgage, and C. D. Melton, trustee under the second mortgage, defendants. The referee called in all creditors of the company, and November, 1872, made his report showing the different classes of bonds, so far as they were presented, in their priorities, &c. In 1874, Judge Carpenter extended and enlarged the reference. In May, 1878—C. M. Furman and C. D. Melton, both having died in the meantime—Judge Shaw ordered that the pleadings should be *amended so as to make parties H. H. De Leon, trustee, substituted for C. M. Furman, and W. A. Clark, substituted trustee for C. D. Melton. The pleadings were so amended, and the cases heard on the merits by Judge Pressley, who declared the priorities, appointed a receiver to take charge of the road, and ordered another reference. To this decision various classes of creditors have filed exceptions and the appeal comes to this court. The brief does not contain any further report from the referee or exceptions thereto. The number and amount of the different classes of bonds, or whether they were issued according to law, do not appear. This court cannot see the bearing of its judgment upon the actual facts, and can do no more than to announce the principles upon which the final report should be framed.

*241

The cases on Circuit were fully argued, and, as the judge states, "without any objection from any one that there was want of proper parties;" but it appears that after his decree was rendered, one Bolivar B. Furman, ex parte, filed his petition in re James S. Gibbs v. The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company et al. claiming that as the first mortgage conveyed the property of the mortgagor to "C. M. Furman, his heirs and assigns," the petitioner, who is the heir of the said Furman, [we suppose eldest son] was and is invested by descent with the legal title to the property and trustee as successor, and insisting that he is a necessary party to the proceedings, and should be impleaded as a defendant. Judge Mackey, to whom the application was made, dismissed the petition, on the ground that "the petitioner has no interest in the subject matter or the issues involved." From that order petitioner appeals, and raises the first question in the case.

The claim of the petitioner comes late, and is purely technical. The intention was to make C. M. Furman the depositary of a personal confidence in the nature of a passive trust; no beneficial interest or transmissible estate was conveyed to him by the mortgage, which was only a security for the bondholders. It was competent for the court, at the instance of the parties in interest, to appoint a trustee as successor of Mr. Furman. Judge Shaw appointed H. H. De Leon, and ordered him made a party. *The order dismissing the petition of Bolivar B. Furman is affirmed and the appeal therefrom dismissed. Hill on Trustees 285, 291; McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strob. Eq. 79; Davant, Trustee, v. Guerard, 1 Speers 242; Ex parte the Greenville Academies, 7 Rich. Eq. 478; Ex parte Mayrant, Rich. Eq. Cas. 1; Ex parte Knust, Bail. Eq. 489; Dean v. Lanford et ux., 9 Rich. Eq. 423.

*242

The next preliminary inquiry is, whether the ordinance of the constitutional convention passed in 1868, declaring inoperative the acts of 1861 and 1866 until re-affirmed by the act of 1869, affects, by changing the date of lien or otherwise, the rights of the parties in these cases. It is not easy to define the powers which a convention of the people may rightfully exercise. It has been doubted whether any act of mere legislation in a state having a constitution can be passed by a convention called for a particular and different purpose. The body is not constituted with two houses, and in other respects lacks the organization necessary for ordinary legislation. The convention of 1868 was not called for a purpose fairly embracing the subject of this ordinance, which was never submitted to the people. But from the view taken by the court upon another ground, it is not necessary to consider here the abstract question of the power of the convention. The State, ex rel. McCready v. Hunt, 2 Hill 1.

It is not competent for one legislature, which is the regular law-making body, to repeal acts of a previous legislature under which private rights have vested, and, clearly, the convention had no higher power. The ordinance in this respect derives no force from the anomalous condition of the state growing out of the war. It is probable, from the time fixed from which the suspension was to commence—"December 20th, 1860"—that the ordinance was made on the idea that all acts of the legislature after secession were void. If so, such assumption was unfounded. Keith v. Clarke, 7 Otto [97 U. S.] 477 [24 L. Ed. 1071]. Private rights vested during the war are recognized as entitled to the protection of the constitution of the United States. A provision of the state constitution itself which impaired the obligation of contracts made during the war, has been declared null and void. Calhoun v. Calhoun, 2 S. C. 283; Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125.

*243

*The ordinance was and is without the force of law. So much of the act of 1869 as reaffirmed the act of 1866 was unnecessary, and the rights of the parties must be determined as if the ordinance never existed.

The most important question in the case is that made by the holders of bonds under the mortgage of 1867, known as the second mortgage. It will be remembered that, in the order of time, the date of that mortgage, and certainly of all bonds held under it, is subsequent to the statutory lien created by the act of 1861, amended by the acts of 1866 and 1869. But it is earnestly urged that the fifth section of the act of 1871 postponed the statutory lien so as to leave the mortgage of 1867 next after the first mortgage. The company only executed two mortgages; all other liens were declared by statute; and the effect of postponing the statutory liens would be to leave the mortgages standing in the order of their dates. The act of 1871 is entitled "An act to promote the consolidation of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company and the Blue Ridge Railroad Company," and sections four, five and seven bear upon the point, and are as follows:

"Sec. 4. That in view of the consolidation of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company and the Blue Ridge Railroad Company, the action of the said Blue Ridge Railroad Company in making the bonds authorized under the act of September 15th, 1868, and of the comptroller-general of the state in endorsing the same, and thereby pledging the faith and funds of the state to the payment of said bonds, is hereby ratified and confirmed; and that the making and execution by said Blue Ridge Railroad Company and said other companies of the mortgage aforesaid to Henry Clews, Henry Gourdin and George S. Cameron, to secure the payment of the bonds aforesaid, is also ratified and confirmed, and said mortgage is declared to be a lien prior to that of the state on all property described in said mortgage, and on the entire line of the road aforesaid, and on all the properties of said several companies, or which they or either of them, may hereafter acquire; but nothing in this act contained shall be construed to divest the state of its lien on the estate and property of the said several railroad companies, or of either of them, for its *endorsement of the bonds aforesaid, but said lien is postponed to and declared to be subject and subordinate to that of the mortgage hereinbefore mentioned, to Henry Clews, Henry Gourdin and George S. Cameron, trustees.

*244

"Sec. 5. That all statutory or other liens or lien, encumbrances or encumbrance, equities or equity, except the mortgage encumbrances now upon the property, assets, effects, rights and franchises of said Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, or any part thereof, and also except the mortgage herein authorized, shall be and are, or is hereby made subsequent to the mortgage encumbrances now in existence thereon and subsequent to the one herein authorized, so that the holders of the bonds secured by said mortgages, or either of them, shall have a lien and security as between each other, according to the time said mortgages have been or shall be recorded, and a prior lien to all other liens or encumbrances whatsoever, any law or laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Sec. 7. That after the consolidation of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company with the Blue Ridge Railroad Company, the bonds now held by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company and the Blue Ridge Railroad Company, shall be endorsed by the consolidated company."

It does not appear that this act was ever accepted by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company or its creditors, or went into operation, in whole or in part. Indeed, the contrary appears. The company executed the second mortgage, which, in its terms, recognizes as superior the first mortgage and the statutory lien. The title of the act has been stated. In the usual manner it is divided into sections, but they all relate to the one subject of the act; otherwise there would be two or more acts in one under a false name, and violating the provision of Section 20, Article II., of the constitution, which declares that "every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." But we think that all the sections of this act, properly construed, have reference to the subject expressed in the title. The fourth section provides for the waiver of a statutory lien on the Blue Ridge railroad, the property of one of the companies to be consolidated. *The fifth section provides for the waiver of the statutory lien on the Greenville and Columbia railroad, the property of the other company being prepared for consolidation. The seventh section provides that "after the consolidation the bonds now held by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company and the Blue Ridge Railroad Company shall be endorsed by the consolidated company." Are these sections each an act independent of the others, or all parts of one whole? The object as stated, and as appears from the act itself, was to consolidate the two companies. Considered in reference to its purpose, the act is a unity with several parts. Each section brings its contribution to the end in view. If the taking effect of the charter of the consolidated company and its endorsement of the bonds are not technically conditions precedent to the waiver of the lien, they are provided for by the same act and are parts of one plan, and must stand towards each other in the relation of mutual and dependent provisions. In the order of time, of course, the companies had to be consolidated before such consolidated company could endorse the bonds; but is it not apparent that the endorsement, though later in the order of time, was to be the counterpart and consideration of the waiver? The fact that the parts are in different sections does not alter the case. The division into sections is purely arbitrary. Part of an act, isolated and disconnected from the context, may defeat instead of give effect to the intention of the law-maker. The fifth section of the act of 1871, which was inserted as part of a plan to consolidate the two companies, cannot, after that purpose has failed, be enforced for the sole and different purpose of effecting priorities in one of said companies. The object of the act having failed, each and all of its parts also fail.

*245

But if the fifth section of the act of 1871 is to be considered as a law in itself, independent of the other sections and the purposes of the act, was it within the power of the legislature to pass such a law? We need not repeat what we have said upon the subject of the infringement of rights through the forms of law in connection with the ordinance of the convention. It has, however, been earnestly and ably argued that these bondholders contracted for no other security than the obligations of the company and the guaranty of the state; that they will still have that if *the lien is postponed; that they never had any vested interest under the statutory lien, which was a collateral indemnity created by the state for the sole purpose of securing herself, and, as it was a creature of the state, solely to indemnify the state against loss on the guaranty, the state could waive or relinquish it at her pleasure. The principle contended for is that a security given for the protection of the surety may be waived by him, and the creditor has no such interest in the transaction that can supply the want or privity of contract.

*246

We consider that the principle, as stated, has no application to this case, and might be admitted without affecting the result here. It will presently appear that the statutory lien in this case was not given exclusively for the indemnity of the guarantor, but to secure the payment of the debt. The general rule undoubtedly is: That when the principal debtor has given the surety a security against his liability, the creditor is entitled to the benefit of the security. 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 196; Homer v. Bank, 7 Conn. 483; Jones v. Quinnipiack Bank, 29 Conn. 25.

There are cases in which the principle may seem to be modified, but, when carefully examined, it will be found that they stand on their peculiar circumstances, as where the security was given after the original agreement for the sole purpose of indemnifying the surety and not for the payment of the debt. The case above cited of Jones v. Bank, which, in the argument, was relied upon by both sides, may be taken as declaring both the rule and the modification. The principles announced in that case are the following:

"When a mortgage is given to secure a debt, whether the debt be in a negotiable form or not, a transfer of the old debt transfers in equity the security, if the security has not previously been surrendered by the creditor." "But when a mortgage is given, not to secure a debt, but to indemnify a security, then the security does not, in the first instance, attach to the debt, as an incident to it, but whatever equity may arise in favor of the creditor with regard to the securities arises afterwards, and comes into existence only upon the insolvency of the parties holden for the debt."

*247

*Apply the principles here announced to this case, and the whole point resolves itself into a question of construction: Whether the statutory lien was given to secure the debt or to indemnify the guarantor? Did or did not the bondholders contract to secure their debt? It seems to the court that there can be no doubt upon that point. They held a perfectly good security under the first mortgage. The state passed an act, and thereby proposed to them to exchange their mortgage security for the statutory lien. They did so, and the terms of the act constitute a contract between the company, the bondholders and the state, as clearly as if a new mortgage had been executed by the company, and the state had guaranteed the bonds as additional security. That contract was made at the time the bonds were guaranteed, and as part of the original arrangement, and each party has a right to insist upon its terms. Was it exclusively to indemnify the state or to secure the debt to the bondholders? It is true, it was to the state, as the first mortgage was made to C. M. Furman, but expressly and in terms to secure the payment of the debt. The act of 1861 has on the face of the covenant these words: "For the faithful performance on the part of the said company of such contract, and the payment of such obligation in priority and preference of any other debt which the said company may then, or at any other time, owe, except the bond debt now secured by mortgage."

The act of 1866 has these words: "That the statutory mortgage contained in the second section of the act of which this act is amendatory shall constitute a lien on all the property, &c., to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the whole debt of $1,500,000 thus guaranteed in the adjustment of the original mortgage and guaranteed debt of said company, also the debt of $600,000 and interest thereon, which is now secured by mortgage." And the act of 1869 declares "that the statutory lien is hereby extended to cover the additional sum of $50,000 herein provided," &c.

Can there be any doubt, from the terms of these acts, that the statutory mortgage was not given exclusively to indemnify the state as guarantor, but, in express terms, to secure the debt to the creditor? This subject has lately received exhaustive considera*tion by this court in the case of Hand v. Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, 12 S. C. 314, and it is quite unnecessary to say more than to repeat the words of Chief Justice Willard, as the organ of this court in that case, in which the facts were less plain than they are in this:

*248

"In all these cases the intention is clearly expressed that the security taken shall be for the payment of the bonds. It is in no case said that it is taken for the special indemnity of the state as endorser. That is undoubtedly implied, but the direct provision is for the payment of the bonds. A provision for the payment of the bonds is primarily a security for those holding the bonds. It is always so in equity, and at law when its forms permit it." (P. 342.) "The foregoing conclusions establish the proposition that the bond and coupon holders took a mortgage or lien upon all the property of the old company intended by that act to be subjected to such mortgage or lien, which the legislature had no right to destroy or postpone, as such attempt was in violation of the provisions of the constitution of the United States and of this state forbidding the passage of a law impairing the obligation of a contract." (P. 356.)

The next question is as to relative priorities of the different classes of bonds guaranteed by the state and held under the first mortgage. It is not questioned by any of the parties that the first mortgage of 1854 is the first lien upon the property of the company to the extent of the bonds that have never been exchanged, but are still outstanding in their original form. But it is not conceded that this is true of that portion of those bonds which were exchanged for guaranteed bonds, and are now in the possession of the state. It is insisted that the state, having guaranteed other bonds issued by the company in lieu of them, which substituted bonds are interest-bearing obligations, that the bonds in the possession of the state, are, in effect, paid, and should be regarded as either canceled or held as cumulative security for a particular class of the guaranteed bonds. The statutory lien was intended as a substitute for the first mortgage, and if all the bonds had passed under the statutory lien, the first mortgage would have become "functus officio," and the statutory lien taken its place as the first, and, in that event, the bonds *received in exchange would have died with the mortgage. The exchange, however, was not made of the whole, but only of part. At first view it would seem that the same result should follow as to the part exchanged, and that the bonds taken up should be regarded "pro tanto" paid, and the mortgage canceled, except so far as was necessary to cover the bonds still outstanding. On the other hand, there may have been good reasons for keeping alive the lien of these transferred bonds under the mortgage until the whole amount was transferred. But be that as it may, the words of the act are too plain and explicit to admit the view that they are to be considered paid. The act declares expressly that the bonds thus taken up and deposited with the "president of the bank shall stand as security to the state, and thereby give the state the lien under the first mortgage until all the bonds now secured by mortgage shall be retired." All the bonds secured by mortgage have not yet been retired, and we cannot declare a result directly in the face of the act. It is not conceived that the outstanding mortgage bondholders have any right to complain of this. They accepted the mortgage security, knowing that it covered the whole $800,000, and there is little equity in the claim that as each bond passed from under the mortgage the value of the mortgage to that extent must be enhanced for their benefit. All the bondholders had the right to stand still as those outstanding have done. It is the same to them whether the state holds them or the original owners.

*249

Accepting this view, it is insisted in the next place that at least no interest should run on the bonds held by the state until after the company ceased to pay interest on the guaranteed bonds substituted for them; otherwise, it is said, the company pays interest twice on the same debt—on the bonds held by the state, and also on the guaranteed bonds given in exchange for them. This would be true if the bonds transferred to the state had been directly for the benefit of the holders of the guaranteed bonds as cumulative security. In that case the payment of one security would discharge the other pro tanto. But these are not double securities to the same creditor. The parties were competent and they have made this arrangement. The guaranty and the statutory lien stand as the security of the bondholder, and these *mortgage bonds are the security of the state for its liability as guarantor.

*250

Interest is only the legal accretions of the principal and becomes part of the debt. The security of the transferred bonds and interest not being to the same creditor, is unaffected by payments on the guaranteed bonds, but is affected by its character as an indemnity, and as soon as the guaranteed debt is paid, and the state saved harmless, its functions, as a guaranty, will have been accomplished, and the excess, if any, fall into the assets of the company. It may be remarked, in passing, that this claim of the state, under the first mortgage, is primarily an indemnity to the state as guarantor, rather than a direct security to the bondholders for their debt, and in this regard differs from the security of the statutory lien, which, as we have seen, is a security primarily for the creditor. Being an indemnity, it may be that this security of the state, according to the principle so strongly urged upon the court, might be relinquished or waived by the state, but the claim is as a bondholder under the first mortgage, which is expressly excepted from the operation of the fifth section of the act of 1871, in regard to waiver.

It only remains to consider the relative priorities as between the bonds issued under the acts of 1861, 1866, and 1869. The court is not informed whether there are any bonds still outstanding, issued under the act of 1861, and still having the caption of "The Confederate States of America." If there are any such, they are unaffected by the provisions of the acts subsequently passed, the terms of which they have not, directly or indirectly, accepted, and must rank next after the first mortgage bonds as the first class of guaranteed bonds.

The act of 1866 did not assume to create a new statutory lien, but to re-affirm and extend that of 1861. It did, however, enlarge the amount of bonds authorized to be issued from $900,000 to $1,500,000—a difference of $600,000; but of this apparent enlargement $350,000 are for interest which had accrued, and which, in fact, was part of the old debt, so that to the amount of $1,250,000 the act of 1866 was substantially a substitute for the act of 1861. If the interest had not been represented by certificates of indebtedness, the debt and interest, which were already *under the mortgage and statutory lien, would have amounted to this statutory sum. But the fourth section of the act of 1866 did provide for another issue of bonds and certificates of indebtedness, to the amount of $250,000, to fund the floating debt of $600,000, by a compromise of one for three. To this extent a new debt was incorporated and the old lien of 1861 extended over it. It is argued that this was a wrong done to holders of bonds issued under the act of 1861 and re-issued under the act of 1866—the $700,000 confederate bonds; that the legislature cannot extend the lien which belonged exclusively to them over an increased debt, and thus impair the value of their security; that to extend an old lien over a new debt, is, in effect, to create a new lien for the new debt, which must leave the old debt under its own lien and take its place in the order of priorities by the date of the extending act. There is great force in this view, so far as the element of new debt is concerned, and we have already held that the bonds issued during the war under the act of 1861 and never passed under the act of 1866, must have priority and take rank from the date of the former act. But as to those bondholders who came in and accepted bonds issued under the act of 1866, we think this objection does not apply. They have accepted the advantages offered by the act of 1866, and they must take its disadvantages. This principle of estoppel is fully developed in the case of Hand v. Railroad, before referred to. We can add nothing to what is there said also upon this point, and will not re-open the argument. The court says: "It is too clear for argument or the citation of authorities, that one taking a provision made for himself by statute, must take upon the condition upon which it is offered. This principle equally applies to express conditions and such as may be fairly implied from the terms of the statute." (P. 348.)

*251

To this it is replied that this is a different case from that of Hand. That the act of 1866 offered no valuable consideration and imposed no conditions; that it only re-issued the bonds in a different style. That the act is not a unity, but divisible, and, in fact, four different acts in one. That the first section provides simply for the re-issue of the bonds issued under the act of 1861; that the second section only provides for the deficit under the *same act; that the third section provides for an issue of certificates to pay interest, and that the fourth section provides for a new issue to fund the floating debt. It is true that these provisions are in different sections, but they are part of one act upon the same general subject. None of the above sections re-enacts the lien; that is in still another section, the sixth, which declares "that the statutory mortgage contained in the second section of the act of which this is amendatory, shall constitute a lien to secure the payment of principal and interest of the entire debt of $1,500,000, thus guaranteed in the adjustment of the original mortgage and guaranteed debt of said company, and also the debt of $600,000 and interest thereon, which is not secured by mortgage." The results of the war had made necessary a re-adjustment of the debt of the company. The act of 1866 embodies a carefully prepared plan upon the whole subject, and not upon any separate part. So far as its general purpose is concerned, it is an entirety, and we cannot avoid the conclusion that those who accepted some of its provisions are bound by all.

*252

The act of 1869 provides as follows: "That to enable the said company to fund the interest due upon their mortgage and guaranteed debt for the six months, viz., from January 1st to July 1st, 1868, the comptroller-general is authorized and directed to endorse the name and credit of the state upon the bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the said company to the amount of fifty thousand dollars, to be applied in all respects and in the same manner and with the same conditions and restrictions as is provided in the act of December 20th, 1866, for the funding of interest, and the statutory lien is hereby extended to cover the additional sum of fifty thousand dollars herein provided."

The company and the bondholders accepted this act. The bonds and certificates of indebtedness were issued, we must suppose, in accordance with its terms, and the last question is made by W. A. Clark, trustee under the second mortgage. He insists "that, as the act of 1869 was passed after the second mortgage was executed, the $50,000 bonds issued under its provisions are subject to the lien of the second mortgage bonds."

The Circuit judge states that "there was no proof before him as to the date of any of the second mortgage bonds, but it is *quite certain that it was after the act of 1871, which purported to postpone the statutory lien."

*253

It was stated at the bar that this was a mistake in fact, and we have no evidence upon the subject before us. It does not, however, seem to us to be a material inquiry whether any of these bonds were issued between May, 1867, and February, 1869. It must be remembered that these bonds were issued only to fund interest in arrears.

Should the bonds and certificates issued under the act of 1869 be postponed to the second mortgage bonds only because of the date (1869) of the act which authorized their issue? The act of 1869 created no new debt, but put in a new form on credit the interest on the old debt from January to July, 1868. The coupons funded were already secured by the lien of 1866. They were as high security as the bonds from which they had been cut, and entitled to share "pari passu" with them. City of Kenosha v. Lamson, 9 Wall. 483 [19 L. Ed. 725]; City of Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 282 [20 L. Ed. 809]; State v. The Spartanburg and Union R. R. Co., 8 S. C. 129. If the coupons had not been funded they would now have the effect of enlarging the lien debt by the amount of this issue. Must the holders of these bonds be postponed only because they accepted these bonds and certificates in exchange for their coupons already secured by lien? That must depend upon the terms upon which they were issued and received. Whether one security operates in payment or satisfaction of another, is always a question of intention. Did they intend to discharge the coupons already due and relinquish their lien by taking in satisfaction bonds for the same amount not due for twenty years, and to be secured by a postponed lien? The bond or certificate is not the debt, but the evidence of it. Nothing is payment but that which produces payment, or is received as payment. To give one security for another of equal dignity, without the intention of discharging the debt, is not payment, but substitution, and in such case it is well settled that a lien, such as a mortgage previously existing, is not discharged, but remains and still secures the debt in the new form. Burton v. Pressly Cheves' Eq. 1; Costello v. Cave & Bradley, 2 Hill 528 [27 Am. Dec. 404]; Gardner v. Hust, 2 Rich. 608; Kelsey v. Rosborough, 2 Rich. 244; Bank v.

*254

Bobo, *9 Rich. 34; Adger v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 527; 6 Wait's Act. & Def. 410, 413, 417.

Here the intention is not doubtful. The bonds were issued and accepted, according to the terms of the act, which is the contract of the parties, and this declared expressly that the statutory lien of 1866 "is extended over them." From the view which the court takes, the bonds issued under the act of 1869 should have priority to the bonds issued under the second mortgage of 1867, without regard to the date of their issue.

The result of this reasoning would be to place the bonds issued under the act of 1869 on the same footing with those issued under the act of 1866; but that part of the Circuit decree which places the bonds of 1869 "after" the bonds issued under the act of 1866, not being appealed from, we are not at liberty to disturb it.

It is adjudged that the Circuit decree be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 254

(Case No. 836.)

Ex parte FARRARS. In re GARRETT v DIAL.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Judgment ⊂⊃128.]

Where a decree ascertained that certain moneys, with interest, were in the hands of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, and applicable to a debt admitted in the pleadings, and it was referred to the commissioner of the court to add the several sums together, with the interest thereon, and if insufficient to pay such debt to take testimony upon other items of the assignee's account, but the decree did not state the aggregate of the moneys charged, nor order payment—Held, that it was not a final money decree.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brown v. Rogers, 80 S. C. 292, 61 S. E. 440.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 237, 238; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃128.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⊂⊃261.]

To entitle a decree to rank as a judgment against the assets of one deceased, it must have ascertained a definite sum of money to be due, and ordered its payment; it must be a decree upon which an execution could have been issued. Cases considered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Addickes v. Allison & Bratton, 21 S. C. 259; Cook v. Jennings, 40 S. C. 210, 212, 218, 219, 18 S. E. 640; Bankhead v. Good, 56 S. C. 394, 395, 396, 398, 34 S. E. 689.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 957; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃261.]

[This case is also cited in Brown v. Rogers, 80 S. C. 289, 61 S. E. 440, and distinguished therefrom.]

See Farrar v. Farley, 3 S. C. 11.

Before Pressley, J., Laurens, June, 1879.

*255

*S. S. Farrar & Bros. obtained a judgment against Joseph Crews, April 17th, 1855, for $2417.51, besides interest and costs. But before this judgment was obtained, Crews had made, in January and April, 1855, five assignments for the benefit of his creditors—two to Lewis Dial, two to W. R. Farley and one to Farley & Dial; and, under the last assignment, whatever balance was left after paying certain preferred debts, was made applicable to all his other creditors in full or pro rata, who should execute a release of any balance that might be due them. The Farrars came in and accepted its terms. In April, 1859, S. S. Farrar & Bros. filed their bill in the court of equity for Laurens district, against Farley, Crews and Dial, for an account by Farley & Dial of their administration of their trust. The bill stated the amount of the Farrars judgment, with an accurate statement of the interest, and that it remained unsatisfied. Dial and Crews, in their answer, admitted that complainants were judgment creditors for the amount stated in their bill, but denied having funds to pay with. In June, 1859, all matters of account were referred by Chancellor Johnstone to the commissioner. The commissioner reported, and his report, with exceptions by Farrar Bros., and Crews and Dial, came up before Carroll, Chancellor, in June, 1868. Some of the exceptions were sustained and some overruled, and the commissioner was ordered to reform his report as directed; and an inquiry, was ordered, if, upon the calculation of interest and the addition of items ordered by the decree, it was found that there was not enough in Dial's hands to pay the Farrars, and also another small judgment held by one Penn. Such further inquiry was never made, because it was found to be unnecessary, as the calculations made under the directions of the decree showed a balance in Dial's hands more than sufficient to pay these two claims. An appeal was taken by Dial to the Supreme Court, pending which Dial died. See 3 S. C. 11. Upon the dismissal of the appeal, Dial's administratrix, Minerva Dial, was brought in by plaintiffs, and judgment entered up against her as administratrix of Dial, in October, 1877.

Meantime an action had been commenced by Patillo Garrett, administrator, against Minerva Dial, administratrix, and others, for a settlement of Lewis Dial's estate.

*256

Creditors were called in, *and the attorneys, who represented Farrar Bros. in the first suit, presented the judgment of October, 1877, as a claim against the estate. It was held by the referee to be a simple contract debt against Dial, and this report was confirmed by the Circuit judge, all parties consenting.

Subsequently, J. C. Farrar and C. D. Farrar, survivors of S. S. Farrar & Bros., filed their petition in the case of Garrett v. Dial, alleging that decree of Chancellor Carroll, rendered in 1868, was a final judgment, and should be paid as such out of the assets of Dial's estate; that his lands had been sold under orders in this cause, but that the purchase money was still in the custody of the court—that they had never been parties to this cause, nor had notice of its pendency. Upon this petition, duly sworn to, Hon. W. H. Wallace, judge of Seventh Circuit, granted an order requiring the parties to the record to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, and restraining the clerk meantime from paying out the funds in his hands. The answer to this petition insisted that the decree of 1868 was not a final judgment; and if it was, that petitioners were estopped by the entry of the judgment of October, 1877, and by the judgment already rendered in this cause.

The decree of the Circuit judge is as follows:

Judge Wallace hitherto, with consent of Simpson & Holmes, as representing Farrar & Bros., ordered a distribution of the funds in this case, then in the custody of the court. That order is now objected to by Farrar & Bros., who came before the court on petition and affidavit, setting forth misunderstanding between them and said attorneys. I think it established that such misunderstanding existed, and that as to such of the fund as remains in court, it should be distributed as if such order had not been passed.

The claim of petitioners presents a very difficult question, on which I find no satisfactory authority, and therefore decide it only because I must.

Joseph Crews assigned his property to Lewis Dial and W. R. Farley for payment of his debts. He owed Farrar & Bros., and in April, 1857, they filed a bill to compel payment against the said assignees. The decree in the case was filed by Chancellor *Carroll, in 1868, and affirmed by the appeal court in 1871, but in October, 1870, Lewis Dial died. With the previous report of McGowan, then commissioner in equity, that decree fixed the amount of the debt of Farrar & Bros., and one to T. S. & J. Penn. It settles that all other claims under the assignments had been settled, and that Dial had in hands applicable to the said two unpaid debts, the sums of $2087 profit on land re-sold by him, $719, the price of a slave Alfred, and $120 for his hire before the sale. The opinion of the said Chancellor was ordered to stand as the decree of the court, and Dial was condemned to pay the costs of the case. On the other points the case was recommitted to the said commissioner, and he was ordered to pursue other inquiries as to the liabilities of Dial, in case the assets in his hands, as settled by said decree, should not be sufficient to pay the said debts. Subsequently the commissioner amended his report, and, finding the assets sufficient, did not pursue the inquiries conditionally directed in the decree. The amended report was not acted on by the court during the lifetime of Dial. After his death, on amended proceedings, it was reported on by Silas Johnstone, referee, and confirmed by the court, and thereupon judgment was entered for Farrar & Bros. on October 2d, 1877, for $6220.88 debt, and $285 costs.

*257

Farrar & Bros. now claim that under this decree of Chancellor Carroll their debt, though not a lien, yet ranks as a judgment against Dial's estate under the act of 1879.

I hold under the case of Edwards v. Sanders, 6 S. C. 316, that a decree, though not a lien, may rank as a judgment under the said act.

Furthermore, that to the extent of $285, the costs of the case, and $2926, the aggregate of the items decided by Chancellor Carroll, with interest from July 5th, 1856, his said decree is one for the payment of money, and ranks as a judgment against Dial's estate, but that it does not so rank in respect of the additional amounts found due by Dial in the commissioner's amended report.

It is therefore adjudged that the former order for distribution of such fund be rescinded, and the same be distributed, in so far *as any still remains, in accordance with this decree, ranking the debt of Farrar & Bros. to the extent aforesaid as a judgment.

*258

From this decree the respondents appealed to this court.

Messrs. Pope & Watts, for appellants, cited 1 McC. Ch. 32 and 1 Daniell's Pr. & Pl. 1199.

Mr. R. W. Shand, contra, contended that as the debt was stated in the bill and admitted in the answer, the only issue was, how much of the assigned estate was in Dial's hands applicable to this debt; and that when the decree of 1868 fixed the items in Dial's hands and directed interest to be charged, it, in effect, said that there was money enough in Dial's hands to pay this debt, and so the decree took rank as a final judgment for the amount charged in the bill and admitted by answer.

March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. The questions raised by this appeal are:

First. Whether the decree of Chancellor Carroll, filed in 1868, was entitled to rank as a judgment in the administration of the assets of Dial.

Second. If so, are not the plaintiffs estopped from claiming such effect for it, by reason of the action of their attorneys in having it merged into and made a part of the judgment recovered in 1877, after the death of Dial.

Third. If that be not so, are not the plaintiffs estopped from setting it up as a judgment recovered prior to the death of the intestate, by the order passed by Judge Wallace in July, 1878?

Since the case of Woddrop v. Ward, 3 Desaus. 203, it has not been doubted that in this state decrees in equity rank as judgments in the administration of assets of the estates of deceased persons. Such was the law in England, even when decrees acted only in personam and were enforceable only by process of contempt and by writ of sequestration. 2 Wms. on Ex'rs 731, (2d Am. Ed.); Morrice v. Bank of England, 4 Brown, P. C. 287. It was not, however, every decree which was entitled to that rank, for, as is said in the next page of Williams on Ex*ecutors: "If a decree be not conclusive of the matters in question, as if it be merely to account and do not ascertain the sum to be paid, it is analogous to a judgment quod computet at law, and that is no complete judgment till the account be stated." Smith v. Eyles, 2 Atk. 385. Such a decree is like an interlocutory judgment at law which has been held, in the case of McIntosh v. Wright, Rich. Eq. 385, not to be such a judgment as is contemplated by the act of 1789. Gen. Stat. 457. To give it such a character, it must be a final decree, and by that we understand (speaking of a money decree) such a decree as not only ascertains that a definite sum of money is due from one party to another, but orders the payment of the same. It must be such a decree as will authorize the issuing of an execution for its enforcement. As is said in Haskell v. Raoul, 1 McC. Eq. 32, a decretal order upon which an execution may be taken out is a final decree. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Forgay v. Conrad, 6 How. 201 [12 L. Ed. 404], have declared the rule to be (the italics being ours): "When the decree decides the right to the property in contest, and directs it to be delivered up by the defendant to the complainant, or directs it to be sold, or directs the defendant to pay a certain sum of money to the complainant, and the complainant is entitled to have such decree carried immediately into execution, the decree must be regarded as a final one to that extent, and authorizes an appeal to this court, although so much of the bill is retained in the Circuit Court as is necessary for the purpose of adjusting by a further decree the accounts between the parties pursuant to the decree passed." This rule is re-affirmed in the same language in the more recent case of Thomson v. Dean, 7 Wall. 342 [19 L. Ed. 94].

*259

The inquiry, therefore, is whether the decree of Chancellor Carroll was such a decree as authorized the issuing of an execution for its enforcement. We do not think so. No definite sum was ascertained to be due by Dial to the plaintiff, and certainly there was no order for the payment to them of such sum. The original report of the commissioner is not before us, and it is not stated that in such report he recommended that any particular sum of money should be paid to the plaintiffs by Dial; and even if he had made such recommendation there is no confirma*tion of the report, but, on the contrary, it is recommitted for reformation in the several particulars indicated, and no order for the payment of any particular sum of money by Dial to the plaintiffs. We do not see, therefore, how, without some further action on the part of the court, any execution could have been issued to enforce the decree; for, in order to do so, as the law then stood, it would have been necessary to enroll the decree, and to do this it would have been necessary to show some decree of the court, not only ascertaining that a definite sum of money was due by one party to the other, but also an order for the payment of the same. It may be, as was argued by the counsel for the respondents, that the decree contained within itself the data from which the amount due could have been ascertained by a mere arithmetical calculation, yet there still is an entire absence of any order or decree for the payment of such amount, and without such order there is no such judgment as would authorize the issuing of an execution to enforce the payment. It would be like a case under the old practice, wherein an action on a note to which no defence was interposed, though the record would furnish the data from which the amount due could be ascertained by a mere arithmetical calculation, yet, still, until that was done, in the mode prescribed by law, there could be no final judgment by the judge's order referring it to the clerk to assess the damages, but the judgment would continue to be a merely interlocutory judgment and not entitled to rank as a judgment in the administration of the assets of an intestate's estate. So in this case Chancellor Carroll might have had before him the data by which he could, by a simple calculation, ascertain what was due from the defendant to the plaintiffs, but the fact nevertheless remains that he did not do it, for reasons which are apparent in the decree itself, and did not decree any specific amount to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs. In this respect the case differs from that of Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. 531, for there the Circuit judge, in the exercise of his chancery jurisdiction, after having ascertained the specific amounts due to the several parties, concludes with an order for the payment of the said sums of money to the said parties. The case of Stovall v. Banks, 10 Wall. 583 [19 L. Ed. 1036], to which our attention has been especially invited *by the counsel for the respondents, does not in anywise conflict with the views hereinbefore expressed, for in that case the decree not only determined the sum due to each of the complainants and directed its payment, awarding execution therefor, but the execution was actually issued. The case of Atherton v. Fowler, 91 U. S. 143 [23 L. Ed. 265], which is also relied upon, was a case in which the Supreme Court of California reversed the judgment of the inferior court and directed a modification thereof as to the amount of damages, but without permitting further proceedings below, if the defendants consented to the modification, and the record showed that such consent was given before the writ of error was taken out. It was, therefore, very properly held that the objection that this was not a final judgment because the case was remanded to the inferior court for further proceedings, was not well taken, because it was not true in point of fact that the case was remanded for further proceedings by the court below, but only for the purpose of enabling the defendants to consent to a modification of the judgment in respect to the amount of damages. When such consent was given, as was done before the writ of error was taken out, there was a final termination of the case, and there was nothing further for the court to do, and the judgment was, therefore, a final judgment. But if the consent had not been given, or until it was given, there was no judgment, either final or otherwise. It was, practically, therefore, nothing more than an order for a new trial, nisi the plaintiff would remit a part of the damages recovered; upon such remittitur being entered, the judgment would become a final one, as nothing would be left for the court to do. But in the case under consideration the report of the commissioner was recommitted for the purpose of enabling that officer to reform the account in accordance with the directions contained in the decree, so that it might form the basis of a final judgment, and until such reformation was made and reported to the court, there was nothing upon which to base a final judgment ascertaining a certain definite amount to be due by the one party to the other, and directing its payment.

*260

*261

Under this view of the case, the other questions presented by the appeal cannot arise and need not be considered.

*262

*The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 262

(Case No. 837.)

THE STATE, ex relatione MARSHALL, v. STARLING.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Mandamus ⇐154.]

County commissioners cannot be required to give a check unless there are funds in the treasury appropriated for the particular subject to which the claim belongs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. ⇐154.]

[2. Counties ⟸162.]

Excesses in any specific appropriation, in the county treasury for a fiscal year, are applicable to other county claims for that year; an excess over all claims goes over to the next fiscal year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 221, 222; Dec. Dig. ⟸162.]

[3. Mandamus ⟸102.]

Funds being in the county treasury for the fiscal year ending October 31st, undrawn, but insufficient to pay audited claims for that fiscal year, and no funds being yet collected for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, upon petition filed in January, a mandamus was granted requiring the county commissioners to draw their warrant for one-third, or the October portion, of a trial justice's salary, which was fixed by law and due for the quarter ending December 31st.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Richland County v. Miller, 16 S. C. 252; In re Conant's Claims, 21 S. C. 364; Jennings v. Abbeville County, 24 S. C. 550.

For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 221; Dec. Dig. ⟸102.]

[4. Counties ⟸204.]

A salary fixed by law need not be audited, as the county commissioners have no discretion to allow or reject it; when funds are in their treasury, applicable to its payment, it is their duty to draw a check therefor.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Clyburn, 16 S. C. 375, 377; State v. Jackson, 32 S. C. 27, 39, 10 S. E. 769; State v. Hallback, 40 S. C. 303, 18 S. E. 919.

For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 312, 316–321, 337; Dec. Dig. ⟸204.]

Original application to the Supreme Court, January, 1880.

Application for a writ of mandamus requiring W. D. Starling, N. J. Dubard and T. A. Scott, county commissioners of Richland county, to pay the salary of the petitioner.

Mr. F. W. Fickling, for relator.

Mr. John R. Abney, for respondents.

March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This is a petition by J. Q. Marshall, a trial justice in the city of Columbia, for a writ of mandamus to *compel the county commissioners of Richland county to draw their check upon the treasury of the county in his favor for $200 for his quarter salary, as trial justice, for the months of October, November and December, 1879, which became due and payable on January 1st, 1880.

*263

The respondents made return, insisting that the rule should be discharged on the grounds—

First. That the relator did not, as he should have done, allege in his petition that there were county funds in the treasury applicable to his claim.

Second. Denying statement of fact as to the alleged promise to issue check for the claim.

Third. Denying that there is any money in the treasury "appropriated for or applicable to the payment of said claim."

Fourth. That out of the taxes for the last fiscal year, the relator had received all his salary except for the month of October, while other creditors of the county had received nothing.

Fifth. That there is no excess from the last fiscal year to come over into this fiscal year.

Sixth. That no taxes have been collected for the present fiscal year.

The return is not traversed, and the facts stated must be assumed to be true.

The relator filed a reply in the nature of a demurrer, making only questions of law.

The county commissioners' act (15 Stat. 989,) provides "that the county commissioners shall not draw any order upon the county treasurer unless he has the funds in the treasury appropriated for the particular object to pay the same, and to enable him to determine whether there is the specific fund upon which to draw, the county commissioners shall indicate on the face of each order the nature of the claim in payment of which it has been given."

And again, Section 23, page 993: "And it shall not be lawful for any county treasurer to pay any claim against the county except upon the checks of the county commissioners, which shall bear upon their face not only the number, amount and *name of the party in whose favor they are drawn, but the nature of the claims for which they are drawn, and the fiscal year in which they were contracted or incurred."

*264

The county commissioners cannot be required to give a check unless there are funds in the treasury appropriated for the particular subject to which that claim belongs. The general rule is that the actor must state everything necessary to make out his case, but whether particular funds are in the treasury may not be known to the claimant, is matter of evidence, and the omission of the allegation is not necessarily fatal.

The question is, were there funds in the county treasury January 1st, 1880, applicable to the class of claims to which that of relator belongs? As a fact it is denied, and it can only be determined by applying the law to the statements of the return. The scheme of the act seems to be, that the commissioners, subject to the limit fixed by the legislature, shall indicate how much money in the year ought to be raised for the county, and distributed among the different objects as provided by law—subject to the controlling duty of keeping distinct the amount collected and the disbursements of each fiscal year. If in any of the sub-divisions of the funds, other than that for fees, disbursements, &c., there should be more than enough to pay all dues of the class for which it was set apart, the excess falls into the residuary fund for the "payment of fees, disbursements," &c., and is applicable to the payment of any other legal claims against the county, and in the event of any excess in this last-named fund, it "shall be applied by the county commissioners to the payment of all claims of that character arising in the next ensuing fiscal year." The excesses of particular funds in a fiscal year are applicable to all claims of that year, and it is only the general excess that goes over to the next year. All claims of the fiscal year, without regard to their character, must be first paid. Some confusion arises in this case from the fact that the calendar is not identical with the fiscal year. The fiscal year commences November 1st, and ends October 31st of the next year. The ordinary expenses, state and county, are provided for as a whole for the fiscal year. The "Act to regulate the appointment and salary of trial justices in the city *of Columbia," approved February 23d, 1875, (15 Stat. 858,) was evidently framed with reference to the calendar year. It provides for each trial justice in the city of Columbia, a "salary of $800 per annum, payable quarterly, on the first days of January, April, July and October, by the county treasurer of Richland, and out of the county funds."

*265

The salary of the relator has been paid up to October 1st, of last year, leaving three months still due—October, November and December, 1879, payable January 1st, 1880. October was in the last, and November and December are in the present fiscal year.

In order to comply with the law requiring each fiscal year to be kept separate, the claim must be divided. No taxes have been collected for the present fiscal year, and therefore there can be no funds applicable to claims of this fiscal year, unless they are there as an excess from the last year. It does not appear that the provision for Richland county in the last fiscal year will discharge all the obligations of that year and leave an excess. The return states that "there will be no excess from the collections of last year to apply to relator's claim." November and December being in the present fiscal year, and there being no funds on hand for that year, no mandamus should issue requiring the county commissioners to sign checks in payment of relator's salary for these months—November and December.

The result may be different as to the salary for the month of October, which was in the last fiscal year. It was not payable until January 1st, 1880, but that circumstance cannot make it a debt of this fiscal year. The statements of the return are not clear as to the balance of accounts for the year ending October 31st, 1879, but it does appear that there is in the treasury the sum of $1451.04 arising from excesses in some of the subdivisions, which, as we have seen, may be appropriated to any other legal claim against the county of that fiscal year. It seems that the commissioners have already approved claims to the amount of the funds in the treasury which are still unpaid. It is not explained why they have not issued checks for these approved claims; but it is admitted that the funds in the treasury have *not been actually applied by order or check for the payment of any particular claims.

*266

The relator's salary for October, 1879, is a claim for that fiscal year, and there being money in the treasury for the payment of the class of claims to which it belongs arising from excess over the amount drawn for by checks or orders, the county commissioners should draw a check upon the treasurer for $66.66 in favor of relator for the same.

It is claimed in behalf of the respondents that it is for them to decide whether they will apply the said residuary fund, and if so, to what creditors they will pay it; that is a matter within their "discretion" and beyond control. The fund is not equitable assets for distribution pro rata among creditors. County Commissioners v. Winnsboro' National Bank, 7 S. C. 79.

In Moses on Mandamus 104, it is said: "Where county commissioners have a discretion and proceed to exercise it, courts have no jurisdiction to control that discretion by a writ of mandamus; but if they refuse to act or to entertain the question for their discretion in cases where the law enjoins upon them to do the act required, courts may enforce obedience to the law by mandamus where no other legal remedy exists."

High on Extraordinary Remedies 105, says: "Frequent applications of the rule occur in cases of salaries due to public officers, and in cases of this nature where the amount of the salary is definitely fixed and appropriated by law, the drawing of the warrant upon the public treasury is unattended with the exercise of any official discretion, and may, very properly, be enforced by mandamus."

The county commissioners have no discretion to allow or reject this claim. It is for a salary and need not be audited. It is fixed by law and ordered to be paid. When there is money in the treasury subject to the payment of legal claims against the county and not actually applied to other claims, it is the duty of the county commissioners to check for a salary fixed in amount and ordered to be paid by the county as a ministerial act positively required by law. The peremptory writ of mandamus should issue requiring the county commissioners of Richland county to draw their check upon the county treasurer, in favor *of the relator, for $66.66—his salary as trial justice for the month of October last.

*267

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 267

(Case No. 841.)

BONHAM v. C. C. & A. RAILROAD COMPANY.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Customs and Usages ⟸15.]

A charter of a railroad company prescribed a maximum rate of charge for the transportation of heavy articles by the hundred pounds, and of articles of measurement by the cubic foot, without further definition in the act itself; whether cotton in bales should be charged as a heavy article or as an article of measurement, depends upon the meaning of those terms as used in the charter, to be ascertained by proof of the custom prevailing at the passage of the act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. ⟸15.]

Before Mackey, J., Richland, December, 1879.

This case and the next succeeding case, Elder v. C. C. & A. R. R. Co., were heard in this court together, both involving a construction of the same section of the act incorporating the defendant company.

M. L. Bonham, railroad commissioner of the State of South Carolina, brought this action against the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad Company, to require them to charge for cotton compressed in bales as a heavy article, under the tenth section of their charter, and not as an article of measurement—and to restrain them from charging higher rates of toll than fifty cents per hundred pounds. The defendant claimed that cotton in bales was an article of measurement, within the terms of their charter.

The Circuit decree, after stating the facts and pleadings, held that no judicial comity was violated in hearing this cause, while the same point was pending before the Supreme Court on appeal from a decision by Judge Wallace. The decree then continued as follows:

The matter at issue must be decided as a question of law, de*pendent upon the true construction of respondent's charter, the meaning and effect of which are to be determined by those established rules for the interpretation of statutes, which are alike commended by reason, and sanctioned by the highest judicial authority. If that construction should operate to affect injuriously either the interests of the corporation or of the public, the remedy is to be sought in the legislative department. Courts are to expound statutes with reference to the legal rights vested under them, and not to frame systems of expediency to fit the varying interests of corporations or individuals.

*268

The question to be decided in this case arises upon the construction of Section 10 of the act entitled "An act to produce conformity in the charters granted to the Charlotte and South Carolina Railroad Company by the States of North and South Carolina," passed December 19th, 1848. 11 Stat. L. 535.

This clause of its charter is construed by the corporation respondent as authorizing it to charge for the transportation of cotton compressed in bales, a rate exceeding fifty cents per hundred pounds for each hundred miles, holding that such cotton as packed in the ordinary hand or horse-power presses of the country, is to be classed as an article of measurement and not as a heavy article, and is therefore subject to a freight charge not exceeding fifteen cents per cubic foot for every hundred miles.

The respondent has therefore charged upon such bales a rate of toll in excess of fifty cents per hundred pounds for each hundred miles, and claim the right, under its charter, to increase its rate upon the same to the limit of fifteen cents per cubic foot for the said distance. The difference in the amount of tolls effected by such classification may be illustrated by the instance of a bale of cotton weighing four hundred and sixty pounds, and containing thirty-five cubic feet.

If charged as a heavy article, to the full limit of the charter rate, the freight thereon would be $2.30 per hundred miles, while charged as an article of measurement, the company may demand the sum of $5.25 for transporting it the same distance. In support of its view the respondent submits that the bale instanced would weigh less by a fraction than fourteen pounds to the cubic foot, and would thus sooner exhaust the cubic capacity *or inner area of the box cars used in transporting this class of freight than articles of less bulk and greater specific gravity or weight.

*269

And hence to classify such bales as heavy articles would be detrimental to the interests of respondent, as the weight capacity of the cars is generally twenty thousand pounds, while twenty-six of such bales would exhaust the cubic capacity of a box car, although aggregating only eleven thousand nine hundred and sixty pounds. The respondent urges, therefore, that the true intent and meaning of its charter are that articles weighing less than thirty pounds to the cubic foot, may be classed as articles of measurement, while articles thirty pounds or more to the cubic foot are to be classed as heavy articles. It is further contended that the practical effect of this formula will be to establish uniformity in freight charges upon all articles, as the maximum charge upon an article by weight at the rate of fifty cents per hundred, would be fifteen cents for thirty pounds, while at fifteen cents per cubic foot, the standard of specific gravity being thirty pounds to the cubic foot, the charge would amount to the same.

It is further submitted that this standard of classification will best give effect to the legislative intent, as expressed in the charter, by harmonizing the rates of toll charged, alike with the weight capacity and the cubic capacity of the cars provided by respondent for the transportation of freights.

I have thus given the salient points in respondent's argument, as unfolding the grounds on which reposes its assumed right to rate cotton in bales as articles of measurement. The theory presented might be deemed tenable if the respondent were a private individual engaged in the carriage of freights, or if the question were, whether the rate charged for the transportation of cotton in bales was a reasonable rate. In the former case, the private carrier could not be subjected to any restrictions save those imposed through considerations of self-interest, induced by the fear of competition or otherwise, while in the latter the basis of classification would be immaterial, as the reasonableness of the charge would alone be in issue.

But the respondent is a railroad corporation in the enjoyment of a highly valuable franchise granted by the state. This fran*chise embraces not only a right of way over a wide and populous belt of country, extending over not less than one hundred and seventy-five miles of territory in length and one hundred and thirty feet in breadth, wherein it was empowered, for the purpose of its road construction, to divest the ownership of property by a compulsory sale after valuation made, but the free gift of all lands of the state lying within sixty-five feet of said road. (See act to charter the Charlotte and South Carolina Railroad Company, passed December 18th, 1846, Sections 16 and 18.) As a consideration for the valuable privileges with which it has been vested, and the special and exclusive rights conferred upon it, this corporation has contracted to perform certain duties to the public, which are defined in its charter, which, as a safeguard for the public, imposes limits upon its corporate powers to enforce the performance of those duties.

*270

When a corporation, thus richly endowed by the public, is charged by the proper officer of the state with having violated its charter in a matter that deeply concerns the common interests of the people whose beneficiary it is, answers back with the argumentum ab inconvenienti, setting up its own convenience as the measure of public right, it can hope to succeed in such an issue only by prevailing upon the courts to ignore both the dictates of right, reason, and the fundamental rules for the interpretation of statutes.

In my opinion, the term "heavy articles," as used in the charter of the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad Company, was intended to include cotton compressed in bales by the ordinary presses of the country, of the usual form and weight, as they were known in the commercial world at the date of said charter. My reasons for this conclusion are as follows:

Up to the date of said charter, and for a period of more than thirty years after its enactment, cotton in bales was classed only as an article of weight in fixing the rate of toll to be charged for its transportation. While I recognize the binding force of the rule as severely expounded by Mr. Justice Story that "contemporary construction can never abrogate the text; it can never fritter away its obvious sense; it can never narrow down its true limitations, or enlarge its natural boundaries," (Story on Const. *407,) yet, when a term which has no definite legal meaning is used in a statute to embrace a large and indefinable class of articles, which could not, in the nature of things, have been enumerated, we are necessarily remitted to contemporaneous usage, as furnishing a practical construction of the legislative intent. The only just limitation is, that such usage shall not be referred to for the purpose of contradicting or varying the obvious sense of the language of the statute.

*271

The object of construction, as applied to a statute, is to give effect to the intent of the legislature in enacting it. Says Mr. Justice Cooley: "In the case of all written laws, it is the intent of the lawgiver that it is to be enforced." Cooley on Const. Lim. 55.

The learned counsel for the respondent, however, while admitting that the statute in question requires construction, and that therefore its import is not obvious, objects to any reference to contemporary usage as a standard of interpretation. This objection is opposed by the overwhelming weight of authority in such cases. Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264; [5 L. Ed. 257]; Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch 299 [2 L. Ed. 115]; The King v. Osborne, 4 East 335; Cook v. Booth, Cowp. 822; 3 Atk. 577; Livingston v. Tenbroek, 16 Johns. 14; Perrine v. Ches. & Del. Canal, 9 How. 172 [13 L. Ed. 92]; 2 Phil. on Ev. 745; 2 Coke Inst. 282; Bank of England v. Anderson, 3 Bing. N. C. 666.

The question now recurs, has there been a long-continued, practical construction of the terms of this charter, by contemporaneous and uniform usage?

I think that this can be established beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the words in question have been interpreted by an unbroken usage extending over a period of more than fifty years.

Twenty years prior to the date of this respondent's charter, the general assembly passed an act incorporating the South Carolina Canal and Railroad Company, (act of December 19th, 1827, 8 Stat. 354,) and embodied the following words in Section 4 of the same: "The charge for the transportation of goods, produce, &c., shall not exceed thirty-five cents per hundred pounds on heavy articles, and ten cents per cubic foot on articles of measurement, for every one hundred miles."

*272

*These words are identical with those contained in respondent's charter, except as to the rate of tolls. Yet the South Carolina Railroad Company has invariably, during the long period above stated, and down to the present day, classed cotton in bales as "heavy articles," and charged thereon by weight and not by measurement. At the date of respondent's charter, the South Carolina railroad was in full operation, and had been running its freight and passenger trains for years to Columbia, the capital of the state, where the legislature annually convened. That body was largely composed of cotton planters, and it must be assumed from their direct individual interest in the matter of freight charges on cotton, that when they inserted the words, "heavy articles" and "articles of measurement," in respondent's charter in the year 1846, they were fully aware of the construction that had been given to the same words in the charter of another company granted by them in the year 1827. That construction was, moreover, the one that was most favorable to producers and shippers, and least favorable to the railroad company that adopted and acted upon it.

It is highly reasonable to presume that a legislature so composed, intended that of two freight classifications to which articles of transportation might be subjected, cotton should be placed in the more favored class. This presumption is strengthened when we recur to the fact, that cotton was then, as now, the chief product of the state, and that all industries flourished or languished, and all values rose or fell with its rise or decline in price. It was emphatically the prime source of public and private revenue.

It is also important to consider that it was the product of a non-manufacturing people, and was, therefore, intended for sale in distant markets. Hence it is safe to conclude, that to furnish a cheap and rapid means of transportation to market for this valuable product, must have been the chief motive that impelled popular subscriptions to the capital stock of this company, as provided for in its charter.

But, upon respondent's theory, the legislature intended that the South Carolina Railroad Company should have the right to charge on cotton in bales as articles of measurement, which, at *the rates fixed by its charter, would have enabled that corporation to have charged on a five hundred pound bale of cotton, containing forty cubic feet, the sum of $5.20 from Columbia to Charleston, a distance of one hundred and thirty miles, while the same bale, if transported that distance as a heavy article, at the extreme charter rate, would have been $2.27½ only.

*273

And, on this basis of classification, at the rates of toll allowed in respondent's charter, the charge on a bale of cotton of the above-stated weight and cubic contents, would be from Columbia to Charlotte, one hundred and ten miles, rated as an article of measurement, $6.60, and as an article of weight only $2.75.

The respondent's construction of its charter rights, it will thus be perceived, discriminates severely against cotton, which, it has been shown, might be reasonably presumed to have been the favored product of the state.

But we are not left to presumption in this particular, for we have positive legislation discriminating in favor of this product.

By the act of December 20th, 1828, fixing the rates of toll to be charged on boats passing through the Landsford, Catawba, Saluda, and other canals therein named, it was provided that "for every boat loaded with cotton, one cent on each bale, for each lock. For every boat loaded otherwise than with cotton, thirty-seven and one-half cents for each lock. For every empty boat, twelve and one-half cents. When a boat is loaded with less than thirteen bales of cotton it shall pass as an empty boat. When a boat is loaded with less than one ton, it shall pass as an empty boat." 6 Stat. 370.

The rates of the Columbia canal were established by an act of the same date, as follows: "For every boat loaded with cotton, one cent on each bale; but boats loaded with less than twenty-five bales of cotton shall pay $1. For boats loaded otherwise than with cotton, the following rates are required: from $4 to $2 per boat, according to size. For each empty boat, $1."

It will be observed that, as to the first named canals, a boat loaded with five thousand four hundred pounds of cotton, or twelve bales, estimating a bale at four hundred and fifty pounds was allowed to pass as an empty boat, and was charged only *twelve and one-half cents, while a boat with one ton, or two thousand two hundred and forty pounds of any other lading than cotton, was charged thirty-seven and one-half cents per lock.

*274

On the Columbia canal, a boat loaded with twenty-four such bales, or any number less than twenty-five, was charged $1 as an empty boat, while a boat with any other lading, however light, was charged at least $2.

I have thought these details not unnecessary, as they serve not only to exhibit the practical effect of respondent's construction of its charter, but make manifest the fact that at the very period when the words which are now construed to impose on cotton the highest rate of toll, were first embodied in a railroad charter, it was the declared policy of the state to discriminate in favor of that article.

That there may be a state policy not declared in terms, but deducible from the general scope of its legislation, as to a fiscal or industrial enterprise, I have no doubt. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 584 [10 L. Ed. 274]; United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch 358 [2 L. Ed. 304]; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 544 [9 L. Ed. 773]; Penna. R. R. v. Canal Commissioners, 21 Penna. 22; Potter's Law of Corp., vol. I., 32.

It may well be held that this corporation is estopped from denying the correctness of a construction of its charter, which, although most favorable to the public, it has asserted and acted upon for more than a quarter of a century.

Certainly this is the established doctrine applied to railroad corporations, as to the location of their routes, and by parity of reasoning, it should apply to the present case. 1 Redf. on Rail. 123.

As to the thirty pounds cubic foot theory, it was, in my opinion, as foreign to the contemplation of the legislators who enacted this charter, as was the mathematical puzzle of the duplication of the cube that baffled the genius of Euclid, or the perplexing problem of the asymptote of the hyperbola. To impute to them any such occult theory, is to take a highly transcendental view of the legislative mind.

*275

*Now, is the capacity of respondent's cars to convey articles of measurement at all, more relevant to the issue than would be the tractive power of its engines to carry articles of weight?

The equipment of its road is changeable at the will of the respondent; and for courts to give judicial sanction to such an argument, would be to erect a most variable and uncertain standard by which to measure public rights.

In view of the law and the facts in the premises—

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the rule heretofore granted in the above entitled cause, be, and the same is hereby made absolute, and that the respondent herein, The Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad Company, the officers, agents, servants and employees, be, and the same are hereby perpetually prohibited and enjoined from charging for the transportation of cotton in bales otherwise than as articles of weight, subject only to the same rates of toll per hundred pounds as are applicable to all other heavy articles, pursuant to the charter of the said company, as herein construed.

It is further ordered, that a copy of this order be forthwith served upon the said respondent, and that the respondent do pay the costs of this proceeding.

From this decree, the defendant appealed, upon the grounds that cotton in bales was an article of measurement within the meaning of its charter; and that there was no evidence to sustain the conclusions of fact as to the custom of charging for cotton on this or other railroads.

[For subsequent opinion, see 16 S. C. 633.]

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

Mr. J. T. Rhett, contra.

March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The question on this appeal is one of the construction of the clause of the charter of the defendant corporation, that provides as follows: "That the said company shall have the exclusive right of conveyance or transportation of persons, goods, merchandise and produce over the said railroad to *be by them constructed, and shall have power to charge for such transportation of persons, goods, produce, merchandise and other articles any sum not exceeding the following rates, viz.: On persons, not exceeding six cents per mile for each person, unless the distance which any person may be transported be less than ten miles, in which case the president and directors may be entitled to make an extra charge of fifty cents for taking up and putting down such persons so transported; for the transportation of goods, produce, merchandise and other articles, not exceeding fifty cents per hundred pounds for each hundred miles on heavy articles, and fifteen cents per cubic foot on articles of measurement for every hundred miles; and for the transportation of the mails such sums as they may agree for with the agents of the United States."

*276

The question is, whether cotton, packed in bales, in the manner used for the purpose of transportation, may be regarded as an "article of measurement," so as to authorize a charge for the transportation of the same, at the rate of fifteen cents per cubic foot for every hundred miles. The plaintiff charges that cotton, in that condition, is to be regarded as a "heavy article," within the intent and meaning of the statute. The first inquiry is, whether the court can determine, as matter of law, whether cotton in bales is a heavy article or an article of measurement, in the sense in which these terms are employed in the statute. It is true, as stated by the Circuit judge in his opinion, that the court takes notice of the general customs of the country; but that does not imply that the usages of business, as a general rule, lay within the judicial notice of the courts. Those customs that have been incorporated as part of the common law, as defined by adjudicated cases, are, beyond question, subjects of judicial notice without proof in point of fact. It is not to be denied that customs may and do become so incorporated, that have had their origin since the period of time to which the common law looks as the test of antiquity. It may well be questioned whether any modern custom becomes incorporated in the common law until it has been established as a matter of fact by judicial authority. The change of the status of such a question from one of fact to one of law, is by gradual and almost insensible steps, but is of *merely speculative interest, as it regards the present case. It is clear that the terms heavy articles and articles of measurement cannot be defined, in their application to goods of different kinds, by mere legal authority; but assuming them to be intelligible to those concerned in the business of transportation by rail, or by more general means, their sense must be made apparent by testimony of such a custom or habit of business as tends to define their import. If these terms are to be regarded as used in a sense peculiar to those engaged in a particular business, then their force can only be ascertained by testimony adduced for that purpose and as matter of fact. That they cannot be regarded in any other sense will become apparent from the consideration of their nature.

*277

It is evident that the term heavy articles is used in a technical sense, and not according to its popular use, from the fact that it is contrasted with articles of measurement. Articles of measurement are such as are ordinarily transported by measurement and not by weight. It cannot be said that there is any such class of articles as articles of measurement in a general sense, and commonly known and understood as such, and hence the term must have a particular or technical sense. Without doubt articles of measurement are charged according to volume, a cubic capacity, because they are light, as compared with the class called heavy, and that accounts for the term heavy being applied to the opposite class, but that affords the reason of the term, but not its definition.

It is said, however, that the statute affords a means by which the terms heavy and articles of measurement may be defined without the aid of extrinsic proof, in such manner as to accomplish what should be regarded as the object of the statute viz., to make every article transported pay according to a single standard by which the two elements of weight and volume are brought to a common unit of comparison. It is said that an article that weighs thirty pounds and occupies the space of one cubic foot will pay an equal amount, whether it is computed according to weight or to measurement, and that, therefore, an article weighing more than thirty pounds to the cubic foot should be charged as heavy, because it is heavier than the article selected as the unit, *and that articles of less than thirty pounds per cubic foot should, for the same reason, be regarded as articles of measurement. This method of gathering the sense of the statute is certainly ingenious, and, if sanctioned by the rules of construction, ought to prevail, notwithstanding its novelty. If the statute indicated an intention to furnish a mathematical formula capable of determining whether any particular article belonged to the one class or to the other, we should be compelled to say that this was the formula, as no other appears, depending wholly on the provisions of the statute, without extrinsic help. But the statute contains nothing that furnishes the indication of such an intent. If we test the mathematical standard by its fitness to accomplish the general objects of the statute, it must fail. Like all theoretical conceptions, it demands a state of things possible but that may never actually exist. For instance, if all articles carried by rail were of the same value, according to weight or volume, the formula would approach perfection. But that is not the case. Coal and diamonds, though intimately related through the element that is common to them, are very far removed from each other in point of value. It is clear that any standard that would rank these articles together as paying the same amount per pound for transportation, would be practically an absurdity. The articles subject to railroad transportation are of so varied a character as to value, liability to produce and receive injury, and convenience of handling and transportation, that the absurdity illustrated by the case of coal and diamonds re-appears with more or less distinctness throughout the whole series.

*278

It may be said that classification of freights into several grades or classes, each paying a rate differing from the others, and passing by the regular steps of gradation from the minimum charge to the maximum, might obviate the irregularity that would result from the differences of value in the articles so graded in the application of the rule of computation already stated. If it were possible that practical classification should be based on differences of value alone, this might be the case. But there are other considerations than that of value that must enter into practical classification, such as liability to produce or sustain damage, and the convenience of handling and transportation. It is apparent *that the moment it is admitted that the amount charged for any two commodities respectively, may be regulated independently of their relative weight and volume, the rule of equality propounded in the mathematical formula is violated, as would be the case, in many instances, where differences relative to liability to produce or receive injury, and the convenience of handling and transporting were allowed to affect the amount of the sums charged for freight. It is clear that the tendency of such a construction as that contended for would be to compel railroad companies to adjust their business to theoretical standards instead of leaving them free, within certain limits, to arrange their modes of transacting their business according to the exigencies of the business. It is equally clear that the whole purpose of the statute was to fix an upward limit to railroad charges, and not to fix a scale by which they might be computed with reference to a unit common to all classes of goods. This would leave the company free to pursue that course that would be dictated by business necessity or prudence within the limits fixed by law. Such being the case, we must conclude that the act does not afford any means of determining the force of the expressions heavy and articles of measurement, and that these terms must be defined by proof of the custom in practice prevailing at the time of the passage of the act.

*279

There is no evidence in this case in which a construction of these terms can be made in their application to cotton packed in bales, and the judgment appealed from must be set aside and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 279

(Case No. 842.)

ELDER & CO. v. C. C. & A. RAILROAD CO.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Customs and Usages ⟸15.]

Where a charter of a railroad company prescribed a maximum rate of charge for the transportation of heavy articles by the hundred pounds, and of articles of measurement by the cubic foot, without further defini*tion in the act itself, it was properly left to the jury to determine whether cotton in bales were heavy articles, or articles of measurement, within the meaning which custom had given to those terms at the date of the charter.

*280

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. ⟸15.]

Before Wallace, J., Fairfield, September, 1879.

This case and the next preceding case, Bonham v. C. C. & A. R. R. Co., were heard in this court together, both involving a construction of the same section of the act incorporating the defendant company.

The case is stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

This is an appeal from a trial justice's court, upon points of law.

The facts of the case pertinent to the issue of law raised, are as follows: The plaintiffs shipped ten bales of cotton at Winnsboro, consigned to Charlotte, upon the defendants' road. The distance between those points is seventy-two miles. The cotton weighed an average of four hundred and sixty pounds to the bale, and had an average measurement of thirty-five cubic feet. The section of defendants' charter brought before the court for consideration, provides that the railroad company may charge "for the transportation of goods, produce and merchandise, and other articles, any sum not exceeding fifty cents per hundred pounds for each hundred miles on heavy articles, and fifteen cents per cubic foot on articles of measurement, for every hundred miles." The defendants charged for the transportation of the cotton at the rate of fifteen cents per cubic foot per hundred miles, or the sum of $37.80. The plaintiffs tendered payment at the rate of fifty cents per one hundred pounds per hundred miles, or the sum of $16.58. This being refused, the plaintiffs paid the amount charged under protest, and brought suit for the difference of $21.22.

At the trial, the defendants requested the trial justice to instruct the jury "that the defendants had the legal right, under this charter, to classify goods, produce, merchandise and other articles offered them for transportation, as 'heavy articles,' or as 'articles of measurement,' according as said goods, produce, merchandise, or other articles, by their weight or bulk, first *exhaust the carrying capacity of the freight cars used for the transportation of the said goods, produce, merchandise, or other articles."

*281

The trial justice declined so to charge; to which the defendants excepted. We shall consider that exception alone; and if error was committed in this refusal, the judgment of the court below cannot stand.

Now, if the defendants had the right to classify the cotton tendered for shipment as articles of measurement under their charter, it then follows that their classification, however arrived at, is legal. The question, then, for consideration is, whether, under the terms of the section of the charter referred to, cotton in bales can be classed as "articles of measurement," as contended by the defendants, or must be classed as "heavy articles," as contended for by the plaintiffs. What, then, is a heavy article? The term "heavy" is a comparative term, as applied to different articles. Iron is heavy, feathers are light or bulky. Yet a pound of feathers is as heavy as a pound of iron. Hence, an article is heavy when a certain bulk has a certain weight, while one which has the same bulk, but weighs less, will not be heavy. On this principle we call iron heavy and feathers light. The difficulty is in drawing the line of demarcation, or in ascertaining when the weight of an article, compared with its bulk, makes it a heavy article. We may safely say that lint cotton is not heavy, and that cotton compressed in very small bales, as is now done by powerful steam or hydraulic presses, is heavy. If we consider bales of cotton as usually packed by farmers and such as were shipped in this case, we are of the opinion that the bulk of thirty-five cubic feet, weighing only four hundred and sixty pounds, fail to make them "heavy articles."

The difficulty, as we have said, is in fixing the line of demarcation. But does not the section under consideration aid us, or indicate a line of demarcation fixed by the statute itself? We must assume what the section intends—a uniformity of charges on what it styles "heavy articles," and what it denominates as "articles of measurement." The limit on one class is fifty cents per one hundred pounds; on the other, fifteen cents per cubic foot. Either mode of charges would amount to the same, if *the article upon which the charge is made weighed thirty pounds to the cubic foot. Upon such an article the limit applied to it, either as a heavy article or an article of measurement, would be fifteen cents. We may then well infer that the intention of the section is to allow a classification upon this basis of thirty pounds to the cubic foot; articles weighing over this coming under the head of "heavy," and articles weighing less, under the head of "articles of measurement." The bales of cotton in this case weighed only four hundred and sixty pounds to the thirty-five cubic feet, or not quite fourteen pounds to the cubic foot. We are, therefore, of the opinion, that by virtue of their charter, the defendants were authorized to classify and charge on the cotton in this case as articles of measurement.

*282

This construction of the section under consideration makes it of itself effective, and obviates the necessity of a contest as to the proper classification of each and every article that may be tendered for transportation. Besides, should the railroad company charge by weight on an article of measurement, according to this standard, or, on the other hand, charge by measurement on a heavy article, it would make an erroneous classification, to its own loss.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the trial justice erred in his construction of the statute, and that, therefore, the judgment of the court below appealed from must be set aside, and it is accordingly so adjudged.

Plaintiffs appealed.

[For subsequent opinion, see 15 S. C. 610.]

Messrs. H. A. Gaillard, A. M. Mackey and Louis Le Conte, for appellants.

Mr. J. H. Rion, contra.

March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This was an action in the trial justice's court, in which the plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment, which was set aside by the Circuit Court.

The case of Bonham v. the same defendants, just decided, disposes of the questions of law raised in this case. The charge *of the trial justice was conformable to the conclusions at which we have arrived as stated in that case.

*283

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be set aside and that of the trial justice affirmed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 283

(Case No. †845.)

THE STATE, ex relatione JONES, v. BOLES.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Sheriffs and Constables ⟸98.]

A sheriff is not relieved from liability to the senior judgment creditor for moneys realized from a sale of the debtor's property and applied to a junior judgment, although directed so to do by an order of the Circuit Court under proceedings by rule, but to which the senior judgment creditor was not a party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 147; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 98.]

Before Townsend, J., Edgefield, October, 1877.

This was an action upon the bond of Isaac Boles, late sheriff of Edgefield county, to which action his sureties were also defendants, to recover the amount of a judgment obtained by Lewis Jones, the plaintiff here, against one Mims. Boles, while sheriff, had sold property belonging to Mims for a sum exceeding the amount of the Jones judgment, which was the oldest existing judgment against Mims. Upon a rule to show cause, issued by Judge Orr in 1870, and the return thereto, Boles was ordered to apply this Mims money to certain junior judgments under which the property was sold. Boles complied with this order, but Jones was no party to these proceedings, and never heard of them, nor was the existence of his judgment brought to the attention of Judge Orr. The defendants relied upon this order of Judge Orr and the statute of limitations as their defences. Mims' lands were sold December, 1868, Boles vacated his office the same month, Judge Orr's order and Boles' payments were *January 15th, 1870; this action was commenced January 17th, 1876.

*284

Judge Townsend charged the jury that the order of Judge Orr protected Boles from all liability on account of the application to the junior judgments of the proceeds of the sale of Mims' land, and that if there was error in such application the remedy of relator was against the junior judgment creditors. To this ruling the relator excepted. Verdict for defendants: and plaintiff appealed.

† Case No. 844, Arnold v. House, will be found in 12 S. C. 600.

Mr. J. P. Carroll, for appellant.

Mr. J. C. Sheppard, contra, supported the judge's ruling, and also claimed the benefit of their plea of the statute of limitations, citing Chev. 25; 3 B. & Ald. 288, 626; 20 Johns. 33; 2 Strob. 344; 4 Rich. 39; 2 Greenl. on Ev., §§ 433, 434; 2 C. & P. 107; 1 C. & P. 312; 16 East 215; Chitty on Cont. 637.

March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This action is against the sheriff and his sureties on his official bond, the relator claiming that the sheriff had improperly paid over the proceeds of the sale of the lands of an execution debtor under junior judgments, when he should have satisfied the judgment of the relator, which was the eldest. The only question that can be considered under the present appeal is, whether there was error in the charge of the Circuit judge in holding that the relator Jones was bound and estopped by an order of the Circuit Court, made against the sheriff on the application of the junior judgment creditors, directing the sheriff to pay over to them the proceeds of the sale in question, when the relator Jones was not a party to the proceeding in which the order was made, and had no notice of it.

The charge violated the fundamental principle and rule of law that no one shall be bound by a judgment or order who is not a party thereto or in privity with one who is a party. Jones had no opportunity to object to the order in question, and, of course, was not bound by it. The sheriff had the means in his power of protecting himself by causing Jones to be made a party to such *proceeding, and, failing to do so, he cannot throw the consequences on the relator.

*285

There must be a new trial.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 285

(Case No. 846.)

STATE v. STEPHENS

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Criminal Law ⟸190.]

A party convicted of murder having moved this court in arrest of judgment, and this court having, upon that appeal, ordered a new trial, the Circuit judge at the second trial properly overruled a plea of autrefois convict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 375; Dec. Dig. ⟸190.]

[2. Criminal Law ⟸965.]

When one convicted of murder is granted a new trial, the second trial may proceed upon the same indictment, and there is no force in the objection that the verdict and sentence in the first trial, written on the back of the indictment, will be read by the second jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2421; Dec. Dig. ⟸965.]

[3. Criminal Law ⟸1192.]

A remittitur which orders a new trial, in effect sets aside the verdict and judgment appealed from.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 32, 33; Dec. Dig. ⟸1192.]

[4. Jury ⟸80.]

It is not necessary that thirty-six jurors should be present at the commencement of a trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 364; Dec. Dig. ⟸80.]

[5. Jury ⟸122.]

The state may direct a juror to stand aside until the panel is exhausted.†

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 501; Dec. Dig. ⟸122.]

Before Wallace, J., Edgefield, June, 1879.

This case having been once before this court, will be found reported in 11 S. C. 319. It will be there observed that the defendant appealed from an order overruling a motion made in arrest of judgment, and that this court directed a new trial. The remittitur, sent down by the clerk of the Supreme Court, read as follows: "Judgment. It is adjudged by the court that there be a new trial, on the ground last stated in the opinion of the court hereunto annexed."

Defendant objected to a trial upon the grounds, (1) that as appeared by the endorsement of the verdict and sentence on the indictment, he had already been convicted, and he filed a formal *plea of autrefois convict; (2) that thirty-six jurors were not present. Both objections were overruled, and defendant excepted. The state ordered jurors to stand aside, who were recalled when the panel was exhausted; to this the defendant excepted. The defendant was found guilty. He then submitted a motion in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the record showed a previous conviction, and there was no evidence before the court to show that such former judgment had ever been arrested, or that a new trial had ever been ordered. The motion was refused and defendant was sentenced to be hanged. He appealed to this court, renewing here the objections taken below.

*286

Messrs. B. W. Bettis and Arthur Tompkins, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Abney, contra.

March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The first exception embodies the proposition that the defendant, having been once convicted of murder under the present indictment, and a new trial having been granted in invitum by this court, the attempt to subject him to a second trial under the indictment was, in effect, putting him in jeopardy of his life twice for the same offence.

† State v. McNinch, (4) 12 S. C. 89.

Section 18, Article I. of the constitution, declares that "no person after having been acquitted by a jury, shall again, for the same offence, be put in jeopardy of his life or liberty." As the prisoner never has been acquitted of the offence charged in the indictment, this clause has no application to his case. If under any circumstances granting to a person under conviction a new trial could be regarded as depriving him of any right of defence, even where such new trial was granted in invitum, still that is not the present case. The judgment of this court granting such new trial was made upon an appeal by the prisoner, and, therefore, must be regarded as made at his demand, whether the appeal prayed for a new trial or that the judgment might be arrested. An appellant asking for relief of a certain character must be regarded as asking for relief of a less comprehensive character should he be found not entitled to that which he *specifically demands. This proceeds from a principle manifestly in the interest of appellants, and there is no sufficient reason for denying its application to capital cases. The appellant sought to arrest the judgment, but the appellate court concluded that he was not entitled to such relief. Finding, however, that he was entitled to a new trial the court so directed. To have held that the prisoner could not have a new trial, although the record exhibited error, merely because he had not named that relief in his appeal, would have been open to serious objection in any case, and especially so in a capital case. The court properly overruled the plea of a former trial, and properly refused to arrest the judgment on that ground.

*287

The remittitur of this court contained its judgment ordering a new trial, and it was the duty of the Circuit Court to proceed, as it did, in obedience to the requirement of that judgment.

There is no force in the objection that there should have been a new indictment. That question was settled by the judgment of this court ordering a new trial, which must be interpreted as ordering such new trial upon the existing indictment.

Neither is there any force in the objection that the former verdict and judgment was submitted to the inspection of the jury. The indictment was properly submitted to their inspection, and, it must be assumed, could not be so submitted without bringing to their attention the former verdict and judgment under it. It cannot be assumed that the knowledge of the previous proceedings under the indictment would have any tendency to prejudice the minds of the jury.

The objection that the remittitur did not expressly set aside the verdict and judgment when it ordered a new trial is without force. That which results as a necessary implication from the judgment rendered is a part of it. A new trial could not be ordered without having such effect, and the order for such new trial must be regarded as setting aside the former verdict and judgment.

It was not necessary that the whole number of thirty-six jurors should be present at the commencement of the trial. No sanction exists for such a demand either in the statute or the authorities.

*288

*The practice of directing jurors objected to by the state to stand aside until the panel is exhausted has been repeatedly recognized, and is too well established to be disturbed by this court, whatever may be our view as to its soundness in principle.

The appeal must be dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 288

(Case No. 847.)

KAPP & ROTHSCHILD v. LOYNS.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Costs ⇨3.]

Costs are governed by the fee-bill of force at the time of the verdict, not at the time of the taxation.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lewis v. Brown, 16 S. C. 64; Fooshe v. Merriwether, 20 S. C. 339; Benbow v. Richardson, 21 S. C. 602.

For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⇨3.]

[2. Costs ⇨22.]

Where plaintiff recovered verdict for $24, in October, 1874, in an action upon a contract for goods sold, defendant is entitled to the costs of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 47–73; Dec. Dig. ⇨22.]

[This case is also cited in Lewis v. Brown, 16 S. C. 58, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, March, 1879.

Action commenced in January, 1874, by Kapp & Rothschild against A. W. Loyns to recover $201.37, the price of goods sold and delivered. Defence was failure of consideration. Verdict was rendered October, 1874, in favor of plaintiff for $24. Plaintiff demanded a taxation of costs in his favor, by the clerk of the court, which, being refused, he obtained a rule, March, 1879, against the clerk. The clerk made return that, in his opinion, the plaintiffs were not entitled to costs, but that the defendant was. The Circuit judge sustained the clerk and discharged the rule.

The plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Mr. R. K. Charles, for appellant.
Mr. G. W. Dargan, contra.

*289

*March 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This is an action for the recovery of money upon an account for goods and merchandise sold and delivered, commenced January, 1874. A verdict was rendered at October Term, 1874, for $24. A question arose as to the right of the plaintiff to costs that was not disposed of until 1879. In the meantime an amendment of the code was passed that materially affected the rule of costs in a case of this character. The first question to be considered is, whether the right of the parties to costs is to be tested by the law as it stood at the time the verdict was obtained, or at the time when the costs were actually taxed.

Costs under the code are in the nature of damages. The code (Section 329) after repealing the statutes allowing attorneys costs, declares that "there may be allowed to the prevailing party upon the judgment certain sums by way of indemnity for his expenses in the action, which allowances are in this act termed costs." This section professes to define the nature of costs, as that term is employed in the code, and the language employed for that purpose imports the idea of damages. Such being the case, the rule of the statute prevailing at the time of the recovery of the verdict, would be the proper measure of such damages as are ascertained by the court as matter of law, and included in the judgment. This rule appears to prevail in New York. Moore v. Westervelt, 14 How. Pr. 279; Scudder v. Gori, 28 How. Pr. 155. The point was noticed, but not decided in Stegall v. Bolt, 11 S. C. 522.

It would follow that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs in this action, it being an action for money, unless he recovered $50. The amendment reducing this amount to $20 (16 Stat. 409) not having been passed until after the verdict recovered, cannot affect the right of the parties as it regards the present question.

As was held in Stegall v. Bolt, the amount claimed is the test whether the action is one "of which a court of trial justice has no jurisdiction," in the sense of sub-division 3, Section 330, where the action is of such a nature that it may be brought in the trial justice's court, where the damages, a sum claimed, is less than $100. This conclusion is a necessary consequence of the language used in confirming jurisdiction in the trial justices, which, in the *instance of actions on contract and for injuries to the person or to real or personal property, makes the claim of damages the test of the jurisdiction. It must, therefore, be concluded that the present is a case of which the trial justice has no cognizance.

*290

The effect of sub-division 4, Section 330, as it regards actions for the recovery of money, is that the plaintiff can gain no advantage in such action by placing the claim at an amount exceeding the jurisdiction of a trial justice, for in such cases he cannot get costs unless he recovers at least $50, as the act stood until the amendment, and $20 now.

Section 331 gives the defendant costs as of course, "in the actions mentioned in the last section, unless the plaintiff is entitled to costs thereon." As we have seen, this action is one mentioned in Section 330, and the plaintiff is not entitled to costs in this action, hence the defendant is entitled to have his costs under Section 331.

The order and judgment appealed from must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

13 S. C. 290

(Case No. 848.)

THE STATE, ex relatione BROWN, v. C. & L. R. R. CO.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Judgment ⊂⊃570.]

A judgment upon the merits dismissing an action brought by certain taxpayers of a county against the county commissioners to enjoin the issue by them of certain railroad aid bonds, is an estoppel to a subsequent action after the bonds have been issued, brought in the name of the state upon the relation of certain other taxpayers of the same county, against the county commissioners, the railroad company and purchasers of the bonds, to have the bonds adjudged illegal and void.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Watson v. Columbia Bridge Co., 13 S. C. 438; Ex parte Kenmore Shoe Co., 50 S. C. 147, 27 S. E. 682.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1032; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃570.]

[2. Judgment ⊂⊃681.]

A county having issued certain railroad aid bonds after a decree of the court had determined that the county had the power to do so, all persons purchasing such bonds become privies to the decree, and may rely upon its estoppels. Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175 [17 L. Ed. 520], referred to.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1202; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃681.]

3. A statement in State, ex rel. Harris, v. Robertson, county treasurer, MS. Dec., Nov., 1877, explained; and the dissenting opinion in Glenn v. County Commissioners, 6 S. C. 412, approved.

*291

[4. Counties ⊂⊃150.]

*In our state constitution there is no restriction which deprives the legislature of the power to authorize counties to incur obligations and issue bonds for their payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 215; Dec. Dig. ⟸150.]

[This case is also cited in Herndon v. Moore, 18 S. C. 355; Feldman & Co. v. City Council of Charleston, 23 S. C. 61, 55 Am. Rep. 6; Floyd v. Perrin, 30 S. C. 19, 8 S. E. 14, 2 L. R. A. 242; Allen v. Adams, Mayor, 66 S. C. 355, 44 S. E. 938, as an example of the constitutional right of counties to subscribe to stock of railroad companies.]

Before Pressley, J., York, March, 1879.

For a proper understanding of this case, it will be well to read the case of Glenn v. County Commissioners of York, 6 S. C. 412. In that case, Glenn and others, taxpayers of the county of York, brought their action against the county commissioners of York, to enjoin the issue of $100,000 in county bonds to pay for a subscription made by the commissioners for the county to the Chester and Lenoir Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, without any vote by the people. The defendants there admitted the subscription, and that the bonds were about to be issued, but claimed the power to make such subscription and issue such bonds under Section 11 of the act incorporating such railroad company, (15 Stat. 395,) which reads as follows:

"Section 11. That it shall be lawful for any county or town interested in the construction of the said Chester and Lenoir railroad to subscribe to the capital stock of said company, or of any company with which it may consolidate or unite, such sum, and to be payable in such manner as the people, or proper authorities of such county or town shall deem best, determine, and authorize; and in all meetings of stockholders, the county commissioners of the respective counties, and the town councils of the respective towns, shall appoint some person to represent the stock of their respective counties and towns: provided, that the property of said railroad company, situated in this state, shall be subject to taxation during the existence of their charter."

The Circuit judge held that the commissioners had the power to subscribe and to issue bonds, and dismissed the complaint, with costs. The plaintiffs appealed, and in 1874 the appeal was dismissed by a majority of the court, but no opinion filed, and Willard, A. J., dissenting.

The present case was instituted in April, 1878, in the name of the State of South Carolina upon the relation of F. H. Brown *and sixteen others, taxpayers of York county, against the Chester and Lenoir Railroad Company, the county of York, the commissioners of York county and several other defendants, then owning or holding bonds of the county of York, issued by the commissioners of York county to pay for subscription of that county to the capital stock of the Chester and Lenoir Railroad Company. The complaint alleged that there was no authority for the subscription or the issue of bonds, and that they were null and void; and it prayed that the bonds might be adjudged illegal and void, and the defendants required to deliver them up for cancellation. The defendants, in their several answers, claimed that the bonds were legal, and protected by the decision in the former case. There were other issues involved, but they were suspended to await the single question, are the bonds valid? Trial was had on the pleadings in this case, and the record in Glenn v. County Commissioners. From the pleadings here it appeared that all of the bonds in existence had passed out of the hands of the county of York, and also of the railroad company, and were held by purchasers for value, and as collateral security for an obligation of the company.

*292

The Circuit decree is as follows:

This case was heard by me on the pleadings, which, together with the acts of the legislature and the case of Glenn and others, hereafter referred to, sufficiently show the facts and issues involved. I have always regarded the said case of Glenn et al. v. County Commissioners, as a final decision of the whole matter now involved. The Circuit judge certainly decided it upon its merits, and the motion to reverse his judgment was dismissed by the majority of the appeal court, from which Willard, A. J., dissented, and, assuming that the action of the majority confirmed the construction of the statute made by the Circuit judge, he fully states the reasons for his dissent.

In my opinion the terms of the act clearly fall within the class of cases of which the word "or" is construed to mean "and." Any other construction would make it confer power either upon the "people" or upon the proper "authorities" to make the subscription in question. But "the people" could not possibly exercise such a power without the concurrence of *"the proper *authorities," unless some other agency were expressly provided for that purpose. No such agency was provided in this case. It is therefore plain that the act intended that the people and the proper authorities should not act in the alternative, but that both should act in concurrence.

*293

Since the case of Glenn et al. v. County Commissioners was decided, matters have transpired of which courts are bound to take notice, and which change very materially the aspect of the case. Three general elections have taken place, at which the people of York county, if the majority had so desired, might have elected county commissioners who would have surrendered, or offered to surrender to the railroad company the stock which had been issued to the county in exchange for the bonds which are again called in question. But no such action was taken, and the commissioners still hold the said stock as the property of the county, and do not in their answer even now offer to surrender it. The act prescribes no special mode by which the proper authorities were to ascertain the sense of the people. And it is now too late to do that by a vote; the road has been built through the county and is in daily operation; the people who are enjoying its conveniences and advantages may now very willingly vote to be freed from a tax to pay for it, and that without any danger of being thereby deprived of its benefits; their wishes in the matter at this time is not a question material to the proper decision of this case; the true issue is, whether or not the majority approved of the subscription at the time it was made; that could not be settled satisfactorily either by a vote now, or by the testimony of any number of witnesses, merely stating their opinion that the people would have voted for or against the said subscription; what they have done or failed to do at the general elections heretofore held, is the only test now proper.

I therefore hold that their long acquiescence has ratified the action of their county commissioners.

Further, as no clause of our state constitution prohibits the legislature from authorizing "the proper authorities of counties or of towns" to make such subscriptions, even without any vote or other concurrence by the people, it could have conferred that power in the said act if it so willed. Not having previously *conferred it, such subscription made in excess of authority, or even without authority, might thereafter be ratified by the legislature. If so, then the act of March 5th, 1875, which authorizes a special tax in York county to retire the bonds which had been so issued, is a clear recognition of their validity, and, consequently, cures all excess of authority by the commissioners.

*294

I cannot assume that the said act was passed by the legislature without its having had full knowledge of all the facts of the case. The appeal court had previously rendered its decision in the said case of Glenn et al. v. County Commissioners; and in that case the excess of authority by the said commissioners was fully and plainly set forth and discussed. It was matter of public notoriety, freely discussed everywhere in the state, and must have been well known not only to the members of the legislature from York county, but to the assembly generally. Besides, it was the duty of the legislature, before passing such an act, to inquire strictly into the facts of the case. And in the absence of all proof to the contrary, I am bound to presume that such duty was properly performed. Other matters, subsequently to the said act, all concur to show acquiescence by the people, and further confirmation by the legislature. Even the act of 1878, which suspends for a year the said act of 1875, makes it manifest that until such suspension the commissioners had been collecting the tax which the said act of 1875 authorized; and after such suspension, the tax act of 1875 still permitted the levy of a tax to pay the coupons on the bonds in question. Whatever, therefore, may be the force of the decision in the said case of Glenn and others, I hold that, without it, matters have since transpired, which, taken altogether, clearly establish the validity of the said bonds. And I consequently adjudge and deem that the complaint in this case be dismissed, with costs.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed, upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the case of Glenn et al. v. County Commissioners, was a final decision of the matters involved in this action.

2. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the people of York county had ever, in any manner or form, by any free action *upon their part, approved, acquiesced in, or ratified the subscription made to said railroad company, without their consent and against their will. The fact being that said people have, at all times and under all circumstances, as far as it was in their power, protested against the said subscription, and denied that it was binding upon them, as the plaintiff is ready to prove.

*295

3. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the legislature of the state had the constitutional authority to give validity by way of ratification to the action of the county commissioners in making the subscription and issuing the bonds in question against the will of the people.

4. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the legislature of the state have ever, by any act or acts, ratified or made valid the said subscription by the county commissioners or the said bonds after they were issued.

5. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the said bonds are valid and binding obligations of the county of York.

6. Because his Honor erred in dismissing the plaintiff's complaint.

7. Because, it is respectfully submitted, his Honor should have decided that the said bonds were issued absolutely without authority and are void, and should have granted the relief prayed for in the complaint.

8. Because his honor should have decided that Section 11 of the act of February 26th, 1873, was in violation of Section 20 of Article II. of the constitution of the state, and had not the force of law.

9. Because his Honor should have decided that, inasmuch as the people of York county had not accepted the privileges named in Section 11 of the act of February 26th, 1873, they could not give validity to the void action of the county commissioners in making the subscription and issuing the bonds in question by acquiescence, or other alleged acts of ratification on their part.

10. Because, it is respectfully submitted, his Honor erred in deciding the cause on questions of fact that were reserved by written agreement of counsel.

The appeal was heard at the April Term, 1879.

*296

*Messrs. Le Conte and Patterson & Gaston, for appellants.

The bonds were issued absolutely without authority. The act, (15 Stat. 393) conferred no authority upon the commissioners to subscribe or issue bonds. See dissenting opinion and argument for appellant in 6 S. C. 412. The legislature had no power to enforce obligations upon the county of York, except upon consent of her people. Counties are only agencies of the general government to aid in the administration of general laws in their several districts. Dillon Mun. Corp. § 10. There is no such thing as a county government. There is nothing in Article IV., Section 19 of our constitution, which contradicts this fundamental principle. The term jurisdiction carries the meaning of the power to administer, not to make laws. The general assembly must determine the necessity; the county have jurisdiction to carry out and administer. Compare with Article IX., Section 9. Again, counties are not named in Article IX., Section 9. Here is cotemporaneous exposition. See the several acts relating to county commissioners. Counties are only sub-divisions of the state, created as instrumentalities of the state government, to subserve the administrations of the general laws of the state in their particular localities. The constitution does not seem to contemplate their incorporation. Art. II., § 3; Art. IX., § 9. But having a corporate form, advantage is taken of this to endow them with powers and privileges which are private as respects the rest of the state, although public in respect of the inhabitants of the county. It is upon this that the questions to which this argument is directed must arise. As respects the acquisition and enjoyment of such special powers and privileges, what are the relations which the county bears to the state, and what control has the state legislature over it? As to such matters, the county corporation is upon the same footing with a municipal corporation fully developed, and indeed a private corporation. The legislature has no compulsory power over it, and can do no more than to grant the power or privilege, subject to the right of the corporation to accept or reject it at its will. Cooley on Coast. Lim. *231; 28 Mich. 228; 13 Wis. 37; 29 Wis. 413; 51 Ill. 17; 2 Am. R. 278; 53 N. Y. 128; 4 Wheat. 694. It is said that *all this is met by State v. Charleston, 10 Rich. 491; so it is as to cities or towns, which possess a complete representative government. But in the case of a county, who represents the corporation? Certainly not the commissioners who are administrative officers of the state not of the county. The people of a county have no one to act for them, and must speak for themselves. It is a mockery of free government to say that a legislature representing thirty-three counties, can, at will, dispose of the property or fortunes of the people of York county, either directly or indirectly, by accepting, as the will of the people, the consent of a board of petty officials elected to fulfill certain subordinate functions, as the agents of the state in the county. Locke's Essay on Gov., § 142. Nor can they raise taxes upon the property of the people without the consent of the people.

*297

If the legislature had, itself, the constitutional power to determine this subscription and authorize these bonds without regard to the will of the people of York, still it could not delegate this power without restriction to be exercised by subordinate functionaries, appointed for purposes wholly foreign to the exercise of such powers. 6 S. C. 436; Cooley on Const. Lim. *116, *119.

Section 11 of act, (15 Stat. 393,) is in violation of Article II., section 20 of the constitution.

The bonds being absolutely void, have not acquired validity by reason of any matter subsequent to their issue. Not by acts of the legislature. 15 Stat. 865; 16 Stat. 485. These acts are not validating acts. 4 Otto 269. Could it be supposed that a legislature which prohibited county commissioners from building a poor-house, without a vote of the people, (15 Stat. 989) would have stultified itself by sanctioning action here? As to purpose of second act, see House Journal, 1877–78. Not having power to authorize, the legislature could not validate. Cooley on Const. Lim. *381; 13 Wis. 37. The bonds did not acquire validity under judgment in Glenn v. County Commissioners. The plaintiff here was neither party nor represented. 2 Dill. on Mun. Corp.; 2 Duer 664; 18 N. Y. 115; 23 N. Y. 318; 26 Mich. 264; 2 Bligh, (H. L.) N. R. 312; 10 Rich. 491. Glenn and his associates were individual taxpayers, suing on their own *account alone. If capacity to sue they represented only themselves. 5 Rich. Eq. 342; 11 Gray 436; Lleady 610; 17 How. 130. See remarks in State, ex rel. Harris, v. Robertson, MS., Dec., 1877. The order of the Supreme Court in the Glenn case does not show that it was final. It does not appear that issues were decided.

*298

The bonds have not become valid by reason of any act or thing done by the people of York county. The acquiescence of the people of York county was specially reserved, and was not before Judge Pressley at all. We were prepared to show that every thing had been done in protest, which a people could do. Only two elections were afterwards held, and if stock was held up to filing of complaint, the action of commissioners could not estop the people. 10 Wall. 676. If the bonds were void, the doctrine of estoppel can have no application. Dill. on Mun. Bonds, 52, 53; 20 Wall. 655. But defendants knowing how the bonds were issued, cannot claim the benefit of an estoppel; nor could claim of bona fide holder avail when there is total absence of authority to issue.

Mr. J. F. Hart contra.

Both state and relators are estopped from bringing this action. The state is estopped. 15 Stat. 395; 6 S. C. 412; 15 Stat. 865, § 7; 16 Stat. 485; and in connection with the fact that York and Chester were the only counties authorized by law to levy a tax to retire bonds issued in aid of railroads, 16 Stat. 288 and 797. The state is estopped. 10 Rich. 499. The relators here are also estopped. In using the word "parties" in Harris v. Robertson, the court meant to include privies. If not, then who were the parties in the Glenn case? As the plaintiffs there were taxpayers, then all taxpayers are bound. Code, § 142. Otherwise, every taxpayer might bring his separate action. And all people of York are bound, because the county commissioners were parties. The judgment there bound the county and all people in it. 10 S. C. 141; 7 Otto 376; 29 Iowa 197; Freem. on Judg., §§ 174, 176, 178.

*299

*If plaintiffs are not estopped, then it is submitted that original subscription and issue of bonds were authorized. Const., Art. IV., § 19; Art. IX., § 8; 1 Dill. on Mun. Corp. 233. Such was the intent of the legislation. 15 Stat. 865; 16 Stat. 288, 485, 797. This is cotemporaneous legislation, to which we may resort in cases of doubt. Pot. Dwar. 136, 189 and note; 191 and note; 5 Cranch, 1. If "or" means "and," as intimated in the Circuit decree, the execution of the bonds by commissioners alone would make them valid. 5 Wall. 784. If power was not fully conferred in original acts, defect has been cured by subsequent legislation. 10 Rich. 494; 16 Wall. 663; Dill. on Mun. Corp., §§ 46, 424; 2 Rob. (La.) 209. If these acts do not purport to be validating acts, it is of no consequence—the form is not material. 7 Wall. 619; 22 Wall. 75; 95 U. S. 653; 121 Mass. 460; 76 N. C. 489; 66 N. Y. 129; 57 N. Y. 177; 5 Wall. 203.

The act of the commissioners has been ratified by the people of York, as held by the Circuit decree from the pleadings, the statutes of the state and other matters within judicial cognizance. 19 N. Y. 218; 17 N. Y. 453; 24 Ill. 90; 5 Wall. 772; Dill. on Mun. Corp., § 385.

The legislature has recognized, the courts sanctioned, and the people ratified these bonds. If Glenn v. County Commissioners was wrong, it cannot now be reversed so as to affect these bonds. 22 Iowa 11; 8 Wall. 584; 1 Wall. 175; 16 How. 432; 3 Wall. 330. If all these positions are erroneous, neither the county of York, nor its people can repudiate the contract with the defendant railroad company while holding its stock. Sedg. on Const. Law 90; 19 Wall. 678.

On September 19th, 1879, this court passed the following order:

It is ordered that the above-stated case be re-argued at the next term of this court. The attention of counsel is especially directed to the following questions, some of which were not fully noticed in the former argument, viz:

1. Does the constitution of 1868 constitute the several counties of this state corporations?

2. If it does not, has the general assembly power to do so?

*300

*3. Has the general assembly the power to confer upon the board of county commissioners the right to issue negotiable bonds for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad?

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for the affirmative.

The constitution has either created counties corporations, or contemplates their creation into corporations by the general assembly. Const., Art. IV., § 19. This recognizes the county as a unit, distinct from the state. Article IX, section 8; shows that counties are or can be made corporations. Compare this with the next succeeding section. The eighth section speaks for the present; the ninth commands for the future.

It is claimed, however, from Art. II., § 3, that there is no change from our old judicial districts, except in name. The last sentence in the same section says that each county shall constitute an election district. Up to that time, election and judicial districts were distinct, in fact, and in their history.

In order to explain our position we must go into a brief examination of the history of the state.

From the earliest settlement of South Carolina down to the adoption of the constitution of 1868, the entire government of the commonwealth was in the hands of the legislature. With the exception of a few incorporated towns, the whole municipal administration was exercised and supervised directly by the general assembly. All the taxes were levied by that body. The whole proceeds of taxation went into the state treasury. Every dollar, for every purpose, general or special, from the building of the state-house to the erection of a county jail, was appropriated and expended under an act of assembly. From the most petty item of expenditure—the costs of a constable for serving a warrant—to the millions expended in internal improvements, the appropriation had to be made by a bill originating in the house of representatives, and passed with all the formalities required by the constitution. There were no district taxes; no district funds; no district purposes, in which the people of the district had any exclusive control; indeed, had *any voice whatsoever. An election district sent its senator and representatives to Columbia, and furnished its taxes. But, except in the share which these representatives had in the vote of their respective houses, the district had no voice or claim in the disbursement of the money they raised. For very many years, indeed, down to a period not very distant, every official in the state was elected or appointed by the general assembly—governor, judges, clerks, sheriffs, ordinaries, tax collectors, justices of the peace, magistrates, managers of election, commissioners of the poor, of public buildings, of free schools, of roads, bridges and ferries. And, notwithstanding the spread of democratic doctrines throughout the Union, and in spite of many efforts to the contrary, the majority of these offices continued to be filled by the general assembly until the new constitution of 1868 was adopted. The local officers, especially the commissioners of the poor, of public buildings, of free schools, of roads, bridges and ferries, appointed by, were directly responsible to the legislature—made their annual reports to, and got their instructions from that body. Annually the comptroller-general reported their accounts, and the accounts of every public servant in the districts, to the general assembly; and on such report, and upon reference to and an examination by committees of each house—an examination going into every item of charge—the accounts which were allowed were paid by the state treasurer, after an appropriation for that purpose. The state was a thoroughly centralized government; and, with the exception of a few towns and villages, there was no form of municipal government—distinct, self-supporting—within the limits of the state.

*301

There have been in South Carolina three kinds of territorial divisions—counties, election districts and judicial districts.

Originally there was, apparently for convenience in territorial designation, counties, such as Craven county, Berkeley county, Granville county and Colleton county, with outlying precincts, such as Ninety-six, the Cheraws, Camden, and so forth. Afterwards, as the up-country became more settled, these outlying precincts were sub-divided into counties, bearing, for the *most part, the same names they now do—Abbeville, Fairfield, Chester, and so forth. 1 Brevard Dig. 253.

*302

The judicial districts were formed for the more speedy and convenient trial of causes in the Court of Common Pleas and General Sessions.

Originally, the only court in the province was held at Charles Town. This proving the cause of great inconvenience, circuits were established, and the province was divided into precincts or districts. Brevard 219. Charleston precinct embraced all the territory between the Santee, Combahee and the sea; Beaufort precinct, all the territory between the Combahee and Savannah rivers and the sea; Orangeburg, between the Savannah, Santee, Congaree and Broad rivers, extending beyond Newberry. 1 Brevard Dig. 256. In 1798, these precincts or districts were subdivided into smaller districts, following very much the boundaries of the counties which had been previously fixed, but not so absolutely or in every instance. For instance, Sumter district was composed of Claremont, Clarendon and Salem counties; Kershaw district comprehended Richland and Kershaw counties; Orangeburg district comprehended Orangeburg, Lexington and Newberry counties; Georgetown district embraced Williamsburg, Kingston and Georgetown. The purpose of this act was declared to be a more easy, certain and uniform system of judicature, by the establishment of courts under proper regulations in districts of convenient dimensions. This division, however, was in no sense political or municipal. The districts were not organized—had no powers and no duties. They only formed the boundary lines within which process from a particular courthouse ran.

The third division of the state was into election districts. These, in some instances, covered the same territory as the judicial districts. In others, as in Charleston, Beaufort, Colleton, Georgetown, Sumter, Horry and Orangeburg, they were widely different. Charleston judicial district had, within its limits, ten election districts, distinct, separate, independent of the judicial district. Georgetown and Horry each had one and a half, dividing All Saints between them. Some election districts, although they had the same boundaries as the judicial district, *had distinct names—Lexington district was represented in the legislature as Saxe Gotha; Marion as Liberty. Each of the election districts had its separate tax collector, and they approached more nearly to our present idea of a county than any other division.

*303

For very many years a political struggle was waged in the state, the object of which was to make the judicial districts and the election districts coterminous and the same. The war produced a change of power in the state, and the convention of 1865 nearly ended the struggle by making in all but one instance the desired change. Every judicial district in the state, but one, was made an election district; and in 1868, by the absorption of the district of Berkeley into Charleston, the entire change was effected.

The constitution of 1868 made all the judicial districts counties, gave to the legislature the right, under certain limitations, to make counties at its pleasure, and declared each county, existing and to exist, an election district.

The new county system had machinery provided for it, whereby the local concerns of each political sub-division should be administered by a board elected by and representing the county, specially charged with its local concerns of every description, and capable of possessing and of using power of taxation over the county, and of thus creating a county fund. This constitution was made by men who had had a wider experience than in South Carolina. They came from states in which counties had been in the habit of discharging some of the functions of government. When they used the word county, they meant something more than mere territory. With the abolition of the name district, a peculiarity in this state, was effected a wide revolution. Instead of its centralized state government, South Carolina was placed on the plane of what Mr. Cooley calls the American system, which is "one of complete decentralization, the primary and vital idea of which is, that local affairs shall be managed by local authority, and general affairs only by the central authority." Const. L. 189. The result is, that in every matter—in all expenses incurred in the care of the poor; erection and repair of public buildings; payment of *juries, witnesses, constables; all expenses of court; salaries of county officers—the county is responsible, and provides for them out of the county funds alone. This was the practical operation, under the constitution, in every matter but the funds for educational purposes. And since the adoption of the last constitutional amendment, this has been brought within the general system, so that every dollar used for county purposes, is raised from taxes levied upon and collected in the county, and is expended in the county by the county officers. Each county raising and paying its own expenses, and the expenses of no other county. This revolution in the internal administration of the state forbids the idea that the counties of the constitution of 1868 are nothing more than the scraps of territory, called under the former constitutions, judicial districts, with no functions whatsoever.

*304

Under second question, counsel cited Gen. Stat. 145; 19 Wall. 673; 7 Otto 376; Cooley on Const. Lim. 87, 173, 191; 15 N. Y. 543; 27 Vt. 142; 4 Wheat. 316; 16 Wall. 676; 13 Ill. 30; Dillon on Mun. Corp., § 10, a.

Under third question, counsel cited 4 Rich. 382; 1 Spears 218; 8 Leigh 120; 15 Conn. 475; 9 Hump. 252; Dillon on Mun. Corp., § 105 a; 19 Wall. 677; 1 Wall. 176; 16 Wall. 669; 19 Wall. 666; 1 Black. 39; 2 Cl. & Fin. 349.

Messrs. J. F. Hart, Hemphill & Hemphill, Rion, Witherspoon & Spencer, on same side.

Messrs. LeConte, Patterson & Gaston, contra.

In addition to the authorities in their former argument, counsel cited as follows:

1. 1 McM. 222; 1 Spears 218; 4 Rich. 382; 10 Pick. 172; 23 Wend. 103; Potter on Corp., § 432; 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp., § 22.

2. 9 S. C. 1; 7 Otto 374; 11 S. C. 333.

3. 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp., §§ 23–30; 2 Id. 445; 9 B. Mon. 330; 9 Mo. 507; 8 Blackf. 361; 21 Ill. 451; 17 Wall. 322; 1 Otto 540; 3 Hill (N. Y.) 531; 31 Penna. 175; 26 La.

*305

478; 28 *Mich. 228; 18 Gratt. 338; 1 Black. 39; 12 Ohio 375; 2 Kent 275; Cooley on Const. Lim. 230, 236, 238, note 2, 250, 251, 252, note 1; Cooley on Const. Lim. 117, 211–235, 287; 104 Mass. 87; 62 N. Y. 160; 9 Mich. 165; 40 Conn. 72; 15 N. Y. 543; 2 Kans. 215; 31 Vt. 226; 9 Cranch. 43.

March 25th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The leading question in this case involves the estoppels resulting from a previous action arising out of the same transactions. The action is in the name of the state, upon the relation of citizens and taxpayers of York county, to have certain bonds for the payment of money issued in the name of the county of York declared null and void, as issued without due authority of law. The defendants are the Chester and Lenoir Railroad Company, to whom the bonds in question were issued, certain parties claiming to have some right or interest in the said bonds derived from the railroad company subsequent to their delivery by the county commissioners to such railroad company and the county commissioners of said county.

It is alleged that a suit was brought prior to the issue of such bonds by the county commissioners, and while such issue was in contemplation, by Glenn and others, as citizens and taxpayers of York county, to test the authority of the county commissioners to issue said bonds, and an injunction prayed to restrict them from issuing the same; that the Circuit Court refused such injunction and dismissed the complaint, and that such judgment was affirmed on appeal to this court; that under the decision of that case and deeming it authority for so doing, the said county commissioners issued said bonds, and they came to the possession of the parties holding them as to bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration and without notice of any defect.

The question of the effect of the judgment in the case of Glenn v. County Commissioners, 6 S. C. 412, upon the present case, involves two inquiries. First, as to its effect on the right of the present plaintiffs to maintain their action, which is alleged to be upon the same cause of action, and substantially between the same parties. Second. What right, if any, the present defendants acquired in virtue of the fact of having, since the rendition *of such judgment, become invested with the rights that were the subject of controversy therein. The first of these questions is substantially identical with that which would have been raised by a former plea of a former recovery between the same parties, on the same cause of action, while the second inquiry has a large scope and involves the whole effect by way of estoppel of the judgment in the case of Glenn v. County Commissioners, in sustaining the rights which they claim to have acquired under that judgment.

*306

We will consider, in the first place, whether the action of Glenn v. County Commissioners is to be regarded as a former recovery upon the same cause of action and between the same parties as those involved in the present case. If this had been an action in the nature of a suit at common law, and the defence of a former recovery made upon the record of a judgment in an action at common law, the question would have had a more restricted character than in the present case, as it would have to be determined in view of the legal effect of a judgment record at common law. The action of Glenn v. County Commissioners was in the nature of a bill in equity, and the present action is of the same nature. Equity will not permit a matter once formally adjudicated to be reopened between the same parties or those holding under them under its decree in a collateral proceeding. The remedy of parties and privies for any errors of fact or law that may be found in a decree, is by appeal or petition or bill of review. A formal proceeding by way of review is, in substance, a prolongation of the original bill, and not in any sense a collateral proceeding. But this action is, in form and substance, a collateral proceeding. The complaint does not seek to re-open a decree and point out its errors for correction, but treats the former suits as void in toto for certain reasons therein assigned.

Is there, then, that degree of identity between the two actions that would authorize them to be regarded, as in substance and effect, between the same parties and concerning the same cause of action? As this question arises in equity, substance, rather than form, is to be looked at, as a consequence of the prevailing habit of equity. Is there, then, identity between the causes of action in the two cases? The question in the Glenn case was whether, *under the act of the legislature, which was claimed as authority for issuing the bonds, the county commissioners had a right to make the subscription to the stock of the Chester and Lenoir Railroad Company, and to issue the bonds of the county of York in payment therefor, without first submitting the question to a vote of the people or electors of the county, whether such subscription should be made? If that question was decided in the affirmative, then it would follow, as a consequence, that the prayer of the complaint for an injunction would be denied, and the county commissioners would be free to proceed and issue the bonds at their discretion. The question in the present case is identical with that just stated. The difference between the two cases, as far as it concerns the cause of action, is in the nature of the relief demanded. Glenn's case only sought an injunction, as no rights had been acquired at that time under the intended action of the county commissioners, but at the time of the commencement of the present action such right had matured, and the relief could not, to be effectual, fall short of a decree declaring such right to be invalid. It may be contended that the prayer for relief is not a test of the identity of the causes of action; it is enough to say that it is not in the present case. The controversy is the same throughout, resting on the same facts and views of the law. At one stage of the controversy one measure of relief is called for, while at another and more advanced stage that measure of relief may be inappropriate and different relief demanded. It cannot be questioned that two actions, brought at different stages of the same controversy, although moulded to the special circumstances existing at the respective times of their commencement, yet each tending to the same general result, must be regarded as involving the same cause of action. If the contrary was admitted, there would be no stability of rights under judgments, for the moment a transaction, even judicially sustained, passed into a new stage of development it would be thrown open to question from its very origin. As applied to proceedings in equity, this view is sustained by the principles on which equity administers justice. The contrary would tend to deprive equity of that characteristic power of adapting itself to courts contemporaneous and successive, which is the ground on *which it has maintained itself, side by side, with the courts of common law. It must be concluded that in substance and effect, and therefore in the view of equity, the two causes of action are identical.

*307

*308

It becomes necessary, then, to inquire whether there is a substantial identity as to parties. The formal record in the case of Glenn v. County Commissioners, is not before us, so that we are compelled to take the title of that cause as it is reported in 6 S. C. 412. It is there stated to be an action by E. L. Glenn and others, alleging themselves to be citizens and taxpayers of York county, against H. K. Roberts and others, as county commissioners. The present action is in the name of the state upon the relation of certain other persons, alleging themselves to be citizens and taxpayers of York county, against the county commissioners of that county and parties who, since the case of Glenn was decided, have become holders of, or interested in, the bonds issued by the county commissioners. As far as it regards the defendants, the identity is complete, as the addition of parties who have acquired an interest in the controversy since the judgment in the first case, is a circumstance consistent with the fact of the identity of the controversy in the two cases. Had the case of Glenn continued undecided to the present time, and were the plaintiffs in that case seeking still the general results sought by the complaint in that case in some form to suit the condition of matters that have arisen since that suit was commenced, it would be a matter of prudence to make the persons who had acquired rights after the commencement of that suit parties, so that a direct decision upon their individual rights could be reached, which should act immediately, and not merely indirectly, upon them. Parties acquiring an interest in the subject matter of a suit after action commenced, from or under the parties to such action, apart from the question of notice, are privies, and it certainly cannot be contended that there is a want of identity between the suits in equity merely because persons who are privies under the one are made parties to the other.

Are, then, the plaintiffs in the two cases to be regarded as, substantially, and in the view of equity, identical? It is necessary to look to the character of suits like the present in order to *understand fully the nature of this question. This belongs to the class of remedies proceeding, nominally, in the right of the state, but, actually, in the interest of a class of individuals having common rights that need protection. It is, therefore, related to that more general class where individuals possess the right to represent the class to which they belong in respect of rights either common to the class, or competing as to a certain subject of property. A bill to enjoin a common nuisance is an instance of this class, based on common rights, and a creditor's bill another, based on competitive rights. This jurisdiction, in some respects, rests on the principles of a proceeding in rem, as the court of equity, through it, lays its hands upon a fund at the instance of some of the parties interested in it, and, by a proper proceeding, administers it with a conclusive effect upon the rights of all others having similar rights thereto. Although equity, as a system, proceeds upon the ground of personal duty, and hence against persons rather than things, yet there are many instances where proceedings in equity partake of the nature of an action in rem. Another principle that appears to be fundamental to such jurisdiction by means of class representation, has an analogy to the familiar principle of the law that where rights of a certain nature are common to large classes of persons, individuals may acquire, by prior occupancy, a superior right, whether temporary or permanent, over all others of that class in respect of such right. The strict illustration of this principle is where such common right has its origin from the law of nature, as in the case of waste and unoccupied lands never subjected to individual right, and animals feræ naturæ, and the like. Where many have a common right to the means of protection by a legal proceeding, this principle is suggested and would enable such as seek the remedy, with the advantage of priority, to have a superior right to prosecute such remedy. Where there are competing rights in a single subject, equity recognizes and protects the priority by injunction, as in the case of a creditor's bill. This right of representation is, however, from its nature, subject to the restriction that the door of controversy must be opened to all of the class represented, who may, on certain conditions, unite in exercising control over the prosecution of the remedy.

*309

*310

*Common or public rights having their origin in the municipal law, are usually protected by the action of the public authority. In England that right of procedure is in the King or his attorney-general, while with us it is in the state. It is customary to allow private individuals having a personal interest in the protection of such rights, to use the name of the state for the purpose of protecting them, and, applying the principles of class representation, a portion of the persons of the community are enabled to become relators, such a proceeding being, in reality, the representatives of the class to which such relators belong.

Such is the nature of the present action. Whether the name of the state is indispensable in such proceedings need not be considered. If it is not, then in the present case its use may be treated with surplusage, and the nature of the case regarded as the same as if the action had proceeded wholly in the names of the persons here styled relators, as was the case in Glenn v. County Commissioners. If, on the other hand, the name of the state is indispensable, then the want of such name would have constituted a ground of defence in Glenn's case. As no such objection was made in that case, it must be treated as if it had been properly brought in the name of the state. In this view, the difference between the two cases would be resolved to that of a misnomer alone, and that equity, at least, would overlook.

We come, then, to the main question involved, as it regards the identity of the plaintiffs in the two cases. It is easy to see, from the principles already stated, that the rights that were represented in the former case are here attempted to be represented again for the same general purpose. The principle of representation is embodied in Section 142 of the code, as follows: "Where the question is one of a common or general interest of many persons, or where the parties are very numerous, and it may be impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of the whole." It is clear that this language contemplated cases where the results of such an action would affect, finally and conclusively, a larger number of persons than those who are immediate parties, for the object of the section was to enable some of a class to act in a manner conclusive to others of the same class, by representing *them. Without the aid of this provision of the code, or the principles on which it was founded, the immediate parties could bind themselves; that in which they needed the aid of the statute, or the principles that existed prior to it, was that the subject of the controversy might be exclusively affected in such a way as to bind others not parties, but merely represented by others as such. The code, evidently, was not intended to exclude others who might choose to come in with those who assume to act as their representatives, but is consistent with the idea that if they stand out they will be bound by what is done in their name. It would follow that when plaintiffs, or relators standing in the place of plaintiffs representing a class of persons, bring an action based on such class rights and are defeated in such action on the merits, no subsequent action can be effectually brought by the same parties or by other parties of the class thus represented. This would dispose of the present appeal if it shall appear that the case of Glenn v. County Commissioners was decided finally and on the merits, provided the use of the name of the state does not interfere with the application of the principles that would apply had the present suit been maintainable and actually brought in the name of the relators without that of the state. This last proposition will be first considered. It is not reasonable to suppose that the state, in lending its name to individuals for the protection of their rights, intended to subvert the principles governing controversies of the class to which this belongs. We need not consider what would be the result if the state, having a substantial interest in this action, should claim that it was not affected by the case of Glenn, for that is not the case here. The state, as such, has no interest in the suit beyond the indirect interest of having protection afforded to the common and public rights represented by the relators. It must then be considered that the same principles apply to the present case that would apply had the relators been the only plaintiffs and capable of prosecuting as such. Then all that remains is the inquiry whether the case of Glenn v. County Commissioners appears to have been finally and conclusively decided upon the merits.

*311

*312

*We will consider, in another place, the matters of fact and law decided in that case, but at present, the question is whether the disposition must be regarded as upon the merits of the controversy. If it appears that the bill was dismissed for lack of proper parties, for the want of a statement of a sufficient cause of action, or for defect of proof leading to a non-suit, then nothing would prevent its renewal in the form in which it appears in the present case. But can such a conclusion be drawn?

It is stated in the report of the case, (6 S. C. 415,) that "on August 16th, 1873, the cause was heard upon its merits before the Hon. Judge Mackey, who, on September 12th, 1873, filed the following order and decree."

The opinion of the Circuit judge is confirmed as to the merits of the case. He says: "I have considered the questions at issue solely upon their merits, and without interposing those technical rules of practice which would have justified the court, sua sponte, in dismissing the complaint." What would have justified the court sua sponte in dismissing the complaint is not stated, and as no defect of jurisdiction has been suggested as appears, cannot be conjectured, but it is quite apparent that no objection had been taken to matters of form, as then it would have been unnecessary to suggest the possibility of the dismissal of the complaint sua sponte. The decree was, then, clearly on the merits. The plaintiffs appealed from the decree, and, of course, only raised by way of appeal questions of substance. The appeal was dismissed by this court and that left the decree of the Circuit Court standing on the ground on which it was originally pronounced. It is true that the majority of this court did not state the grounds for dismissing the appeal, but that, though of interest in an aspect not at present under consideration, is of no importance to the present question. If it is assumed that the appeal was dismissed for irregularity and not upon the merits, that would not alter its effect, for it left the Circuit decree standing with the same force and effect that it had when first pronounced. It must be concluded that the Circuit decree in the case of Glenn v. County Commissioners was *a decision upon the merits, and in its nature final and conclusive and a bar to the present action.

*313

Although it may not be necessary in order to dispose of the present appeal to go beyond the matters already discussed, yet the importance of the principles and the magnitude of the interests involved, render it appropriate that certain other questions raised in the case should receive consideration. Among these, one already noticed, is entitled to a place, namely, what is the effect, by way of estoppel, of the decree in Glenn v. County Commissioners, considered apart from the question of the bar of a future action created by such decree? Assuming that there was no formal objection to the maintenance of the present action, must the matters decided in the Glenn case be regarded as so far settled between the present parties that the record in that case is conclusive of all the allegations of fact and law in the present complaint? It is clear that the county commissioners, being parties to both suits, have a right to rely on the conclusive character of the decree in that case. If they had not, they might be placed in the position of having unlawfully issued the bonds in controversy, although at the time of issuing them they had the sanction of a decree of the Circuit Court in a suit to which they were parties, affirmed as the result of an appeal to the Supreme Court. The other defendants stand in the position of having acquired rights under the decree in question, and upon the faith of such degree. By the acquisition of such rights they became privies to the decree, and had a right to rely on its estoppels and were bound by its consequences. As such, they may allege the bar of the decree to any further agitation of the questions involved, as they would be precluded from averring against such decree, as it regards its effect upon the property acquired by them under the decree, had it gone against their interest, as effectually as if they had been parties to the suit in which the decree was rendered. It would not be questioned, if the subject of the former action was the title to land, that a decision thereon would conclude all parties becoming purchasers after judgment from parties bound by such judgment. In the present instance, the subject of the action was a power to issue bonds, and the question was its legal *validity, and the defendants, who have taken bonds under such power, may well contend that their titles were conclusively passed upon when the power under which it has arisen was judicially sanctioned. It would follow that in the present case they have the right to set up the decree as a bar and estoppel to any attempt to disturb the decision on which their title rests.

*314

We have said in State v. County Treasurer, (MS., Dec., Nov., 1877,) that as the majority of the court who decided Glenn's case did not disclose the grounds of their decision, that this court is not committed to any view of the questions discussed in that case, and that the court deems all questions of law that arose therein as open and undecided, except so far as relates to the parties in that action. Parties here should be taken to include privies; indeed, privies are always intended when a general reference is made to parties. This court concurs in the positions taken in the dissenting opinion in the Glenn case, and if the question was open before us, would have no hesitation in placing the case upon such grounds.

This extension of the protection of a decree to those deriving their rights under it at any time subsequent to such decree, when in harmony with the technical rules that govern remedies and their effects, is demanded by a principle that has received its most unqualified statement in the case of Gelpcke v. City, 1 Wall. 175 [17 L. Ed. 520]. It is there held that if at the time when municipal bonds are issued, the law, as expounded by the highest court of a state, sanctions the validity of such issue, no subsequent decision of the court can impugn the validity of such bonds by overruling its former decision. This principle is applied in that case in the most general manner, and without regard to whether the former decision was upon the power or authority to issue the particular bonds in question. It is, therefore, in effect placing the principle of stare decisis upon higher ground than it has ever before occupied. We are now compelled by the language of the case to believe that the Supreme Court of the United States intended to hold that a decision of a state court overruling a former decision, under such circumstances, becomes, in effect, a law of a state impairing the obligation of a contract, so as to become involved under the constitution of the United *States. We cannot assume that that court intended to expand the constitutional sense of the word "law" so as to become a guaranty that no state court should violate the rule of stare decisis so as to affect contract rights. Whatever difficulty may suggest itself as to the possibility of safely applying the principle in question in the naked form in which it is presented in the case just cited, it is easy to recognize the principle itself as just and suitable to be applied whenever the nature of our remedial system will admit of it. In the present case its application is consistent with the rules governing the proper effect of remedies, and therefore justifiable.

*315

It only remains to notice the objection that was raised upon the argument of the appeal, that the county of York, not being a corporation, bonds issued in its name are without validity. The question of the right of the county commissioners to issue the bonds of the county of York, that was presented in Glenn's case, necessarily involved the further question, whether the county of York is capable, legally, of making a valid bond, and therefore it is manifest that the question cannot be re-opened in the present case. If it could be, it would not be necessary to consider the broad question whether the county of York is a corporation. It would be sufficient to ask whether it had legal power to contract obligations within the scope of its legitimate interests. If it possesses such capacity, the only question would be whether the legislature had authorized its exercise, and that question is disposed of, as between the present parties, by the decree in Glenn's Case. It will be conceded, without difficulty, that it is competent for the legislature to confer upon the people of a county power to incur obligations binding upon them, as a community, unless forbidden by the constitution. The argument before us has been mainly addressed to the question whether the constitution has created the counties into corporations, or so arranged their character and powers as to amount to exhaustive legislation on the subject, thus, impliedly, excluding the legislature from legislating either antagonistically or cumulatively on the same subject. This view is not a necessary one to the matters at issue in the present case. The true inquiry is whether there is anything in the constitution that precludes the legislature from *permitting the counties to incur any obligation whatever in the nature of a contract; for the objection is such as would apply to any contract obligation whatsoever. It is impossible to find any clause in the constitution that admits of the construction contended for; but, on the contrary, there are provisions of a positive character from which it is reasonable to infer that the counties were intended either to have originally or from the legislature capacity to contract obligations necessary to the transaction of their local business.

*316

Section 19, Article IV. of the constitution provides that "the qualified electors of each county shall elect three persons, for the term of two years, who shall constitute a board of county commissioners, which shall have jurisdiction over roads, highways, ferries, bridges, and in all matters relating to taxes, disbursements of money for county purposes, and in every other case that may be necessary to the internal improvements and local concern of the respective counties." Here is an express recognition of the capacity of the communities styled counties to have interests peculiar to themselves and not common with all other citizens of the state. The terms "local concerns" are of the most general character, and, that they are not intended to be confined to such matters of state administration as may happen to fall for execution within the territorial limits of the respective counties, is evinced by the provision for "internal improvements;" clearly internal improvements of a general character as affecting the state at large, or one or more counties were not here referred to as the administration of such improvements would not be committed to boards circumscribed by county lines, but to more general bodies, whose jurisdiction would be commensurate with the local extension of such internal improvements. It must then be understood that what may be called county improvements may be brought within the capacity of the counties as local communities. The words internal improvements admit, naturally, of an extended signification. It is left to the legislature to fix the character of the improvements that may be thus undertaken within the scope of the sense of the constitution. The right of improvement embraces power to create facilities that do not exist. The right to make improvements of a local *character implies power to acquire and hold property and to renew obligations and make contracts in relation to such property as ordinary means for that purpose. It cannot be doubted that if the legislature should authorize a county to purchase the road and franchises of a turnpike company and throw the road open to the public, that such a transaction would be an improvement in the sense of the constitution. To allow such a transaction is, impliedly, to allow an obligation to be contracted for that purpose.

*317

Section 8, Article IX. of the constitution speaks of the "corporate purposes" of counties as objects for raising and expending county taxes, thus strengthening the view already presented, that these communities are capable of acquiring interests distinct and apart from such as concern the state at large; the limit is put by the constitution to the extent or character of such corporate purposes. That the community may have local interests calling for the expenditure of money is clearly recognized and provided for, and that implies the power of incurring obligations and of satisfying them.

It must be concluded that there is no constitutional restriction depriving the legislature of the power of authorizing counties to incur obligations, and that is decisive of the question under consideration.

The judgment must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 317

(Case No. 849.)

SUBER v. ALLEN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Action ⊂⊃50.]

A judgment creditor brought his action against the several parties, their sureties and representatives, who had administered upon the estate of his judgment debtor, deceased, for account, settlement, &c., alleging also that the lands of the deceased were bound by his judgment, and that "plaintiff is informed and believes that one S. claims to be the owner in fee of the land herein described, but the plaintiff denies the validity of said title, *if any he have,

*318

and alleges that the same is illegal and void"—Held, on demurrer of a defendant properly a party, that complaint was multifarious for misjoinder of the cause of action against S.†

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Barrett v. Watts, 13 S. C. 441, 444.

For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 524; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃50.]

[This case is also cited and explained in Arthur v. Allen, 22 S. C. 432.]

Before Thomson, J., Richland, May, 1879.

Action commenced in December, 1878, by C. H. Suber, as administrator of John Coate against Nancy Allen and others, heirs-at-law of J. M. Allen, the administrator de bonis non of Allen, the administrator of the first administrator, a surety of the first administrator, and the administrator of a deceased surety. *and J. C. F. Sims, who, it was alleged, claimed a lot of land belonging to Allen. The complaint demanded an accounting and payment of a judgment obtained by John Coate against J. M. Allen during his lifetime. The land in Sims' possession, it was alleged, was bound by this judgment. All of the defendants answered, except Simeon Younginer, the administrator of the deceased surety, who demurred as follows:

*319

The defendant, Simeon Younginer, as surviving administrator of the estate of Peter B. Smith, deceased, demurs to the complaint herein, for the grounds that it appears upon the face of the complaint—

*320

*First. That there is another action pend-

†A decree upon the question of multifariousness, rendered by the Hon. John A. Inglis, formerly one of the Chancellors of this state, and afterwards one of the justices of the Court of Appeals, is worth preserving, and may therefore be appropriately inserted here. The cause was tried at June Sittings, 1860, of the Court of Equity for Union District, and the decree was filed August 1st of the same year. So much of it as bears upon the demurrer for multifariousness is given in full:

George B. Tucker v. James A. Tucker et al. } Bill for account, partition, &c.

[Executors and Administrators ⊂⊃473, 474.]

[Cited in Stallings v. Barrett, 26 S. C. 478, 2 S. E. 483, to the point that several distributees may unite in demanding an account from the administrator.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2041–2060; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃473, 474.]

The parties to this cause are the children, and, as such, the heirs-at-law and distributees of Fanny Tucker, late of Union District, who died intestate in December, 1857. At her death the intestate was seized and possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, consisting of one or more plantations, a number of negro slaves, and the usual stock of horses, cattle, &c., found about a planting establishment. Administration of the personal estate was, in the early part of last year, 1859, duly granted to Thomas C. Jeter, the husband of one of the intestate's daughters; as it is said, to him and his wife jointly. Under an order from the Court of Ordinary, all the personal chattels, which came into the possession of the administrators, have been sold on a credit. George B. Tucker, one of the distributees, was a purchaser at this sale to the extent of nearly $22,000, and, to secure payment of the purchase money, gave his two notes; each for one half the amount, with interest, payable the one on January 1st, 1860, and the other on January 1st, 1861. The former of these notes not having been paid at its maturity, an action for the recovery of the amount due thereon was brought in Common Pleas at last Spring Term. Pending this action $7000 has been paid in part satisfaction of the note, and the administrators are proceeding to judgment for the balance. During the last eighteen years of the intestate's life, George B. Tucker, who was her youngest son, lived with her, and had the oversight and management of her property and business, upon a contract, as he says, for compensation. He holds a note, under seal, purporting to be made by her, bearing date March 23d, 1853, for the payment to him of $6,500, at three days, "for value received in managing *her business for the thirteen years" then last preceding. The validity of this paper is denied by the other distributees, on grounds touching the legal competency of the intestate to bind herself by deed at the date which it bears, and force or fraud put upon her will by the undue influence exerted by the holder. An action in the Common Pleas has been brought by George B. Tucker against the administrators, wherein he is seeking to recover out of the assets in their hands the amount of this demand, with interest, and also a further demand of $2,500, claimed to be due to him upon his contract as manager for the intestate for the five years intervening between the date of the note and her death. This recovery is resisted by the other distributees, who, on the contrary, allege that he never accounted with his intestate in her lifetime for his receipts and disbursements as her agent, for the crops made under his management and control and disposed of by him, from year to year, during the period of his stewardship, and for other moneys of the intestate which came to his hands; that upon such accounting he would be in debt to her estate, and that the other distributees are in this court, and in the settlement of the estate entitled to such accounting from him. And, indeed, to his action at law a discount or set-off has been filed by the administrators, charging him with the alleged value of the yearly crops made.

*319

For more than a year after the intestate's death, during which the question of her intestacy was in litigation, and there was consequently, no administration, George B. Tucker retained in his possession all the property left by the intestate. It is alleged that upon the grant of the administration he did not deliver to the administrators all the "goods, chattels and effects" of the intestate which had been thus in his hands. Certain negro slaves, now in his possession, are claimed to have been the property of the intestate at her death and to have been converted by him to his own use; and the administrators have an action of trover now pending in the Common Pleas for the recovery of damages for such conversion. But besides these, it is charged that he had in his possession, after the intestate's death, sundry other chattels, and particularly two promissory notes or other securities for the payment of money, all the property of the intestate; one of the said securities being his own obligation in some form for the payment of $1800, subject to a credit of $800, paid in *part thereof; and the other a small note of one of the other distributees, James A. Tucker; and that these he has retaining between the same parties for the same cause of action.

*320

Second. That several causes of action have been improperly united; one being to marshal the assets of the estate of John M. Allen, and for the payment of the debts found to be due by said intestate, and for an account by Daniel B. Miller, as administrator of the estate of Addison R. Phillips, who was the administrator of the estate of the said intestate; the second being against this defendant as the surviving administrator of Peter B. Smith and William Glaze, who was a cosurety with defendants' *intestate, upon the bond of the said Addison R. Phillips, as administrator of the estate of the said John M. Allen, deceased; and a third being against the defendant, James C. F. Sims, for the purpose of trying the titles to the lot of land described in the complaint.

*321

His Honor, the Circuit judge, overruled the first demurrer and sustained the second, "for the reason that it appears to the court that the cause of action embraced in the complaint against the defendant, James C. F. Sims, is improperly joined with other causes of action therein set forth."

Plaintiff appealed.

*322

*Messrs. Baxter & Seibles, for appellant.

Messrs. Melton & Clark, contra.

March 25th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This is a judgment creditor's bill against the administrator de bonis non of the assets of the intestate debtor, seeking satisfaction of the judgment out of the intestate estate. The only question made by the appeal is one of alleged multifariousness in the complaint. The complaint makes ed wrongfully. In the year during which he kept possession of the whole property, he cultivated the land and used the labor and services of the negro slaves, horses, &c. It is stated in the pleadings that during the year 1859, George B. Tucker and Thomas C. Jeter have each had in possession and use, portions of the land of the intestate. In such a condition of the affairs of this estate, George B. Tucker, on April 11th, in the present year, filed his bill of complaint against his brother, James A. Tucker, and his two sisters, Nancy Oxner and Mary Jeter, with their husbands, Emanuel Oxner and Thomas C. Jeter. This bill prays that the lands of which his deceased mother died seized shall be partitioned; that Thomas C. Jeter and wife shall account for their administration of the personal estate, and that the residue of the said estate, after the payment of debts, which shall be found upon such accounting, shall be distributed; and that the administrators shall be restrained from further prosecuting their action at law against him for the recovery of the balance which is due on his note, and he be permitted to settle the same in the general distribution of the estate. To this bill the defendants, James A. Tucker and Emanuel Oxner and wife, have filed a joint demurrer, and have assigned for cause of their demurrer, that in joining this matter with the prayer for an account of the administration, that the bill is multifarious. The other defendants, Thomas C. Jeter and his wife, have also filed a demurrer to so much of said bill as seeks a partition of the real estate, and have likewise assigned for cause of their demurrer, that in joining this matter with the prayer for an account of the administration and a distribution of the surplus of the personal estate, the bill is multifarious. All the defendants, except James A. Tucker, have also answered to the several parts of the bill. The demurrers of Jeter and wife and Oxner and wife, have been waived by their respective answers, each of which covers the whole case made by the bill and all the matters embraced in the several parts, and for this reason, if there were none other, would be overruled. But the demurrer of James A. Tucker, for the same cause, would still remain, and the objection of multifariousness must, therefore, be considered and disposed of. Lord Cottenham, in delivering his judgment in Campbell v. McKay, remarked: "To lay down any rule applicable universally, or to say what constitutes multifarious*ness, as an abstract proposition, is, upon the authorities, utterly impossible; the cases upon the subject are extremely various, and the court, in deciding them, seems to have considered what was convenient in particular circumstances rather than to have attempted to lay down an absolute rule." Lord Redesdale describes it as "demanding several matters of different natures, of several defendants in same bill." The definition furnished by Mr. Story, is "the improperly joining in one bill of several matters properly distinct and unconnected, against one defendant, or the demand of several matters of a distinct and independent nature, against several defendants in the same bill." In another passage of his work he is more satisfactory. "Frequently," he says, "the objection raised to a bill, though termed multifariousness, is, in fact, properly speaking, a misjoinder of causes of writ, that is to say, the claims asserted in the bill are of so different a character that the court will not permit them to be litigated in one record. It may be that the plaintiffs and defendants are parties to the whole transactions which form the subject of the suit; but, nevertheless, these transactions may be so dissimilar that the court will not allow them to be joined together, but will require distinct records. But what is more familiarly understood by multifariousness, as applied to a bill, is where a party is brought as a defendant, upon a record, with a large portion of which, and of the case made by which he has no connection whatever." Without, however, attempting to define multifariousness in exact terms, an undertaking, declared by such high authority, utterly impossible of accomplishment, it may be safely affirmed that the present bill is not liable to this objection. Which one of the matters, in respect of which relief is here sought, is so distinct from and independent of all the others, that it ought not to be joined with them in one suit? What inconvenience can result from litigating in one record all the matters contained in this bill? The object of the whole suit is single—the settlement and distribution of the estate of the intestate, Fanny Tucker. It is true this estate consists, in part, of realty, and partition of this is asked; in other part of personalty, and it is asked that the surplus of this share be ascertained and distributed. It is true also that the personalty is in the hands of administrators, who are, in respect thereof, charged with the payment of the intestate's debts, and the bill prays that in order to ascertain *what is the surplus liable to distribution, these administrators shall account for their administration. It is further true that the assets in the hands of the administrators

---

*321

*322

*323

J. C. F. Sims, *an entire stranger to the estate, as must be assumed, a party, and demands relief against him. The facts alleged as connecting Sims with the case are that he is in possession of a parcel of land alleged to have belonged to the intestate at his decease, claiming title thereto. Plaintiff alleges further that at the decease of the intestate debtor the land in question was bound by his judgment. The statement of the complaint tendering an issue to Sims is as follows: "That the plaintiff is informed and believes that one James C. F. Sims claims to be the owner in fee of the tract of land herein described, but the plaintiff denies the validity of the said title, if any he have, and alleges that the same is illegal and void."

The code (Section 167, Sub-division 5,) allows a demurrer on the ground "that several causes of action have been improperly united." From the nature of this provision it is evident that any defendant may take the objection. If two independent causes of action, incapable of being united for the purposes of prosecution, are set forth in a complaint, all the defendants concerned are interested in having them separately considered, for the objection rests on the general ground that complete justice cannot be done where matters, foreign to each other, are considered together. This principle applies as directly to one party as to the other.

The objection of multifariousness in the present case comes from the defendants, who are proper parties to the creditor's bill, and not for Sims, who, as is alleged, was improperly joined with the others. The objection of a misjoinder of causes of action or multifariousness is general, going to the whole frame of the complaint, for the reasons already stated, and may be taken by any defendant; hence that question is open in the present case.

*324

*The question thus arises whether there has been a misjoinder of independent causes of action. The code (§ 190,) distributes the various causes of action into seven classes, allowing independent causes of action between the same parties, appertaining to any single class named, to be united together in one action, but does not permit a cause of action of one of this class to be united with one of another class in the same action, although the parties are the same in each.

The present complaint, considered as a creditor's bill, must belong either to the first or second class, which was described as consisting of cases arising out of: "1. The same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action. 2. Contract, express or implied;" while the cause of action against Sims, involving claim for the recovery of land, belongs to the fifth class.

The first part of class No. 1 embraces causes otherwise independent, but when arising between the same parties and out of a single transaction or course of dealing between such parties, it is conceivable that the same transaction between certain parties might give rise to several causes of action of a separate and distinct nature, such as a cause of action for the recovery of money on contract and one for the recovery of land or personal property or for damages to the consist, in part, of the note of the plaintiff, George B. Tucker, which they are suing to judgment at law, and he asks that as he is entitled to one-fourth of the whole estate, he may not be subjected to the expense of a suit at law to be compelled to pay money which is presently to be returned to him. But all these matters are parts of one whole, and the relief sought in respect of them severally, all conduces to the one end of a settlement and distribution of the estate. What distinction is there between realty and personalty, so wide and deep that, although constituting parts of the same estate, the partition of each must be sought in a separate suit? They are both assets for the payment of debts, and are both distributable in the same shares among the same persons. Shall there be distinct bills required for the distribution of choses in possession, as for example negro slaves, and choses in action? Such things have been done. Of all the matters embraced in this bill, which one is it in which all the parties are not interested, and, if any, which of the parties is it who is not interested in that particular matter? The real estate? They are all equally interested in that. The personal estate? Each one is entitled to an equal share. The accounting asked from the administrators? These are equally liable to account to all. All are equally concerned in ascertaining the full surplus liable to distribution. Will it be tolerated that the distributees of an intestate shall maintain, as such, each his separate suit against the administrator for as many successive repetitions of the same accounting? On the contrary, and because this will not be allowed, one distributee may not now maintain his suit for such account without joining all the others. And as to the injunction prayed, that is a relief incidental merely to the general object of the bill, the settlement of the estate. It touches the recovery and application of the assets, and concerns all the parties. But it is not necessary in order to avoid the objection of multifariousness, that all these defendants should be interested in every matter embraced in the bill. There must be a thread of connection among the matters themselves. Some of the defendants must be interested in the whole, but others may be necessary parties, although their interest touches the subject of the suit only at particular points.

So far is a bill which, like this, seeks to have the whole estate of an intestate *brought into one settlement, from being justly liable to the objection of multifariousness, that, upon consideration of fairness, convenience and completeness of justice, it greatly commends itself in this respect to the favor of the court. The contrary practice of splitting up the settlement of an estate into two or more suits, whether in the same or different courts, so that it is difficult, if not impossible, in any one to survey the whole field occupied by the interests of the parties, and their mutual equities, the full adjustment of which ought to enter into the settlement, is one "more honored in the breach than in the observance." The demurrers are overruled, and it is adjudged that the plaintiff is entitled to have the partition, account and distribution prayed for.

*323

person or to real or personal property, and also to causes of both legal and equitable cognizance. Independently of the connection established by Section 1, by means of the identity of the transaction out of which they arise, they would fall respectively under two or more of the seven different classes named, and could not be joined in one action, although between the same parties. The code connects them in class No. 1 for the purposes of prosecution when they have their origin in the same transaction.

The next case mentioned in class No. 1 is that of "transactions connected with the same subject of action." It must be remembered that this is not intended as the means of determining what matters, direct and collateral, may be brought together as parts of a single cause of action. The section of the code under examination uses the terms causes of action as including such as are recognized either at common law or in equity.

*325

It *leaves the question as to what matters may be brought within the compass of a single cause of action, whether of legal or equitable cognizance, to be determined by the antecedent rules of law and equity upon the subject. Its object is to declare what cases, which, prior to this code, had to be considered separately, and, by an independent form of procedure, can be grouped together in one action under the code. Viewed in this light, the language under immediate examination may be regarded as in substance declaring that when a certain right, or certain connected rights, between the same parties are brought into legal controversy, all transactions between the parties bearing on the state of these rights may be included within the scope of the action, although such transactions considered as independent transactions, would, in their nature, call for different forms of legal procedure for the purpose of investigation, according to the practice that prevailed prior to the adoption of the code.

It would follow, from the foregoing, that unless it can be made to appear that Sims was a proper party to the creditor's bill, as such, according to the rules of equity existing prior to the code, and so was fairly within the scope of that single cause of action, the demand against him would have to be regarded as a separate and independent cause of action, neither arising between the same parties, nor out of a single transaction, nor out of transactions affecting the same subject of action. This will readily be made apparent. The proper parties to an action against Sims to recover the land are the heirs or distributees of the intestate, in the absence of title made under him. The plaintiff not having made title under his judgment, has no claim to recover the land. The administrator, as such, does not appear to have any present demand upon the land, as it has not been made assets for distribution as will hereafter appear. There is, then, a complete failure of identity between the parties concerned in the respective causes of action. The claim against Sims has no relation to the transactions that are the proper subject of examination under the creditor's bill. So the causes of action do not concern the same subject of action. The subject of the creditor's bill is the right of the creditor to compel the *proper distribution of assets of the intestate estate, and for that purpose to compel the administrator and those connected with him in liability, to account, while the subject of the demand against Sims is the relative strength of the title by which the intestate and Sims respectively claimed the land in controversy. It is clear, then, that the code gives no means of connecting together the causes of action against the administrator and that against Sims, if they are to be regarded as independent causes of action.

*326

It only remains to inquire whether the demand against Sims is a proper incident of the creditor's bill. If it is, then it is a part of a single cause of action in the sense in which the code refers to causes of action in the section under consideration.

It is true that when assets of an intestate may be traced into the hands of a stranger, coming to him through a devastavit committed by the administrator, by which such party is affected, he may be brought within the scope of the bill and decree, as was held in Ragsdale v. Holmes, 1 S. C. 91, and reiterated in Melton v. Withers, 2 S. C. 561. But in the present case the land of the intestate in the hands of Sims cannot be regarded as assets of the character for which the administrator is liable to account.

The lands of an intestate are not primarily assets for the purposes of administration, although made general assets for the payment of debts by the statute of 8 Geo. 2, ch. VII. The lands of a decedent may be sold, and the proceeds of the sale paid to the administrator for the purposes of administration. Gen. Stat. 458, § 10. When sold by the Probate judge he is required to take a special bond for their custody and application. As to such assets coming to the hands of the administrator, the language of the statute is: "And the administrator or executor receiving the same shall be chargeable therewith as with other assets which have come into their possession in the regular course of administration." Gen. Stat. 458, § 10. While, then, the lands of the decedent are, strictly speaking, never assets in the hands of an administrator, and only become such in the hands of the executor, through special provisions in the will for that purpose, yet the proceeds of the sale of such real estate may *become assets in the hands of the administrator, and his accountability correspondingly extended.

*327

No such assets are alleged to be in the hands or subject to the control of the administrator; in fact, no attempt to sell the lands in question appears to have been made. The whole subject is then foreign to the proper accountability of the administrator. It is not to be denied that it might become material to the present suit to seek a sale of the land in question, if it should appear that the present assets are insufficient for the payment of the debts of the estate; but such a proceeding would be incidental to the principal purpose of the complaint, and would not render it necessary that Sims should be made a party. It must be assumed that Sims claims to hold under title paramount to that asserted for the intestate; in that case it would be competent to sell the lands in Sims' possession, if necessary for the purposes of administration without making him a party, and leave the purchaser to contest the title of Sims in a proper action.

Neither the administrator nor the heirs of the intestate are seeking any remedy against the land in Sims' hands; the plaintiff alone is seeking to force them into such a controversy. One objection to allowing the plaintiff to insist that the controversy with Sims should be prosecuted at the expense of the estate and for his benefit is the fact, alleged in the complaint, that the plaintiff's judgment has a lien against the land in question as the estate of the judgment debtor. If so, the plaintiff has a direct remedy by enforcing his judgment against the land. There is, therefore, no necessity arising from the want of an adequate remedy at law that would justify the plaintiff in attempting to compel the administrator and heirs of the intestate to contest Sims' title at the expense of the estate, and for all that appears without a reasonable hope of sucess.

There is also another objection. Sims is not placed in the position of having assets of the intestate estate, through either a wrong of the administrator or of himself. He must be regarded as a bona fide holder of possession under claim of title, and can only be ousted by legal process. He is not in the least affected by the equities in the present case, and cannot be deprived of his *defense at law; nor can he waive it to the disadvantage of the other parties. Sims must, therefore, be regarded as a stranger to the present controversy, and the cause of action alleged against him as a distinct and independent cause of action, forming no part of the proper matters in controversy.

*328

The order appealed from must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

13 S. C. 328

(Case No. 850.)

McGRATH & BYRUM v. BARNES.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Evidence ⟸420.]

Where an executor gave his promissory note for the payment of money which was expressed to be the amount due by his testator's estate to the payee "for medical services rendered, most of which during last illness," parol evidence of a contemporaneous agreement that the note was to be paid only upon a certain condition, is incompetent.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cline v. Farmers' Oil Mill, 83 S. C. 205, 65 S. E. 272.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1943; Dec. Dig. ⟸420.]

[2. Evidence ⟸441.]

When parol evidence may be received to show a verbal agreement not expressed in a note, considered; and cases reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kaphan v. Ryan, 16 S. C. 357; Moffatt v. Hardin, 22 S. C. 27; Bulwinkle & Co. v. Cramer & Blohme, 27 S. C. 381, 3 S. E. 776, 13 Am. St. Rep. 645; Willis v. Hammond, 41 S. C. 163, 19 S. E. 310; Groesbeck v. Marshall, 44 S. C. 544, 22 S. E. 743; Doyle v. Hill, 75 S. C. 263, 55 S. E. 446; Russell v. Tillman, 89 S. C. 259, 260, 71 S. E. 836.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1719, 1723–1763, 1765–1845, 2030–2047; Dec. Dig. ⟸441.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⟸96.]

When and to what extent an executor is personally bound by his written promise to pay a debt of his testator, considered; and cases reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 413; Dec. Dig. ⟸96.]

[4. Executors and Administrators ⟸202.]

Such promise, when based upon the possession of assets and his duty to pay, without other consideration, is binding only to the extent of the amount actually due by testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 748; Dec. Dig. ⟸202.]

[5. Executors and Administrators ⟸96.]

Though the debt due by testator at the time the executor qualified had become barred by the statute of limitations at the date of the written promise to pay, it will be supported as a good consideration for such promise.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Armour Packing Co. v. London, 53 S. C. 546, 31 S. E. 500.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 413; Dec. Dig. ⟸96.]

Before Fraser, J., Anderson, February, 1879.

This was an action commenced in April, 1877, by the plaintiffs against James T. Barnes, to charge him personally with the payment of the note set out in the opinion of the court. Plaintiffs had purchased the note from H. H. Scudday, for valuable consideration some time after its maturity. The defence was that the defendant gave the note as executor of C. V. Barnes for *balance struck upon a settlement of mutual accounts between Scudday and C. V. Barnes, upon express condition that any other accounts afterwards discovered, should be credited; and if the voucher should not be approved by the judge of Probate, this note or memorandum was to be given up or destroyed; that Scudday should be notified of the time of trial before the Probate Court, so that he might appear and defend his accounts; that he was so notified but failed to appear, and the vouchers were disallowed. At the trial these matters were offered to be proved by parol testimony. Plaintiffs objected; their objections were overruled and they excepted.

*329

Scudday's accounts were for the years 1855 to 1856, inclusive, and amounted to $550.50; due by Scudday to C. V. Barnes, $206.92, and to J. T. Barnes $70.28, leaving balance due to Scudday $273.30, for which the note was given June 26th, 1875. C. V. Barnes died in February, 1866; J. T. Barnes and C. V. Barnes, sons qualified as executors within a month afterwards. August 19th, 1875, there was a balance in executor's hands of $5925.65, of which $4595.36 was set aside to widow, to revert to the estate at her death; and adding the amounts already received by legatees, the sum of $203.80 was the share of each child. At this settlement the judge of Probate (sometimes called Ordinary) refused to allow J. T. Barnes credit for the notes.

The charge of the Circuit judge to the jury was as follows:

1. It is doubtful whether the note sued on was not nudum pactum, inasmuch as there was no consideration personal to the defendant.

2. That Scudday, the payee of the note or memorandum, and the defendant differed as to whether they had frequent conversations about the mutual claims in the long interval of time between 1866, when the testator died, and 1875, when the memorandum or note was signed by the defendant, one of the executors; but without charging them upon this issue of this fact, or giving any intimation of opinion upon the subject, he charged as matter of law, substantially, that even if such conversations as Scudday claimed had taken place, and there were promises to pay the balance, (which defendant denied,) yet these conversations were merely parol, and could not, after the adoption of the code in *March, 1870, have the effect of keeping the original debt alive longer than four years after that time, and that on June 26th, 1875, when the memorandum or note sued on was signed, the original claim on the accounts was barred, and the right of action gone.

*330

3. That at that time the original claim being barred, one of the executors could not, even by contract in writing, make a new debt to bind the estate. That an individual who owes a debt, which becomes barred, may make a new debt of his own by a new promise in writing, (the old debt being the consideration of the new promise,) but that as to a debt against a dead man's estate, when the right of action against the executors is clearly barred, the executor cannot make a new debt against the estate by a new promise. It is not like the promise of an individual to make a new debt with sufficient consideration against himself, but is unauthorized, without consideration, and nudum pactum. It is true the estate was said to be solvent, but it did not follow that Barnes, the executor, had any interest in it. The estate may have been given to others, or the defendant may have been fully advanced. There was absolutely nothing to show that the executor had any interest in the estate, and it could not be assumed.

The jury found for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed, alleging error in the admission of the parol testimony and in the charge to the jury.

[For subsequent opinion, see 18 S. C. 606.]

Mr. J. W. Harrison, for appellants.

1. That the court erred in admitting parol testimony to vary the terms of the written contract. 1 Bay 303; 2 M. Const. R. 31; Id. 265; Harp. 401; 3 McC. 469; 6 Ves. 327, and notes; 2 E. C. L. R. 427; 5 E. C. L. R. 268; 2 Strob. 122; 4 Strob. 99; 8 Rich. 407; 9 Rich. 50; 12 Rich. 31.

2. That the court erred in charging that on June 26th, 1875, the original claim on the account was barred. 7 Wait's Act. & Def. 266; 3 Strob. 196; 4 Strob. 67; Hays v. Clinkscales, (not reported;) 14 Eng. R. (Moake) 304–326; 3 Hill 16; Dud. 121.

3. That the court erred in charging that the debt being barred, one of the executors could not, even by contract in writing, make *a new debt to bind the estate. 13 Am. R. 417, and authorities referred to.

*331

Mr. S. McGowan, contra.

Mr. A. T. Broyles, in reply.

March 25th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The action was upon the following promissory note:

"$273.30.

Anderson, S. C., January 26th, 1875.

"One day after date, I promise, as the executor of the estate of C. V. Barnes, to pay H. H. Scudday, or bearer, the sum of two hundred and seventy-three 30-100 dollars, due by said estate to H. H. Scudday for medical service rendered, most of which during last illness.

(Signed,) "Jas. T. Barnes, Executor."

Evidence was admitted, subject to objection, tending to show that the note was given in pursuance of an agreement that the payment of the note should be conditional upon the allowance by the Ordinary of the claim made against the estate by the payee of the note. The objection urged was that the admission of this testimony violated the rule that written instruments cannot be varied by oral testimony.

It appears to be well settled in this state, that in an action on a promissory note between parties affected by the rights and equities existing between the original parties to the note, where the note does not state the consideration upon which it was given, or where only a general consideration is stated, such as value received, it is competent to prove in defence that the note was given as part of an agreement by which the payment was to be conditional instead of absolute, and such agreement, when it appears to have been the consideration of such note, may be resisted to show either partial or entire failure of consideration on which the note was made.

*332

*That promissory notes and other obligations for the payment of money absolutely are frequently given upon considerations of an expectant character, as upon contracts, calling for acts to be performed by the party to whom the note is given, and are put in an absolute form for the convenience of the parties, is a fact well known. When a party gives his note upon the promise of the payee to perform a certain act, and the payee fails to perform, it is reasonable that the transaction should be considered as a whole for the purpose of ascertaining what is due between the parties. This cannot be done where a negotiable note has come into the hands of one who is not affected by the rights and equities existing between the original parties independently of the terms of the note itself; as where held by a purchaser before maturity without notice. The question is, whether such a defence to a promissory note is sanctioned by the principles of law and the adjudicated cases.

The principle upon which such evidence has been admitted seems to be this: That a promissory note as between the original parties to it, unless supported by a consideration, is nudum pactum. Bank v. Topping, 9 Wend. 273. Here arises the propriety of inquiring whether such a consideration existed. When the note states the consideration specifically, it may well be said that, to admit oral testimony to show a different consideration, is, in effect, to vary the terms of the written instrument by oral proof. McClanaghan v. Hines, 2 Strob. 122, is a case of this class. In that case, according to the express terms of the note, the payer promised to pay the amount due upon the notes of a third party belonging to the payee. The court held that an attempt to show by parol proof that the maker merely promised to take in hand the collection of such notes and to pay over only what was collected therein, was an attempt to change the contract as it appeared on the face of the note, and, therefore, inadmissible under the rule that precluded the alteration of the terms of written instruments by parol. But when the note expresses no consideration or a merely formal or general consideration, as by the usual words value received, or by similar general or formal expressions, it is evident that if the true consideration of the note rests in an agreement, written or *oral, between the parties, the proof of such agreement does not necessarily tend to charge the terms of the note, although by showing the true consideration upon which it was given it may control the recovery upon the note.

*333

Barnes v. Shelton, Harp. 33 [18 Am. Dec. 642]. In that case it was held that the maker of a promissory note could set up by way of discount or a breach of a parol contract what was the consideration of the note in suit. This decision was put upon the right of discount and not upon the broad principle of a failure of consideration.

Gazoway v. Moore, Harp. 401. In that case the note stated that it was given "for the hire of his negro man Abraham," and it was held that it could not be shown by parol evidence that a different rate of hiring was agreed upon conditionally. Here the note expressed the contract of the parties as it regarded the consideration for which it was given, and its expressed terms could not be contradicted by oral proof.

Hampton v. Blakeley, 3 McC. 469. The promissory note here was alleged to have been given for the balance due on a settlement of sundry accounts. The Circuit judge excluded the proof of the consideration of the note, and the decision was reversed on appeal. It would seem that the court were of opinion that the production of the written accounts by which it would appear that the sum stated in the note was entered by mistake, would not involve the objection of varying written instruments by parol proof. The principle upon which this view depended was that in effect the note and the written accounts on which it was based constituted one written instrument, so that one part could be corrected by reference to another. Although this case involved merely a question of the correction of a mistake, yet it recognizes the rule that this note and the agreement in virtue of which it is given, constitute, in view of the law, a single transaction. It may be that it was material for the purpose of correcting, at law, a mistake in the written instrument that the means of such correction should be in writing also; but where the question is, was there a consideration, and what was the consideration, when it leaves untouched *the terms of the instrument, no such necessity for exclusively written testimony could exist.

*334

Hagood v. Swords, 2 Bail. 305. Here the court went a step further than in Barnes

v. Shelton, and allowed as a defence to a promissory note proof that it was to be surrendered upon a certain contingency. Had the agreement to surrender the note been made subsequent to the making of the note, it would have been a clear case of discharge in the nature of payment that might have been proved by oral testimony alone. But the fact was that the agreement to surrender was part of the original agreement that formed the consideration of the note. Although Judge O'Neall lays stress on the fact that the parol proof offered related to matter of discharge alone in the nature of payment, yet as the agreement was contemporaneous with the note, the case really involves the whole question, whether the recovery on the note could be affected by the discovery, through parol testimony, of the fact that the consideration of the note depended upon a contingency. McClanaghan v. Hines, 2 Strob. 122, has already been alluded to as a case where the note assumed to express the specific consideration on which it was founded. Clearly, in that case, parol proof of a different consideration would tend to vary the express declarations of the note itself, and, therefore, was inadmissible.

Knight v. Knotts, 8 Rich. 35, finally settled the question by placing the defence upon the true ground, namely, as involving the consideration of the note. The verbal agreement accompanying the note was held to be the consideration of the note, the two constituting but one agreement, and when the contract failed to give support to the note the latter could not justify a recovery.

In the present case the evidence admitted under objection tended to show that the parties had agreed at the time of the making of the note, that if the demand for which the note was given was rejected by the Ordinary, the note should not be paid. This was very different from placing the liability of the executor upon the actual validity of the debt, for the debt might be afterwards established, notwithstanding the decision of the Ordinary. The evidence was, therefore, an attempt to show that a different agreement was made than that which is expressed in the note, *and one that would place the claim on a different footing from that on which the law placed it. It is, therefore, like McClanaghan v. Hines and Gazoway v. Moore, a case where parol evidence was resorted to to vary the terms of a written instrument. The evidence was improperly received.

*335

The next question to be considered is, what is the binding force and effect of the promise of the executor, expressed in the note in suit? Like all other promises and engagements, it must be upon adequate consideration to be capable of legal enforcement. We have here to inquire—1st, whether an executor can bind himself by his agreement or promise to pay a debt of his testator, so that an action can be maintained at law upon such promise; 2d, what consideration is necessary to support such a promise; and, 3d, what is the effect of such a promise?

The cases uniformly hold that a promise to pay a debt or legacy made by an executor is nudum pactum, unless supported by an adequate consideration. It is agreed that if such executor derives any benefit individually, or for the estate of his testator, or subject the promisee to disadvantage, the promise made upon such consideration binds him individually, and that an action at law can be maintained upon such promise and judgment obtained against such executor individually. It would seem also that in such a case the action may be brought against the defendant as executor, and judgment de bonis propriis will follow; and that in such case the executor cannot plead plene administravit, at least to defeat such judgment de bonis propriis. It is also held that if there be no such consideration as that just stated, yet if there be assets sufficient to pay such debt or legacy at the time of making such promise, it is obligatory, and may be enforced by an action at law against such executor individually or as executor, and the judgment as affecting such executor will be de bonis propriis.

The ground upon which the promise is held to be binding in law, when there are assets sufficient to pay the debt or legacy, is that the executor having sufficient assets for the purpose, is bound, both morally and by virtue of his office, to pay the debt or legacy, and such duty is a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay, so that indebitatus assumpsit will lie upon it.

*336

The rule, *so far as it regards the payment of the debts of an intestate, applies equally to administrators. Nor does it make any difference whether the promise was made individually or as executor or administrator.

The consideration of forbearance generally appears in the cases where the executor has been held bound by his promise, independently of their being assets sufficient to pay at the time of making the promise. If the executor induces forbearance to sue on the part of the creditor of his testator by means of his promise, such consideration is sufficient and the executor is bound. There may be other instances of an adequate consideration than that of forbearance, but that is the consideration illustrated in the cases.

The authorities will be next considered. Rann v. Hughes, 7 T. R., note 350, is a leading case, and holds that a promise of an administrator to pay a debt of his intestate is nudum pactum, unless supported by a consideration. That although the promises must, under the statute of frauds, be in writing, still a consideration is necessary to support it. The only kind of consideration discussed in the case is that of forbearance, which is recognized as sufficient, upon the ground that "if a person indebted in one right, in consideration of forbearance for a particular time, promises to pay in another right, the convenience will be a sufficient consideration to warrant an action against him or her in the latter right."

Childs v. Monins, 2 B. & B. 460. The action was upon a promissory note made by the defendants as executors, by which they severally and jointly promised to pay a certain sum on demand, together with lawful interest. It was held that the agreement to pay interest implied that the promise to pay was upon an agreement to forbear. This was based upon the idea that as the executor could not, by law, pay interest on the debts of his testator, the agreement to pay interest was to be regarded as something engaged on the part of the executor individually, and that it could only be ascribed to the motive of securing delay on the part of the creditor of the testator. It was also held that though the promise was made as executor, yet, from the nature of the transaction, it must be considered an individual obligation.

Atkins v. Hill, 1 Cowp. 284. This was an action of assumpsit *against an executor, brought by a legatee upon a promise to pay a legacy, made at a time when there were assets sufficient for its payment. It was held that such an action could be maintained at law. The sufficiency of the consideration to support the promise, was placed on the ground that the executor having assets sufficient to pay the legacy, was bound in consequence so to do, and such an obligation would support the promise to pay.

*337

Hawkes v. Saunders, 1 Cowp. 289. That action was against the executor individually for a legacy, alleging sufficiency of assets and liability to pay at the time when the promise was made; also a promise of the executor. It was held that the action lay. Lord Mansfield held that the possession of assets and liability to pay was a sufficient consideration to support the promise.

Trevenian v. Howell, Cro. Eliz. 98, holds that a promise by an executor to pay when he has sufficient assets therefor, is good to support a judgment de bonis propriis.

Bank v. Topping, 9 Wend. 273, was an action against an administrator on a promissory note payable at sixty days. It was held that the delay of payment for sixty days could not be construed as an agreement to forbear, and that the promise was nudum pactum, unless there were assets at the time it was made.

Walker v. Patterson, 36 Me. 273. The same doctrine was held in that case as in the cases already referred to.

It must be conceded that had the defendant offered to prove that there were not assets sufficient to pay the debt at the time the promise to pay was made, such evidence could not have been excluded. It is true that if there had been some other consideration, such as forbearance, the question of assets would not have been material, but no such consideration is presented in the evidence. There is no agreement to pay interest as in Childs v. Monins. The payment was not deferred for any particular time as it was in Bank v. Topping, while in that case such delay was not regarded as evidence of an agreement to forbear. Under such circumstances it was clearly competent for defendant to have shown that there were no assets applicable to the payment of the note at the time the promise was made. If, then, such fact could be shown, could it not also be shown that there was *nothing due to the plaintiff, or that less was due than the amount demanded?

*338

It is the duty of the executor, coupled with his promise, which gives legal validity to such promise. If nothing was due to the plaintiff, no such duty existed to support a promise to pay. If less than the amount promised was due, the amount actually due was the measure of the duty of the executor and must be the measure of the recovery under his promise.

The Circuit judge was clearly in error in holding, in an action against the executor individually, as this must be considered, in which judgment was not sought de bonis testatoris, (Ashby v. Ashby, 7 B. & C. 444,) that the promise of the executor could not stand for want of consideration on the ground that the debt had been barred by the statute of limitations. A debt which becomes barred after the executor has qualified is a good consideration for a promise to pay, and there was nothing to prevent the executor from binding himself by a written promise to pay. Whether the executor could obtain remuneration out of the assets of the estate where he has failed to interpose the bar of the statute is a question not presented by this record. He could bind himself by his direct promise as well as indirectly by failing to plead the statute in an action seeking to charge the assets.

There must be a new trial.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 338

(Case No. 851.)

DIERCKS v. ROBERTS.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Bills and Notes ⊂=60.]

Where one endorses a note in blank under agreement with the maker that the blank shall be filled with a certain amount, and the maker fills it with a larger amount, and delivers it to the payee, who has no knowledge of such agreement, the endorser is liable to the payee for the note as written.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Mars v. Mars, 27 S. C. 136, 3 S. E. 60.

For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. ⟸60.]

*339

[2. Evidence ⟸441.]

*If a note on the face of it, purports to be an absolute engagement to pay money at a certain time, no parol evidence of an agreement at the time to renew and give indulgence will be admissible to defeat the action on the note.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Smith Bros. v. Brabham, 48 S. C. 341, 26 S. E. 651.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1894; Dec. Dig. ⟸441.]

3. Rugely v. Davidson, 2 Mill's Const. R. 33, limited.

[4. Bills and Notes ⟸537.]

Whether the holder of a note has used due diligence to discover the endorser's place of residence, is a question of fact for the jury; but it is error to submit to them the inquiry whether due diligence had been used in giving to the endorser notice of the dishonor of his note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1888; Dec. Dig. ⟸537.]

Before Thomson, J., Richland, March, 1879.

Action by G. Diercks against W. T. Roberts. Verdict for plaintiff. The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John Bauskett, for appellant.

Mr. W. S. Monteith, contra.

April 9th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This action was brought against the defendant as endorser of a promissory note for $250, made by one Francis Hammond, June 19th, 1878, payable sixty days after date, and protested for non-payment on August 21st, 1878.

The defence interposed was based upon three grounds: 1. That the note was in blank when it was endorsed by the defendant, and that it was agreed at the time, between defendant and Hammond, that it should be filled up for $100, and that the plaintiff had notice of such agreement. 2. That it was also agreed at the time of the endorsement, that three notes should be executed and used as renewals of each other, so as to make the amount fall due "when the cotton crop should come in." 3. That due notice of the dishonor of the note had not been given, so as to charge defendant as endorser. The exceptions to the judge's charge were designed, doubtless, to raise three questions: 1. Whether the fact that the amount secured by the note was in blank at the time of the endorsement could affect the question of the defendant's liability. 2. Whether the parol agreement, made at the time the notes were endorsed, that the notes should be renewed was a good defence to the action.

*340

3. Whether the *Circuit judge erred in charging the jury "that the main question in the case was, whether due diligence had been used in giving notice of the dishonor of said note to the defendant, Roberts, and that he would leave this question of 'due diligence' to them to determine."

As to the first question, we do not see how it can arise under the evidence adduced in this cause; for there is no evidence whatever tending to show that there was any understanding between the plaintiff and the defendant that the amount to be inserted in the note should be limited to $100, but, on the contrary, the plaintiff distinctly testifies that the note was filled up for $250 before the endorsement was made; and although the defendant in his answer, which is not evidence, does say that he endorsed the note in blank, with the understanding that the amount to be inserted was $100, and that the plaintiff had notice of such understanding, yet, in his testimony, which is evidence, he only says that such was the agreement between him and Hammond, and does not even intimate that the plaintiff was a party to or had notice of any such agreement. It is clear, therefore, without entering upon the hypothetical inquiry as to what would have been the legal effect of such testimony, if it had been adduced, that there was no error on this point; for, certainly, no private understanding between the defendant and Hammond, not brought to the notice of the plaintiff before he took the note, could affect the question of the defendant's liability.

The next inquiry is as to the effect of the parol agreement, made at the time of the endorsement of the note, that it should be renewed from time to time. The proposition that where a person signs or endorses a note payable at a particular day, or, what amounts to the same thing, where he signs or endorses a note in blank, which is afterwards filled up by being made payable at a particular day, (Carson v. Hill & Jones, 1 McM. 76; Aiken v. Cathcart, 3 Rich. 133 [45 Am. Dec. 764]) parol evidence can be admitted to show that the agreement was that it should not in fact be payable on such day, but should be renewed, cannot be sustained. We take the rule to be as stated in Chitty on Bills, ch. II., p. 61: "If the instrument, on the face of it, purport to be an absolute engagement to pay money at a certain time, no parol evidence of *an agreement at the time to renew and give indulgence will be admissible to defeat the action on the bill or note." To same effect see Phillips on Evidence, 433. As is said by Lord Ellenborough, in Hoare v. Graham, 3 Camp. 57: "The condition for a renewal entirely contradicts the instrument which the defendants have signed; such an arrangement rests in confidence and honor only and is not an obligation of law. There may, after a bill is drawn, be a binding promise, for a valuable consideration, to renew it when due, but if the promise is cotemporaneous with the drawing of the bill, the law will not enforce it. This would be incorporating with a written contract an incongruous parol condition which is contrary to first principles." See also Free v. Hawkins, 8 Taunt. 92, (4 E. C. L. R. 313) Thompson v. Ketchum, 8 Johns. 146. It is very true that some of the remarks made by Gantt, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Rugely v. Davidson, 2 Mill's Const. R. 33, are well calculated to convey the impression that the parol evidence adduced in this case should have the effect claimed for it. In that case one of the grounds of defence was, that at the time the note was endorsed it was verbally agreed that the endorsee would "sue the drawer and proceed against him to insolvency, before he was to have recourse to the endorser; and that, in the event of the drawer's insolvency, that the endorsee should not call upon the endorser for payment until the expiration of three years next succeeding the proof of insolvency." At the trial below the testimony as to this parol agreement was withdrawn from the jury as incompetent, and it was upon that ground that a new trial was granted. It must be observed, however, that in the first place that case was an action against the endorsee of a note past due, and in such a case the question whether due diligence has been observed in making the demand and giving the notice of non-payment is a question for the jury, whereas, in a case where the action is against the endorser of a note before maturity, the rule is otherwise, and the question of diligence (all the circumstances necessary for giving the notice being known) is one of law for the court. Gray v. Bell, 2 Rich. 67 [44 Am. Dec. 277]. Hence the court might very well have held, in the case of Rugely v. Davidson, that where the parties have, by their own agreement, *determined the degree of diligence which should be required to fix the liability of the endorser, the evidence of such agreement ought to be allowed to go to the jury, in an action on a note endorsed after due, whether the question of diligence is for the jury. A careful examination of that case will, however, reveal the fact that the decision could only be regarded as the law of that particular case, for it was, in fact, decided by an equally divided court, although nominally by a vote of three to two, for as the law then stood, the judge who heard the case on Circuit not being allowed to participate in the determination of the case in the Court of Appeals, the voice of Cheves, J., one of the three dissenting judges, who had heard the case on Circuit, could have no weight in the decision of that particular case. It furthermore appears that Nott, J., one of the majority, who delivered a separate opinion, did not concur in so much of the opinion of the court, as presented by Gantt, J., as seemed to recognize the idea that the agreement to indulge the endorser for three years after the making of the note had been pursued to insolvency constituted a defence to the action, for he expressly held that portion of the agreement to be incompetent, as going to control the legal effect of the endorsement, and limited his concurrence to the proposition that parol evidence was admissible to show that the parties had, by their own agreement, fixed upon what should be due diligence in making demand upon the maker of the note. The case does not seem to have been recognized in the subsequent cases of Eccles v. Ballard, 2 McC. 388, and Brock v. Thompson, 1 Bail. 322, but only to the extent allowed by the opinion of Nott, J., that such evidence may be adduced to show what degree of diligence in making demand of the maker of a note should be sufficient, under the agreement of the parties, to charge the endorser of a note transferred after maturity, and not to the extent of allowing such evidence to be received for the purpose of extending the time fixed for payment of such note.

*341

*342

The next inquiry is as to the propriety of the charge upon the question of diligence. The evidence was that the endorser was a resident of Richland county, and that Columbia was and had been his post office for the past thirty years, and that Eastover *was not his post office, he never having received a letter from that office in his life. The notary testified "that he protested said note on August 21st, 1878, and mailed a notice to W. T. Roberts, at Eastover. That he did not inquire as to the post office of W. T. Roberts, but believed that Capt. J. H. Sawyer told him the post office was Eastover."

*343

It also appeared from the plaintiff's testimony that he sent a notice of protest by private hand to the defendant some time in September, 1878, and the defendant testified that he never received any notice of the dishonor of the note until September 12th, 1878, when he received a note from the plaintiff notifying him of the fact. In this case the question of diligence involved two inquiries —one of fact and the other of law. Whether due diligence was used in ascertaining the post office of the defendant, was a question of fact for the jury, but when the fact of residence was ascertained, or when due diligence had been employed in endeavoring to ascertain such fact, the question of diligence in giving the notice is a question of law, upon which it was the duty of the court to have instructed the jury. Thompson v. Bank, 3 Hill 82-3 [30 Am. Dec. 354]; Central Bank v. Adams, 11 S. C. 452 [32 Am. Rep. 495]; Bateman v. Joseph, 12 East 433. As is said in the last-named case: "Whether due notice has been given of the dishonor of a bill, all the circumstances necessary for the giving of such notice being known, is a question of law; but whether the holder has used due diligence to discover the place of residence of the person to whom the notice is to be given, is a question of fact for the jury." In this case the whole question of diligence was left to the jury, and it may be that they concluded that the notice sent on September 12th, 1878, was sufficient to charge the endorser. Be that as it may, however, it was error to refer to the jury the question "whether due diligence had been used in giving notice of the dishonor of said note to the defendant Roberts."

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial is ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *344

(Case No. 753.)

STATE v. WILDER.

STATE v. JACKSON.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Bail ⟸77.]

The Court of General Sessions has jurisdiction under proceedings by scire facias to estreat a recognizance given to secure the appearance before that court of a person charged with crime. Section 443 of the code of procedure relates only to writs of scire facias as a civil remedy.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Johnson, 77 S. C. 253, 57 S. E. 846.

For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. § 336; Dec. Dig. ⟸77.]

[2. Courts ⟸42.]

Sections 8 and 9 of Chapter CXLII. of the general statutes, are not in conflict with Article IV., Section 1, of the constitution, but only provide a means by which the Court of General Sessions may carry into effect its unquestioned powers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 163–170, 181–183; Dec. Dig. ⟸42.]

[3. Criminal Law ⟸1110.]

The mode suggested by which alone matters omitted from the brief may be brought to the attention of this court. Facts appearing only in argument of counsel will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McPherson v. McPherson, 21 S. C. 267; Welch v. Gleason, 28 S. C. 249, 5 S. E. 599; In re Estate Neubert, Burkhim v. Pinkhussohn, 58 S. C. 474, 36 S. E. 908.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2896, 2903–2917, 2919; Dec. Dig. ⟸1110.]

Before Shaw, J., Richland, April, 1878.

These were rules issued by the state against Charles M. Wilder and Ann E. Jackson, to show cause why a recognizance entered into by them as sureties for the appearance of one Houston at the Court of General Sessions to answer to a bill of indictment, should not be forfeited, Houston having failed to appear. The defendants, for cause, showed that the writ of scire facias has been abolished by Section 443 of the code of procedure, and the remedies obtainable under that form must be obtained by civil actions.

The Circuit judge overruled the returns, declared the recognizance forfeited, and ordered execution to issue for the collection of the penalty, if not paid by a day named.

Defendants appealed. In the argument of appellant's counsel in this court, the further ground was taken that the recognizance had not been acknowledged in the presence of either a judge or trial justice, and that there was no certificate from either of such officers of such acknowledgment; and that therefore the recognizance was void under Chapter CXLII., Section 7, of the general statutes.

*345

*Mr. John Bauskett, for appellants.

Mr. Solicitor Abney, contra.

April 16th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. These two cases, involving the same question, were heard and will be considered together. That question is, whether the Court of General Sessions has jurisdiction to estreat a recognizance given to secure the appearance before said court of a person charged with crime to answer to a bill of indictment to be preferred against him.

The grounds upon which jurisdiction is denied are, that the provisions of Sections 8 and 9 of Chapter CXLII., (Gen. Stat. 750.) under which the proceedings in these cases were instituted, are practically identical with the proceeding by writ of scire facias, and that writ being abolished by Section 443 of the code of procedure, and the remedies previously obtainable in that form provided for by a civil action, the Court of General Sessions, which, under the constitution, has no civil jurisdiction, could not exercise the jurisdiction claimed for it in these cases. A sufficient answer to this is that the second part of the code, in which the provision abolishing the writ of scire facias is found, relates only to civil actions, and cannot, therefore, be construed so as to apply to criminal action or to any proceedings in the court invested with jurisdiction of such actions. This provision must, therefore, be construed as applying to that writ only, as it had heretofore been used to obtain or enforce a civil right as contra-distinguished from a criminal proceeding. There is no doubt but that at the time of the adoption of the code the writ of scire facias could be used in the Court of Common Pleas as a civil remedy merely, for example, to revive a judgment, and the provision of the code unquestionably abolished it as a remedy in such and the like cases. But it is equally true that the writ could then be used in the Court of General Sessions, under the provisions of the act of 1787, 6 Stat. 130, as a remedy for the enforcement of the performance of the condition of a recognizance given to secure the attendance before said court of persons charged with crime, or witnesses in such cases; and so the law *continued to be—unaffected by the provisions of the code above cited—until the adoption of the general statutes, when the act of 1787 was repealed, and the provisions of Sections 8 and 9 of Chapter CXLII., of the general statutes were substituted therefor. It is apparent, from a similar course of reasoning, that the provisions of Section 443 of the code of procedure do not apply to the proceedings in these cases.

*346

It is argued, however that the provisions of the general statutes under which the proceedings in these cases were instituted, are unconstitutional, because they purport, in violation of Section 1, Article IV. of the constitution, to confer civil jurisdiction upon the Court of General Sessions, which, by that section, is invested "with criminal jurisdiction only." Such a construction of that clause of the constitution would so cripple the powers of the Court of General Sessions as greatly to impair, if not absolutely destroy, its usefulness, and it is not, therefore, admissible. The powers conferred by the sections of the general statutes in question, are not given for the purpose of investing the Court of General Sessions with any "civil jurisdiction," but solely for the purpose of enabling it to exercise the powers with which it is unquestionably clothed by the constitution. If the court, which is invested with the power to try and punish offenders against the law, had no means of enforcing the attendance of such persons, and of the witnesses necessary to testify against them, it would indeed be an empty farce to give it the power to try and punish; and certainly the proceedings prescribed by the sections under consideration have no other purpose but to enable the Court of General Sessions to carry into effect the powers with which it is undeniably vested, by securing and enforcing the attendance of parties and witnesses. Such a construction as that contended for would result in the denial to that court of the right to preserve order and enforce its mandates by the use of the proceedings in case of contempt.

The other ground taken in the argument—that the recognizances were not acknowledged in the presence of either a judge or a trial justice—is not properly before us, inasmuch as the fact upon which it is based, though alleged in the argument of the appellant's counsel, nowhere appears in the "case" as submitted, *and we cannot, therefore, consider it. While this court would be disposed in a criminal case, especially were it one involving human life, to extend every indulgence possible to the appellant, it must be manifest to every one that we have no right to decide a case upon facts which do not appear in the record, and can only be learned from ex parte statements of counsel made in the argument. As well might it be claimed that a jury could base their verdict upon facts, the proofs of which had been inadvertently omitted, and which only appeared from the statements of counsel in argument. If counsel find, in any case that they have omitted, as any one is liable to do, to insert in the "case" as prepared for this court, facts which are necessary to enable them to raise a question which they deem important, the proper practice is, before the argument has commenced, to obtain the consent of the counsel on the other side to an amendment of the "case" by the insertion of such facts; or, if such consent cannot be obtained, to move the court, upon affidavits submitted, to recommit the record to the Circuit Court for amendment.

*347

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 347

(Case No. 854.)

CAROLINA NATIONAL BANK v. WALLACE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Bills and Notes ⊂⊃414.]

Notice of non-payment of a promissory note to one of two executors of a deceased endorser, is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1150; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃414.]

[2. Bills and Notes ⊂⊃421, 537; Customs and Usages ⊂⊃21.]

While the general rule requires that where the parties reside in the same city or town, notice of dishonor must be given personally to the endorser, or, in his absence, must be left at his residence or place of business, yet where the note is made payable at a bank whose usage it is to give such notices through the post office, that mode of giving notice will be sufficient. Whether such usage exists, is a question of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1178, 1888; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃421, 537; Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃21.]

[3. Bills and Notes ⊂⊃537.]

An endorser is bound by notice of dishonor actually received in due time, and where there is any evidence in the case tending to show such receipt, the question should be submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1862–1893; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃537.]

[4. Bills and Notes ⊂⊃394.]

Where the endorser of a note dies before its maturity, and the maker becomes executor, notice to such executor of non-payment is necessary to fix the liability of the endorser's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1040; Dec. Dig. ⟸394.]

*348

*Before Wallace, J., Richland, July, 1879.

Action by Carolina National Bank against William Wallace and William P. Geiger, executors of the will of Jacob Geiger, deceased. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Melton & Clark, for appellants.

The general rule laid down in Foster v. Sineath, 2 Rich. 339, has exceptions. It may be varied by contract, or by implication, as where the bank at which the paper is payable has a different usage. 9 Wheat. 582; 11 Wheat. 431; 1 Pet. 32; 11 Mass. 88; 17 Mass. 452; 13 Pick. 419; 9 Metc. 585; 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1013, note; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 920, (*685); 1 Am. Lead. Cas. *403. By the acquiescence of the community, it has become a usage; certain, reasonable and sufficiently ancient to be known. 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 925, (*688.) Usage of trade, unlike general customs, need not be immemorial. 2 Bouv. L. Dict. tit. "Usage." Usage becomes a part of the contract. 1 Spear's 323; 3 Rich. 333; 2 Rich. 339. There are so many exceptions, the rule should be declared obsolete and be abolished. 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 502, (*403); 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1010.

There was evidence going to show that Geiger received the notice by mail, and this question should have been submitted to the jury. If Geiger received the notice, the manner of its transmission was immaterial. 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1003; 1 Pars. B. & N. 483; 3 McLean 96, 582; 26 Me. 45. If sent by mail, it is sufficient if received. 10 Allen 524, et supra. That fact may be presumed by the jury from the evidence. 2 Pet. 132; 3 McLean 96. There was enough evidence in this case for the jury to have presumed that the notice had been received. Stark. on Ev. *741, 754, 763; 2 Mills 133; 21 E. C. L. R. 402; 26 Me. 45; 19 Pick. 114.

Notice to Geiger, executor, was unnecessary, as he knew of his own default as maker. 1 Pars. on B. & N. 523, 526; 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1169. This case differs from Magruder v. Bank, 3 Pet. 87, and the grounds upon which that case was put.

*349

*Mr. William Wallace, contra.

The non-suit was proper under the rule laid down in Foster v. Sineath, 2 Rich. 339, sustained by 16 Johns. 221; 11 Johns. 231, and cases there cited. Usage cannot bind unless the endorser was conversant of it. Chit. on Bills 416; or exercised beyond legal memory. 2 Bouv. Inst. 490.

April 16th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an action against the defendants as executors of Jacob Geiger, endorser of a note drawn by the said Wm. P. Geiger, and made payable at the Carolina National Bank of Columbia. The defence interposed was an alleged failure to give due notice of the non-payment of the note, so as to charge the estate of the endorser. The testimony adduced tended to show that the bank authorities learned of the death of the endorser only a few days before the maturity of the note, and supposing that Wm. P. Geiger, the maker of the note, was the only executor, on the day the note became payable, after demand and refusal of payment, deposited a notice of nonpayment in the post office, in Columbia, addressed to "Wm. P. Geiger, executor of the estate of Jacob Geiger, Columbia, S. C," he being, at the time, a resident of Columbia. Testimony was also adduced tending to show that on the back of the envelope in which the notice was enclosed, was the usual printed notice "Return to the Carolina National Bank, of Columbia, if not delivered in five days;" that it was the rule of the post office, when a leter, with a notice endorsed upon it, was not delivered within the time specified to return it to the sender; that the bank was in the habit of receiving its mail from the post office at least three times a day, (Sundays excepted,) and that the envelope above-mentioned had never been returned to the bank. It was also in evidence that it was the custom of this bank, as well as all the other banks in the city of Columbia, to give notices of the dishonor of notes through the post office, as well as persons residing in the city as to those residing elsewhere, and that such had been the usage of this bank from the time of its establishment up to and after the time of the maturity of the note in question.

*350

*Upon this evidence a motion for a nonsuit was made upon the ground that a notice deposited in the post office, addressed to the endorser, where both parties lived in the same city, was not sufficient. The motion was granted and exceptions duly taken. No question seems to have been raised in the court below, and certainly none in the argument here, as to whether a notice to one of two executors would be sufficient. But as the defence rested upon the general ground of want of due notice, and as the grounds upon which the Circuit judge based his judgment are not stated, it may be proper for us to say that notice to one of two executors would be sufficient. Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1000.

The questions raised by the exceptions are: 1. Whether the general rule, where both parties reside in the same town or city, requiring notice of the dishonor of a note to be delivered personally to the endorser, or in case of his absence, to be left at his place of residence or place of business, was not so modified by the evidence as to the usage of this bank to give such notices through the post office as to render that mode of giving notice sufficient. 2. Whether the Circuit judge was not bound, under the evidence adduced, to submit the question of fact to the jury as to whether Wm. P. Geiger had actually received the notice in due season. 3. Whether any notice at all was necessary under the circumstances. Wm. P. Geiger, the maker of the note, having become one of the executors of the endorser before the note became payable, and, therefore, necessarily cognizant of the fact of the non-payment of the note.

As to the first question, it cannot be denied that the general rule is that where the parties reside in the same town or city, the notice must be given to the person entitled to it, either personally, or in case of his absence, it must be left at his residence or place of business. Story on Prom. Notes, § 312; 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1005, and this rule has been recognized in this state. Foster v. Sineath, 2 Rich. 338. And although it has been suggested that this rule "has lost its reasonable force and exists only by authority," and, therefore, should be abrogated rather than undermined, as it has been, by exceptions, (1 Am. Lead. Cas. 403; 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1010,) yet we do not regard it as *within our province to adopt the remedy proposed, and, therefore, leave the suggestion to be considered by that department of the government to which it properly belongs. To this rule, there are, however, exceptions, one of which is that where a note is made payable at a particular bank, and it is proved to be the usage of such bank to give notices through the post office to persons residing in the same town or city, that mode of giving notice will be sufficient. This is upon the ground that persons who become parties to such a note are presumed to have knowledge of the usages of the bank at which they have chosen to make the note payable, and have agreed to be bound by such notice as it is the usage of the bank to give. In the American notes to the case of Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 416–17, it is said:

*351

"It has been repeatedly decided, in relation to the contract of endorsement, that an established usage of particular banks as to the time of demanding payment and giving notice differing from the time fixed by the general law-merchant, with which banks the parties deal, is evidence of intention and consent that the contract of the endorser shall be modified according to this usage, and that, therefore, the endorser is bound by such demand and notice as the usage prescribes; * * * and the same principle has been applied to the manner of making the demand," citing the cases to sustain both propositions.

It would seem necessarily to follow from this that the same principle would apply to the manner of giving notice, and a recent writer, Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, states that it has been so held in several cases which he cites, but to which we have not access. Nor is it necessary that knowledge of such usage should be brought home to the person sought to be affected by it; for, as is said by Marshall, C. J., in Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. 33 [7 L. Ed. 37]; adopting the language which had been previously used by Story, J., in Mills v. Bank of U. S., 11 Wheat. 438 [6 L. Ed. 512]:

"When a note is made payable at a bank whose invariable usage it is to demand payment and give notice on the fourth day of grace, the parties are bound by that usage, whether they have a personal knowledge of it or not. In the case of such a note the *parties are presumed, by implication, to agree to be governed by the usage of the bank at which they have chosen to make the security itself negotiable."

*352

These remarks will apply as well to the manner of giving notice as to the time when the demand of payment should be made and the notice of non-payment should be given. This view was plainly recognized in the case of Bowling v. Harrison, 6 How. (U. S.) 248 [12 L. Ed. 425], where a charge to the jury that, in order to fix the liability of the endorser, who resided in the same town where the note was payable, "the notice must be personal, unless he had agreed to receive it elsewhere, or unless by custom and usage of the bank at which the note is payable, the notice of non-payment was left at the post office," was approved, although it seems to have been held in that case that there was no sufficient proof of such a custom or usage as would dispense with notice—the proof, in fact, being exactly the other way, and that it was the usage to give notice personally, unless there was a memorandum on the note providing for a different mode of notice. But to make such usage effectual it must, of course, be properly proved. As is said in the case just cited: "A usage to be binding should be definite, uniform and well known. It should be established by clear and satisfactory evidence, so that it may be justly presumed that the parties had reference to it in making their contract." To this we may add that the usage should be reasonable. The question, therefore, should have been left to the jury to determine whether there was sufficient proof of such a usage at the plaintiff bank as would, upon the principles above announced, dispense with the necessity of notifying the endorser personally, or by leaving a notice for him at his residence or place of business.

As to the next question, there can be no doubt that whatever may have been the mode adopted of giving the notice, if the party actually received it, and received it in due time, he would be bound, and the mode of transmission would, in such a case, become wholly immaterial. 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1003, where the cases are cited. So that if there was any evidence in this case tending to show that the notice was actually received, and received in due time, the question should have been left to the *jury. The fact that a party has received such a notice may be proved, like all other facts, either by direct or circumstantial evidence, and while it is very clear that there was no direct evidence in this case to show that William P. Geiger received the notice, there were circumstances adduced in evidence which should have been submitted to the jury with instructions to inquire whether such circumstances satisfied their minds, not only that the notice was actually received, but that it was received in due time. The evidence upon this point may have been of a slender character, but still that was a matter for the jury and not for the court to pass upon, and, therefore, we think that the non-suit was improperly ordered.

*353

As to the third question, we are entirely satisfied that there was no error in the ruling of the Circuit judge. The object of notice is not merely to inform the endorser that the note is not paid, but also to let him understand that the holder looks to him, as well as the maker, for payment; and without such notice the endorser would have a right to conclude either that the note was not paid or that the holder was satisfied to look alone to the maker for payment. Tindall v. Brown, 1 T. R. 169–70. We think, too, that this case comes within the reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Magruder v. Union Bank, 3 Pet. 87 [7 L. Ed. 612], recognized in Bank v. Tyler, 4 Pet. 384 [7 L. Ed. 888], and re-affirmed in Union Bank v. Magruder, 7 Pet. 287 [8 L. Ed. 687]. In that case the maker having died before the maturity of the note, the endorser became his administrator, and it was held that demand and notice were nevertheless necessary. There, as here, it was contended that it was entirely useless; but Marshall, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said, after stating the general rule as to demand and notice: "The defendant in error does not controvert this rule, but insists that this case does not come within it, because demand of payment and notice of non-payment are totally useless, since the endorser has become the personal representative of the maker. He has not, however, cited any case in support of this opinion, nor has he shown that the principle has been ever laid down in any treatise on promissory notes and bills. The court ought to be well satisfied of the correctness of the principle before it sanctions so *essential a departure from established commercial usage." And after suggesting that it was possible that assets which might have been applied in payment of the note, had payment been duly demanded, may have been diverted to other purposes, or that it was possible that the maker had, during his lifetime, paid the note before maturity, concludes as follows: "Be that as it may, no principle is better settled in commercial transactions than that the undertaking of the endorser is conditional. If due diligence be used to obtain payment from the maker without success, and notice of non-payment be given to him in time, his undertaking becomes absolute, not otherwise." In this case we may also say that no case has been cited in support of the view contended for by the appellant, but on the contrary, Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, Section 1175, seems to take the same view of the matter which we have done and cites the cases. William P. Geiger may very well be regarded as having knowledge of the fact that the note was not paid, but William P. Geiger, as maker of the note and as executor of the endorser, are two different and distinct persons in law, and while he may have known that he, as maker, had not paid the note, yet he could not know, until notified, that he, as endorser or representative of the endorser, would be expected to pay it. It was possible that the bank might have seen fit to look alone to the maker for payment, and therefore William P. Geiger, as executor of the endorser, might have applied, as he would have had the right to apply, the assets belonging to his testator to other purposes, until he was notified, not only of the non-payment of the note, but that the estate which he represented would also be looked to for payment.

*354

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial is ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *355

*(Case No. 855.)

BULL v. ROWE.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Execution ⇐280.]

A decree in summary process in 1869, was entered by the judge upon the docket, but no entry in the minutes was shown, and was revived without objection under summons in 1876. Held, that a purchaser at a sale of land thereunder had sufficiently proven the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 813; Dec. Dig. ⇐280.]

[2. Execution ⇐102.]

The renewal, by default, of an execution under proceedings for that purpose, estops defendant from objecting that the original execution had not been returned to the clerk before the summons to renew was issued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 203; Dec. Dig. ⟸102.]

[3. Constitutional Law ⟸180.]

The state constitutional provision as to homestead must be so read as if that part which violates the constitution of the United States had been expressly excepted.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Agnew v. Adams, 17 S. C. 370.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 498-500; Dec. Dig. ⟸180.]

[4. Constitutional Law ⟸180; Homestead ⟸7.]

An assignment of homestead is absolutely void as to a debt contracted before the adoption of the constitution of 1868, but not in judgment at the time of such assignment.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Carrigan v. Bozeman, 13 S. C. 376; Charles v. Charles, Id., 385; Adams v. Agnew, 15 S. C. 40; Agnew v. Adams, 17 S. C. 370.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 499; Dec. Dig. ⟸180; Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⟸7.]

[5. Homestead ⟸2.]

An assignment of homestead made but not recorded in court, can in no way affect the rights of one whose debt, excepted from the operation of the homestead law, was not then in judgment; and a purchaser of the homestead under a judgment obtained upon such debt and levied before the record of the assignment, is entitled to recover the land.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Douglass v. Craig, 13 S. C. 373; Carrigan v. Bozeman, Id., 377; Charles v. Charles, Id., 386; Agnew v. Adams, 17 S. C. 371; Youngblood v. Lathen, 20 S. C. 375; Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 402; Hosford v. Wynn, 26 S. C. 133, 1 S. E. 497; Woods v. Bryan, 41 S. C. 80, 19 S. E. 218, 44 Am. St. Rep. 688.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⟸2.]

6. This case distinguished from McKeown v. Carroll, 5 S. C. 75.

[7. Estoppel ⟸95.]

Estoppel by conduct defined.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Douglass v. Craig, 13 S. C. 375; Agnew v. Adams, 17 S. C. 372; Carter v. Du Pre, 18 S. C. 183; In re Covin's Estate, 20 S. C. 475; Jennings v. Harrison, 33 S. C. 209, 11 S. E. 695; Graham v. Fire Ins. Co., 48 S. C. 226, 26 S. E. 323, 59 Am. St. Rep. 707.

For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 285-287; Dec. Dig. ⟸95.]

[8. Homestead ⟸107.]

A creditor, whose claim is not in judgment, remaining silent and inactive while a homestead is being assigned to his debtor, is not thereby estopped from enforcing his judgment, afterwards obtained, against such homestead.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 17 S. C. 13; Myers v. Ham, 20 S. C. 527; Trimmier v. Winsmith, 41 S. C. 116, 19 S. E. 283.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. ⟸107.]

[9. Estoppel ⟸56.]

[Cited in Smith v. Oglesby, 33 S. C. 197, 11 S. E. 687, to the point that there must be some act done or omitted, or a change of position made by the person claiming the estoppel.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 142; Dec. Dig. ⟸56.]

[10. Homestead ⟸1.]

[Cited in Trimmier v. Winsmith, 41 S. C. 114, 19 S. E. 283, to the point that the operation of the homestead exemption does not affect the title to the land.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. ⟸1.]

[This case is also cited in Douglass v. Craig, 13 S. C. 371, as to the doctrine of estoppel.]

Before Hudson, J., Orangeburg, January, 1879.

Action by Norman A. Bull against John C. Rowe, to recover five hundred acres of land, purchased by plaintiff as the property of defendant at a sheriff's sale, in the case of Sarah Watt against John C. Rowe. Defendant resisted upon the ground that it was his homestead, duly assigned to him on January 27th, 1869, as appears by the following return:

"We, the undersigned, commissioners appointed respectively, by the sheriff, J. M. Cope, and John C. Rowe to set off a homestead claimed by John C. Rowe do make this return of our action in the premises: We do assign and set apart to John *C. Rowe, as his homestead, a tract of land upon Snake Swamp, containing five hundred acres, which we appraise at $2 per acre, together with the building and improvements thereon. All of which we assign, transfer and deliver to John C. Rowe.

*356

"January 27th, 1869.

"C. M. McMichael.
"W. H. Smith,
"W. C. Moss."

J. M. Cope
v.
John C. Rowe } Orangeburg County.

Personally appeared before me, C. M. McMichael, W. C. Moss and W. H. Smith, and made oath that they, the appointees of the creditors, sheriff and defendants, in the case above set forth as appraisers, to allot a homestead to John C. Rowe, will faithfully carry out the provisions of the act of the general assembly, in such case made and provided.

C. M. McMichael,
W. C. Moss,
W. H. Smith.

Sworn to before me this 25th day of January, 1869. Geo. Boliver, Mag. ex off.

Endorsed: Filed March 12th, 1877.

Homestead of John C. Rowe.

Recorded in Record Book No. 15, page 408, March 12th, 1877. Geo. Boliver, Register.

Appraisement and return of homestead to John C. Rowe.

W. C. Moss, $2; C. M. McMichael, $2; W. H. Smith, $2; oath, seventy-five cents; survey, $7; total, $13.

N. A. Bull was one of the plaintiffs in the case of Case & Bull v. Rowe, referred to in the statement contained in the opinion of the court.

This land was levied on by the sheriff in the Watt case, January 27th, 1877, and sold April 2d, 1877, for $675, to N. A. Bull. The other facts of the case are stated in the opinion.

The Circuit judge charged the jury that, originally, this claim of homestead was invalid as against the Watt judgment, which was based upon a contract made prior to

*357

1868: and that it was *invalid because Rowe did not reside on it; that the return, while indefinite, was made and filed in the clerk's office for record; that record was not necessary, but proper; that creditors may attack the return within a reasonable time, although no time is fixed; that while the return was indefinite, still, as the land was surveyed, and notice given at the sale of the assignment of the homestead, the return could not be held void for want of definiteness; that creditors thus had notice; and the only way the assignment could be vacated was by direct proceedings attacking the return, and could not be avoided in a proceeding by a purchaser at sheriff's sale to recover the land; that the verdict should be for the defendant, and that the creditor, through whom Bull claims, was estopped by acquiescence.

To these instructions, the plaintiff excepted, and requested his Honor to charge, inter alia, as follows.

4. That the state constitution prescribes that the homestead consists of the "dwelling-house, out-buildings and lands appurtenant," and that lands not appurtenant to the dwelling-house are not included. And that a homestead, as against debts existing prior to the adoption of the constitution of South Carolina, is not only voidable, but utterly void.

5. That the lapse of time and laches of plaintiff cannot operate to make that valid which was void ab initio.

6. That the defendant derives his title either under the assignment or by possession; that the assignment is void ab initio, and that it requires ten years' possession to give him title.

7. That the assignment and return should have been recorded in the clerk of the court's office.

8. That the assignment and return is void from uncertainty and obscurity!

Upon these requests the court charged as follows:

"As to the fifth request, I charge you that the lapse of time and laches of the plaintiff cannot operate to make that valid which was void ab initio, but may operate to make that a title which otherwise could not have been a title."

"As to the sixth request, I cannot so charge, but hold that by failing to avail himself of the method pointed out by statute, to set aside the admeasurement of homestead, the plaintiff has lost *the rights which he otherwise would have had under the constitution of the United States, as well as the constitution of South Carolina."

*358

"Upon the seventh request, 'that the assignment and return should have been recorded in the office of the clerk of the court,' I hold that when the return was filed for recording in the court, it was the beginning of notice."

"As to the eighth request, 'that the assignment and return is void from uncertainty and obscurity,' I charge you that the return is very unsatisfactory and quite indefinite; but under the evidence, and in view of the fact that express notice was given on the day of the sale, I hold that it was sufficient."

To all of which the plaintiff excepted.

The defendant's counsel then requested the court to charge the jury as follows:

1. "That in order to make out a title to land purchased at sheriff's sale, the judgment and execution under which the sale was made must be produced; and in order to prove a judgment obtained under the summary process practice, it was not only necessary to produce the entry of the presiding judge on the docket, but the original entry of the decree in the book containing the minutes of the court; and this proof not having been made, the plaintiff has not made out his title, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendants."

Upon this request the judge charged as follows: "Such, gentlemen of the jury, is the ordinary rule and requirement of law; but in this case there was sufficient evidence of the judgment upon which the execution was issued to sustain the sale therein and the title of the purchaser."

2. "That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the execution in the case of Sarah R. Watt v. John C. Rowe was never returned by the sheriff to the clerk for renewal or otherwise, the subsequent proceedings for the renewal of the said execution were irregular and void; and the sale made under the renewal execution in said case, of the defendant's homestead, was therefore void, and the jury should find for the defendant."

Upon this request the court charged as follows: "That proposition embraces a correct rule of practice; but the fact that *the return of the execution to the clerk's office may be proved by evidence other than an endorsement on the execution, the proceedings for the renewal of the execution and the entries upon the dockets and minutes of the court raise the presumption that it was returned to the clerk's office before the second execution was issued."

*359

Defendant's counsel excepted to the charge of the court as to each of these requests.

Verdict for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. W. J. DeTreville and S. Dibble, for appellant.

Mr. J. F. Izlar, contra.

Plaintiff must recover on strength of his own title. 1 Tread. 99. The judgment is a part of the title. 1 McM. 377; 1 N. & McC. 468; 2 Ib. 417. A decree in summary process may be shown only from the entry in the minutes of the clerk. 1 McM. 493; 2 Mills' Const. R. 247; 2 Spears 311.

There could be no proceedings to waive the Watt judgment until the original fi. fa. was returned to the clerk's office.

The homestead in this case was set off under act of 1868. 14 Stat. 19. No complaint was then made, although the present plaintiff was then a judgment creditor of Rowe. Being set off, and the assignment returned for record, the homestead cannot be subjected to further proceedings until so permitted by the court under whose process it was set off. 46 N. H. 363; 12 Ohio 431; 5 S. C. 75. It was a judgment, and must stand. Thomp. on Home., § 667 and notes. The judgment creditor is estopped. 54 N. H. 128. So are all judgment creditors then holding liens.

As a judgment, it is binding upon all who could have resisted it. Herm. on Estoppel 165; 1 Johns. Ch. 436; 2 Spear. 620; 2 Rich. 560; 13 Iowa 549; 14 Ib. 320; 7 S. C. 148, 172. The plaintiff here was then a judgment creditor; and therefore he is bound.

The right of homestead is a good defence in ejectment. Thomp. on Home., § 686.

*360

*April 20th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. On January 30th, 1869, Sarah Watt obtained judgment in the Summary Process jurisdiction of the court for Orangeburg county against John C. Rowe on a cause of action arising on a contract made before the adoption of the constitution of 1868. Under this decree execution was issued, which subsequently lost its active energy and was renewed by scire facias by order of Judge Reed, October 18th, 1876. A second execution was issued thereon under which the plaintiff levied upon a tract of land of five hundred acres on "Snake Swamp," fifteen miles from Orangeburg, as the property of Rowe, the defendant in execution, and had the same sold by the sheriff. At this sale the land was purchased by Norman A. Bull, the appellant, who received sheriff's title for the same, and he brings this action to recover the land from the said Rowe and his tenants in possession.

At this sheriff's sale Rowe had public notice given that he claimed the land as his "homestead" which had been assigned to him under the constitution and laws of this state. In the trial of the case that was his principal defence and the following facts were disclosed:

There were other judgments in the sheriff's office against Rowe, but it will not be necessary to refer to more than three of them. That J. M. Copes for $501.91, entered February 13th, 1867, and that of F. M. Rogers for $2812.31, by confession, and entered March 20th, 1867, and that of Case & Bull for $322.72, entered March 22d, 1867. The execution of Copes was levied, and on January 27th, 1869, three days before Sarah Watt obtained her decree, appraisers, appointed for the purpose, signed the paper which is printed in the brief, setting off to Rowe, as his homestead, the five hundred acres of land now sued for. The return was not marked, filed or recorded until March 12th, 1877, and had, probably, been in the record in the case of Copes for most of the intervening time. When it was placed on the record does not appear. Briggs, who was sheriff at the time, says: "I kept it for a while, and then I think I returned it to the sheriff's office for recording." The land assigned as homestead was not sold at that time (afterwards, *as above-stated,) but the remainder of his lands were sold and applied to executions according to their priorities, and for what remained unpaid, the executions were returned "nulla bona." Livingston, who was sheriff when the five hundred acres were sold in 1877, also applied the proceeds to executions in his office according to their priorities. That of Case & Bull received its "pro rata," but it does not appear that the proceeds of either sale reached the case of Sarah Watt.

*361

Upon these facts the case was submitted to the jury, who, under the direction of the judge, found a verdict for the defendant. The judge was requested by the counsel on both sides to charge certain propositions of law, which he did, and the case comes up on exceptions to his rulings.

We will first dispose of the exceptions of the defendant. His first exception was, "that in order to make out a title to land purchased at sheriff's sale, the judgment and execution under which the sale was made must be produced; and in order to prove a judgment obtained under summary process, it was not only necessary to produce the entry of the presiding judge on the docket, but the original entry of the decree in the book containing the minutes of the court; and this proof not having been made, the plaintiff has not made out his title and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant." Upon which the judge charged "that in this case there was sufficient evidence of the judgment upon which the execution issued to sustain the sale."

We find no error in this charge. No separate judgment could be produced for the reason that the decree was rendered in a Summary Process, in which no formal judgment was required by law. The original entry of the decree on the docket in the handwriting of the judge who rendered it, and the fact that the execution had been renewed against the defendant without objection, was sufficient. Douglass v. Owens, 5 Rich. 534.

Defendant's second exception was "that if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the execution in the case of Sarah R. Watt v. John C. Rowe was never returned by the sheriff to the clerk for renewal or otherwise, the subsequent proceedings for the renewal of the said execution were irregular and void; and the sale made under the renewed execution in said case of the *defendant's homestead was therefore, void, and the jury should find for the defendant." We find no error here. The defendant was estopped by the proceedings for the renewal of the execution. Herman's Law of Estoppel 191; Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C. 197.

*362

That brings us to the defence of Rowe and the exceptions of the plaintiff. These may be considered as condensed into the third and fifth. The third exception is "that the constitutional provisions and the statutes of this state as to homestead are void as to contracts pre-existing before April 15th, 1868." The fifth exception is, "that the lapse of time and laches of plaintiff cannot operate to make that valid which was void ab initio."

Several cases involving the same or kindred questions are now before the court, and for that reason, and because we are desirous of supporting the provision for homestead, especially as to old debts, if it can be done properly, we have considered this case with care and have gone more fully into the reasons for the opinion than otherwise would have been necessary.

The homestead exemption is of modern origin and exclusively American. Most of the states of the Union have adopted homestead laws since 1839, when Texas, then a young republic inviting settlement, led the way. These laws in no two states are in all respects the same. The difference in these enactments has produced want of symmetry in the decisions, but the leading idea in most of them is that the right of homestead in the debtor is neither a lien, encumbrance nor an estate, but a negation of the ordinary remedies of the creditors as to certain property for certain purposes—an "exemption," dealing merely with the means of enforcing the contract and leaving the title of the property untouched.

Several irregularities were alleged against the claim of the homestead in this case, growing out of the details of this proceeding; as, for instance, that the land assigned was not "the family homestead of the defendant," who never lived on it, but miles away at Orangeburg; that "the return" of the appraisers is without plat or metes and bounds, and is too vague; that it was never "returned for record" until the levy under which the land was sold by the sheriff, &c.; but we do not think it neces*sary to consider these points and give no judgment upon them. The main question is, whether the plaintiff is barred of his recovery of the land sued for by the homestead claim of the defendant.

*363

The plaintiff purchased under the execution of Sarah Watt, and the sheriff's deed conveyed to him all her rights. In this action for the land the inquiry is narrowed down to the simple question, whether Sarah Watt was barred by the assignment, either under the law at the time of the assignment, or by lapse of time, or by any subsequent acts of her own up to the day of sale. We will endeavor to keep these points from running into each other, and consider first the rights of the parties as they stood under the law on the day of assignment, reserving for consideration hereafter the alleged effect of the acts of the plaintiff in execution.

The constitution (Art. II, § 32,) declares "the family homestead of the head of each family residing in this state, such homestead consisting of dwelling-house, out buildings, and lands appurtenant, not to exceed the value of $1000, and yearly product thereof, shall be exempt from attachment, levy or sale, on any mesne or final process issued from any court. * * * Provided, that no property shall be exempt from attachment, levy or sale for the payment of obligations contracted for the purchase of said homestead or the erection of improvements thereon. * * * It shall be the duty of the general assembly, at their first session, to enforce the provisions of this section by suitable legislation."

In 1868 the general assembly passed "An act to determine and perpetuate the homestead," which provided that "the sheriff or other officer executing said process shall cause a homestead, such as said person may select, not to exceed the value of $1000, to be set off to said person in the manner following, to wit: He shall cause three appraisers to be appointed, one to be named by the creditor, one by the debtor, and one by himself, who shall be discreet and disinterested men, resident in the county, and shall be sworn by a justice of the peace to impartially appraise and set off by metes and bounds a homestead of the estate of the debtor, such as he may select, not to exceed the value of $1000; *and the said appraisers shall proceed accordingly to set out the homestead, and the set-off and the assignment so made by the appraisers shall be returned by the officer along with said process for record in court; and if no complaint shall be made by either party, no further proceedings shall be had against the homestead, but the residue of the lands and tenements of the head of the family, if any more or other he shall have, shall be liable to attachment, levy and sale; provided, that upon good cause shown, the court, out of which the process issued, may order a re-appraisement and re-assignment of the homestead, either by the same appraisers or others appointed by the court; and provided further, that should the creditors or debtor neglect or refuse, after due notice from the officer executing the process, to nominate an appraiser, the said officer shall appoint the same." 14 Stat. 19.

*364

In 1869 the general assembly passed "An act to punish sheriffs and other officers for violating the homestead." 14 Stat. 172.

In 1872 was passed the "Act to reduce all acts and parts of acts to determine and perpetuate the homestead into one act, and to amend the same," which, as to the manner of laying off homestead, changes the law of 1868 only in allowing for complaint "thirty days after return for a record in court." 15 Stat. 229.

In 1873 was passed an "Act to revise and amend the homestead law," which substantially re-enacted the act of 1872 as to the manner of laying off homestead, only adding that the return should be made by the appraisers "within ten days after the assignment and set-off is made." 15 Stat. 369.

These are the provisions of our constitution and laws upon the subject of homestead. They were firmly enforced according to their terms by this court, as appears from the cases In re Kennedy, 2 S. C. 216, and Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 229. But in December, 1872, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610 [21 L. Ed. 212], held that so much of the constitution of the State of Georgia as gave a homestead exemption against debts in existence at the time of its adoption, was void. The judgment declares that the legal remedies for "the enforcement of a contract which belong to it at the time and place where it is made, are a part of its obligation. A state may *change them, provided the change involves no impairment of a substantial right. If the provision of the constitution or the legislative act of a state fall within the category last-mentioned, they are to that extent utterly void. They are for all the purposes of the contract which they impair as if they had never existed."

*365

This is undoubtedly the law, and our courts, conforming their decisions to the principles announced in that case, have decided that so much of our constitution and laws as purport to allow a homestead against a debt older than the constitution, are in violation of the constitution of the United States and void. Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125; Ex parte Hewett, 5 S. C. 409.

This created a new state of affairs, and the difficult duty is devolved upon the court of deciding the rights of parties according to principles not in the minds of those who made the laws, and which, of course, contain no provision applicable to the case.

Although it was not known at the time Rowe's homestead was set off in 1869, the same principles were applicable then which have been since declared. If the question of assigning the homestead in this case were before us to-day, it is clear that it could not be allowed. De La Howe v. Harper, 5 S. C. 470. In conformity with these latter cases and the principle on which they are founded, we are bound to interpret the constitution and laws as if the provision for allowing homestead exemption against debts then in existence were spunged out, and in place thereof another exception embracing such debts were added to the proviso, which declares "that no property shall be exempt from levy and sale for taxes, or for payment of obligations contracted for the purchase of said homestead," &c. Judge Cooley lays it down in his Constitutional Limitations, p. 188, "that if an act is unconstitutional in part, it is to be construed as if the unconstitutional part were expressly excepted." We are therefore constrained to hold that the assignment of homestead to Rowe in 1869 was unauthorized as to the debt of Sarah Watt, which must be considered as excepted and beyond the jurisdiction to assign homestead, and such assignment as to her debt was absolutely void.

If the assignment as to the debt of Sarah

*366

Watt was void on *the day it was made, were the relative rights of the parties different the next day or the next month? Did the fact of assignment itself, apart from any alleged effect of acquiescence on her part, in any way change those rights? The circumstances of the case may suggest some vague idea of res adjudicata. As the debtor has the right to but one homestead while he may have many debts, and as it would be unreasonable to require him to have his homestead laid off as many times as he has his creditors, an impression is apt to arise that the assignment is, in some way, a proceeding in rem, or of administration, and that, when made, it must be regarded as done once for all, and that every creditor is somehow bound thereby. The principles of res adjudicata are very extensive and effective. The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction embraces all parties, whether they choose to be heard or not, and is conclusive until reversed on appeal, whether the decision be right or wrong. But it pre-supposes a tribunal and jurisdiction of the subject matter, and it is indispensable that there should be parties notified who have the right to be heard. No element of the principle of res adjudicata appears in this proceeding. Sarah Watt had not obtained judgment when the assignment was made, and she was not before the persons who assigned the homestead. The act of 1868 provides no tribunal to decide the question of right of homestead, for the obvious reason that, according to the view upon which the act proceeded, there was no right to decide. The exemption was allowed against all claims whatever, except for taxes and the purchase money of the homestead, and as to these it did provide the means to decide the right in the section which requires the court to certify thereon the consideration for which it was rendered. We suppose that no homestead could stand which was assigned against a process which had endorsed on it the certificate that the consideration was for the purchase money of the homestead. The process of Sarah Watt had not on it the judicial certificate that her debt originated before the constitution—only for the reason that the law, proceeding on another view, had made no provision for that case. We think that a careful reading of the act will show that it never contemplated any such issue; it provides no tribunal, no judge, for no case and no notice *to the parties. We are not informed whether the practice is to notify other judgment creditors. It is not necessary that any one should know of the assignment but the levying creditor, the sheriff and the appraisers, who are commanded to do certain acts specifically prescribed. The act does direct that the assignment shall be "returned for record in court, and if no complaint shall be made by either party, no further proceeding shall be had against the homestead." This manifestly means the parties to the proceeding, viz., the acting creditor and the claimant, for the words are "either party," and the proviso is, "that upon good cause shown, the court, out of which the process issued, may order a re-appraisement and re-assignment of the homestead, either by the same appraisers or others appointed by the court." Complaint could reach no further than that. The act cannot fairly be construed to provide a means for the determination of rights which, by its terms, did not exist—the right in question was declared after the act was passed and in direct opposition to its terms, spirit and intent. The question of right was never submitted to a tribunal before which Sarah Watt was a party, in such a way as to impose upon her the consequences of failing to appear, or the duty of lodging a "complaint" for the purpose merely of a "re-assignment." The assignment was not recorded; it was only found after a search filed in the clerk's office with the records. We are obliged to say Sarah Watt's rights were never adjudicated, and she should not be bound by the ex parte ministerial proceedings under which Rowe's homestead was laid off, which did not and could not embrace her debt. No person can be made a party in a case except by process of law or by his own consent. Story's Eq. Pl., § 207–8; Marshall v. Drayton, 2 N. & McC. 26; Williams v. Von Valkenburg, 16 How. Pr. 144; Buckly v. Buckly, 6 Abb. 307; Booden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. 220; Sollee v. Croft, 7 Rich. Eq. 43.

*367

The law upon this subject is condensed by "Thompson on Homestead and Exemptions," Section 230, as follows: "It is scarcely necessary to state, as a general rule, that a dedication of homestead, in whatever form, does not have the effect of withdrawing it from liability on account of any pre-existing debt, liens, conveyances or charges which otherwise would have bound *the land;" and again, Section 291: "Every debt created by contract prior to the passage of any homestead or exemption law, is privileged from the operation of such law. To this rule, as the writer understands it, the court can now admit no exceptions." It is said in Newton v. Summey, 59 Ga. 399: "It has been often ruled by this court, in effect, that in the assignment of a homestead there is no magic by which superior liens can be thrown off or deficient titles made perfect. Those whose claims outrank the constitution, may stay out of the Ordinary's Court, and nothing there done will be in their way." [In Georgia, homestead is assigned in Ordinary's Court.]

*368

After the assignment there may be a presumption that it is valid. This, however, does not make it "voidable," good until set aside by a direct proceeding for that purpose, but good until the important fact is shown. As soon as it appears that there was a privileged debt, the "prima facie" is removed, and the whole proceeding quo ad hoc is void. This fact may appear in any proceeding, direct or collateral, for what is absolutely void may be disregarded as nullity whenever and wherever it is encountered. Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strob. 1; Singleterry v. Carter, 1 Bail. 467 [21 Am. Dec. 480]; Williamson v. Farrow, 1 Bail. 611 [21 Am. Dec. 492]; Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet. 169 [7 L. Ed. 381]; 1 Tidd's Pr. 937.

We see no reason why Bull, the purchaser, may not maintain his direct action for the land. Our court has held that when the assignment of homestead has not been "returned for record in court," under the act of 1868, it is not exempt from levy and sale, and the purchaser at sheriff's sale may disregard it and recover the land from the defendant in execution notwithstanding his claim of homestead. Ryan v. Pettigrew, 7 S. C. 146; Choice v. Charles, 7 S. C. 171. This case is much stronger, for here, as to this creditor, the whole proceeding is void.

It may seem that this view is in conflict with the case of McKeown v. Carrol, 5 S. C. 75, but if that case is carefully examined it will be found that the point decided is not inconsistent with what is here declared to be the law. In that case the creditor had a judgment older than the constitution. Homestead was allowed and he did not complain but levied and sold what he assumed to be the remainder in the property assigned as *homestead. At that sale McKeown purchased and took sheriff's deed, reciting the homestead, sale of the remainder and purchase by him. Claiming to be remainderman under this deed, he instituted proceedings against those in possession for an order to restrain them from committing waste. The application was refused. The purchaser had no higher right than the plaintiff in execution under which homestead had been assigned and which was acknowledged in his deed and title taken subject to it. The case turned upon the force of the word "exempt," and without regard to the doctrine and dicta of the case, the ruling was right; as stated in the judgment of the court, "the plaintiff did not put himself in a proper position to question the nature of the defendant's right of possession."

*369

Assuming that defendant Rowe had no right to homestead as against the debt of Sarah Watt, and that the mere ministerial act of assignment gave no additional rights and was void as to her, does the evidence show that she did or omitted to do anything to bar her right to proceed against the land? The doctrine of estoppel applies to constitutional as well as other rights and to proceedings absolutely void as well as those merely voidable. The assignment as a fact was made. Rowe retained possession of the land assigned while his other property was sold to pay his debts. Sarah Watt was probably aware of this assertion of claim adverse to her right, and she took no step to controvert it from 1869 until 1877. Should this non-action enure to the benefit of the defendant and now estop her or her alienee? The law does not require one to contest for his rights, but if he omits to do so for a certain time, it imposes the penalty, in the form of the statute of limitations, of withholding the means of enforcing them. The statute of limitations is not pleaded and does not apply here. But without reference to the statute, one may undoubtedly waive his rights either by voluntarily yielding them or by doing certain acts which will be held, by force of law, to have that effect.

It is not easy to lay down any general rule as to what acts shall constitute a waiver. That must depend largely upon the circumstances of each particular case. There are, however, principles upon which estoppels proceed. The doctrine is not *shifting and uncertain according to the caprice of the judge, but rests upon well-defined and fixed rules. Thus understood estoppels no longer deserve the epithet of "odious" but are most useful agencies in the administration of justice. As we understand it, estoppel by conduct is where one party has been induced by the conduct of the other to do or forbear doing something which he would not or would have done but for such conduct of the other party. Bigelow on Estoppel 480. The conduct which is claimed to operate as an estoppel must have induced action, the disavowal of which would be inequitable, and which, therefore, the party who holds out the inducements is estopped from disavowing. There is no estoppel without fault to the injury of another. There was, in this case certainly, no intentional waiver on the part of Sarah Watt, for that would imply knowledge of the existence of her right, which she did not have. Was there anything done or omitted which would estop her? Can we say the assignment of homestead or anything connected with it was induced by the conduct of Sarah Watt, either by concealment, silence, non-action, acquiescence or declarations? She did not take any part in the assignment of homestead, for she then did not have judgment. The whole proceedings as to her was "per force." She made no misrepresentations which it is now inequitable to disregard; and so far as we can see, she did not say or do anything in reference to the matter, but was simply silent and inactive. She held no relation of trust to Rowe which made it her duty to speak or act, and she therefore had the right without injury to him and without fraud to be silent and inactive. All that can be said is, that she did not disturb the proceeding for a time, during which Rowe enjoyed the homestead, and of this, certainly, he has no right to complain. This delay was probably induced by ignorance of her rights, and was, therefore, without one of the indispensable ingredients of laches—willful negligence. As was said by Judge McIver, in the case of the State v. Moseley, 10 S. C. 1: "Though that act, having been decided to be unconstitutional, cannot be regarded as ever having had any legal force or effect, yet in questions involving good faith or laches, it may perhaps be worthy of consideration that such a *law was not only spread upon the statute book, but was universally acquiesced in until the question of its constitutionality was decided." But be that as it may, we cannot resist the conclusion that the mere non-action of Sarah Watt for a period short of the time necessary to bar her right to levy and sell was not a waiver of her rights, and should not estop her or the purchaser at sheriff's sale.

*370

*371

There should be a new trial, and it is so ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. 371

(Case No. 856.)

DOUGLASS v. CRAIG.

ARMSTRONG v. CRAIG.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Homestead ⇐7.]

An assignment of homestead under an execution in a case where the debt was contracted before the adoption of the constitution of 1868, is void.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 17 S. C. 12; Fowler v. Wood, 31 S. C. 403, 10 S. E. 93, 5 L. R. A. 721.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[2. Estoppel ⇐56.]

The definition of estoppel in Bull v. Rowe, (7) ante p. 355, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 142; Dec. Dig. ⇐56.]

[3. Estoppel ⇐95.]

Judgments were obtained upon debts contracted before 1868; and the lands of the debtor were levied upon in 1872 in the possession of his administratrix and widow, who claimed a homestead: the homestead was admeasured to her, and the remainder of the lands were sold, and the proceeds applied to the executions in these cases; but the assignment of the homestead was not returned to the clerk's office until 1878, during which interval, these execution creditors were quiescent. Held, that they were not estopped from subjecting this homestead to levy and sale under their executions.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 17 S. C. 13; Myers v. Ham, 20 S. C. 527; Hosford v. Wynn, 26 S. C. 133, 1 S. E. 497.

For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 285–287; Dec. Dig. ⇐95.]

[4. Homestead ⇐200.]

[The fact that a judgment creditor has accepted the proceeds of a sale of all of his debtor's property except a homestead does not estop him from objecting to the validity of the assignment of the homestead, which was void as against his debt.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 376; Dec. Dig. ⇐200.]

Before Aldrich, J., Fairfield, September, 1878.

The two cases are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court. The judgment in the Douglass case was obtained November 4th, 1867, as stated in the opinion, but in the Armstrong case the judgment bears date November 12th, 1869.

*372

*These cases were heard at April Term, 1879, and the cases were ordered to be reargued, special attention being directed to the following questions:

1. Can the lien of a judgment obtained prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1868 be affected by the failure of the party holding such lien to except to any proceedings provided for by the acts of the legislature in reference to the mode of assigning a homestead to the judgment debtor?

2. Are not the acts to be construed as relating only to those cases in which, under the constitution, the judgment debtor is entitled to a homestead as against such judgment?

Mr. W. H. Lyles, for appellant.

Mr. Henry Obear, contra.

First question—Cited Bigelow on Estoppel, 500, 578; 46 N. Y. 354; 3 Johns. Ch. 416; Sedg. on Const. & Stat. Law, 111; Cooley on Const. Lim. 181; 74 N. Y. 386; 46 N. H. 363; Thomp. on Home., § 711.

Second question—3 Pet. 411; Story's Const. 256; 26 Wend. 42.

April 20th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. Some time previous to November, 1867, J. F. Craig died intestate, leaving a widow, Harriet C. Craig, who administered upon the estate and continued to reside upon the lands of her deceased husband. It does not appear that the intestate died insolvent, but we assume that he did, for the two cases named in the caption were sued on obligations of the intestate and judgment recovered against the respondent as administratrix, November 4th, 1867. February 8th, 1872, the sheriff of Fairfield county levied upon a tract of land of eight hundred and forty-eight acres as the property of the deceased intestate at the suit of "Margaret Armstrong and others." The respondent claimed "homestead" out of her husband's lands so levied, and March 22d, 1872, the appraisers (how appointed does not appear) made a sworn statement that they had "set aside a homestead from the real estate of J. F. Craig, deceased—*the house and two hundred and fifty acres of land adjoining," &c.—which paper is marked by the clerk as "filed and recorded April 10th, 1878." Soon after the said paper was signed, viz., March 4th, 1872, the sheriff, leaving unsold two hundred and fifty acres assigned as homestead, sold the remainder of the lands and the proceeds were distributed among the judgment creditors according to their priorities, including the two cases herein named of William Douglass and Margaret Armstrong.

*373

June 24th, 1878, proceedings were commenced in the case of Douglass by service on the sheriff of notice that he would be ruled to show cause why he would not make the money on the execution of plaintiff. The sheriff answered that there was no other property of the deceased debtor out of which he could make the money but the land which had been assigned for a homestead as above-stated, and that he could not, under pain of criminal proceedings, levy and sell that.

July 7th, 1878, the plaintiff, in the case of Harriet Armstrong, second above-stated, served upon the respondents "exceptions to the assignment of homestead." The motions in both cases were heard together upon the merits. The Circuit judge sustained the assignment of homestead, discharged the rule against the sheriff in the first case, and in the second overruled "the exceptions to the assignment of homestead," and from that ruling the judgment creditors appealed to this court.

This court, at the present term, has decided that the assignment of a homestead as against a debt contracted before the adoption of the constitution is without authority and void "ab initio," and such assignment may be disregarded whenever that fact appears in any proceeding, direct or otherwise. Bull v. Rowe, ante p. 355; Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strob. 1; Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet. 169 [7 L. Ed. 381].

The case of Hill v. Robertson was an action for land which had been sold by order of the judge of Probate under petition of guardian of plaintiff, who after he came of age, sued for the land and recovered it. Judge Evans, in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "It would be a waste of words to attempt to prove the proceedings of a court of limited jurisdiction in a case clearly without its jurisdiction, are absolutely void *and may be so declared wherever the question is presented, whether directly or collaterally."

*374

In the case of Thompson v. Tolmie, the court says: "We agree that if the court had jurisdiction it has a right to decide every question that occurs in the cause, and whether its decision be correct or not, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding in every court. But if it acts without authority, its judgment and orders are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable but simply void, and form no bar to a recovery sought in opposition to them even prior to a reversal."

The intestate debtor, J. F. Craig, died before the constitution allowing homestead was adopted, and therefore it is clear that all his debts were in existence at that time, that his widow was not entitled to homestead, Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125, and the assignment of homestead to her was simply void.

But it is earnestly argued that the plaintiffs in both the cases under consideration are estopped by their own acts from now moving to set aside this homestead exemption. It is said that under the executions the respondent applied for and had homestead assigned to her; that their execution creditors were parties to the proceeding and they did not appeal, but accepted their "pro rata" of the proceeds of the other lands sold, and acquiesced for six years—from 1872 to 1879. All the parties at the time were ignorant of the true state of the law. According to the terms of the constitution and our decided cases, the respondent seemed to be entitled to the homestead, but it now appears that she was not so entitled. What effect should the conduct of the parties under these circumstances have upon their rights respectively? It is a new case and not free from difficulty; but, however painful it may be, the law, as we understand it, must be declared. The statute of limitations is not pleaded and manifestly has no application to the case. By the law of that time, the judgments had a lien for twenty years. The plea of "res adjudicata" cannot prevail, for several reasons, but it is only necessary to state that the whole proceedings were without jurisdiction and void.

We are unable to discover in the conduct of these execution creditors any element of the principle of estoppel. As was said *in the case of Bull v. Rowe: "An estoppel is where one party has been induced by the conduct of another party to do or forbear doing something, which he would not or would have done but for such conduct of the other party." Such conduct must have induced action which it would be inequitable to disavow and which the party holding out such inducements will be estopped from disavowing. No estoppel will be declared without fault to the injury of another. The plaintiffs had liens upon the property before the constitution allowing homestead was adopted. We cannot perceive on their part either concealment, guilty silence or misrepresentations, but simply non-action and delay without fraudulent intent. But it is said that the plaintiffs accepted their "pro rata" of the proceeds of sale of the other property, based on the allowance of homestead. That is true, but that did not necessarily involve assent to the homestead. They had a right to what they got and more besides. They accepted no benefit under the unconstitutional act, but were deprived by it of what they had a right to claim. To accept half their right does not imply an abandonment of the other half. This case is not analogous to that of Clay v. Smith, 3 Pet. 412 [7 L. Ed. 723], where a citizen of Kentucky, not bound by an insolvent law of Louisiana, voluntarily came in and received a dividend under the state law; or to the case of Van Hook v. Whitlock, 26 Wend. 42, where a creditor of a corporation before the passage of an unconstitutional act authorizing the corporation to make an assignment in discharge of their liabilities voluntarily came in and accepted a dividend under such assignment. In these cases what was received was the fruits of the unconstitutional act. Not so here. The plaintiffs received nothing but what they would have received if homestead had not been assigned, and they received nothing under that proceeding, but entirely outside of it.

*375

It has been further urged for the respondent that the right to homestead involves the question of title to lands and cannot be decided without a jury and regular sworn testimony upon a mere rule upon the plaintiffs. We have held at the present term, in the case of Charles v. Charles, post No. 859, that the right of homestead is a *mere "exemption from levy or sale," and as the sheriff is the officer appointed by the law to levy and sell property under execution, that the legal question of right to homestead may be made upon rule on the sheriff to levy and sell the property claimed as homestead. The court will not hear upon rule a case which is complex and involves conflicting testimony; but where the facts are simple or admitted, or the question is one of law as to the duty of the sheriff himself, we see no reason why it may not be heard upon rule.

*376

The order of the Circuit judge is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings according to the principles herein announced.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 376

(Case No. 857.)

CARRIGAN v. BOZEMAN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Homestead ⟸7.]

The assignment of homestead as against a debt contracted before the adoption of the constitution of 1868, is without authority and void, and may be disregarded as a nullity whenever that fact appears in any proceeding direct or collateral. Bull v. Rowe, ante p. 355.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⟸7.]

[2. Homestead ⟸200.]

A debtor having had assigned to him a homestead which was invalid as against a certain judgment under which it was afterwards sold, the purchaser is not estopped from denying the validity as to him of the homestead assignment, because, that in his deed from the sheriff, the property is described as "the land set off to defendant as a homestead."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 376; Dec. Dig. ⟸200.]

[3. Trial ⟸136.]

Where only questions of law are involved, the judge may direct a verdict.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hillhouse v. Jennings, 60 S. C. 401, 38 S. E. 596.

For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 318, 320, 321, 323–327; Dec. Dig. ⟸136.]

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, March, 1879.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. R. K. Charles, for appellant.

Mr. J. J. Ward, contra.

*377

*April 20th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. Berryman W. Edwards, administrator, recovered judgment against Jesse Bozeman, November 14th, 1868, upon a cause of action bearing date March, 1862, under which the sheriff of Darlington, in February, 1877, sold a tract of land of the defendant Bozeman. At that sale the plaintiff, W. A. Carrigan, purchased the land and received sheriff's title, which described the land as "as all that tract of land set off to defendant as a homestead, containing three hundred and forty acres, more or less." This action was brought by him as purchaser at sheriff's sale to recover the land from Bozeman, who made defence that the land had been assigned to him as a homestead in 1869, under a levy in the case of "A. Smoot and others." It appeared that the paper or warrant authorizing the assignment of homestead and appointing appraisers for that purpose, was not signed by Sheriff Cox himself, but by the clerk in his name, and that the return of the appraisers remained in the sheriff's office from the time of its execution until some time after the sale, when the sheriff was requested by defendant's attorney to return it with the execution for record in court. The judge charged the jury that the assignment of homestead was not perfected according to law; that if they believed that the signature of the sheriff had not been made by himself or his deputy, but by a clerk in his office; that it had no witness and that the paper had not been recorded, that of itself would avoid the homestead. He instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff, and the verdict being so returned the appeal comes to this court upon several grounds:

First. That the homestead was properly assigned and set off.

Second. That plaintiff in execution waived his right to object to the assignment of homestead by acquiescence and participation therein.

Third. That no questions were left to the jury, although there were questions of fact in the case.

Fourth. That plaintiff is estopped from asserting that no homestead was laid off to defendant.

We have, at the present term of this court, in the case of Bull v. Rowe, ante p. 355, decided that "the assignment of homestead *as against a debt contracted before the adoption of the constitution, is without authority and void, and that such assignments as to such debt may be disregarded as a nullity whenever that fact appears in any proceeding, direct or collateral." That disposes of the first and second exceptions.

*378

The sheriff's deed to the plaintiff describes the land as "all that tract of land set off to defendant as homestead, containing three hundred and forty acres, more or less." This does not amount to an estoppel of the plaintiff. It is the statement of the sheriff, and cannot be properly construed to be the conclusive admission of the donee Carrigan. He had no connection with Bozeman or his claim of homestead until he purchased at sheriff's sale, and that purchase itself negatives the idea that at the same moment he admitted that he purchased nothing.

Besides, it might be true, as matter of fact, that the land had been "set off to defendant as homestead" as against other debts, and yet be no homestead as to the execution of Edwards, under which Carrigan purchased. Even if the land had been "set off to defendant as homestead," that did not necessarily involve the admission—in contradiction to the very act of purchasing, and against the law as it is now declared—that it was a legal and valid homestead, and as such a bar to his rights, secured to him by that very deed. The expression in the deed was not intended to be more than a description of the property conveyed.

Under the view which this court takes, that the assignment of homestead, as to the execution of Edwards, under which the land was sold, was utterly void, there was in the case nothing but questions of law, and we find no error in the charge of the judge instructing the jury to find for the plaintiff.

The appeal is dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *379

*(Case No. 858.)

BEATTIE v. POOL.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Limitation of Actions ⟸100.]

An action by a creditor to set aside as fraudulent a confession of judgment made by his debtor, is not barred by the statute of limitations, where the creditor for the statutory period has not had notice of facts which go to make up a fraud, but only a suspicion that there was something wrong about it.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 45; Richardson v. Mounce, 19 S. C. 482; Harrell v. Kea, 37 S. C. 375, 16 S. E. 42; Garvin v. Garvin, 40 S. C. 443, 19 S. E. 79; Smith v. Linder, 77 S. C. 541, 58 S. E. 610.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 480; Dec. Dig. ⟸100.]

[2. Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸30.]

A judgment confessed for the purpose of defeating other creditors, is fraudulent and void as to them, although based upon a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McSween v. McCown, 23 S. C. 353.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 73; Dec. Dig. ⟸30.]

Before Fraser, J., Greenville, April, 1879.

The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

This case was heard by me at the regular term of the Court of Common Pleas for Greenville county, held by me in April, 1879.

Certain issues of fact involved in the case were submitted to a jury who failed to agree on a verdict.

The case was then, without objection from either side, heard by the court—the evidence submitted to the jury being taken without objection on the trial before the presiding judge.

There was much conflicting testimony. I find, however, that the weight of the evidence is in favor of the following state of facts: On November 11th, 1856, John P. Pool, one of the defendants, gave his note to Amelia Hudson for $1020, with Jordan P. Pool and Peter Cauble as sureties, the consideration of which was slaves. This note was under seal. On this note suit was commenced against all three makers, September 13th, 1866, and the case stood for trial on the issue docket, March 25th, 1867—suit in the name of Esli W. Hudson, administrator. On March 23d, 1867, two days before a trial could have been brought on on the above-described note, a confession of judgment was made by John P. Pool, one of the defendants, to James H. Pool, his son, the other defendant, for the sum of $2000, and interest from March 1st, 1861, and costs. This judgment was founded *on a note dated March 1st, 1861, for $2000, given by John P. Pool to James H. Pool. Some time after this confession of judgment, the first case above-mentioned was "stricken" from the docket, in accordance with a practice which then prevailed in the courts of the Eighth Circuit, in contracts for the purchase of slaves.

*380

Esli W. Hudson died and was succeeded in the administration of Amelia Hudson's estate by Hamlin Beattie, plaintiff in this case. Hamlin Beattie, as administrator de bonis non, commenced suit again on the note for $1020, on May 9th, 1874, and obtained judgment for $1679.25 and costs, on June 16th, 1874.

Proceedings were commenced to set aside the confession of John P. Pool to James H. Pool, May 14th, 1875, and either by non-suit or discontinuance came to an end without a trial, February 3d, 1877.

On April 3d, 1877, the tract of land described in the proceedings was sold under the judgment of James H. Pool v. John P. Pool, was bid off by and conveyed by the sheriff to James H. Pool.

This action was commenced February 26th, 1878. The costs of the first action having been paid since the commencement of this, it was held that this case could proceed.

The complaint charges fraud in the note and confession of judgment made thereon. The answers deny the fraud and plead the statute of limitations. It is unfortunate that this note could not be produced on the trial: and it would have been better if the incapacity of John P. Pool for coming to court and giving his testimony had been more clearly established.

The consideration of the note for $2000 was as follows: James H. Pool, then a minor, had, for some years, been allowed by his father to use his wood ready cut, his servant, his carts, oxen and mules in hauling wood for sale, and appropriate the money thus collected to the amount of $600 to his own use: to this amount was added $1400, the proceeds of jeans woven and sold, eggs and butter sold, the materials and labor used being all the property of the father—there being no evidence of any trust deed or other special circumstance which prevented the marital rights from attaching. These facts are accepted because they are sworn to, *and there is no conflicting testimony and the witnesses not impeached, and are, therefore, found to be true.

*381

Four of the witnesses testify that James H. Pool said on several occasions that the judgment confessed by his father was a fraud, and two of them say that he mentioned the debt set up by the plaintiff in this case as the debt the judgment was intended to "defeat;" and one of them says that he was requested to say nothing about what had been said to him about it. The testimony of these witnesses, together with the fact that the confession of judgment was made while another suit was pending, and the creditor kept at bay by litigation, (which was not renewed on the second suit,) lead me to accept it as a fact that the confession of judgment was made for the purpose of defeating the bona fide creditors of John P. Pool.

The testimony of Mr. Wells does not go any further than to show that Esli W. Hudson had anything more than a suspicion that there was something wrong about the judgment of John P. Pool to James H. Pool.

There is no evidence that he had any notice of facts which go to make up a case of fraud. Shannon v. White, 6 Rich. Eq. 101 [60 Am. Dec. 115].

It is held that there is no sufficient evidence of such notice to sustain the plea of the statute of limitations.

That even admitting that the note was based on a sufficient consideration to make it a valid debt, so far as the rights of other creditors are concerned, the intent to use even such a debt to defeat other creditors, makes the confession of judgment fraudulent and void as to them. Hipp v. Sawyer, Rich. Eq. Cas. 417; Richardson v. Rhodus, 14 Rich. 100.

The allegation of insolvency in the sixth clause of the complaint, and the failure to deny it in the answer, make it sufficient to establish the insolvency of John P. Pool, and that the individual and security debts stand, so far as this case is concerned, on the same footing.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the tract of land mentioned in the complaint be sold by the master, &c.

Defendants appealed.

*382

*Messrs. J. P. Moore and Earle & Wells, for appellant.

Messrs. Perry & Perry and Whitner & Symmes, contra.

April 20th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This action was brought by the plaintiff as administrator de bonis non of Amelia Hudson, deceased, a junior judgment creditor of the defendant John P. Pool, to set aside as fraudulent and void as to creditors a judgment confessed by the said defendant to his co-defendants and son, James H. Pool.

The complaint alleges want of consideration in the note on which the judgment was confessed—charges that the judgment was confessed for the purpose of hindering, delaying or defeating the other creditors of the defendant John P. Pool, and alleges want of notice or knowledge of the fraud until within six years before the commencement of this action.

The defendants' answer denies the fraud, alleges the bona fides of both the note and the confessed judgment, and pleads the statute of limitations.

The Circuit judge, to whom the cause, after a mistrial upon certain issues of fact referred to a jury, was submitted by consent of parties, found as matters of fact—first, that the judgment of John P. Pool to his son James H. Pool, was confessed for the purpose of defeating the bona fide creditors of John P. Pool; and, second, that there was no evidence that Esli W. Hudson, plaintiff's predecessor as administrator, had any notice of facts which go to make up a case of fraud, but that he had a suspicion that something was wrong about the judgment; and upon these findings of fact he overruled the plea of the statute of limitations and set aside the judgment as to the bona fide creditors of John P. Pool.

The defendants appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

"1. It is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in finding, as matter of law, that plaintiff's action was not barred by the statute of limitations.

"2. That his Honor erred in finding, as matter of law, that *the confession of judgment from John P. Pool to James H. Pool was fraudulent as against the creditors of the said John P. Pool.

*383

"3. That his Honor erred in his conclusions of the law, the same not being warranted by the facts as found by him."

There is no exception to the findings of fact, and, therefore, they must be taken to be true. The only question submitted is, whether there is error of law in the Circuit decree, as to which it is insisted—

First. That the plea of the statute of limitations should have been sustained upon the proof that Esli W. Hudson, first administrator, "had no notice of facts which go to make up a fraud, but nothing more than a suspicion that there was something wrong about the judgment of John P. Pool to James H. Pool."

The code of procedure (Gen. Stat. 591, § 114,) provides as follows: "An action for relief on the ground of fraud, in cases which heretofore were solely cognizable by the Court of Chancery, the cause of action in such cases not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud."

The terms of this provision would seem to exclude the idea that the proof in this case was sufficient to put into operation the statute of limitations against the first administrator, Esli W. Hudson, who "had no notice of facts which go to make up a fraud." Although frauds are generally committed in the dark, we have no doubt that in most cases of fraudulent confessions of judgment third persons have their suspicions, but to hold that such suspicions alone amount to a discovery of the fraud, would be to give aid in protecting such frauds; and to exclude that very result seems to have been the purpose in using the terms of the code "until the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud."

This provision of the code is but the embodiment of an equitable principle which has long been recognized in the state. It has been placed upon the ground "that it would be against conscience for a party to avail himself of the statute where, by his own fraud, he has prevented the other party from knowing or asserting his rights within the period prescribed by the statute." This principle is so well settled that it is not necessary to do more than make a general reference to some of the decided cases. *Hudnal v. Teasdall, 1 McC. 228 [10 Am. Dec. 671]; Prescott v. Hubbell, 1 Hill's Eq. 214; Shannon v. White, 6 Rich. Eq. 101 [60 Am. Dec. 115]; Parham v. McCravy, 6 Rich. Eq. 145; McClure v. Ashby, 7 Rich. Eq. 444.

*384

We are satisfied with the statement of the doctrine made by Chancellor Dargan in the case of Shannon v. White: "The ground upon which the court of equity applies the statute of limitations is the laches of the plaintiff, but how can laches be imputed to him who is ignorant of the fraud? * * * On the trial it was incumbent upon the defendants to prove that the plaintiff had notice of the fraud more than four years prior to the filing of the bill. And here it is to be remarked that it would not be sufficient to prove that the plaintiff had a suspicion of the fraud. But it is necessary to bring home to him a knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud. Suppose some one were to tell him that a fraud had been committed? It would not be sufficient unless he were informed of the facts constituting the fraud, or put in possession of a clue by which, with proper diligence, he might come to a knowledge of the facts."

As to the second exception, we see no error in the decree. It is admitted that the judgment was confessed by the father to the son with intent to defeat, delay and hinder other creditors, but it is insisted that it was not fraudulent, because it was based upon what purported to be a valuable consideration. Upon the question of fact, whether a judgment or conveyance was made to defeat and hinder other creditors, many nice distinctions are made as to what is and what is not a badge, and what is and what is not conclusive, of such purpose. But when such intention is proved or admitted, we agree with the Circuit judge, that "even admitting the note was based on a sufficient consideration, the intent to use it to defeat other creditors makes the confession of judgment fraudulent and void as to them." 13 Eliz.; Gen. Stat. 425; Hipp v. Sawyer, Rich. Eq. Cas. 417; Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill 16; Thomas & Ashby v. Jeter & Abney, 1 Hill 380; Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. 324 [23 Am. Dec. 140]; Brown v. McDonald, 1 Hill's Eq. 297; Smith v. Culbertson, 9 Rich. 106; Guignard v. Aldrich, 10 Rich. Eq. 256.

The Circuit decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *385

*(Case No. 859.)

CHARLES v. CHARLES.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Homestead ⇐7.]

The assignment of a homestead is without authority and void as against a debt contracted before the adoption of the constitution of 1868, and may be disregarded whenever that fact appears in any proceeding, direct or collateral. Bull v. Rowe, ante p. 355.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Corry v. Tate, 48 S. C. 552, 26 S. E. 794.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⇐53.]

The right of an administrator to proceed against his debtor's homestead is not affected by his acceptance in his own right of a dividend from the sale of the debtor's land, in excess of the homestead assignment.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 41.

For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 34; Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. ⇐53.]

[3. Judgment ⇐570.]

The right of homestead is not adjudicated by an order discharging a rule which was moved against the sheriff to require him to sell, where the discharge was granted upon the ground that a rule was not the proper proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Carrigan v. Evans, 31 S. C. 265, 9 S. E. 852.

For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1028; Dec. Dig. ⇐570.]

[4. Homestead ⇐207.]

The question of right of homestead may be determined under proceedings by rule against the sheriff.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Douglass v. Craig, 13 S. C. 375; In re Voorhies, 46 S. C. 123, 24 S. E. 170; Corry v. Tate, 48 S. C. 553, 26 S. E. 794.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 388; Dec. Dig. ⇐207.]

5. This case distinguished from Kirby v. Woods, 5 S. C. 4.

Before Fraser, J., April, 1879, and Aldrich, J., July, 1879, Greenville.

This case is stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. E. Earle, for appellant.

Mr. J. P. Moore, contra.

April 20th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. Some time during the late war, (1865,) James O. Charles died, leaving a will, of which his widow, Martha A. Charles is executrix. It does not appear that James O. Charles died insolvent, but we assume that he did, for the appellant was sued and judgments recovered against her as executrix by T. L. Hedrick and W. W. Tarrant & Co. The sheriff of Greenville made a levy, in the case of W. W. Tarrant & Co., upon the lands of the testator. The appellant, as his widow, claimed homestead, and one hundred and twenty-five acres of her late husband's lands were assigned to her as home*stead, and the return of appraisers made May 23d, 1871. The remainder of the land was afterwards sold, April, 1873, and the proceeds distributed among the judgment creditors according to their priorities, the pro rata share of the executions above-named being paid to R. H. Jacobs, who, we infer, had become the owner and assignee thereof.

*386

In the meantime, in March, 1872, after the homestead was assigned as stated, John Charles, as administrator, obtained judgment against Martha A. Charles, as executrix, upon a note given by her testator in 1858. In April, 1872, John Charles was removed as administrator, and R. H. Jacobs appointed administrator de bonis non in his place. In September, 1872, the then acting administrator had the execution levied upon the land set off as homestead to the appellant, but the sheriff refused to sell, and he was twice ruled and each time the rule was discharged. The administrator "de bonis non" then commenced action against the appellant, and obtained a temporary injunction to stay waste, but a demurrer was sustained on the ground that "the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." He then again ruled the sheriff to require him to levy and sell the homestead. Judge Fraser heard the case and made the rule absolute. Notice of appeal was given, but not being prosecuted, another rule upon the sheriff was obtained, being the fourth in the case, which was heard by Judge Aldrich, and again made absolute; and from both these orders the appeal comes to this court.

We have at the present term decided, in the case of Bull v. Rowe, ante p. 355, that the assignment of homestead as against a debt contracted before the adoption of the constitution is without authority and void, and that such assignment may be disregarded as a nullity whenever that fact appears in any proceeding, direct or collateral. The testator of appellant died before the constitution was adopted, and, therefore, it is clear that she was not entitled to homestead in his lands as against any of his debts. The whole proceeding was void, and in such case there can be no res adjudicata. The appraisers have no jurisdiction as to the right of homestead, and judgment in the case of John Charles had not been rendered at the time the assignment was *made. The fact that R. H. Jacobs, in his individual capacity, received in other cases the proceeds of the other property sold outside of the homestead cannot affect the rights of the parties interested in the judgment in this case, which he is controlling as administrator de bonis non. It would seem that there has been no blamable negligence in this case, as this is the fifth effort to make the money. But it is urged that, admitting the assignment of homestead to be utterly void, and that it was error to discharge the first rule, the execution creditor should have appealed, and not having done so, the matter is adjudged, and he could not renew the effort to make the sheriff sell the land. The question was not determined on its merits in such a way as to impose the consequences of not appealing. The rule was discharged upon the ground that a rule was not the proper proceeding. It was like a nonsuit ordered in an action improperly conceived.

*387

We do not see why the question of appellant's right to homestead cannot be decided upon a rule on the sheriff. No question as to the title to property is involved. The right to homestead is not a new estate given by the law, but a negation of the ordinary rights of the creditor as to certain property for certain purposes—an "exemption," dealing merely with the process for enforcing the contract but leaving the title to the property untouched. As the sheriff is the officer appointed by law to levy and sell property under execution, it would seem that the question of "exemption from levy and sale" could be made upon a rule on the sheriff requiring him to do his duty. Indeed, that seems the appropriate way in all cases where the assignment of homestead is absolutely void. The leading case on the subject in the United States Court, Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610 [21 L. Ed. 212], was decided on motion for rule and mandamus, requiring the sheriff of Randolph county, Georgia, to levy and sell the land which had been set off as homestead under the unconstitutional state law. Many of our cases upon the subject have been decided on rule requiring the sheriff to enforce the process. Keller v. Myers, 5 S. C. 11; Cochran v. Darcey, 5 S. C. 125; Garaty & Armstrong v. Du Bose, 5 S. C. 493; De La Howe v. Harper, 5 S. C. 470.

*388

*It is true, that in the case of Kirby v. Woods, 5 S. C. 4, which was a rule upon the sheriff to sell land which had been set off as a homestead, it was held that "under the circumstances set forth in the return the sheriff was not in contempt and the rule was discharged." In that case the merits were not considered. One Kirby recovered a judgment against Woods, as administrator of Hickson, in 1868, upon a debt older than the constitution, and John M. Tindal, sheriff of Sumter, was ruled to sell the land of which Hickson died seized. The sheriff made return that he levied on the land, but that it had been assigned as homestead to Mrs. Hickson; that Kirby had filed objections and "thereupon it was agreed that the residue of the land should not be sold until the right to the homestead exemption had been decided by the court." Before it was decided by the court, he ruled the sheriff for not selling, and the rule was properly discharged. The court say "Kirby should have consummated the proceedings he had initiated. There is not such a willful and culpable disobedience as shows a contempt of the authority under which the process to the sheriff issued, which should subject him to this summary mode of proceeding. The rules which bind the ministerial officers of the court to a strict and proper performance of all duties enjoined by law are not to be relaxed, but at the same time they are not to be so harshly construed as to provoke punishment where it is clear that there is no wrongful disobedience." The court was right in holding Kirby to his agreement, and that is the point of the case.

Very often the object of the rule is not to punish the sheriff, but to enforce a claim of right. Our law imposes penalties upon the sheriff for violating the homestead. It is not his duty to decide conflicting rights, and until the question is decided he is not culpable or in default, and the court will see to it that he is not punished. He is not required to run the risk of punishment, but to do as the sheriff is this case did, give notice to the person claiming homestead and refer the question of his duty to the court, which may decide it, or if necessary, order an issue. Taylor v. Easterling, 1 Rich. 316; Cannady v. Odum & Matheny, 2 Rich. 527; Brown v. Furze, 2 Rich. 531; Thomas v. Aitken, Dud. 293.

*389

*What is here said is not intended to conflict with any of the decided cases in our books, which hold that the court will not in a summary way upon mere rule decide any matter in which there is conflicting testimony, but leave the party to his action. That is a safe rule of practice and necessary for the proper administration of the law, but it has no application where the facts are simple or admitted, or it is a question of law—especially one in reference to the duty of the officer who is ruled in regard to the enforcement of the process of the court.

We agree with the Circuit judge, that in this case "the sheriff stands in the same position that he does in all other cases where he has the process of the court in his hands, and no sufficient excuse for not enforcing the same."

The orders below for making the rule absolute are affirmed, the appeal dismissed and the case remanded for such orders as may be necessary to carry out the principles herein announced.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 389

(Case No. 862.)

STATE v. BRANHAM.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Criminal Law ⇐894.]

An exception in the words "that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence," charges no specific error, and will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Covar v. Sallat, 22 S. C. 270.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2115; Dec. Dig. ⇐894.]

[2. Criminal Law ⇐1032.]

Where an alleged misnomer of the owner's name in an indictment for burglary, has not been objected to in the court below, nor made a ground of appeal, this court cannot consider it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2627, 2628, 2642; Dec. Dig. ⇐1032.]

[3. Indictment and Information ⟸176.]
It is not necessary to prove the precise day or year of the commission of the offence as laid in the indictment, except when time enters into the nature of the offence, or is made a part of the description of it.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Howard, 32 S. C. 94, 10 S. E. 831; State v. Reynolds, 48 S. C. 385, 26 S. E. 679; State v. Green, 61 S. C. 15, 39 S. E. 185; State v. Dewees, 76 S. C. 76, 56 S. E. 674.

For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 548; Dec. Dig. ⟸176.]

[4. Burglary ⟸2.]
The act of 1866 (13 Stat. 405), enlarging the limits within which burglary and arson may be committed, did not repeal burglary at common law; and the act of 1878 (16 Stat. 631), increasing the punishment for burglary at common law, did not repeal the act of 1866, (Gen. Stat., ch. CXXIX., § 32,) nor the common law offence.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Evans, 18 S. C. 139.

For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. ⟸2.]

[5. Criminal Law ⟸519.]
The Circuit judge having permitted evidence of a confession of guilt made by a prisoner to the committing magistrate to go to the jury, this court refused to interfere upon that ground, although the manner of the officer *was rude and his caution to the prisoner not as explicit as it should have been.
*390

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Howard, 32 S. C. 95, 10 S. E. 831; State v. Henderson, 74 S. C. 478, 55 S. E. 117.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1163–1174; Dec. Dig. ⟸519.]

[6. Criminal Law ⟸547.]
Where the confessions of a prisoner made to a trial justice at the preliminary examination are reduced to writing and signed by the prisoner, and such written statement is within reach of the court, it is error to admit parol testimony of the confession.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Jones, 29 S. C. 227, 7 S. E. 296; State v. Winter, 83 S. C. 155, 65 S. E. 209.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1241; Dec. Dig. ⟸547.]

[7. Criminal Law ⟸521.]
[Confessions made at a preliminary examination before a trial justice, who has asked the defendants what they had to say for themselves, and warned them that whatever they said would be taken for or against them, are admissible as evidence.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1186; Dec. Dig. ⟸521.]

[8. Criminal Law ⟸519, 532.]
[Cited in State v. Rogers, 99 S. C. 504, 83 S. E. 971, to the point that a confession must be voluntary, and such question must be first determined by the court, but the jury are the final arbiters of such fact.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1163–1174, 1218; Dec. Dig. ⟸519, 532.]

[This case is also cited in Scurry v. Coleman, 14 S. C. 169, as to the principles governing repeal by implication.]

Before Wallace, J., Richland, July, 1879.

Indictment against Hannibal Branham and March Harris, for burglary. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Allen J. Green, for appellants.

Parol evidence of the confessions were inadmissible, as they had been reduced to writing. Pressley's Law of Mag. 208, 209; Roscoe's Cr. Ev., tit. "Confessions;" 4 C. & P. 548; McNally's Ev. 45; 1 Leach 240, 310; 1 Busbee's (N. C.) R. 239. The confessions, as proved, should not have gone to the jury, the circumstances surrounding them making them inadmissible. Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 38, 50; 1 Leach 263; Whart. Am. Cr. Law, §§ 687, 695; 1 Strob. 155; 12 Eng. L. & E. 583; 2 East P. C. 648. There is fatal variance between time laid and time proved. Before 1866 there was only burglary at common law, which could be committed only in a dwelling-house. 1 N. & McC. 583. The act of 1866 repealed the common law definition, and the punishment of burglary, as thus newly defined, was regulated by act of 1869. 14 Stat. 175. Burglary at common law was then revived by act of 1878, which went into effect May 21st, 1878. Time is thus essential here. Statutory burglary being repealed before trial, and common law burglary not re-enacted until after the offence was committed, the judgment must be arrested. 1 Leach 306; 22 N. Y. 95, 155. The verdict is contrary to law and evidence, of which the court will take notice. 11 S. C. 319; 12 S. C. 89. The misnomer is fatal. 2 Russ. on Cr. 789, 795; 4 Strob. 32. Confession of a prisoner is only evidence against himself. 2 Russ. on Cr. 864. Confessions show that they were only accessories. 2 Bish. on Cr. Proc., § 9; 49 Me. 588; 2 Vr. 65; Gen. Stat. 742, § 2.

*391
*Mr. Solicitor Abney, contra.

April 21st, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. The defendants were convicted upon an indictment for burglary and larceny, at July Term of the court for Richland county, 1879, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary at hard labor for the term of six years. The indictment charged that the offence was committed by taking seventeen pieces of bacon from the smoke-house of Nick C. Joiner, February 9th, 1879. The proof was, that the taking was a year before, February, 1878, and the owner of the property was N. G. Joiner. The defendants were arrested April, 1879, and carried before a trial justice, and a preliminary examination was held at Eastover. One of the witnesses for the state was caught by the trial justice in a "crooked tale," and the trial justice spoke angrily to him and threatened "if he did not stop shenanegan and tell the truth, he would send him right up to jail." Defendants were asked what they had to say for themselves, and were told that "if they desired to make a statement it was their privilege to do so, and they were warned that whatever they said would be taken for them or against them, as it might be." Defendants then made confession, each charging the other and one Tempe Brown, with the crime. Harris said he stopped in a low, wet place and Branham and Tempe Brown went to the smoke-house and brought the meat down to him and he helped to carry it off. [A low wet place is about three hundred and seventy-five yards from the smoke-house. The track of three persons led from the smoke-house to the low, wet place.] Branham said he went with them and stopped under a wagon shed; that Harris and Brown came to him and told him "the house had been dug under," and to come and get the meat. He said he refused to go and they went and got the meat, and that he helped them to carry it off. These statements were reduced to writing by the trial justice, read over to and signed by the respective defendants and the trial justice, which paper was in court. Parol testimony was received to prove the confessions. [Defendants excepted.] Defendants then moved to strike out the confessions, on the ground that they were improperly obtained, which motion was *refused and defendants excepted. No evidence was introduced on the part of the defence.

*392

Defendants made motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, and failing therein appealed to this court on the following grounds:

1. "That the presiding judge erred in receiving parol testimony of the alleged confession of defendants, the rule being when prisoners confess before examining magistrates it is the duty of the latter to take the confessions in writing, and the writing alone is evidence of the confessions, unless it appears that the writing is lost or destroyed.

2. "That his Honor erred in allowing the confessions, the circumstances surrounding the confessions being such as to make them inadmissible.

3. "That there is fatal variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof, in this: the indictment alleges the offence on February 9th, 1879, and the proof is that the offence was committed February 9th, 1878, and the indictment should have so charged.

4. "That the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence."

The last exception, that the verdict is "contrary to the law and the evidence," does not charge any specific error, and, therefore, cannot be considered. The sufficiency of the proof to charge the prisoners as principals was properly addressed to the Circuit judge upon a motion for a new trial. The alleged misnomer as to the owner of the property, Nick C. Joiner for N. G. Joiner, does not appear to have been objected to in the court below, or brought to the attention of the judge, either in the pleadings or orally. No reference is made to it in the grounds of appeal, and the matter is not before this court in such form that we can consider it. The other grounds of appeal will be considered in the inverse order in which they are stated.

As to the variance between the indictment and the proof as to the time the offence was committed. No statute of limitations is in the case, but simply a question of pleading. It is not necessary to prove the precise day or even year laid in the indictment, except where time enters into the nature of the offence, or is made part of the description of it. State v. Anderson, 3 Rich. 176; State v. Porter, 10 Rich. 148.

*393

*But it is ingeniously argued that as there is a time limited in the act of 1878 (16 Stat. 631) to go into effect, to wit, "sixty days from its passage," time becomes essential to an indictment under that act. It does not appear that this indictment is under the act of 1878. It reads, "against the form of the act of the general assembly in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state," &c. But no particular act is referred to, and we conclude that it was not under the act of 1878, for the reason that the punishment under that act is "imprisonment during the life of the prisoner," and these defendants were imprisoned only for "six years." We assume that the indictment was under Section 32, Chapter CXXIX., (Gen. Stat. 720,) being substantially the re-enactment of the act of 1866. If this indictment were under the act of March 22d, 1878, the judgment would have to be arrested, for the reason that the act was not passed until the offence was committed, February 8th, 1878. The criminal law is so tender of the rights of the citizen that it will not allow him to be tried and punished under a law which was not in existence at the time the offence was committed, especially if the subsequent law increases the punishment. That would be unconstitutional because ex post facto.

Accepting this view, it is then argued that the defendants could not be indicted and punished under the aforesaid section of the general statutes, for the reason that the act of 1878, being on the same subject, was a substitute for and a repeal of that law. That the defendants could not be tried and punished under the act of 1878, because it was passed after the offence, nor under the aforesaid section of the general statute, because that was repealed by the act of 1878, and there being no law under which they could be punished, consequently they must go free —as did the defendant convicted for cow-stealing, in the case of State v. Thomas, 14 Rich. 164. We do not think the cases are analogous. In the case of Thomas, as here, the offence was committed before and tried after the change of the law, and there was no authority under which he could be punished, for the reason that it was held that the act of 1866, upon the subject of cow-stealing, operated as a repeal of the act of 1789, upon the same subject. But no such result can happen in this case. The act of 1878 *does not operate as a repeal of so much of the aforesaid section of the statutes as relates to burglary. Nor did the said section repeal the offence of burglary at common law. The act of 1878 does not expressly repeal anything. It contains no repealing clause, but simply increases the punishment of one convicted of "the crime of burglary at common law." That, itself, is an express legislative declaration that the offence of burglary at common law had not been repealed. If the act of 1878 operates as a repeal, it must be by implication. Such repeals are possible, but they are not favored. To have that effect the new law must cover the whole subject exhaustively and be absolutely inconsistent with the old law. Acts upon the same subject, which can stand together, are construed in pari materia. If they are consistent, they both stand—the last as an amendment. If part is consistent and part not, the repeal only operates upon the inconsistent part. State v. Major, 14 Rich. 76; State v. Alexander, Ib. 247; Goddard v. Boston, 20 Pick. 407; State v. Corley, ante p. 1.

*394

The act of 1866, re-enacted in the general statutes, shows, by its terms, that it is not inconsistent with burglary at common law, but, on the contrary, assuming its existence, is based upon it and only supplements it by enlarging the field within which an analogous statutory offence could be committed. The terms are: "With respect to the crimes of burglary and arson, and to all criminal offences, which are constituted or aggravated by being committed in a dwelling-house, any house, &c., * * * in which there sleeps a proprietor, &c., * * * with a view to the protection of the property, shall be deemed a dwelling-house," &c. 13 Stat. 405. No repeal of burglary at common law was intended by this act—none is necessarily involved in its terms and none can be implied. Nor does the act of 1878 operate as a repeal, either of burglary at common law or of the additional statutory offence provided for in the section aforesaid. The latter it does not touch at all, and only increases the punishment of the former, in the view, doubtless, that burglary at common law is more heinous than the statutory offence created by the section aforesaid. We can discover no error in the judge's charge on the subject of the third exception.

*395

*It was further urged for a new trial that the Circuit judge erred in admitting as evidence the statements of the defendants made at the preliminary examination before the trial justice, upon the ground that they were not voluntary; that the defendants were ignorant; that they were without counsel and alarmed by the presence of the officer of the law, who was rude to the witnesses, and were betrayed into making statements which were not true. The rule upon this subject of confessions has been often stated, but no where better than in 2 Russell on Crimes: "The highest authorities have now established that a confession, if clearly made and satisfactorily proved, is sufficient alone to warrant a conviction without any corroborating evidence aliunde, but a confession, in order to be admissible, must be free and voluntary. That it must not be extorted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, or by the exertion of any improper influence." The rule requiring that the confessions must be perfectly voluntary, is founded on the great principle of the common law, that the guilt of a prisoner must be discovered by other testimony than his own confession. "Nemo tenebatur prodere ipsissime." It is proper in the administration of the criminal law that the rule should be preserved in all its integrity.

It is especially necessary to guard with jealousy all confessions made by prisoners in arrest in the presence of the officers of the law; but it is impossible to lay down any rule that will determine every case. As is said in some of our cases, there is no difficulty about the principle itself, but its application is beset with difficulties. In practice, what is and what is not a violation of the principle, must of necessity be left, in the first instance, to be determined by the Circuit judge, whose situation best enables him to decide in each case whether the confessions are voluntary. The judge below, familiar with all the facts, ruled that the confessions were voluntary in this case, and, upon review, refused a motion for a new trial, and it is difficult to say, as matter of law, that he was in error. The manner of the officer was peremptory, but no inducements were held out and there was some corroborating testimony. Some of the earliest cases held that all confessions of one in arrest, made to an officer in authority, were *assumed to be induced and were inadmissible, but that rule, if ever established, has certainly been modified. When the trial justice said to the prisoners that if they desired to make a statement it was their privilege to do so, he should have added it was also their privilege to remain silent, which would have excluded the possible inference that they were bound to speak. We would have been better satisfied if he had so warned them, but we cannot say the confessions were not voluntary. This subject was much discussed in the case of State v. Kirby, which was twice in the Appeal Court, and is reported in 1 Strob. 155, 388. The opinion on the last occasion was delivered by Judge Withers, who, after full consideration, in a capital case announced the law in terms which cover this case. "A confession is admissible," says Mr. Greenleaf in the first volume of his Evidence, Section 239, "though it is elicited by questions, whether put to the prisoner by a magistrate, officer or private person; and the form of the question is immaterial to its admissibility, though it assumes the prisoner's guilt. In all these cases the evidence may be laid before the jury, however little it may weigh under the circumstances, and, however reprehensible may be the mode in which, in some of them, it may be obtained. According to recent decisions by some of the English judges, a knowledge by the prisoner that the government itself has offered a pardon and a reward, will not exclude his confession, unless it appears that it was made under the influence of a hope of pardon held out by authorized parties, and though, when that is urged, the judge may exclude the confession when such influence is manifest, it is unquestionably for the jury when the facts are doubtful." Regina v. Boswell et al., 41 E. C. L. R. 584; Regina v. Dingby et al., 47 Ib. 637.

*396

Upon a preliminary examination the accused parties have the right to be present and cross-examine witnesses, but they are not required to make any statement themselves. Gen. Stat. 197. It is not the duty of a trial justice to examine accused parties or to take their statements in writing, unless they are sworn as witnesses on behalf of the state by their own consent, and if he does so it is not an official act; but he is not prohibited from doing so, and a respectable authority recommends that the ancient *course of taking such statements should still be pursued. Be that as it may, when confessions are taken by a trial justice, in writing, signed by the parties, such evidence is the best evidence upon the subject, and if such confessions are relied upon against them, the defendants are entitled to have them produced in the very terms in which they were made. From the infirmity of memory there is always more or less uncertainty about parol testimony, especially in reference to declarations—mere spoken words. Even in civil cases the rule is that parol testimony is not admissible to explain, vary or add to written instruments, which must speak for themselves. In criminal proceedings there is even more reason that only the best and most reliable evidence should be allowed. There may have been in the written confessions some qualifications or explanations, and, we think, when demanded by the defendants, they should have been offered. It was error to receive parol testimony of confessions made in writing where there was no obstacle in the way of the written confessions being offered.

*397

The judgment is set aside and a new trial ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. 397

(Case No. 863.)

CLEVELAND v. COHRS.

(November Term, 1879.)

A case was remitted to the Circuit Court with leave to plaintiffs to amend by adding new parties; the plaintiffs made their amendments and served them upon all the defendants, and answers were put in; the Circuit Court held the amended complaint insufficient, but upon the call of the docket, gave plaintiffs leave to further amend, and upon such further amendments, which differed materially from former allegations, and which were not served, gave judgment for plaintiffs two days afterwards. Held—

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1201.]

That the Circuit Court could grant the order allowing a second amendment.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Coleman v. Heller, 13 S. C. 495; Pickett v. Southern Ry.—Carolina Division, 74 S. C. 242, 54 S. E. 375.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4679; Dec. Dig. ⇐1201.]

[2. Pleading ⇐239.]

That the Circuit Court erred in rendering judgment upon the second amendment without time given to defendants to answer or demur.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dunsford v. Brown, 19 S. C. 566; Crane, Boylston & Co. v. Lipscomb, 24 S. C. 438; Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 575, 9 S. E. 684; Pope Mfg. Co. v. Charleston Cycle Co., 55 S. C. 541, 33 S. E. 787; Cauthen v. Cauthen, 70 S. C. 171, 49 S. E. 321.

For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 629; Dec. Dig. ⇐239.]

*398

[3. Costs ⇐238.]

*When a defendant prevails in his appeal, which was rendered necessary by defective pleadings of plaintiffs, he is entitled to the costs of such appeal.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Huff v. Watkins, 25 S. C. 244, 246; Murray v. Aiken Mining & Porcelain Mfg. Co., 39 S. C. 465, 18 S. E. 5; Stepp v. National &c. Ass'n, 41 S. C. 208, 19 S. E. 490; Sullivan v. Latimer, 43 S. C. 263, 21 S. E. 3; Cunningham v. Cauthen, 47 S. C. 163, 25 S. E. 87.

For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 911; Dec. Dig. ⇐238.]

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, March, 1879.

See this case previously reported in 10 S. C. 224. After the case was returned from the Supreme Court to the Circuit Court, the plaintiffs served the following paper upon the defendant Cohrs, and also upon F. E. McKenzie and Sarah E. Alexander.

"Take notice, that under the leave to amend granted by the Supreme Court, the plaintiffs amend their complaint by making F. E. McKenzie and Sarah E. Alexander parties defendant, and by adding to said complaint the following paragraph, to wit:

"6. That the defendant, F. E. McKenzie, had, before the commencement of this action, parted with all his interest in and to the debt secured by the bond and mortgage herein described, and that Sarah E. Alexander, the widow of ——— Alexander, formerly Sarah E. McKenzie, and called Sarah Ann McKenzie, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, had likewise, before the commencement of this action, parted with all her right, title and interest in and to the debt secured by the bond and mortgage aforesaid."

F. E. McKenzie answered that he had held the bond and mortgage as guardian for his two daughters, and that upon settlement with them he transferred the bond and mortgage to Mrs. Florence Cleveland, who is now sole owner; that Mrs. Alexander was otherwise settled with and has no interest whatever in these securities. Mrs. Alexander answered: "That she has no interest, either legal or equitable, in the bond and mortgage sought to be collected in this suit."

The other facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Defendant Cohrs appealed.

[For subsequent opinion, see 18 S. C. 599.]

*399

*Mr. L. De B. McCrady, for appellant.

Mr. B. J. Whaley, contra, upon the first point decided by this court, cited Voorh. Code, 346, note d and 355 note f; and upon second point, Code, § 192; 3 S. C. 401.

April 22d, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. This was an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate. Originally the plaintiffs claimed to be assignees of the bond and mortgage, which was the cause of action, but failing to establish the assignment of the bond, the Circuit Court, nevertheless, rendered judgment in their favor, upon the ground that the plaintiff, Florence, had shown herself to be the equitable owner of the bond. From this judgment an appeal was taken to this court and it was set aside, but leave was granted to the plaintiffs to amend by making the sister of the plaintiff, Florence—Mrs. Sarah E. Alexander, (erroneously called in the opinion of this court Sarah Ann McKenzie, as we are now informed,) who seemed to have the same interest in the bond and mortgage as the plaintiff, Mrs. Cleveland—a party, as well as the legal owner of the bond, F. E. McKenzie, if they shall be so advised. In pursuance of the permission thus granted, the plaintiffs, on June 6th, 1879, served a notice of amendment, which it was conceded, on the argument of this appeal, though not appearing in the "case," was held by the Circuit judge to be insufficient, and that he thereupon allowed the plaintiffs to make another amendment, by an order passed March 15th, 1879. No notice of this last amendment was given to or served upon any of the parties, so far as we can discover, but was simply an order granted in open court, probably on the call of the case for trial, granting leave to the plaintiffs to amend their complaint—first, by striking out the fourth paragraph, in which the assignment of the bond and mortgage had been alleged, and inserting in lieu thereof allegations; that the bond in question was given for money in the hands of F. E. McKenzie, as guardian of the plaintiff, Florence, and her sister, Mrs. Alexander; that before the commencement of this action the title of said bond had been transferred by F. E. McKenzie to the plaintiff Florence, on a *settlement of his guardianship accounts; that the mortgage was duly assigned, but the bond having been lost was not assigned in writing, but that by virtue of such settlement the plaintiff Florence became the sole equitable owner of said bond and mortgage. Second, by adding to the prayer of the complaint a demand that the said Sarah E. Alexander and F. E. McKenzie may be debarred from all interest in said bond, and the plaintiffs decreed to be sole owners thereof. To this last amendment no answer or demurrer was put in by any of the parties, and no time allowed therefor, as the Circuit Court, two days thereafter, granted the judgment of foreclosure from which the appeal is now taken. It does appear that on January 28th, 1879, the said F. E. McKenzie and Sarah E. Alexander did file what purport to be answers to the complaint as first amended, though these answers were verified before the service of such amendment; but this amendment, as has been stated, was held to be insufficient, and these answers cannot be regarded as answers to the last amendment, which differs very materially from the first, and which was not authorized, and, of course, not filed until near two months after these so-called answers purport to have been filed.

*400

Numerous grounds of appeal have been presented, but in the view which we take of the case it will not be necessary, and perhaps not proper, for us to consider more than two of them, for, as the case must be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of enabling the defendants, if they shall be so advised, to plead to the complaint as amended, when new issues may arise, or those already presented may assume a different form, any remark which we might now make upon the other questions presented might prove to be inapplicable and possibly prejudicial to the case as it may then be presented.

The first ground of appeal questions the right of the Circuit judge, after holding the amendment of January 6th, 1879, to be insufficient, to grant leave to plaintiffs to make another amendment. We think there was no error in this respect. The manifest object of this court, in sending the case back before, was to enable the plaintiffs to amend their proceedings by bringing before the court all the parties necessary to a complete determination of the controversy, so that, if judgment should eventually *be rendered against the defendant, Cohrs, in favor of the plaintiffs, it would be a complete bar and protection to him against the claims of others, who, as the case was then presented, seemed to have an interest in the subject matter. It is very clear that the first amendment was altogether insufficient for that purpose, and the Circuit judge was unquestionably right in granting leave to the plaintiffs to make such an amendment as would, in his judgment, be necessary to effect the purpose for which the cause was sent back to the Circuit Court.

*401

The next ground taken is that the Circuit judge erred in rendering judgment upon the complaint as amended, without allowing time to the defendants to answer or demur to the complaint as thus amended. This ground, we think, is well taken. The case made by the amended complaint is undoubtedly very different from that made by the original complaint, and the defendants had, therefore, a right to demand time to answer or demur, as they might be advised. In the original complaint the plaintiffs claim to be the legal assignees of a bond, while in the amended complaint they allege the very opposite, and say that the bond was never legally assigned, but that, by virtue of certain transactions there set out, they claim to be the equitable owners of the bond, and, as such, entitled to maintain an action thereon. An answer to the one claim might, and probably would, be a very different answer to that which would be interposed to the other; and when the plaintiffs are permitted to change, and, in fact, reverse the title by which they claim the cause of action upon which they sue, the defendants ought, certainly, to be allowed the privilege of putting in answers to the new aspect in which the plaintiffs' claim is presented. In addition to this, aside from the answers of F. E. McKenzie and Sarah E. Alexander, (if, indeed, they can be considered as answers), which certainly are not evidence against the defendant, Cohrs, there does not seem to be any evidence showing how the plaintiff, Florence, came to be the sole equitable owner of the bond. On the contrary, all the testimony would seem to show that she and her sister were the joint owners of the bond. The referee does find that "on March 23d, 1870, F. E. McKenzie came to a settlement, in whole or in part, with his ward Florence and her husband, and on that day, in *consideration of a receipt from them in the amount of $2950, assigned to them the mortgage made by the defendant," but on what evidence the material part of this finding, viz., that McKenzie came to a settlement with his ward, is based, we are unable to discover. F. E. McKenzie, in his testimony, makes no allusion to any such settlement, but, on the contrary, he says that the money secured by the bond in question belonged to his two daughters, and there is an entire absence of any testimony showing by what authority he undertook to transfer the bond to one of them.

*402

When plaintiffs obtain leave to amend their proceedings by making new parties, it should appear upon the record that such parties have been brought in by the service of a summons, or the acknowledgment of such service; and when an amendment of a complaint is allowed which calls for or warrants an answer or demurrer from one or all of the defendants, the records should show that a copy of such amendment has been duly served, and that the time for answering has expired, before this can be considered on its merits. In this case, the papers purporting to be answers of F. E. McKenzie and Mrs. Alexander, might be regarded as a sufficient acknowledgment of services so as to make them parties to the case, but having been filed before the second amendment was authorized, they certainly cannot be regarded as any acknowledgment of the service of such amendment, and as this amendment made such very material changes in the allegations of the complaint as warranted answers from the defendants, copies of it should have been served upon all the defendants, and time allowed for answering before the case could properly be heard by the Circuit Court.

As there is no exception to that portion of the Circuit decree which imposes all the costs upon the defendant Cohrs, and the question is only raised in the argument here, we would not be at liberty to disturb the judgment of the Circuit Court upon that ground; but as that judgment must be set aside upon another ground, which is properly taken, and the question of costs will, therefore, be necessarily opened, it may be as well to say that we think that the defendant, Cohrs, having been the prevailing party in both appeals, which were rendered necessary by the de*fective pleading on the part of the plaintiffs, is entitled to have the costs incurred in such appeals taxed against them.

*403

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside, and the case is remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 403

(Case No. 864.)

JOHNSTONE v. MANIGAULT.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⊂⊃41.]

An appeal lies from a judgment rendered in a special proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sease v. Dobson, 36 S. C. 557, 15 S. E. 703, 704.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 134; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃41.]

[2. Landlord and Tenant ⟸261.]

A tenant, whose crop had been sold under proceedings authorized by the agricultural lien act of 1878, (16 Stat. 410) gave the notice to the sheriff prescribed in Section 3 of the act. Held, that he had thereby elected to seek the only remedy which this act afforded to the tenant, and that was an issue to determine whether the amount claimed was justly due.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Garlington v. Gilliam, 31 S. C. 337, 9 S. E. 1037; Sease v. Dobson, 33 S. C. 237, 11 S. E. 728; Georgia, etc., Railway Co. v. Ridlehuber, 38 S. C. 318, 17 S. E. 24.

For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 1059; Dec. Dig. ⟸261.]

[3. Landlord and Tenant ⟸261.]

The tenant gave to the sheriff the notice and affidavit required by the statute, and the landlord filed in the clerk's office a statement of the issue raised by such affidavit, and had it set down for trial at the next succeeding term of the Circuit Court. Held, that it was not necessary to serve upon the tenant notice of such filing, nor to have the issues framed by an order of the court.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Ellis, 20 S. C. 346; Sease v. Dobson, 34 S. C. 355, 13 S. E. 530.

For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 1059; Dec. Dig. ⟸261.]

Before Mackey, J., Georgetown, April, 1879.

Special proceeding under the agricultural lien act of 1878. The case is stated in the opinion of the court. The affidavit and notice of Manigault were as follows:

To T. W. Dickinson, Esq., Sheriff, Georgetown county:

Dear Sir—You will please take notice under the provisions of Section 3 of "An act entitled an act to secure landlords and persons making advances," approved March 4th, 1878, that the amount claimed by Mrs. A. L. Johnstone as due by me to her for rent, and for which claim you have seized and sold a portion of my crop, is not justly due to her, and that the proceeds of such sale are to be held by you as provided in said act.

*404

*Herewith is served upon you the affidavit required by said section.

A. M. Manigault, Jr.

December 20th, 1878.

Personally appeared before me, Arthur M. Manigault, Jr., and made oath, (being first duly sworn,) that on December 3d, A. D. 1878, T. W. Dickinson, sheriff of Georgetown county, levied upon, seized, and on December 16th, 1878, sold a portion of deponent's crop of rice, on Estherville Plantation; in Georgetown county, upon a claim of Mrs. A. L. Johnstone, that the sum of $700 was due by this deponent to her for rent of the said plantation, and, upon affidavit, that deponent was about to sell or dispose of his said crop, or in some other way was about to defeat the lien of the amount so alleged to be due for rent; that the amount so claimed is not justly due from deponent to the said Mrs. Alice L. Johnstone, and that she is not entitled to the same; and, further, that deponent was not about to sell or dispose of his crop, or in any other way to defeat the lien of any amount that might be due by him for rent to any one soever.

A. M. Manigault, Jr.

Sworn to, December 18th, A. D. 1878.

The paper called issue was as follows:

Alice L. Johnstone v. Arthur M. Manigault, Jr.—Issue.

Be it remembered that on December 3d, 1878, under and by virtue of proceedings in that behalf had and obtained by the above-named Alice L. Johnstone, according to the requirements of the statutes in such case made and provided, a certain quantity of rice grown upon Estherville Plantation, in the county and state aforesaid, by Arthur M. Manigault, Jr., the tenant of said plantation, was seized and sold by the sheriff of Georgetown, to pay the sum of $700, the rent of said plantation for the year 1878, to the said Alice L. Johnstone, the landlord of the said Arthur M. Manigault, Jr., and the assignee of said rent. That upon such sale the said rice brought the sum of $747.40, which is now in the hands of the sheriff.

That the said sheriff ought to pay over the said proceeds of sale, or so much as might be necessary to extinguish the said *rent to the said Alice L. Johnstone, but he refuses to do so, alleging that said Arthur M. Manigault, Jr., did, within thirty days after such sale, give him notice in writing, accompanied by an affidavit, to the effect that the amount claimed is not due, and that he holds the proceeds of said sale subject to the decision of the court, upon the issue thus raised between the said Alice L. Johnstone and the said Arthur M. Manigault, Jr. And the said Alice L. Johnstone, in fact, says that under the seizure and sale aforesaid, and the statutes in such case made and provided, she is entitled to the net proceeds of said sale, or so much thereof as will be necessary to extinguish the said rent, notwithstanding the said notice and affidavit of said Arthur M. Manigault, Jr.

*405

Wherefore she demands the decision of the court, that the said sum of money, or so much as may be necessary to extinguish the said rent, be paid over to her, together with her costs.

Mr. H. A. M. Smith, for appellant.

There was no issue upon which defendant could be forced to trial. 16 Stat. 410, §§ 2, 3, 5. What is an issue? Bouv. L. Dict.; Jacob's L. Dict.; Code, §§ 271, 273. Issue can thus only arise by allegations and counter allegations; or by order of court defining the issue. Here we have neither; only notice to sheriff to stay his hand. This, like attachment, should have been followed by complaint. Affidavit is insufficient, as the plaintiff here was not the landlord who made the contract, but only an assignee; and facts are not stated upon which the deponent formed his belief. 17 How. Pr. 559; 22 Ib. 272; 6 S. C. 169. There could be no indictment for perjury here, and tenants and their character would be at the mercy of him who held the lien. Proceedings should be in analogy to existing methods of procedure; and that required an issue. If plaintiff's affidavit was insufficient, there was no traversible fact, whereby an issue could be raised. Act of 1878 was passed after lease was made, and act of June, 1877, (16 Stat. 265,) repealed all former lien laws.

Mr. R. Dozier, contra.

*406

*April 23d, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. Under the view taken in this case the preliminary question raised by the respondent as to whether the appellant could appeal in a case of this character, is of no practical importance and need not, therefore, be considered; but it may be as well to say that the position taken by respondent cannot be sustained. This, it is true, was a special proceeding and not an action, but it is a mistake to suppose that there is no appeal from the judgments or orders of the Circuit Court in special proceedings. On the contrary, sub-division 3 of Section 11, of the code of procedure, expressly provides for an appeal in such cases. See also Cureton v. Hutchinson, 3 S. C. 607.

The facts out of which the controversy in this case arose, are briefly, as follows: At the beginning of the year 1878, the appellant held a lease of a plantation, in Georgetown county, then belonging to one William C. Johnstone, which expired on December 31st, 1878. At some time during the year, precisely when does not appear, the plantation was sold to the respondent and the rents assigned to her. On December 2d, 1878, on an affidavit made by said William C. Johnstone that he was the duly authorized agent of respondent; that $700 remained due and unpaid on the rent; and "that deponent is informed and believes that the said Arthur M. Manigault, Jr., is removing and selling the crop made on said plantation and is about to defeat the lien which the said Mrs. Alice L. Johnstone has, by law thereon," a warrant was issued by the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to seize the crop of the appellant raised on said plantation for the purpose of satisfying respondent's demand for rent. Under this warrant the sheriff seized and sold five hundred bushels of rough rice on December 16th, 1878, and within thirty days thereafter, the appellant made the affidavit and gave the notice to the sheriff, contemplated by the proviso to the third section of the act of March 4th, 1878, (16 Stat. 410,) copies of which affidavit and notice may be found in the "case" as prepared for this court. At the next succeeding term of the Court of Common Pleas for Georgetown county, the respondent, by his attorney, filed in said court the "paper called issue," (a copy of which will be found *in the "case,") which, however, was not served either upon the appellant or his attorneys, and the case was docketed on Calendar No. 1, but "no notice was served either on the appellant or his attorneys, further than the mere fact of docketing the case, but the fact of its having been filed was known to one of his attorneys from seeing the paper in the clerk's office and having a copy made." At the call of the case for trial the appellant moved to strike the case from the docket and to dismiss the proceedings and that the sheriff be directed to pay over the proceeds of the sale of the rice to appellant, on the following grounds:

*407

1. That the affidavit upon which the warrant was issued was insufficient and irregular, inasmuch as it was made upon information and belief only.

2. That the affidavit was not made by the proper person.

3. That the seizure of the crop could only be made by the actual lessor and not by his assignees.

4. That no issue had been made up for trial in the manner required by law, and there was no issue between the parties for trial.

The Circuit judge held that the affidavit was insufficient, but that appellant "by coming in under the statute and serving his affidavit upon the sheriff, waived his objection to the insufficiency of the affidavit, and that the issue between the parties consisted of the allegation in the affidavit of Mrs. Johnstone that so much rent was due to her, and the denial in the affidavit of Manigault that so much was justly due to her, and that the cause should proceed to trial on the issue so raised, and that the paper filed by the attorney of Mrs. Johnstone was a correct statement of the issue, and directed the trial to proceed." After testimony in behalf of the respondent had been introduced, the appellant offering none, the jury found a verdict in favor of the respondent. The appellant having duly excepted, brings this appeal upon the same grounds as were urged in support of the motion before the Circuit judge.

According to the view taken of this case, the questions raised as to the sufficiency of the affidavit, and to the right of respondent as assignee to the remedy provided by the act in *question, cannot properly arise and need not, therefore, be considered. The action taken by the appellant, avowedly, was under the proviso to the third section of the act of March 4th, 1878. 16 Stat. 410. Having elected to seek the remedy provided for by that proviso, he must be confined to the relief which that remedy was designed to afford, and that was the privilege of having an issue tried by the court to determine whether the amount claimed was justly due. This privilege the appellant has enjoyed, and, therefore, has no reason to complain, as he has obtained the only relief which the remedy he chose to adopt was competent to afford him. That the relief afforded by the proviso in question was intended to be confined solely to the opportunity given to the tenant or person to whom advances should be made, to contest before a judicial tribunal the justice of the claim, under which his property has been seized and sold, is clear from the very terms used. The language is that if the tenant or person to whom supplies have been furnished, "shall, within thirty days after such sale has been made, give notice in writing to the sheriff, accompanied with an affidavit to this effect, that the amount claimed is not justly due, that then," &c. The very fact that the remedy is only provided for after the sale shows that it was not designed to be used as a protection against an illegal seizure or sale of the party's property, and the nature of the affidavit required, "that the amount claimed is not justly due," shows that the sole purpose was to afford the means of having the amount claimed to be due judicially ascertained. Indeed, there was no necessity for making any special provision to protect the person to whom supplies were advanced, or the tenant from an illegal seizure or sale of his property under the provisions of the second section of the act, as the general provisions of law already afforded ample means for the protection of parties whose property was about to be seized without due warrant of law, or for the recovery of damages from those who might trespass upon their rights; but there was eminent propriety, if not an absolute necessity, that an act giving a summary mode of relief to a creditor should contain some provision whereby the debtor could have the justness and amount of the claim thus summarily to be enforced inquired into.

*408

*409

*It is said, however, that while all this may be true, still the proceedings in this case cannot be sustained because there was no order of court framing the issue and no notice to appellant that such issue had been framed or filed and would be set down for trial. A sufficient answer to this objection is that the statute, which in every line of it shows that the intention was that the whole proceeding should be of the most summary character, does not require or contemplate any such notice, and as no advantage could be acquired by the one party or disadvantage suffered by the other from the want of such an order or notice, there is no practical necessity for either. The appellant when he made the affidavit and gave the notice to the sheriff, himself made up the issue by traversing the allegation in the affidavit upon which the warrant was issued, that a certain amount was justly due; and any formal statement of the issue so raised, which should be filed in court, upon which the question could be tried, would be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the act, which prescribes no particular formality as to notice; none, certainly, was necessary. The act requires none, and so far as the appellant is concerned, he certainly cannot complain of want of notice of a proceeding which he himself has inaugurated, and which the very act under which he commenced his proceedings not only informed him must terminate in an issue, the nature of which is fixed by the act—whether the amount claimed was justly due—but also informed him when such issue would be set down for trial—"shall be made up and set down for trial at the next succeeding term of the court."

The judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 409

(Case No. 865.)

CURETON v. MILLS.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸519.]

Where the administrators, in this state, of an intestate, whose domicil was here, also administered in North Carolina, and brought personal property *there found into this state and sold it, they must account here for the proceeds of such sale.

*410

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Graveley v. Graveley, 25 S. C. 20, 60 Am. Rep. 478; Stevenson v. Dunlap, 33 S. C. 352, 11 S. E. 1017; Jones v. Jones, 39 S. C. 256, 17 S. E. 287, 802; Hamilton v. Levy, 41 S. C. 383, 19 S. E. 610.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2310–2322; Dec. Dig. ⟸519.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⟸518.]

The rights and liabilities of original and ancillary administrators, and their relation to each other, in such case, determined, and cases reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2299–2309; Dec. Dig. ⟸518.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⟸523, 526.]

Such assets must be accounted for and distributed in this state, as it regards North Carolina debts, according to the laws of the state of North Carolina.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2329, 2352; Dec. Dig. ⟸523, 526.]

[4. Executors and Administrators ⟸506.]

An aggregate of expenditure for a calendar year will not be allowed administrators on their accounts, in the absence of evidence showing that the items were proper credits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2169–2177; Dec. Dig. ⟸506.]

[5. Appeal and Error ⟸266.]

This court will not notice a ground of appeal based upon a confirmation by the Circuit decree of the referee's report in a particular to which no exception had been taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1552; Dec. Dig. ⟸266.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, June, 1879.

This was a bill filed in the court of equity for Spartanburg county, in May, 1868, by Thomas K. Cureton and Nancy R. Mills, as administrators of Govan Mills, and Mary S. Cureton against R. H. Mills, J. C. Mills, J. B. Davis and William Ballenger, for a settlement of the estate of Govan Mills, who died intestate in 1862, in South Carolina, in which state he was domiciled. The administrators here were also administrators in North Carolina. Nancy R. Mills was the widow, and R. H. Mills, J. C. Mills, and M. S. Cureton were the children of intestate. Davis and Ballenger were creditors, citizens of this state. They answering demanded an accounting, and all creditors were called in to establish their demands. R. H. Mills, J. C. Mills and Nancy R. Mills died before the hearing in the Circuit Court.

Govan Mills owned lands and personal property in both North Carolina and South Carolina. Negroes and other personalty were appraised on the North Carolina plantation, under the order of the Ordinary of Spartanburg district, by South Carolina appraisers. This property was then brought into this state and sold.

F. M. Trimmier, Esq., clerk of court, to whom it was referred as referee to state the accounts, found as a matter of fact, that there were creditors in both states; that the administrators had not kept separate accounts of their two administrations; that they had sold in this state personal property brought here from North *Carolina to the amount of $20,803.28. As a matter of law, the referee gave the administrators credit for this sum, as not chargeable against them in this state; and refused them credit for payments made to creditors residing in North Carolina. In the statement accompanying his report, no credit was allowed the administrators for two items, proven by the attorney for the administrators in words following:

*411

Since the last return, to wit, in 1871, the administrators received $253, and amounts paid out $325. Also, from 1862 to 1866 the administrator paid to witness, as attorney's fees and for collections and expenses, $1217.-25 in confederate money.

To the report of the referee the plaintiff filed the following exceptions:

3. Because the referee, in the accounting, failed to allow a credit of $325, paid out in 1871.

5. For that referee reported that none of the payments of claims belonging to residents of North Carolina are proper credits in the accounting here of the administrators.

6. For that referee failed to report that the estate in South Carolina had been fully administered.

And the creditors of the estate filed the following exceptions to this report:

1. That the referee allowed the administrators credit for the sum of $20,803.28, the amount of sales of personal property sold in South Carolina under the order of the Court of Ordinary for Spartanburg county, South Carolina, as assets belonging to the administration in North Carolina.

2. That the referee failed to charge the administrators with the surplus of the estate after administration in North Carolina.

The Circuit decree is as follows:

The domicil of the intestate, Govan Mills, was in this state, but he owned property also in North Carolina, and plaintiffs are his administrators in both states.

Some of his slaves, which, at the time of his death, were on his plantation in North Carolina, were brought by plaintiffs into this state, where they were appraised and sold by order of the Ordinary of Spartanburg in 1862. From that time until this suit, the assets of intestate in both states were administered in the *payment of debts, without regard to the residence of the creditors; some debts in each state remain unpaid and the assets are insufficient to pay all.

*412

Plaintiffs now claim that the proceeds of the slaves which were in North Carolina when intestate died, should be omitted from the account in this state, and the referee sustains that claim. He also refuses to allow plaintiffs credit on their accounts here for their payments to creditors residing in North Carolina.

To these and other rulings of the referee both sides have filed exceptions which I will not notice in detail, because I prefer to recommit the case for further inquiry and report according to the following rulings, to wit:

1. I hold that the proceeds of said slaves are assets in this state, it being the domicil of the intestate, and the property having been appraised and sold here by legal authority. Collins v. Bankhead, 1 Strob. 25; Wilkins v. Ellett, 9 Wall. 740 [19 L. Ed. 586].

2. That this estate being insolvent, all its assets in both states are to be applied so as to equalize all the creditors according to their legal priorities, but with due regard to the priority law of each state as to the assets within its limits. Dawes v. Head, 3 Pick. 128; Tucker v. Condy, 10 Rich. Eq. 12.

3. That the payments to North Carolina creditors are to be charged to the assets in that state, and if the same be insufficient to equalize the creditors there with those in this state, they are to be made equal out of the assets here, and a like equalization is to be sought in North Carolina by creditors residing in this state if the assets here are not sufficient for that purpose.

4. In taking the accounts of defendants, all confederate money received and not heretofore paid out by them, is to be reduced to its value according to our statute.

It is ordered and adjudged that the rulings above-stated stand as my judgment and decree, that the case be re-committed to referee to take and report a full account of the assets and debts in each state, and what amounts are yet due in each by the defendants and to what debts, according to priority, the balance in this state, if any, should be applied; that he also report what amount, if any, of the assets in this state, should be paid to creditors, and what creditors, in North Carolina, in order to equalize *them according to the rank of their debts with like creditors in this state.

*413

From this decree T. K. Cureton appealed to this court.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Appeal lies—Code, § 11; 15 Stat. 495; Voorh. Code, 349; 4 S. C. 115. The case in 8 S. C. 112, is not in point. Credits should have been allowed for the $325.90, and the $1217.15; they were doubtless oversights. The proceeds of the sale of the personal property brought from North Carolina are not properly chargeable in the account of the administrators in this state. The Circuit judge errs in saying it was appraised in this state. 7 S. C. 63; 1 Rich. 116; 5 Ired. Eq. 367; 2 Bail. 438; Story on Confl. Laws, §§ 513–518, 529, b, c, d; 3 Redf. on Wills 27; Freem. on Void Jud. Sales, § 4; 2 Wms. on Ex'rs 982; 14 Rich. Eq. 105; 16 Wall. 610; 15 Pet. 6; 6 How. 59; Pend. v. Cooke, (Conn. 1877,) 6 Reporter 518; Rorer on Inter-State Laws 251. Payments to the North Carolina creditors are proper credits in the appellant's administration account here. 11 N. H. 95; 45 Iowa 221; 2 Kent 434; 10 Rich. Eq. 16; 44 Texas 497; 3 Pick. 128; 4 McC. 28.

Mr. J. B. Cleveland, contra.

The order is not appealable. Dud. Eq. 24; 8 S. C. 112. To the authorities cited by the Circuit judge to sustain his propositions, we add the following: 2 Bail. 436; 5 Pet. 518; 45 Iowa 221; 3 Pick. 128; 1 Strob. 25; 1 Rich. 116; 10 Rich. Eq. 12; 9 Wall. 740; 7 S. C. 60; 4 McC. 28; 4 McC. 278; 1 Mills' Const. R. 292; 5 Cranch 289.

April 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This case involves the accounting of the administrators of G. Mills. The leading question arises out of the following facts: G. Mills was domiciled, at his death, in this state, and died intestate, leaving property and debts in both this state and North Carolina. T. K. Cureton and N. Mills took out letters of administration in both states. Personal property of the intestate, situated in North Carolina at his death, was reduced to possession there by the administrators and brought *into this state and sold by order of the Ordinary of Spartanburg. There appear to be debts of the intestate due to citizens of both states unsatisfied, and it is claimed that as it regards North Carolina debts the North Carolina assets should be applied by the administrators in accordance with the laws of that state, and not according to the priorities existing under the laws of this state. The only appellant here is the administrator, T. K. Cureton. His principal objection to this Circuit decree is that it decreed that the proceeds of sales of slaves brought from North Carolina and sold here are chargeable to the administrator's account here, and that it directed the application of the North Carolina assets, instead of holding, "that the whole of the North Carolina property should be accounted for there, and this plaintiff chargeable here as to North Carolina assets only with any surplus that might be found in his hands after a full accounting had and decree made in North Carolina."

*414

The proposition embodied in the appellant's objection, just stated, is that the administrator ought not to be held to account for so much of the assets as came from the sale of the property of the intestate situated in North Carolina, at his death, and brought within this state by the administrators, but, if accountable therefor, under any circumstances it would only be after the North Carolina debts had been paid, and then only as it regarded the surplus of the North Carolina estate remaining undisposed of after the payment of the debts there due.

It will be observed that no North Carolina creditor is before this court as an appellant, and we are at liberty to infer from the record before us that no such creditor appeared in the action or was represented otherwise than by the administrators, one of whom is appellant here. The objection comes wholly from the administrator himself. The objection that would exclude the authority of the courts of this state from control over assets subjected to the authority of the Ordinary of Spartanburg, by the voluntary act of the administrators themselves, would seem, in itself, anomalous; but the question will be considered and disposed of on more general grounds. The questions then to be considered are, first: Have the courts of this state jurisdiction to compel a domestic administrator, representing an intestate, dom*iciled at his death in this state, to account for assets of such intestate held in this state, and received by such administrator under letters of administration issued to him by a foreign state, when such assets were situated in such foreign state at the death of the intestate, and were of a personal character? And, second, if such assets may be distributed by such domestic jurisdiction, must they be so distributed according to the laws of the state where they were so situated at the death of the intestate, or according to the laws of the domicil of the intestate?

*415

In considering the first in order of these questions, it is material to notice the circumstance that the same persons were administrators in both states. This fact renders it necessary to consider the question of jurisdiction under two aspects. Suppose that the plaintiffs had been administrators in this state alone, and other persons had administered in North Carolina, and had collected the assets there situated, and had turned over such assets into the hands of the plaintiffs as the administrators of the domicil of the intestate for administration here? Could the courts of this state have assumed control over such assets in a proceeding in this state to compel the domestic administrator to account? This constitutes one of the two aspects above-noticed. The other may be illustrated by supposing that the present plaintiffs were North Carolina administrators alone, and not entitled to represent the intestate's estate in this state, would they, being citizens of this state, found here, and having had North Carolina assets, brought here by them, be held accountable here for the administration of such North Carolina assets?

Looking at the question under immediate consideration in the first of these aspects, it assumes the following form: Can the administrator of the domicil of the intestate be compelled to account for assets of his intestate found in his hands in such state, notwithstanding such assets may have been situated at the death of decedent in a foreign state, and there reduced to possession under administration granted by such state? The principles from which the solution of this question would naturally flow are well established by abundant authority, and free from dispute. All the authorities concur in the conclusion that according to the principles of international law, universally *adopted, the administration had, at the domicil of the decedent, whether dying testate or intestate, is to be regarded as the principal administration, to which all foreign administrations, granted by reason of personal assets being found at the death of the decedent in a state foreign to that of the domicil, are, in some sense, a degree subordinate. The exact relations subsisting between this original and the ancillary administrations are differently estimated by different states, but all recognize some degree of subservience on the part of the ancillary administration to the administration of the domicil. For instance, all agree that where the purposes of the ancillary administration are accomplished, according to the law of such ancillary administration, and a residuum remains, that such residuum is subject to the purposes of the original administration, to be distributed according to the law of the domicil of the decedent. There is a difference of opinion as to whether that residuum should be transmitted to the domicil of the decedent for distribution, notwithstanding there may be legatees or distributees residents of the state of such ancillary administration; some authorities holding that opinion, and others sustaining the view that when the legatees or distributees reside within the place of the ancillary administration that distribution may be made by the court of such state of assets under their control, though following the law of the domicil as it regards the order of that distribution. Harvey v. Richards, 1 Mason 381 [Fed. Cas. No. 6,184].

*416

It will not be necessary for our immediate purpose to attempt to state the doctrine that appears to be supported by the best reasons and authority as it regards the authority of the courts of the place of the ancillary administration over assets found at the death of the decedent in such place, for, as has been already said, the validity of this principle, to which the solution of the present question is to be referred, is not involved in such discussion, but stands conceded by all.

It is one of the necessary deductions from the general character ascribed to this administration at the domicil of the decedent, by the authorities, that such administration is, in its nature, general and unlimited, while the ancillary administration is both special and limited. The nature of the administration had at *the domicil of the decedent depends on the universally received doctrine that personal property follows the person of its owner. This principle, doubtless, had its origin in the enlarged spirit that flows from commercial intercourse among nations. It may well be conceived that there was an older notion, more agreeable to the conceptions of states living in isolation, and, therefore, jealous of their authority, by which property, either personal or real, within such state, claimed by a citizen of a foreign state, could only be controlled and disposed of in such manner as would be admissible if the foreign owner were present and subject to the laws prevailing where such authority was to be exercised. With the development of international commerce would arise a necessity that movable property, the special subject of that commerce, should, wherever located, be immediately under the control of its owner, to the end that its transmission may be facilitated, as it would be where the owner, in its disposition, was compelled only to consult the law to which he was personably amenable, and not bound to act as a subject, sub modo, of every state where his property chanced to be located for the time being. Immovable property, such as lands and houses, not being within the sphere of the general operations of commerce, would remain under the more primitive rule, and that is its condition at the present day. The fact that the rule that personal property follows the person of the owner in the sense that the law that binds the person is the law that governs the transmission of his personal effects has been universally ascribed to the international law and not to municipal regulations, seems to justify the conclusions just drawn as to its origin and the nature of the rule antecedent to it. It will not be necessary to add that the force of this rule of international law depends upon local acceptance, and that many exceptions to its universality are recognized by all states; indeed, it is competent for any state to deny the rule altogether and transfer the interchange of personal property by applying the rules commonly confined to immovable property alone.

*417

This rule of the international law looks to the power of control over movables as the essential feature of the idea of property, and to the subject of property as the adjunct, and localizes such property for the purpose of disposition where the dispensing *will may be found. It would follow that according to this idea the authority of the owner of movable property must be regarded as in its nature general and unlimited; general, because it covers all his movables, under whatever local sovereignty they may chance to be placed, and, unlimited, because he is not constrained as it regards the objects in regard to which he may exercise that power of control or disposition. In saying that the power of the owner over his goods is general and unlimited in its nature, it is not affirmed that that power is necessarily absolute, or, in its exercise, free from limitations imposed by the various sovereignties where his property of that class is situated, for that is not true of his domicil and cannot be absolutely true of any other jurisdiction within which his movables may be situated. Such limitations, in the exercise of the rights of ownership, do not result from the operation of any such principle as that the owner of property can only exercise such authority as is permitted by the laws but from a conflict between the rights of the individual and the community, in which case the former must give way.

*418

Such being the character ascribed by our laws to the authority of the owner of chattels, whatever may be their situs, it would seem to follow that when that authority comes to be represented in the hands of a personal representative of a deceased owner it would possess the same nature, although that authority cannot exist to the same extent as it did in the owner while living, for the reason that the personal representative is bound either by the testamentary disposition of his testator or by the law of distribution, which did not bind the decedent. The terms general and unlimited, as applied then to the representative of the decedent, must be taken in a sense more restricted than when applicable to the living owner. It may be said to be general in the sense that it extends to all the personal effects of the decedent wherever situated, and unlimited in the sense that all the objects contemplated by the law of testamentary disposition, or of distribution of the domicil, are competent and proper objects to be had in view in the administration of the estate.

The distinction that has been pointed out between the characters of the original and of the ancillary administration will be *better understood when the restricted character of the latter is fully presented.

*419

The ancillary administration, we have said, is special and limited. The sense in which these terms are used is the same as that just applied to the original administration. That administration is special, because it extends merely to such personal effects of the decedent as may be found at his death in the place of ancillary administration, while, as we have seen, the scope of the original administration is commensurate with the whole personal estate of the decedent wherever situated. The ancillary administration is limited in the sense that the objects to which that administration looks do not comprehend all that are appropriate to the original administration. The ancillary administrator is primarily concerned only with the debts of the decedent at the place of ancillary administration, and with the administration of the assets only to the extent requisite to pay such debts. In some instances the courts of the ancillary administration have undertaken to distribute the estate of a foreign decedent; but this is an exceptional jurisdiction, depending upon special circumstances, such as the fact that all the distributees, legatees or creditors are residents of the state where the assets of a foreign decedent were found, and the ancillary administration personally amenable to that jurisdiction. No authority appears to sanction the idea that the ancillary administration could make distribution in favor of foreign creditors except by the aid of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Before looking into the authorities to see how far the views already expressed have their sanction, it is proper to observe that it is only in a potential sense that the original administration embraces all the effects of the decedent where part of these effects are situated in a foreign state. The laws of that state may prevent that claim from being actually asserted until the debts of the decedent then due are paid. But this is merely a limitation of a recognized general authority in the original administration, for the moment the objects of the ancillary administration are accomplished, the general right of the administrator of the domicil is respected by all foreign states, and the residuum subjected to that control, thus evincing a general *recognition of the fact that the ancillary administration is special and limited, and the original administration general and unlimited.

*420

The most conclusive proof that the original administrator has that general character which has been stated is the fact that all the creditors, whether domestic or foreign, are embraced within the rule of disposition that binds the original administrator. Cameron v. Wurtz, 4 McC. 278; Dawes v. Head, 3 Pick. 128. Some states and countries give preferences as among different classes of creditors, and in some instances preferences to their own citizens over foreign creditors, but none exclude foreign creditors from distribution, even though, by the law of the countries where they reside, the effects of the decedent, found in such countries at his death, may be subject to a preference in behalf of its own citizens who may be creditors. It is obvious that if all creditors wherever residing, are within the scope of the original administration, that all assets, wherever situated, must equally be within that scope. It is hardly to be supposed that the one would be included and the other excluded. Indeed, where a creditor who had availed himself of the laws of New Jersey to obtain part payment through an ancillary administration in that state, applied to come in with other creditors in New York, the place of original administration, all that the court did in view of the advantage gained in New Jersey was to equalize the other creditors with the one who had obtained part payment in New Jersey, allowing him to come in on equal terms with all others as it regarded the totality of assets, foreign and domestic, deducting the amount he had received. Lawrence v. Elmendorf, 5 Barb. 73.

We come, now, to the authorities bearing on the question.

Conover v. Chapman, 2 Bail. 436. The intestate was domiciled in South Carolina. The South Carolina administrator was also administrator in Maryland, where assets of the intestate estate were situated at the death of the intestate. The administrator was sued in this state on a debt of his intestate, and pleaded "plene administravit of assets which had come to defendant's hands in this state." The plea was adjudged bad on demurrer, on the ground that it was to be assumed that by the laws of *Maryland, the administrator was bound, after paying debts there due, to apply the residuum to the purposes of the original administration in South Carolina, and, therefore, there was at least a conditional obligation on the part of the administrator to account for the Maryland assets. Judge Butler holds that the administrator was not indeed chargeable with the Maryland assets to such extent as to render him amenable to account in this state for the disposition made of the Maryland administration, but that he was under a more limited obligation to account therefor, and that his plea of plene administravit should have been general and not limited to the assets found in this state. He recognizes the principle that the South Carolina administrator and the Maryland administrator must be legally considered distinct persons as it regards the separate offices held by the same person. This case fully recognizes that the primary authority of the administrator, at the domicil of the intestate, extends to all his effects, wherever situated, although, as it regards foreign assets, he may ordinarily account for them by showing that they are subject to another jurisdiction, to which, as a general rule, he is alone responsible for their disposition. It is consistent, therefore, with the proposition that the authority of the original administrator is general and unlimited in its nature, and his liability commensurate therewith.

*421

Carmichael v. Ray, 1 Rich. 116. The administrator of an intestate, domiciled in South Carolina, sought to recover, upon his title as administrator, personal property of his intestate that was situated in North Carolina at his death. It was held that the South Carolina administrator acquired no title under his letters of administration to property of the intestate beyond the territorial jurisdiction of this state. This case may seem to militate against the conclusions, to the support of which it is cited, but that is apparent merely, and not real. It is one thing to say that the scope of administration is general and extends to all assets of the intestate wherever situated, and another to say that, under the circumstances of its location, his title cannot be asserted over a particular chattel that appertained to his intestate's estate. It is obvious that the conclusion of the court was correct. The defendant claimed the property under the opera*tion of the laws of North Carolina during the time that the property was subjected to that jurisdiction. It was clearly competent for the laws of that state, operating upon a subject of property subjected to them, to create a right of ownership that would be respected everywhere. To assert title in the administrator, under such circumstances, would be equivalent to denying to the laws of North Carolina that force which is everywhere accredited to the laws of a sovereign state over all persons and property subjected to them. Suppose, however, that the administrator in that case had obtained rightful possession of the North Carolina property, and had brought it within this state, there is nothing in the case that would preclude the idea of his being accountable therefor as proper to be applied in a due course of administration here. Indeed, Judge Butler instances, in the opinion in that case, the payment of a foreign debt to a domestic administrator, recognizing the principle that where such payment is made, the sum paid would be assets rightfully in the hands of the administrator for administration, but he correctly holds that that principle is not applicable to the case he had in hand. Unless foreign assets are within the general scope of the administration how could the administrator be chargeable with such assets coming into his hands under such circumstances?

*422

Wilkins v. Ellett, 9 Wall. 740 [19 L. Ed. 586]. It was held that a payment of a debt due by a citizen of one state to the administrator under the laws of another state, where the intestate was domiciled at his death, there being, at the time of such payment, no administration in the state of the debtor, was a valid payment and discharged the debt. It has been questioned whether this is not allowing the debtor to subvert the laws of his state by voluntarily contributing to remove therefrom assets, that, by those laws, are devoted to debts due within the state. However this may be, the recognition of the general nature of the authority of the administrator of the domicil involved in this case does not appear to have been at any time brought into question, and it does not appear to be questionable.

It will not be necessary to go further in the examination of the authorities, domestic and foreign, on this point, as none are found that militate against the proposition advanced, while *throughout the whole the fundamental principles on which that proposition rests are abundantly illustrated.

*423

If the original administrator has a general right as to all effects wherever situated, his obligation is commensurate with that right and extends to accountability for all assets reduced and reducible at home, and all actually reduced abroad. It would follow that when this administrator of the domicil of the intestate holds possession of personal effects of his intestate, within the jurisdiction from which he derives his authority as administrator, he is bound to account therefor, even though such effects at the death of the intestate were situated within a foreign jurisdiction. It would also follow that the domestic administrator is bound to account for all assets reduced to possession, wherever situated at the death of the intestate, but that such assets are properly accounted for, as a general rule, when it appears that they were, at the death of the intestate, in a foreign jurisdiction, and still so remain, and that his possession thereof was obtained as administrator under the authority of such foreign state, and that the purposes of such ancillary administration have not been fulfilled. For any devastavit of the foreign assets in the course of the ancillary administration, he would be subject to the jurisdiction of the domicil, at least to as great an extent as an ancillary administrator would be who was not accredited as the administrator of the domicil, which liability will be hereafter considered.

We come now to the second aspect of the general question, that proceeds on the supposition that the administrator had been sued in this state solely in his character of a North Carolina administrator. Could such a suit be maintained? If a citizen of this state is appointed under the laws of another state administrator of one domiciled in this state at his death, having assets in such foreign state, and such administrator bring such assets within this state, can the parties interested as creditors or distributees, compel such foreign administrator to account for such assets here?

As a general rule, rights of property matured and perfected under the laws of a state having jurisdiction of the person and property involved, are respected and protected everywhere. The *obligations incurred as a consequence of the perfecting of such a right and the credit thereto, according to its nature, must stand on the same footing as the right itself, and be enforced everywhere where jurisdiction for that purpose can be obtained.

*424

It is true that when public powers and authority are executory, such powers belonging to the sovereign under whom they are exercised, cannot be put in execution by any other jurisdiction than that of such sovereign. Hence it is that the powers of an administrator, being in their nature public powers, cannot, while executing, be enforced in any other jurisdiction than his own. But when rights are matured or perfected in pursuance of such power, they should be respected everywhere. Judge Butler, in Carmichael v. Ray, 1 Rich. 116, fully states the principle in the following language: "If a foreign administrator has, in virtue of his administration, reduced the personal property of the deceased there situated into his possession, so that he has acquired the legal title thereto according to the laws of that country, if that property should afterward be found in another country or be carried away and converted against his will, he may maintain a suit for it there in his own name, for he is, to all intents and purposes, the owner thereof." If, then, the title acquired through his administration when perfected by reducing to possession be respected, and can be protected everywhere, surely the obligations imposed upon him as the consequence of obtaining such title, must accompany the right wherever it goes, and if the one can be vindicated the other can be enforced.

There are, indeed, many instances where, on grounds of public policy, one state will not enforce rights of a particular class matured under the laws of another state, but no means appear for drawing the case of the duty of an administrator to apply the assets received by him in the due course of administration within this class of exceptions. What ground there exists for saying that an administrator may come into the courts of the state to vindicate his title matured under the laws of another state, and yet cannot be brought before the courts of the state to answer for the proper disposition of said property under the laws by means of which it was acquired? It may and should be conceded on the principles already stated, that a foreign administrator cannot be *held to account for foreign assets that he has never reduced to possession, on the ground that his conduct was in violation of the laws of the state under which he derived his administration, for that would be to put in exercise those laws which can only be accomplished by the jurisdiction to which they appertain; but where he has reduced assets to possession, and his duty springs out of and is commensurate with his title, no good reason appears why he may not be compelled to account for such assets in any state that may chance to have jurisdiction of the proper parties and the assets the subject of controversy.

*425

On the other hand, to deny under such circumstances a remedy in the courts of a foreign state, might amount to the loss of all remedy whatever. When the intestate was domiciled in the state where such remedy is sought, and the assets and the person of the foreign administrator are there present, and the distributees are residents thereof, unless the remedy can be there obtained it may be impossible to obtain it anywhere.

McNamara v. Dwyer, 7 Paige 239, a case decided by Chancellor Walworth, fully sustains these principles, although in that case the remedy was sought at the place of an ancillary administrator, and not, as in the present case, at the domicil of the intestate. The reasoning of that case is irresistible. Unfortunately, the conclusion of that case is misstated in the head note of its report.

Conover v. Chapman, 2 Bail. 436. In looking into this case for another purpose, we found that it was said that the ancillary administrator could not be held accountable, except in the courts of that jurisdiction. It does not appear that any person interested in the ancillary administration as a creditor entitled to be paid thereunder, was a party to that case. It is only one entitled to a remedy in the courts of the ancillary state against the administrator there localized who could claim such a remedy in any foreign state, by reason of the presence in such state of the parties and the subject of controversy. It follows that as no one of the parties had a right to complain of the manner in which the ancillary administration in Maryland had been conducted, that the court merely intended to say that the proper jurisdiction of that question was in Maryland, and not to exclude the idea that a *demand primarily cognizable in the courts of Maryland could become, under possible circumstances, cognizable in the courts of South Carolina.

*426

Collins v. Bankhead, 1 Strob. 25. It is said in this case that there is a general liability on the part of the ancillary administration to account to the original administrator for the ancillary administration. This statement should doubtless be qualified in the manner already indicated, but it certainly covers the general idea that such an accountability is possible, and, such being the case, where the ancillary administrator and the domestic administrator are one person, clearly that liability could be inferred under the limitations already stated at the demand of domestic creditors or distributees in the domestic forum.

Carmichael v. Ray, 1 Rich. 116, while recognizing the responsibility of an ancillary administrator in respect of foreign assets reduced to possession there, properly holds that the courts of the domicil cannot aid such ancillary administrator to reduce such foreign assets to possession, even though such assets may be found at the place of domicil. This conclusion is in accordance with the principle that public powers, such as the case holds the powers of an administrator to be, cannot, while executory be enforced by a foreign jurisdiction.

Campbell v. Tousey, 7 Cow. 64. A Pennsylvania executor was, in this case, held responsible to account in New York for Pennsylvania assets, received in that character. The court held that he could not be charged as executor as he had no such authority in New York, but that he was liable to account therefor as executor, de son tort, for such Pennsylvania assets. The difficulty in the explanation of this ground of accountability was noticed by Chancellor Walworth in McNamara v. Dwyer, already commented upon, but he did not undertake to develop his objection. It is obvious that to charge one as executor, de son tort, it must appear that he obtained assets by an act of wrong; but this cannot be affirmed of one who, by the laws of a country to which he was at the time amenable, and having jurisdiction of such assets, is clothed with authority over the same. The conclusion that such action should be maintained against the defendants as executor, de son tort, appears to have been forced out *of respect to the principle that a foreign executor has, as such, no standing in the domestic forum to enforce his powers as such. That is, indeed, true, but does not interfere with his accountability, based on his duty by reason of assets reduced to possession, to properly apply them in the course of administration, for the remedy in that case is upon his individual duty. When he is before the court for such a purpose, it is his powers and obligations, consummate through his authority as an executor, that is the subject of controversy.

*427

Boston v. Boylston, 2 Mass. 384, was decided upon a Massachusetts statute, and is not recognized as a general authority.

Dawes v. Boylston, 9 Mass. 337, denies, in general terms, the right of the legatees in that case to pursue distribution in that ancillary jurisdiction, but places the conclusion on the ground that only a partial distribution could be effected in Massachusetts, and full administration only could be had at the domicil, which was England. This principle is not confined to the case of a foreign administration, but equally affects the right of seeking distribution in a case of purely domestic administration. This case cannot be regarded as going beyond the statement of an exception to the right of legatees to call the original executors to account within an ancillary jurisdiction, and is clearly no authority for the proposition that an ancillary administrator cannot be made to account for foreign assets in the jurisdiction of the domicil.

Richards v. Dutch, 8 Mass. 506. A Massachusetts administrator of a testator, domiciled in India, sued on a debt due to his testator in Massachusetts. The defendant attempted to show that the subject of the debt, namely, property of the testator in his possession, had been left as a legacy to him by the testator. The court treated the defence as if it had been an action by a legatee for a legacy, and, as such, denied that it could be maintained against an ancillary administrator. Nothing is said in the case about any assent of the foreign executor, and such assent does not appear to have been a matter at all considered. It may well be doubted whether the assent of the ancillary administrator could entitle the legatee to sue in a court of law. The real difficulties of the case appear not to have been developed, and it *cannot properly be regarded as an authority upon the matters under present consideration, as they were not involved in it.

*428

Dawes v. Head, 3 Pick. 128. The only point actually decided was that it was not a breach of the condition of the ancillary administrator's bond; that he had failed to pay a debt due to a foreign creditor, a resident of the country of the domicil of the foreign testator. It, therefore, can be regarded as no more than an exposition of the law of Massachusetts as it regards the extent of the objects to which ancillary administration, had in that state, primarily extends. The general discussion in that case does not profess to be material to the question then before the court; but, even if carrying authoritative weight, the conclusion arrived at that it is the duty of the ancillary administrator, after satisfying local debts, to transmit the residuum, does not even exclude the idea that the courts of that state obtaining jurisdiction over the foreign executor, and, having the assets in their jurisdiction, might proceed to make distribution according to the law of the domicil of the testator or intestate. Much less would it exclude the idea that the courts of the domicil, having jurisdiction of the person of an ancillary administrator and control of the assets, might proceed to adjust the accountability of each ancillary administrator at least to the extent of the assets within its control.

Fay v. Haven, 3 Metc. 109. The defendant was both administrator of the domicil and ancillary administrator in Massachusetts, and it was held that he was not bound to account in the latter place for assets received in Louisiana, the place of domicil. This case is consistent with the proposition already stated, that when an ancillary administrator is sued in his own jurisdiction, he sufficiently accounts for foreign assets received in the character of a foreign administrator by showing that these assets are in the course of administration in the proper jurisdiction to which they appertain. It was not a case where the court was proceeding with reference to assets within its control.

Harvey v. Richards, 1 Mason 381 [Fed. Cas. No. 6,184], decided by Judge Story in the United States Circuit Court, must be regarded as an exposition of the laws of Massachusetts, and that case holds that where there was ancillary administration in Massachusetts of the *estate of one domiciled, at his death, in Calcutta, and leaving a will there, under which executors had qualified, such ancillary administrator could be compelled to distribute the Massachusetts assets there, when the necessary parties were all before it, and the circumstances of the case were such that complete distribution could be made. If the ancillary jurisdiction could be extended thus far, clearly a similar exercise of authority would be competent on the part of the jurisdiction of this domicil having the legatees or distributees and the foreign ancillary administrator and the assets before it.

*429

Goodall v. Marshall, 11 N. H. 88 This case did not involve the present question but gave deliberate consideration to the general question. Chief Justice Parker recognizes that special circumstances may warrant the assumption of jurisdiction by the courts of the ancillary administration in decreeing distribution, citing for that purpose Harvey v. Richards, and various other cases.

Pipon v. Pipon, Amb. 25, holds that distributees have no right to file a bill for a partial settlement of the estate merely, and this conclusion is placed upon the language of an English statute.

Tourton v. Flower, 3 P. Wms. 369, was decided upon a ground that appears to imply that a bill might properly be filed in England against an ancillary administrator there for the distribution of the estate of one domiciled in France, at his death, who left a will under which executors qualified.

It must be concluded that the proposition that an ancillary administrator, resident within the jurisdiction of the domicil of the decedent, and having there assets of the decedent, may be compelled to account there for his administration of all assets under the control of that jurisdiction, is sustained by the authorities. It follows that the administrators in the present case were bound to account for the North Carolina assets in their possession, and it remains to consider under what law the distribution of such North Carolina assets must take place.

It is well settled that the assets of a decedent, found in any state or country, whether the domicil of such decedent or otherwise, are to be applied in a course of administration, under the *laws of such state, to the extent of the payment of all debts provided for by the laws of such state, and that all preferences allowed by such laws are to be respected. It is also well settled that where a residuum remains, after satisfying the purposes of ancillary administration, it must be distributed according to the law of the domicil of the decedent. It is only necessary to make a general reference to a few of the cases. Tucker v. Condy, 10 Rich. Eq. 16; Smith v. Bank, 5 Pet. 518 [8 L. Ed. 212]; Lawrence v. Elmendorf, 5 Barb. 73; Goodall v. Marshall, 11 N. H. 85.

*430

The assets brought into this state by the administrators must be accounted for and distributed in this action as it regards North Carolina debts, according to the laws of the State of North Carolina.

The exceptions to the decree, so far they relate to the rule of administration, must be overruled.

The appellant excepted to the decree on the ground that a credit to the amount $325 was not allowed. No evidence appears showing that the objects for which that amount was paid were proper for such payment. Without such proof the item could not be allowed. The exception as to the item of $1217.25 does not appear in the exceptions to the report of the referee, and cannot, therefore, be noticed; and in addition to this there is no evidence that the amount thus paid was applied to proper objects.

The decree must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 430

(Case No. 866.)

CARROLL v. STILL.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Bills and Notes ⟸456.]

Where a sealed note, payable to A, as administrator, &c., has been transferred to B, who thereby became the legal owner and holder of it, an action on the note may be maintained in the name of "A, as administrator, &c., who sues for the sole use and benefit of B."

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hill v. Hill, 51 S. C. 139, 28 S. E. 309; Barnwell v. Marion, 54 S. C. 228, 32 S. E. 313.

For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1418; Dec. Dig. ⟸456.]

*431

*Before Townsend, J., Edgefield, October, 1877.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. J. Norris, for appellant, cited Code, § 134; 6 S. C. 184; 25 N. Y. 625; 6 Wall. 134.

Mr. J. L. Addison, contra, cited Code, § 136; 6 S. C. 119.

April 24th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This action was brought by James P. Carroll, administrator of Preston S. Brooks, deceased, who sues in this behalf for the sole use and benefit of Robert G. M. Dunovant against Elijah Still, upon a note under seal, given to James P. Carroll, as administrator. The defendant filed what was styled a demurrer, in these words: "That if R. G. M. Dunovant is the holder and owner of said note, the action should have been in his name; and if J. P. Carroll, as administrator, is the holder and owner of said note, then the action should have been brought in his name." This demurrer was overruled, and the defendant appeals to this court.

The demurrer does not "distinctly specify the grounds of objection to the complaint," but states them hypothetically, and might have been disregarded. Code, § 168. We will, however, consider it as if it specified distinctly the ground of objection to the complaint under sub-division 2 of the Chapter on Demurrers, viz.: "That the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue." Demurrers upon purely technical grounds are not favored, and the real question in the case is, not who ought to have brought the action, but whether, as it has been brought, it can be sustained upon principle and authority.

From the earliest history of this state down to the year 1870, when the code of procedure was adopted, the payee of a bond or note under seal, not being negotiable and not assigned under the act of 1798, was held to have the legal interest and to be the proper person to sue upon it, whether it had been transferred or not. That was not only the universal practice, but the only way in which such an obligation could be enforced in a law court.

*432

*The code of procedure made the following provisions on the subject: "Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in Section 136." Code, § 134; Gen. Stat. 594. The section referred to as making exceptions provides as follows: "An executor or administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section, shall be construed to include a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another."

The latter provision expressly covers the case of a bond given to an administrator, and why may not this action, in accordance therewith, be prosecuted in the name of James P. Carroll, as administrator, without reference as to who is the real party in interest? It was insisted that the exception does not include this case, for the reason that "Dunovant is a stranger to the administration of the estate of Brooks, and that the action is not brought by J. P. Carroll for any purpose connected with his trust as administrator," but it was stated on the other side with equal confidence, "that the note was turned over to Dunovant, as guardian for the eldest daughter of P. S. Brooks, deceased, as part of her distributive share of her father's estate, and that the note was never the private property of Dunovant." These statements are decidedly conflicting, but the court cannot accept either as affecting the judgment. The demurrer admits the truth of the statements in the complaint, and these are the only facts which are before us.

The complaint states that the instrument sued on is a note under seal; that it was given to James P. Carroll, as administrator of P. S. Brooks, deceased; and that it had been transferred for a valuable consideration to Dunovant, who is now the legal owner and holder of the same, whose name is also on the record as beneficiary plaintiff. In this state of facts, we do not see why the plaintiff, James P. Carroll, may not maintain the suit as administrator. The exception in the code contains no qualification limiting the right to "purposes connected with the trust of administration," and we are not to assume any such thing. The *defendant does not deny his obligation to pay the note. No substantial right is involved. The case of Sullivan v. Hellams, 6 S. C. 184, is not analogous, for there the note was given to G. W. Sullivan in his individual capacity, and, therefore, never came within the exception. The case of Billings v. Williamson, 6 S. C. 119, is in point. That was the case of a bond given to Billings, as commissioner in equity, who had no interest in it except as a trustee of an express trust, and the bond had been transferred by operation of law to the clerk; yet the court sustained the action in the name of Billings, the payee, even after his office of commissioner had been abolished. In that case the court say: "It is possible that a strict compliance with mere technical form would have been better fulfilled if the complaint had been brought in the name of the clerk." So we may say in this case, that it is possible it would have been more technically correct if the action had been brought in the name of Dunovant; but the code declares, without qualification or limitation, that in such a case the administrator "may sue," and we are not to narrow, by construction, the express statutory provision, whether the administrator has or has not transferred the equitable interest in the single bill so made payable to him, and on that account falling within the exception.

*433

The order below is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 433

(Case No. 867.)

WATSON v. COLUMBIA BRIDGE COMPANY.

(November Term, 1879.)

[Mechanics' Liens ⟸292.]

A, having purchased all the shares of an incorporated bridge company, hypothecated the stock and mortgaged the property to secure certain notes, and, after that, contracted with a builder to repair the bridge. For a balance due for such repairs, the builder, within the time required by statute, filed the notice and petition necessary to secure a mechanics' lien, and obtained judgment thereon against A in his own name, with a decree for the sale of the bridge to satisfy the lien. The shares of stock were after*wards sold under a power given by A at the time of their hypothecation, and the purchasers, claiming to be the corporators, resisted payment of the decree. Upon action brought a year afterwards against the corporation in their corporate name to have this decree enforced against the bridge property—

*434

Held, that a decree in this action directing its sale for the satisfaction of the lien, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Roberts, 19 S. C. 157; Green v. Iredell, 31 S. C. 595, 10 S. E. 545.

For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 599 605, 607, 610; Dec. Dig. ⟸292.]

Before Wallace, J., Richland, July, 1879.

This case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Melton & Clark, for appellant.

Mr. J. D. Pope, contra.

April 26th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. The Columbia Bridge Company was incorporated, and, up to the close of the war, owned the bridge across the Congaree river at the foot of Gervais street, and known as the "Columbia Bridge." In the month of February, the bridge was burned, and the stock became almost worthless. In 1872, John L. Neagle purchased all the shares of stock in the company, and then, having full control as the only stockholder, rebuilt the bridge on the old site.

In the spring of 1873, he hypothecated with the receiver of the bank of the state two hundred shares of the stock as collateral security for a loan of $10,000, and in the summer of the same year, he executed a mortgage to L. D. Childs, as trustee, under his own hand and in his individual name, of the entire bridge property, and by the said deed hypothecated nine hundred and twenty-two and one-half shares of the stock to secure a loan from the Carolina National Bank of $30,000. In 1875, Neagle contracted with Mayhew & Co., mechanics, to repair the western abutment of the bridge, which had been damaged. The work was completed in August, and within thirty days thereafter Mayhew & Co. filed a notice for the purpose of securing a mechanics' lien on the bridge property upon which the work was done.

*435

*Within six months after the completion of the work, they filed their petition to enforce the lien against "J. L. Neagle," who did not resist the claim, and February, 1876, Judge Carpenter gave judgment for $424.20, and in May thereafter, Judge Cooke, sitting for Richland county, decreed that the bridge property should be sold in satisfaction of the lien established as stated. Afterwards, the sheriff advertised the property for sale, but for some reason he did not sell it. In November, 1877, the shares of stock pledged to the bank, and Childs, were sold under powers in the transfer, and purchased by Johnson and others, who now claim, by virtue of the ownership of these shares, to be the company, and in the name of the charter title, the "Columbia Bridge Company," resist the sale under the decree aforesaid. This and the judgment have been assigned to John L. Watson, and he, as assignee, brought this action to enforce the decree against the "Columbia Bridge Company," and to have the bridge property sold. The Circuit judge decreed for the plaintiff, and ordered the bridge sold in satisfaction of the lien. From that decree the "Columbia Bridge Company" appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because the complaint states no cause of action against the defendant.

2. "Because the plaintiff has no right which can be enforced by this form of action.

3. "Because, if the said John L. Neagle so represented the corporation as that it should have become bound by a judgment rendered in an action in which the said Neagle, in his own person, was defendant, the authority of the latter would certainly be sufficient to bind the corporation by his deed, and the mortgage to Childs, trustee, carried the entire estate of the corporation."

As to this last exception, the proposition stated is correct, but we do not see its application. We do not understand that any one is before the court setting up the mortgage executed to L. D. Childs, trustee. If so, that would present no good ground against the sale of the property, but as to the disposition of the proceeds of sale it would raise a nice question of priorities under the ninth section of the mechanics' act. Gen. Stat. 550.

*436

*The brief contains nothing on the subject, but it was stated at the bar that the Childs' mortgage was paid in full by the sale of the stock hypothecated. That being the case, the mortgage is discharged and we need not further consider the third exception; the purchaser cannot take the stock, and at the same time set up the mortgage which was paid by the sale of the stock. The plaintiff is assignee of Mayhew & Co., and as such is entitled to all the rights which his assignors had at the time of the assignment and no more. The defendant has the right to ask that the case shall be considered as if the action were brought in the name of Mayhew & Co., and there is no question of counterclaim in the case, we will so consider it. As to the point made by the first exception that "the complaint states no cause of action against the defendants." As we understand it, this is not an original petition to enforce lien under the mechanics' act before cited; if so, it would be too late as that act declares that "unless the suit for enforcing the lien is commenced within six months, &c., the lien shall be dissolved." The petition required by that act was filed and the lien established and sale of the property ordered. That order was analogous to a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, and as there was no appeal, all the points now made as to alleged irregularities in the lien must be regarded as adjudged, if the cause of action was substantially the same in that action as in this. "The rule in these cases is that a point once adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, however erroneous the adjudication, may be relied upon as an estoppel in any subsequent suit in the same or any other court at law or in chancery when either parties or the privies of either allege anything inconsistent with it, and this, too, whether the suit is upon the same or a different cause of action." Bigelow on Estop., 45.

It is manifest that the cause of action sued upon in the case against Neagle is substantially the same as stated in this. The court does not see that any obstacle has been interposed to the enforcement of the decree already rendered so as to make an actual case, and there is no propriety in giving judgment in a matter which has been already adjudged. But it does appear that the enforcement of the order of sale in the first case is resisted on the ground that the property of the corporation can*not be sold under an order rendered in a case against "J. L. Neagle" individually. This may be equivalent to a complaint on the part of the defendants to enjoin the sale of the bridge property under the decree, and in order to end the litigation, we will consider that actual issue as made. That decree may be enforced against the bridge property precisely as if the name of the "Columbia Bridge Company" instead of "J. L. Neagle" had been used as defendant. To establish a mechanics' lien it is not necessary that the contract for the work should be made with the owner of the property. It is sufficient if it is made "with any one rightfully acting for such owner," and where the work is done under such authority, the lien arises not ex contractu, but from doing the work. The claim is against the property in the nature of a proceeding in rem. After the petition is filed, the court, under the act, takes measures to have the proper parties notified. In this case Neagle was the owner, and was the only person who could be notified at the time the proceeding was instituted.

*437

Neither the hypothecation of the stock nor the mortgage of the property by Neagle divested his title until the stock was sold in 1877. He made the contract and was in possession; the right party was notified, and the objection is reduced to this, that he should have been sued as the "Columbia Bridge Company." Considering substance and disregarding mere form, the decree of sale in the case of Neagle may be enforced as if the defendant named had been the "Columbia Bridge Company." That is the truth of the matter, and the court can look to the real facts in the case. As Mr. Justice Miller says in the case of Miles v. Caldwell, 2 Wall. 35 [17 L. Ed. 755]: "Courts of equity are not restrained by technicalities but can look past the nominal parties to the real ones." Who are nominal and who are real parties have often been considered in questions of res adjudicata. The very point was decided in the case of Tate v. Hunter, 3 Strob. Eq. 136. Tate sued Cobb, sheriff, for money in his hands, and Cobb defended on the ground that the money was applicable to an execution of A. Hunter, and that issue was decided for the sheriff, and afterwards Tate sued Hunter himself, and the court held that the cause of action was the same, and that in the first suit, *Cobb was the technical, but Hunter the real party in interest, Chancellor Dargan says: "The general rule certainly is that the judgment of a competent court is binding and conclusive upon the parties, and will not be reviewed or reversed by any court possessing jurisdiction. * * * The subject matter and the issue are precisely the same with those in the former trial. The complaints are the same and the defendant is substantially the same. The only question worthy to be considered is whether this is a case between the same parties as those in the case of Tate v. Cobb, sheriff, tried at law. Upon this point, as already intimated, I have a very decided opinion. The sheriff, in that case, was merely a nominal party, and the defendant in this case was the real party in interest. The sheriff is the agent of the plaintiff in execution. As was said in the Duchess of Kingston's case, the court will take notice of the real parties to the suit. Such also was the doctrine held in the King's Bench in Kernerly v. Orsse, 2 Doug. 517."

*438

There is another view. If we look behind the corporate title, which is a mere name to the real litigations, we find that the defendants are the successors of Neagle and his privies. Neagle owned all the stock. He was in possession of the bridge which he had built. He had the repairs made, and a lien for their value had been established during his ownership. He owned all the shares, including the very shares which the defendants subsequently purchased at a sale authorized by him, and, therefore, from him as sole owner. They are in under him as stockholders—as his privies—and are estopped from denying his acts or a decree founded on them. "If the subject of the former action is the title to land, a decision thereon would conclude all parties having purchased after judgment from parties bound by that judgment." State, ex rel. Brown, v. C. & L. R. R. Co., ante p. 290. There is a difference between the stock of the company and its property. The title of the property is in the corporation and not in the stockholders individually, whose right to control it is through action of the corporators.

The stock may change hands and bring in new members, but they take their interest subject to lien placed upon the property by their predecessors. The present defendants purchased the stock *of J. L. Neagle, and they cannot repudiate by using the corporate title, a lien placed upon the property through him.

*439

The Circuit decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. 439

STATE v. McKETTRICK.

(April Term, 1880.)

[Criminal Law ⟸1023.]

The sentence of the prisoner in the Court of General Sessions is the final judgment, from which alone an appeal may be taken.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Prater, 27 S. C. 600, 4 S. E. 562; Archer v. Long, 46 S. C. 295, 24 S. E. 83; State v. Burbage, 51 S. C. 286, 28 S. E. 937; State v. Stephenson, 54 S. C. 239, 32 S. E. 305; State v. Hughes, 56 S. C. 543, 35 S. E. 214; State v. Byars, 79 S. C. 175, 60 S. E. 448.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2596; Dec. Dig. ⟸1023.]

[For subsequent opinion, see 14 S. C. 346.]

Upon the call of this case upon the docket of the Supreme Court, it appeared that the appellant had been convicted of an assault and battery in the Court of General Sessions for Abbeville county, at September Term, 1879; but the presiding judge refused to sentence him, as an appeal was to be taken.

This court declined to hear the appeal, as there was no final judgment from which alone an appeal would lie; the sentence of the court being, in such cases, the final judgment.

13 S. C. 439

(Case No. 870.)

BALLE v. MOSELEY.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Pleading ⟸72.]

A complaint cannot be held on demurrer to be defective in not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because that it contains no prayer for relief.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Williams v. Irby, 16 S. C. 374; Butler v. Williams, 27 S. C. 225, 3 S. E. 211; Westlake v. Farrow, 34 S. C. 273, 13 S. E. 469; McMakin v. Fowler, 34 S. C. 289, 13 S. E. 534; Lassiter v. Okeetee Club, 70 S. C. 107, 49 S. E. 224.

For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 143; Dec. Dig. ⟸72.]

[2. Pleading ⟸199.]

[Cited in Kennerty v. Etiwan Phosphate Co., 17 S. C. 416, 43 Am. Rep. 607, to the point that an objection by demurrer may be made after issue joined.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 464–469; Dec. Dig. ⟸199.]

Before Wallace, J., Laurens, February, 1880.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court. Defendant appealed from the order of the Circuit judge, holding the complaint to be sufficient to sustain a judgment.

Messrs. Pope & Watts, for appellants, cited

*440

Code, § 165; 20 *How. Pr. 184; 24 Ib. 313; 19 Abb. 449; 1 Rob. 87; 2 Ib. 56; 15 Abb. 352.

Mr. James Farrow, contra.

The requisites of a complaint (Code, § 165,) as to demand for relief, is applicable only to cases in which a defendant does not answer. Sec. 299; 5 S. C. 8; 6 S. C. 130; 2 Abb. Forms 8, note. The demurrer here is not sustainable. 1 Abb. Forms 112, 113, note h. The relief awarded to plaintiff may be any consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue. Code, § 299; 2 Wait's Pr. 306; Bliss' Code Pl., § 404. Whether demanded or not. Bliss' Code Pl., § 161; Voorh. Code 425, a. Liberality of code in furtherance of justice. Secs. 182, 192, 193, 196, 199; Bliss' Code Pl., § 442; 2 Wait's Pr. 312. If it is a defect, the objection should have been raised on motion and before answer. 6 S. C. 137; 2 Wait's Pr. 334; Voorh. Code 202; Bliss' Code Pl., §§ 420, 435, 436, 442. And if well raised by demurrer, plaintiff should have leave to amend. Code, §§ 192, 193; Voorh. Code 262, h.

May 3d, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This action was brought to recover damages for a trespass alleged to have been committed by defendant in causing a bale of cotton to be taken from the possession of the plaintiff. The complaint, which is set out in the brief, alleges that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the bale of cotton; that defendant caused the same to be seized and taken from the possession of the Laurens Railroad Company, with whom it had been deposited by the plaintiff, and concludes in these words: "That the defendant, having obtained the possession of the said bale of cotton, did cause the said sheriff to sell the same as under a lien warrant, and thereby said defendant unlawfully converted and disposed of the same to his own use, to the damage of the plaintiff one hundred dollars." The defendant "answered the complaint as to the merits," but whether by a general denial or by alleging matters justifying the seizure, does not appear, nor is it important.

At the trial the defendant interposed the objection, by way of *demurrer, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the only omission claimed being that the complaint contained no demand for relief. Even conceding that the complaint is defective in not concluding with a formal demand for relief, the practical question in this case is, whether such defect rendered it amenable to the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demand for relief is not part of the cause of action, (Pom. on Rem., § 580, p. 630,) and, therefore, any defect in the form of such demand does not constitute any ground for the demurrer interposed in this case. 2 Wait's Pr. 452–3. It does not appear that any fact is omitted which is necessary to constitute the plaintiff's cause of action, and until this does appear there is no ground upon which a demurrer under sub-division 6 of Section 167 of the code, could be sustained. If the complaint is defective in that it does not comply with the requisites prescribed by sub-divisions 1 and 3 of Section 165 of the code, such defects afford no grounds for the demurrer interposed here; for that is the appropriate remedy only where the defect complained of is the omission to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

*441

In pursuance of these views the judgment of this court has already been entered, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 441

(Case No. 871.)

BARRETT v. WATTS.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇐333.]

An action was brought in the county of L, by the creditors of one deceased, to marshal assets, subject lands to the payment of debts, &c.; two tracts of the land lay in the county of L, and one of these tracts was claimed by one of the defendants, and another tract, which was claimed by other defendants, lay in the county of A. Held, that under an issue framed in this cause, the question of title to the lands in A might be tried in the county of L.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in New Home Sewing Machine Co. v. Wray, 28 S. C. 100, 5 S. E. 603; Wagener & Co. v. Swygert, 30 S. C. 302, 9 S. E. 107.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1372–1375; Dec. Dig. ⇐333.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⇐356.]

Held, further, that there was no misjoinder of actions in the complaint. Suber v. Allen, ante p. 317, approved.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sheppard v. Green, 48 S. C. 174, 26 S. E. 224.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1463–1467; Dec. Dig. ⇐356.]

*442

[3. Courts ⇐153.]

*The Court of Common Pleas is a court of general jurisdiction, and has power to try all cases, except such as are specially excluded from its jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ex parte Ware Furniture Co., 49 S. C. 28, 27 S. E. 9.

For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 375; Dec. Dig. ⇐153.]

[This case is also cited in New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Wray, 28 S. C. 86, 5 S. E. 603, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Wallace, J., Laurens, February, 1880.

Action commenced 1876 by Elizabeth C. Barrett in behalf of herself and all others, creditors of Richard Watts, deceased, against John B. Watts, in his own right, and as executor of Richard Watts, and other defendants. The appeal was taken by the plaintiff and one of the defendants. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Pope & Watts, Caldwell, Ball, for appellants.

Messrs. J. R. Abney and James Farrow, contra.

May 3d, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The object of this action was to marshal the assets of the estate of Richard Watts, obtain an order for the sale of his lands, call in his creditors and provide for the payment of such claims as might be established against his estate. The deceased, at the time of his death, was domiciled in Laurens county, and the complaint, which was filed in the Court of Common Pleas for Laurens county, alleged that he died seized and possessed of lands, both in Laurens and in Abbeville counties—two tracts in Laurens and one in Abbeville—as well as personal property alleged to be insufficient for the payment of his debts. Two of the defendants, devisees of the testator, by their answers set up title to the Abbeville tract under a parol gift from the testator perfected by adverse possession, and the executor, who was also a defendant and devisee, set up a similar claim to one of the Laurens tracts. The other tract in Laurens has been sold under an order heretofore granted in this cause, and all the other substantial matters in the case have been heretofore disposed of, except the question raised by some of the defendants as to the title to the Abbeville land, the claim to the remaining tract in Laurens, and the accounting by the executor *for the rents of the Laurens lands. At the last February Term of the Court of Common Pleas for Laurens county, the attorneys for the appellants "moved for a trial by the jury of that court of the issues of fact material to the question of title in controversy between the appellants and the respondent, as such issues should be agreed upon by counsel or settled by the presiding judge." The counsel for the parties who set up a claim to the Abbeville land "raised a question as to the jurisdiction of the court and moved to dismiss the complaint as to the Abbeville tract, on the ground that the land in controversy, being situate in Abbeville county, the title to the same could not, by law, be tried or determined by a jury of a court of Laurens county." The Circuit judge held "that the Court of Common Pleas for Laurens county had no jurisdiction to try, by a jury or otherwise, the title to the lands in Abbeville county and refused either to refer issues to the jury or to dismiss the complaint as to the Abbeville land, and left the cause in statu quo, except so far as the adjudication of want of jurisdiction in that court was concerned." From such ruling this appeal is taken upon grounds stated in the brief, which it is not necessary to set out here, as the only point ruled by the court, which is questioned by the appeal, is, whether, in the case as made, the court in Laurens had jurisdiction, in any form, to determine the question raised as to the title to the Abbeville land.

*443

The Court of Common Pleas being a court of general jurisdiction, it is incumbent upon those who deny its jurisdiction in any particular case to point out the constitutional or statutory provision which abridges such general jurisdiction. It is not pretended that there is any provision in the constitution which would have such an effect, and the only statutory provision relied upon for the purpose is that contained in Section 146 of the code of procedure, which is as follows: "Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial, in the cases provided by Statute 1; for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination, in any form, of such right or interest," &c. It will be observed that the language is where "the subject of the action, or some part *thereof, is situated," &c. So that the inquiries in this case, are: 1. What was the subject of this action. 2. Whether any part thereof was situated in Laurens county. It is very clear that the subject of this action is the property, both real and personal, of which it is alleged the deceased debtor died seized and possessed, and not merely that portion of it situated in Abbeville, and it is conceded that "some part thereof"—and much the larger part—is situated in Laurens county. It follows, therefore, that this provision of the code cannot have the effect claimed for it.

*444

It may be, that, upon a proper showing, in a case like the one under consideration, it would be proper to order the trial of the issue raised as to title to be had in the county where the land lies, in analogy to the provision made for the change of the place of trial, but that is a matter which should be addressed to the discretion of the Circuit Court and is not before us for our consideration.

It may be, also, that before ordering a sale of the lands to which claims are set up by some of the devisees, that it would be proper, first, to exhaust the assets which have come, or should have come, into the hands of the executor, and that for this purpose the executor should first be required to account for the rents and profits of the Laurens land, but that, too, is a matter for the Circuit Court and is not before us for our consideration.

The position taken by respondents in the argument that two causes of action which cannot be properly united are really involved in this case, cannot be maintained. What constitutes the cause of action in cases of this kind has been so fully and clearly stated in the recent case of Suber v. Allen, ante p. 317, that it is not necessary to repeat it here; and from the principles there laid down, it is quite clear that two causes of action are not involved in this case.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case remanded to the Court of Common Pleas for Laurens county for such further proceedings as may be necessary under the views herein announced.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *445

*(Case No. 872.)

NIMMONS v. STEWART.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Costs ⇐103.]

Where an action is instituted in the court of equity for the benefit of persons unable to contract for themselves or by one of a class for the benefit of all, the fees and costs should be apportioned and paid out of funds which the litigation has brought under the control of the court.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Westmoreland v. Martin, 24 S. C. 240; Buist v. Williams, 81 S. C. 499, 62 S. E. 859.

For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 398; Dec. Dig. ⇐103.]

[2. Equity ⇐402.]

A reference to ascertain what would be a reasonable fee in such cases is only to inform the conscience of the judge, and parties in the cause have no right to notice of the reference.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hubbard v. Camperdown Mills, 25 S. C. 496, 505, 1 S. E. 5; State v. Port Royal & Augusta R. R. Co., 45 S. C. 467, 23 S. E. 380.

For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 874; Dec. Dig. ⇐402.]

[3. Attorney and Client ⇐155.]

[The trustee of an idiot, for whom a charge of $2,000 was made upon land for her support, obtained a decree for the sale of the land, and the setting apart of $2,000 of the proceeds, the interest of which was to be appropriated to the support of the idiot. Held, that $200 should be allowed out of the $2,000, as a fee for the trustee's attorney.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. ⇐155.]

[4. Attorney and Client ⇐130.]

[Cited in Ex parte Fort, 36 S. C. 25, 15 S. E. 332; Park v. Laurens, 68 S. C. 218, 46 S.

E. 1012, to the point that a claim for professional services as between attorney and client rests upon contract express or implied.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 292, 293, 295, 296, 306, 307, 311; Dec. Dig. ⟸130.]

[This case is also cited in Westmoreland v. Martin, 24 S. C. 238, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Aldrich, J., Pickens, June, 1879.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. E. Earle, for appellants, cited the code of procedure, Section 278 as amended, and Section 296.

May 3d, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This case was submitted without a word of argument of any kind whatever, and we know nothing of the circumstances except what we find in the brief.

It seems that Isaac Anderson executed to the son, John F. Anderson, a conveyance of a tract of land in Pickens county, containing fifteen hundred and sixty acres, more or less, not however, to take effect in possession during the lives of the donor and his wife, and also upon the further condition that his idiotic daughter, Mary, should have a support for life out of the said land; and if the donee, John F. Anderson, should fail to give a good and sufficient support to Mary, then the sum of $2000, charged upon the said land, was to be set apart to Hester Nimmons and Alpha Barton, as trustees, for the support of Mary. That Hester Nimmons, the plaintiff, alone accepted the trust, and the life tenants, as well as the donee, John F. Anderson, having died, she, in the double character of one of the heirs of Isaac Anderson and as trustee for the idiot daughter, Mary, in*stituted these proceedings, first, for the partition of the land; and, second, to raise the $2000 charged thereon for the support of Mary, "her cestui que trust."

*446

The case was heard as a proceeding in equity by Judge Aldrich, who rendered a decree in which he ordered the lands sold for partition and the proceeds divided among those entitled, except as to the amount of $2000 of the purchase money, (less the counsel fee of $200, hereafter referred to, which was to be paid in cash,) which was directed to be secured by bond and mortgage of the purchaser, and the interest thereon, as it should accrue to be paid semi-annually to Hester Nimmons, as trustee of Mary, during her life, and after her death, the corpus, reduced to $1800 by the fee aforesaid, to be distributed among the parties in interest. The decree was equivalent to a sale of the land and the investment, under the orders of the court, of $1800 of the purchase money, the interest of which was to support Mary during her life, and at her death to be distributed among those entitled in remainder.

The decree contained an order referring it to the clerk of the court to inquire and report what would be a reasonable fee for the professional services of the attorney of Hester Nimmons, the plaintiff, which was directed, as before stated, to be paid out of $2000 set apart for Mary. At the time the decree was signed, the clerk's report, which was prepared in advance, was read, reporting the evidence and recommending a fee of $200, which was adopted, and that amount ordered to be paid the attorney of the plaintiff.

The defendants, who are entitled to the said fund at the death of Mary, appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because the court erred in confirming the report of the referee allowing a fee of $200 to the plaintiff's attorney, the reference having been held and the report therein confirmed before any order of reference was made.

2. "Because the court erred in confirming said report, the reference having been held without any notice to the appellant or his attorney.

3. "Because the said fee is excessive.

*447

*4. "Because the court erred in allowing said fee out of the corpus of the trust fund, the remaining portion of the tract of land out of which the trust fund arises being left undisposed of in any manner."

The general rule certainly is, that a claim for professional services, as between attorney and client, like other claims for services, must rest on the contract of the parties, express or implied, and can only be established on proof of such contract against the party who makes the engagement; but there are exceptions to this rule on the equity side of the court. The well-established practice of the court of equity, as to costs and fees, differs, in several particulars, from the rule of law. In equity, costs, as between "party and party," are entirely within the discretion of the court, and as to fees between "solicitor and client," there are cases in which, from the character of the parties or the nature of the proceeding, the court will make provision for the payment of proper charges for professional services rendered in the proceedings which have taken place in the court, as where the parties for whose benefit the services are rendered are infants, lunatics, or from any other cause are not capable of contracting, or where the parties are numerous and have an interest in common, for the benefit of which professional services are rendered, at the instance of one or more of the parties interested. In such cases as this, the court generally deems it just and equitable that services rendered for the benefit of the common interest should, as upon a quantum meruit, be paid for out of the common fund, and will, upon a proper showing, so order, if the fund or property, the subject of litigation, is under the control of the court, as, for example, in suits of trustees, agents, &c., in creditors' suits, for the administration of the estates of deceased debtors. The expenses of a suit for an account and distribution of estates, must be discharged out of the general estate. 2 Daniell's Ch. Pl. & Pr.; Minuse v. Cox, 5 Johns. Ch. 451.

The code of procedure repealed the laws in force at its adoption, upon the subject of costs, and changed the principle upon which they are allowed, but at the same time it provides "additional allowances in any action for the partition of real prop*erty." Gen. Stat. 651, § 334. The recent act altering the code as to costs, does not affect this question. It has been held that these provisions, in the New York code, do not affect the equitable power of the court to grant counsel fees out of a common fund belonging to the parties, as part of the relief which should be given on the final disposition of the cause. Hotaling v. Marsh, 14 Abb. 161; 3 Wait's Pr. 494.

*448

This was a proceeding in equity. Whether regarded as instituted by Hester Nimmons, as trustee, to raise the fund charged on the land for the support of her cestui que trust, Mary, or as heir-at-law of Isaac Anderson, for partition of the land, she was successful in both aspects of the action, and her expenses in having the proceedings conducted should be reimbursed either out of the interest for the support of Mary, or the proceeds of the sale under the prayer for partition. Certainly the whole expenses should not be thrown upon the interest set apart for the support of Mary. Part was so charged, and the remainder upon the general fund in court, which was within the discretion and judgment of the Circuit judge, without making any reference upon the subject. He was familiar with the facts of the case. He had the right to decide what interest should be charged with the expenses in whole or in part, and he might also have fixed the amount of the fee without reference; but for his own satisfaction, he referred it to the clerk to "ascertain and report what would be a reasonable fee for the plaintiff's attorney." This was not one of those references of which the parties had a right to notice. It was really ex parte, and intended only to inform the conscience of the judge. The evidence reported satisfied him. He adopted it and made his decree that $200 should be paid to the plaintiff's attorney, who had conducted the proceedings, out of the corpus fund of the court, and we cannot say that this was error. The evidence reported by the referee is not in the brief, and we cannot consider the question whether the fee for the services rendered was excessive. Both the referee and Circuit judge concur as to the amount, and in that case it would require the strongest evidence to reverse the decree, if the question were before us. So far as we can judge *from the nature of the case and the amount involved, the fee does not seem to be excessive.

*449

The decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 449

(Case No. 873.)

VERNER v. DOWNS.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐241.]

A judgment creditor is not entitled to a decree adjudging a deed of conveyance made by his debtor to be fraudulent, until there has been return of nulla bona to an execution issued [upon] the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Burch v. Brantley, 20 S. C. 508; National Bank of Newberry v. Kinard, 28 S. C. 111, 113, 5 S. E. 464; Compton v. Patterson, 28 S. C. 154, 5 S. E. 470.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 720; Dec. Dig. ⇐241.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐1175.]

Plaintiffs not claiming that the deficient evidence could be supplied, this court reversed the Circuit decree and dismissed the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4573–4587; Dec. Dig. ⇐1175.]

Before Mackey, J., Oconee, March, 1878.

This was an action commenced in 1876, by J. D. Verner and W. J. Stribling, constituting the firm of Verner & Stribling, against G. W. Downs, Sallie Downs, and W. T. Owens, to set aside as fraudulent a certain deed of conveyance of a tract of land, alleged to be the property of G. W. Downs, who was largely indebted to Verner & Stribling on notes and accounts, and upon which suit was then pending. That suit was instituted in 1875, and judgment was obtained in February, 1877, a year before the trial of this case. There was no proof of a return of nulla bona, or even of the issue of an execution, on this judgment. One of the plaintiffs testified that an attachment had been issued in the action on the money demand, and also that he had "failed to be able to make the money" on this judgment. The Circuit judge held that the deed was fraudulent and void, and ordered the land to be sold as the property of G. W. Downs. The defendants appealed, upon several grounds, only one of which has been considered by this court. It was as follows:

*450

*5. "Because the conclusion of his Honor, that the conveyance of the tract of land in question be, and the same is hereby declared fraudulent and void, is contrary to law and the evidence submitted to his Honor, the Circuit judge, in writing, upon the trial had in this action."

The ground taken in the opinion of this court was not noticed in the court below, nor in the arguments first submitted on the appeal; but, upon the hearing of the appeal, this court raised the question, whether the plaintiffs had sufficiently exhausted their legal remedies to entitle them to a recovery in this action; upon this question the respondents filed a supplemental argument.

Mr. S. P. Dendy, for appellant.

Mr. J. J. Norton, contra.

This court should not have raised the question. 4 S. C. 356; 2 Hill's Ch. 121; Code, §§ 192, 193. The rules laid down in 2 McC. Ch. 416; 14 Rich. Eq. 155, and 1 S. C. 192, are not conclusive against us. They were dismissed upon the ground that it was not shown that there was no adequate remedy at law, and they admit that such inadequacy may originate from various causes. See 4 Rich. Eq. 197; 14 Rich. Eq. 154, note; 4 S. C. 293; 4 Johns. Ch. 619; Spears' Eq. 427. If objection is valid, we should be permitted to amend. 3 Strob. Eq. 330; 9 Rich. Eq. 337. The failure of the sheriff to make the money on attachment is as good as nulla bona to an execution. 2 Wait's A. & D. 414, 416, 417.

May 10th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This action is in the nature of a judgment creditor's bill to set aside a conveyance made to the defendant, S. Downs, the wife of the judgment debtor, on the ground that it was made to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of such judgment debtor. The decree appealed from adjudged the conveyance in question to be fraudulent and void. The fifth ground of appeal raised the objection that the decree, in adjudicating the conveyance fraudulent and void, "is contrary to law and the evidence." The objection renders it necessary for us to see *whether the evidence on which the decree was pronounced shows that the plaintiffs had an equity to demand the decree. It nowhere appears that an execution has been issued upon his judgment, and that it has been returned nulla bona in whole or in part. This is a fatal defect in showing that the plaintiff has a right to demand the aid of a court of equity in a creditor's bill inter vivos. Ragsdale v. Holmes, 1 S. C. 91. The proper remedy for a judgment creditor, for the enforcement of his judgment, is by execution in the court of law. It is only when he has exhausted that remedy without satisfying his debt, that he can demand the aid of a court of equity. The highest evidence of the exhaustion of such remedy is the record evidence offered by the returns of the sheriff upon the execution. The plaintiff, in producing such return of nulla bona, is not required to give independent proof of the solvency of his debtor. Enjoying the advantages arising from the simplicity and inexpensiveness of this means of exhibiting the condition of his debtor's estate, it is unreasonable to permit him to disregard these simple means of proof, and cast upon the court and the party the onerous issue of the insolvency of the defendant, upon general evidence. Hence it is that the courts of equity have held, as a rule of convenience, founded on the clearest reason and equity, that the plaintiff must issue his execution and procure its return, before applying to the court of equity for aid. Having failed to show, in the present case, that this step has been taken, the evidence shows no equity in the plaintiffs to demand the decree that has been pronounced, and it must be reversed.

*451

It is not claimed, at bar, that the deficient evidence can be supplied at the Circuit, and the bill must be dismissed.

Decree reversed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. *452

*(Case No. 874.)

STATE v. McNINCH.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Criminal Law ⟸1023.]

A refusal by the Circuit judge to grant a continuance in a criminal case, is not appealable.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Crawford v. Schmidt, 16 S. C. 634.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2585; Dec. Dig. ⟸1023.]

[2. Bail ⟸94.]

A rule issued by the Court of General Sessions against a defendant under indictment in that court, and his sureties, to show cause why their recognizance should not be estreated, is not appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. § 419; Dec. Dig. ⟸94.]

Before Aldrich, J., Laurens, February, 1879.

McNinch, Irby and Blackwell, were jointly indicted for murder. A severance was ordered, and McNinch was separately arraigned, tried and convicted. See 12 S. C. 89. The state then elected to proceed with the trial of Irby, who was out on bail, and thereupon his counsel moved for a continuance. Pending the discussion of this motion, the solicitor moved that the defendant be called, and urged that a motion for continuance could not be heard unless the defendant was in the power of the court instead of the custody of his bail. The court so ruled. The accused was called, but did not answer. At the same term of the court, a rule to show cause was issued against the defendant and his bail.

From the refusal to grant a continuance, and from the rule to show cause, the defendant, Irby, appealed.

Messrs. Pope, Baxter and Caldwell, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Ball, contra.

May 10th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The first objection made by the appeal is that the Circuit judge refused a motion for a continuance on a ground alleged to be erroneous. The case was in the Court of General Sessions upon an indictment for murder. The motion for a continuance is one addressed purely to the discretion of the *Circuit judge, and his decision on such motion is not subject to review in this court, even though his mind, in coming to this conclusion, may have been influenced by an erroneous view of the law. We cannot regard the alleged error of law before us for consideration.

*453

The appellant has brought before us for reversal an order to show cause granted by the Circuit Court against the defendant, and his sureties, why his bond should not be estreated. The rule to show cause is in the nature of process to compel a party to answer to some matter cognizable before the court issuing it, and is presumed to be issued ex parte. Either of these circumstances are sufficient to preclude an appeal to this court as they show conclusively that no action of the Circuit Court prejudicial to the minds of the defence of the party called up to answer has been taken.

The appeal must be dismissed but without prejudice to the rights of the appellants to appear and answer to the rule in the Court of General Sessions.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

13 S. C. 453

(Case No. 875.)

STATE v. WASHINGTON.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Criminal Law ⇐697.]

Alleged insufficiency of proof in a criminal case cannot be considered by this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1649; Dec. Dig. ⇐697.]

[2. Indictment and Information ⇐75.]

The certainty of an indictment for murder is not affected by the omission of the word "wound" where it should first occur in the sentence charging the prisoner with giving to the deceased "one mortal, of the length of one-eighth of an inch, and of the depth of one inch, of which said mortal wound" the deceased died. State v. Schroder, 3 Hill 61, approved.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Brown, 24 S. C. 225.

For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. ⇐75.]

[3. Criminal Law ⇐698.]

Incompetent testimony, not objected to at the time, becomes competent for that case.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Emory v. Hazard Powder Co., 22 S. C. 482, 53 Am. Rep. 730.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1651; Dec. Dig. ⇐698.]

[4. Homicide ⇐221.]

In a murder case it was properly left to the jury to determine whether the dying declarations of the deceased were statements of fact, or expressions of opinion, and what weight should be given to such testimony.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Nance, 25 S. W. 172.

For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 464; Dec. Dig. ⇐221.]

[5. Indictment and Information ⇐60.]

[The general rule in framing an indictment is that the offense shall be so described that the defendant may know how to answer it, the court what judgment to pronounce, and that a conviction or acquittal on it may be pleaded in bar to any other indictment for the same offense.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 182, 266, 267; Dec. Dig. ⇐60; Highways, Cent. Dig. § 182.]

[This case is also cited in State v. Green, 48 S. C. 148, 26 S. E. 234, as to the question of charging upon the facts.]

*454

*Before Fraser, J., Charleston, June, 1879.

To the statement of the case as given in the opinion of the court, it is only necessary to add that the indictment was in the usual form charging a murder committed with a gun, but in the following description, the word "wound," in brackets, was omitted:

"One mortal [wound] of the length of one-eighth of an inch, and of the depth of one inch, of which said mortal wound," &c. There was only one count in the indictment.

Mr. W. S. Montieth, for appellant, cited Wharton's Law of Homicide, §§ 835, 844; Archb. Cr. Pl. & Pr., tit. "Indictment."

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

Testimony not questioned as to competency at trial, cannot be objected to on appeal. 12 Abb. 227; 3 S. C. 448; 7 S. C. 290; 4 Strob. 58. The judgment cannot be arrested for insufficiency of proof. 1 S. C. 1. As to the dying declarations, see 15 Rich. 342. The indictment is sufficiently certain. 4 Bl. Com. 306; 1 Chitty on Cr. Law, 138; 2 Bail. 69; 1 T. R. 69; 5 East 260; 1 Green's Cr. R. 406; Riley 65; 5 T. R. 317; 3 McC. 190.

May 10th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. On the night of September 11th, 1877, Allen Collins, sitting in his own house near the Ten Mile Hill, in Charleston county, was shot in the leg by some unknown person who was outside of the house, but so near that powder was found on the side of the door and cloth wadding in the wound. The deceased, was, that night, carried to the Roper Hospital, in Charleston, where he received every attention, but his leg had to be amputated, gangrene followed, and he died on the 23d of the same month. The prisoner, Daniel Washington, alias Charles Jamison, was charged with shooting the deceased, and convicted of murder. His counsel made motions before the Circuit judge in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, and failing therein, appealed to this court to reverse the order refusing his motions. The case was called at the last term of this *court, but the attorney of the prisoner was not present. By the rule of court, the appeal might have been dismissed, but the case being a serious one, involving life, the court appointed a competent member of the Richland bar to take charge of the defence, which he kindly consented to do, and has conducted the defence earnestly and faithfully without the hope of reward. The attorney in charge procured copies of the evidence and the judge's charge taken by the official stenographer, and reformed the exceptions taken below so as to enable the court to understand them. Objection is made that "additional exceptions cannot be now presented to this court as grounds in arrest of judgment and for a new trial which were not presented in the court below during trial, nor raised on hearing of motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial." It is true that a motion in arrest of judgment cannot be made originally in this court. It must first be made to the Circuit judge, and can only come here on appeal from his order, (State v. Rankin, 3 S. C. 447 [16 Am. Rep. 737],) but the record shows that motion was made before the Circuit judge and refused. The case, then, is before the court, and we are at liberty to consider any question which may arise out of the record. As was said in the case of State v. McNinch, 12 S. C. 89: "This court is bound in a capital case to take notice in behalf of the accused of any error apparent upon the record by which the prisoner has been deprived of any of the substantial means of enjoying a fair and impartial trial." This is also a capital case. The prisoner is poor—without the means to print a brief or to employ counsel, and his regular attorney is not present. Certainly these are circumstances which appeal strongly for every indulgence which is allowable under the law.

*455

The exceptions, as remodeled, are the following:

1. "Because his Honor erred when he permitted the witness, Theodore G. Boag, to state the declarations of the deceased made to him in conversation before he was shot and in the absence of the defendant.

2. "Because his Honor erred when he permitted the so-called dying declarations of Collins to go to the jury it being apparent that they were mere opinion and not statements of facts made from his own knowledge.

*456

*3. "Because his Honor erred when he admitted in evidence the record book of the hospital, and permitted a third party to read entries therein to the jury.

4. "Because his Honor erred when he assumed as a fact, conceded by the prisoner and the state, and so stated to the jury, that this was either a case of murder or nothing.

5. "Because his Honor erred when he overruled the motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment for want of certainty in the indictment.

6. "Because the said motion should have been granted and said indictment quashed, the word 'wound' omitted being fatal to it.

7. "Because the testimony does not support the conviction, it being a matter of grave doubt from what cause death ensued. It is apparent he was neglected by the physicians —Dr. Porcher testifying that on his departure he left deceased in charge of Dr. Michel, and Dr. Michel testifying that he only saw the patient after death."

The last exception does not charge error of law, but alleged insufficiency of proof. That was properly submitted to the Circuit judge upon a motion for a new trial, but cannot be considered here. By the constitution this is not an appellate tribunal in such cases as this, but a court constituted "for the correction of errors at law." It may, however, be proper to say that the whole of the testimony taken together shows plainly that the reporter made a mistake when Dr. Michel was represented as saying that "he did not see the deceased until after death." In his testimony further on he says: "I think Dr. Porcher performed the amputation; I was called in afterwards." And in his cross-examination, he says: "I did not see the patient until after amputation."

The fifth and sixth exceptions relate to the alleged uncertainty in the indictment in omitting at one place the word "wound." The certainty required in an indictment is well expressed in the case of State v. Schroder, 3 Hill 61: "The general rule in framing an indictment is that the offence should be so described that the defendant may know how to answer it, the court, what judgment to pronounce, and that a *conviction or acquittal on it may be pleaded in bar to any subsequent or other indictment for the same offence." Tested by this rule the indictment is sufficiently certain. The omission to insert at one place in the indictment the word "wound" does not affect its plain meaning. The context makes it clear that it was a mere omission to fill a blank in an unimportant part. The whole clause in which the omission occurs might be struck out as surplusage without, in the least, obscuring the meaning. The object as the clause in which the omission occurs was to describe, by length and breadth, the wound, which had been both before and after distinctly alleged, which was unnecessary. We find no error in these exceptions. State v. Coleman, 8 S. C. 237; State v. Wimberly, 3 McC. 190.

*457

The fourth exception is clearly founded on a misconception. A careful reading of the judge's charge will show that he affirmed nothing, but referred to a fact which was not disputed, when, in the commencement and by way of introduction to the issues to be considered, he said: "I think it seems to be admitted on both sides that this is either a case of murder or nothing."

The third exception charges error of law by admitting in evidence "the record books of the hospital." If this evidence was entitled to any weight, it was in favor of the defendant, and was not only not excepted to at the trial, but after it came out the defendant's attorney moved "to strike out all the medical testimony, except the record just read by Dr. Rhett. Incompetent testimony, not objected to at the proper time, becomes, for that case, competent. Any other rule would enable parties to prepare beforehand for a case in the Supreme Court and continue litigation indefinitely. As was said in the case of Burris v. Whitner, 3 S. C. 512: "The time to object to incompetent testimony is when it is offered. It would be unfair to allow a party to postpone his objection until after the testimony has been given, for in that case he would be enabled to retain the evidence if it inured to his advantage, and to exclude it if it made against him. Such speculative advantages are discountenanced by the courts." The same may be said as to the irrelevant testimony of Theodore G. Boag, detailing a conversation with deceased before he was shot, upon the subject of horse thieves and detectives. The tes*timony was irrelevant and could have been excluded at the moment by objection.

*458

The only other objection is to the admissibility of the statement of the deceased as dying declarations, on the ground that it was merely the expression of opinion. It does not appear that the admissibility of this testimony was made a ground of objection at the trial, and this objection was not included in the first exceptions filed. But it appears in the record, and we have considered it. Theodore G. Boag testified as follows: "I think it was on the 23d of the same month—Sunday morning—that Collins said, 'I am going to die, and Daniel Washington killed me.' On Monday morning he was a dead man." To the question whether Collins was aware of his condition, he replied, "Yes; he fainted immediately after he said Washington shot him." Under the authority of the case of State v. Quick, 15 Rich. 342, in which the declaration under very similar circumstances was, "Leggett Quick killed me," it was properly left to the jury to determine what weight should be given to the declaration soberly made in extremis: "I am going to die, and Daniel Washington killed me." The whole of the judge's charge is before us, and we think he announced the law correctly when he said, "the dying declarations of a person who has been wounded are competent upon a trial for murder. The reason of it is that the dying person is supposed to be under the same solemn sense of obligation to speak the truth as when under oath. You are not bound to believe a dying declaration, however, because it was made. Mr. Boag, the witness for the state, said when first spoken to the deceased said that he thought the prisoner was the same man who shot him: and just before his death he said positively that Washington had killed him. Now you must be certain whether the deceased was speaking of facts which he knew or of conclusions which he had drawn. It is for you to consider that testimony just as it is, and give it its proper weight, whatever that may be."

We have not been able to discover any error of law charged in the exceptions.

The motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial are refused and the appeal dismissed.

*459

*The case must, therefore, be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of enabling that court to assign a new day for the execution of the sentence heretofore imposed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 459

(Case No. 876.)

STATE v. BELCHER.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Criminal Law ⊂⊃697.]

Exceptions alleging insufficiency of proof to sustain a verdict of guilty in a criminal case, cannot be considered by this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1649; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃697.]

[2. Criminal Law ⊂⊃854.]

The Circuit judge permitted the jury in a capital case to disperse during the trial, without objection made on either side. Held, that it was within his discretion to do so.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Stewart, 26 S. C. 128, 1 S. E. 468.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2040; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃854.]

[3. Criminal Law ⊂⊃918.]

During an arraignment, the name of a juror, who had been temporarily excused, was drawn, but the juror was not called and presented, to which no objection was made by the prisoner until after verdict. Held, that there was in this no ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2223; Dec. Dig. ⟸918.]

[4. Homicide ⟸213.]

The dying declarations of a wife are admissible against her husband upon his trial for the murder of such wife; and this rule is not affected by Section 415 of the code of procedure.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Reynolds, 48 S. C. 387, 26 S. E. 679.

For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 447; Dec. Dig. ⟸213.]

[5. Homicide ⟸204.]

Statements relating to her death—wound made by the deceased eighty-two days before her death, but not in the immediate apprehension of dissolution—are not admissible in evidence against her accused murderer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 438; Dec. Dig. ⟸204.]

[6. Criminal Law ⟸366.]

Statements of the deceased to her attending physician, detailing the cause of the injuries from which death ensued, made some time after the occurrence, are not admissible in evidence against the accused as part of the res gestæ, upon his trial for her murder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 806, 811, 814, 819, 820; Dec. Dig. ⟸366.]

[7. Criminal Law ⟸364.]

The rule of res gestæ is this: where the inquiry is as to a certain transaction, not only what was done, but also what was said by those present during the transaction, is admissible, for the purpose of explaining its character.†

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Arnold, 47 S. C. 13, 24 S. E. 926, 58 Am. St. Rep. 867.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 809; Dec. Dig. ⟸364.]

[8. Homicide ⟸200.]

[Cited in State v. Sullivan, 43 S. C. 209, 21 S. E. 4; Gosa v. Southern Ry., 67 S. C. 361, 45 S. E. 810; State v. McDaniel, 68 S. C. 309, 47 S. E. 384, 102 Am. St. Rep. 661; State v. Martin, 94 S. C. 95, 77 S. E. 721, to the point that dying declarations are admissible as part of the res gestæ, when they are contemporaneous with the main fact, but they need not be concurrent with the main fact in point of time.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 425–427; Dec. Dig. ⟸200.]

Before Thomson, J., Spartanburg, October, 1879.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

*460

*Mr. P. D. Hyler, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Ball, contra.

May 10th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. William Belcher was indicted for the murder of his wife, Elizabeth. The indictment contained two counts, one for murder by actual violence—beating and kicking—and the other by neglecting to provide necessaries for her when she was sick and helpless, from which neglect she died. The jury found him guilty on the first count, and he appeals to this court for a new trial, upon the following grounds:

1. "Because the Circuit judge erred in allowing the declarations of the deceased to come in evidence against her husband, contrary to Section 415 of the code of procedure.

2. "In allowing the declarations of the deceased to come in evidence against the accused, when the said declarations were made to Dr. W. A. Harrison, on April 21st, and the deceased did not die until July 12th, 1879.

3. "Because Guilford Mason, one of the petit jurors in attendance upon court, and whose name was drawn as one of the jurors to be presented to the prisoner, was not so presented.

4. "Because the members of the jury were separated at one time during the trial.

5. "Because there was no proof as to the time when the accused struck the blows, from the effects of which, as alleged in the indictment, Elizabeth Belcher afterwards died.

6. "Because there was no legal proof that Elizabeth Belcher died from the effects of the said blows.

7. "Because the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence."

The fifth, sixth and seventh exceptions charge no error of law, but alleged insufficiency of proof, and might properly have been submitted to the Circuit judge, upon a motion for a new trial, but we are not at liberty to consider them here.

The fourth exception charges that the jurors were allowed to separate at one time during the trial. The Circuit judge reports "that there was no request to keep the jurors together, *which was composed of intelligent men, and no feeling being manifested in the case, the jury were allowed to disperse." The strictness of the old practice as to keeping juries together after being charged with a case, has long since been relaxed. This was no error. The judge has discretion to permit the jury to disperse during the trial, even in capital cases. State v. McKee, 1 Bail. 651 [21 Am. Dec. 499]; State v. Silas Anderson, 2 Bail. 565; Bishop's Cr. Proc. 996.

*461

The third exception charges that Guilford Mason, one of the petit jurors, whose name was drawn, was not presented to the prisoner. Upon this point, the judge reports that "Guilford Mason had been excused, and when his name was drawn, it may have been pronounced by the clerk, but it was not called as that of a juror who was present, or who was expected to serve, but was put aside and another juror called and sworn. The view of the judge was, that the state selects the panel and presents the jurors to the prisoner, who exercises not the right of selection, but of objection to the jurors presented. The prisoner freely exercised the right, and in the call of jurors, twelve were presented, to whom he made no objection. The action of the clerk in relation to the juror was not, at the time, excepted to." We find no error here. The absence of the juror was by authority of the court, and it was the same as if he had been detained at home by sickness. If the prisoner had any right to complain, he should have made the objection at the time. Gen. Stat. 523, ch. CXI., § 29; State v. Coleman, 8 S. C. 242.

† See review of Bedingfield's case, (14 Cox's Crim. Cas. 341,) in the American Law Review for December, 1880, and January and February, 1881.

The first and second exceptions relate to the admissibility of the statements of the deceased, as proved by Dr. Harrison, and will be considered together. The judge reports that "Dr. W. A. Harrison testified that he visited deceased as a physician, April 21st, 1879; was called in to see her at Dr. Nesbits'; she was in a wretched condition; made an examination; found her suffering pain, &c.; her general appearance indicated enemia; her appetite was good; she may have been in that condition for months. She said her condition was caused by her husband; he threw her down; jumped upon her on her womb, and there remained on her; beat her on her breast and sides. She had been in the condition in which he then saw her, ever since.

*462

She thought, *at that time, she would then die. The doctor then gave his opinion that the effects she exhibited would follow the treatment she said she had received. * * * This physician further said that the deceased was suffering from peritonitis (chronic), and had some symptons of cancer. He mentioned symptoms of both diseases, in detail, and concludes that, in his opinion as a medical man, the woman died from the treatment she received from her husband." The admission of this testimony was objected to, and the objection is renewed here upon several grounds. First. It is insisted that this statement of the deceased should not have been received, for the reason that the deceased was the wife of the accused, and if living, would not have been a competent witness against her husband, being excluded by Section 415 of the code. The preamble to the code declares that "the second part relates to civil actions in the courts of this state." The first sub-division of Section 415, provides, generally, that "the husband and wife shall be competent and compellable to give evidence, the same as any other witness, except as hereinafter stated." The second sub-division, manifestly for the purpose of excluding the inference that the provisions of the section might be construed as applying to criminal actions, declares that "nothing herein contained shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other, in any criminal action or proceeding, except," &c. These provisions, taken together, leave the law of evidence in criminal proceedings unchanged, and by the common law, the declarations of the wife, "in articulo mortis," are admissible against the husband on trial for the murder of his wife. 1 Phil. on Ev. 251; Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 118.

The evidence is also objected to on the ground that they were not "dying declarations." Hearsay is evidence of facts with which the witness is not acquainted, but which he merely states from the relation of others, and is inadmissible for the double reason that the party originally stating the facts does not speak under oath, and the party against whom the evidence is offered has no opportunity to cross-examine the party making the statements. The only case in the whole range of the criminal law where evidence is admissible against the accused without an op*portunity of cross-examination, is that of "dying declarations" in cases of homicide, and they are only admissible from the necessity of the case, and when made in extremity—when the party is at the point of death, and is conscious of it—when every hope of this world is gone, and every motive to falsehood is silenced by the most powerful considerations to speak the truth. For the reason that the admission of such statement is exceptional, they ought always to be excluded unless they come within the rule in every respect. State v. Quick, 15 Rich. 342; State v. McEvoy, 9 S. C. 211; Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 31. The testimony of Dr. Harrison as to the statements of the deceased to him, does not come within the definition of dying declarations, and was mere hearsay. He did not witness the acts complained of, but only related what she told him had taken place. She was afflicted with a lingering disease. Her statement was made April 21st, and she did not die until July 12th, nearly three months after. It does not appear that the statement was made in extremity; she said she thought at the time the violence was inflicted that "she would then die," but she did not say that, at the time she made the statement, she considered herself in the very presence of death—soon to occur.

*463

It was further suggested that the testimony was admissible as part of the res gestæ. The Circuit judge reports that it was admitted on that ground; but we think that it was equally inadmissible on that ground. We understand the rule of evidence as to res gestæ to be this: Where the inquiry is as to a certain transaction not only what was done, but also what was said by those present during the transaction, is admissible for the purpose of explaining its character. Thus, as an illustration, it was held in the prosecution of Lord George Gordon for high treason, that the cry of the mob which accompanied the prisoner was admissible as part of the transaction. Rex v. Lord George Gordon, 21 How. St. Tr. 534. Declarations which accompany the act characterize it; but to do so the declarations must be by the persons engaged in the act, contemporaneous with it, if not precisely concurrent in point of time, and proved as other facts by witnesses. To make declarations a part of the res gestæ, they must be contemporaneous with the main fact, not, however, precisely con*current in point of time. If they spring out of the transaction, elucidate it, and are made at a time so near to it as reasonably to preclude the idea of deliberate design, they are then to be regarded as contemporaneous. State v. Mitcham, 11 Ga. 615; Handy v. Johnson, 5 Md. 450; Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 24. In the case of Thomson et ux. v. Trevanian, which was an action of trespass and assault, Lord Chief Justice Holt allowed what the wife said immediately on receiving the hurt to be given in evidence. 1 Phil. on Ev. 252; 6 East 193. In this case the statement was made, not by the accused, but by the deceased; not at the time, or near it, but afterwards; how long after does not appear, as she did not state when the violence, of which she complained, was inflicted on her. No declarations of the accused, at the time or afterwards, were proved by Dr. Harrison, who only gave the statement of the deceased as to what had previously occurred. The account given by a person, in answer to questions of a medical man, is evidence of complaints and symptoms, and of what the person suffers from his bodily state when an inquiry into such particulars is material; but it is not evidence to charge another person as the cause of those sufferings, nor is such an account any evidence of the truth of the statement. 1 Phil. on Ev. 233.

*464

The statement of the deceased to Dr. Harrison was not part of the transaction of which she complained, nor evidence of it, and his testimony as to that statement should have been excluded.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside, and a new trial granted.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 464

(Case No. 880.)

STATE v. McGREER.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐784.]

In the preparation of cases for this court, it is important that the rules regulating appeals, should be observed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. ⇐784.]

*465

[2. Homicide ⇐300.]

*Upon the trial of one indicted for assault and battery with intent to kill, the Circuit judge refused to charge "that if the prisoner really thought his life was in danger, or that he was in danger of great bodily harm, he is not guilty, provided he did not negligently come to his conclusion." Held, that in such refusal there was no error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614, 616–620, 622–630; Dec. Dig. ⇐300.]

[3. Homicide ⇐96.]

The Circuit judge charged the jury "that the prisoner was not to be the judge as to the necessity to inflict the battery, but that the jury was to judge of the necessity." Held, that in this there was no error.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Beckham, 24 S. C. 284; State v. Sullivan, 43 S. C. 212, 21 S. E. 4.

For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 125; Dec. Dig. ⇐96.]

[4. Homicide ⇐109.]

What is necessary to make out a case of self-defence—stated.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Jones, 29 S. C. 236, 7 S. E. 296; State v. Jackson, 32 S. C. 44, 10 S. E. 769; State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 595, 12 S. E. 556; State v. Littlejohn, 33 S. C. 600, 11 S. E. 638; State v. McGraw, 35 S. C. 290, 14 S. E. 630; State v. Bowers, 65 S. C. 214, 43 S. E. 656, 95 Am. St. Rep. 795; State v. Hutto, 66 S. C. 452, 45 S. E. 13; State v. Foster, 66 S. C. 473, 45 S. E. 1; State v. Thompson, 68 S. C. 137, 46 S. E. 941; State v. Miller, 73 S. C. 278, 282, 53 S. E. 426, 114 Am. St. Rep. 82; State v. Thompson, 76 S. C. 124, 56 S. E. 789; State v. Stockman, 82 S. C. 400, 64 S. E. 595, 129 Am. St. Rep. 888; State v. Watson, 94 S. C. 461, 78 S. E. 324.

For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 139; Dec. Dig. ⇐109.]

Before Thomson, J., Abbeville, February, 1880.

This is an appeal taken to this court by Sam McGreer, from a sentence based upon his conviction by the jury under an indictment for assault and battery with intent to kill. The exceptions are fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Cothran, contra.

May 12th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This case is presented here merely on a statement signed by the counsel for the appellant, which does not contain any legal evidence of having been served upon the counsel on the other side, or having been assented to by him; nor does it show that it had ever been submitted to the Circuit judge, and the case settled by him; for while it does state that a copy was served upon the solicitor, and no amendments proposed by him, this is no more than the assertion of counsel in the case, and though, doubtless, entitled to the highest credence, does not furnish that legal evidence upon which courts of justice are required to act. Such a mode of presenting an appeal is not in accordance with the rules of this court, and is open to grave objection. But as the counsel representing the state has not seen fit to interpose any objection, doubtless from a desire that the defendant may encounter no obstacle, of what might be regarded as of a technical character (though in some cases it might assume a substantial character) in obtaining the judgment of the court *of last resort as to whether he has been tried strictly according to law, we will waive the objection, and proceed to consider the case upon its merits, having alluded to this matter only for the purpose of calling the attention of the bar to the importance of observing the rules in the preparation of cases for this court.

*466

The indictment charged the offence of assault and battery with intent to kill, and the Circuit judge was requested to charge that "if the prisoner really thought his life was in danger, or that he was in danger of great bodily harm, he is not guilty, provided he did not negligently come to his conclusion." This he refused to do, but charged "that the prisoner was not to be the judge as to the necessity to inflict the battery, but that the jury was to judge of the necessity." Exceptions were duly taken to the charge and refusal to charge, and they constitute the only matters for our consideration.

To make out a case of self-defence, two things are necessary: 1. The evidence should satisfy the jury that the accused actually believed that he was in such immediate danger of losing his life, or sustaining serious bodily harm, that it was necessary, for his own protection, to take the life of his assailant. 2. That the circumstances in which the accused was placed were such as would, in the opinion of the jury, justify such a belief in the mind of a person possessed of ordinary firmness and reason. It is not a question which depends solely upon the belief which the accused may have entertained; but the question is, what was his belief, and whether, under all the circumstances, as they existed at the time the violence was inflicted, the jury think he ought to have formed such belief. As we understand the charge of the judge, it conformed to the principles above-stated, and was, therefore, free from objection.

The request to charge, which was refused, was justified by the doctrine as laid down by Wharton in the second edition of his work on Homicide, which, however, as he admits in the preface to that edition, is one of the changes "which the last few years have wrought in the judicial conception of the law of homicide." This innovation upon what was previously understood to be the law in this respect does not seem to us to be warranted by the adjudicated cases, which, when closely examined, will not, with *the exception of the case of Grainger v. State, 3 Yerger 459, which has been the subject of much adverse criticism, justify the inference drawn from them, although there may be expressions used by judges in some of the cases which may seem to justify such an inference; and, as there certainly is no authority here for such a doctrine, we are not disposed to adopt it.

*467

To give the instruction asked for in this case would have tended to convey to the jury the idea that the true test was the belief of the accused as to the necessity for his taking life, while we regard the true test to be the opinion of the jury, after hearing all the circumstances, whether the accused actually believed that such necessity existed, and whether, under all the circumstances surrounding the parties, at the time the violence was committed, he was warranted in forming such belief. There was, therefore, no error in refusing to charge as requested.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 467

(Case No. 881.)

HAND v. SAVANNAH AND CHARLESTON RAILROAD CO.

STATE, ex relatione ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. SAME.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Railroads ⊂⊃192.]

Where the rights of the several classes of creditors of a railroad corporation have been declared, and the condition of the railroad demands an early sale, such sale will not be postponed until the interests of individual creditors have been adjusted, and the class to which their demands belong has been ascertained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 637; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃192.]

[2. Railroads ⊂⊃197.]

Upon the sale of a railroad, it is customary and reasonable to require cash sufficient to pay costs and other claims demanding immediate payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 662; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃197.]

[3. Railroads ⊂⊃192.]

But the officer conducting the sale should not be authorized to exact a cash advance previous to the close of the biddings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 391, 634–642; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃192; Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1517.]

[4. Railroads ⊂⊃171.]

It is not error to order the payment of undisputed claims, having an undoubted priority, in advance of the adjustment of the rights of other creditors, whose claims are of an inferior rank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 554; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃171.]

[5. Railroads ⊂⊃191.]

The state, being a party in court, is bound as much as other parties, by the judgment in the cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 624–633; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃191.]

*468

*Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, January, 1880.

For a full understanding of these cases, see the report of them in 12 S. C. 314. After the remittitur was filed in the court below, a motion was made in behalf of Hand and others, holders of six per cent. bonds of 1856, for a sale of the property and a reference to carry out the directions of the Supreme Court. Upon these motions, the Circuit judge filed the following order:

These cases come up on a motion to refer and for an order of sale. The litigation was commenced in 1870, and has been prosecuted with more or less vigor, from that time to the present. Sick and weary, I have labored through the mass of papers submitted, and at last do not see that I have anything to do but to carry out, as nearly as I can, the opinion of the Supreme Court on the appeal from the decree of Judge Wallace.

For the purposes of this inquiry, it is matter of no consequence who is responsible for the protracted litigation which has resulted so disasterously to the road and to all who have been so unfortunate as to put their money in it or its securities. It is full time to bring it to an end.

The main discussion seems to be whether the court shall order a sale.

After examining the numerous decrees and orders made in the causes, I do not think there is room for two opinions.

The receiver, the judges of the Circuit Court before whom these cases have been heard, and the justices of the Supreme Court, all concur in the conclusion that a sale is proper and necessary, to say nothing of the consent of the counsel in the case to a sale in May, 1875; and, indeed, it cannot be otherwise. Here is a large and valuable property, a highway connecting the commercial emporiums of the States of Georgia and South Carolina, literally going to ruin for the want of proper management. Here are creditors whose claims are undisputed, kept in abeyance for ten years, waiting the determination of a legal controversy in which they have no interest. Here are passengers, shippers on the road, and those living on the line, without *redress, if injury be done to their persons or property. The road is absolutely of no value but to the receiver and those employed by him. It pays not a dollar of debt or interest to those who advanced their money for its construction, while, as the debt grows, the security diminishes.

*469

This is abundantly proved by the application to Judge Hudson, at the last term of the court, for leave to borrow money, on a preferred claim, to keep the road in running order, it being represented as unsafe.† Can there be a doubt that this ruinous condition of affairs shall be arrested? I have always supposed that when a receiver is appointed, it is to speedily wind up the affairs of the corporation, or the business committed to his care. It is not to make a soft place, where he and his friends and those he employs can make profit, but to save to the creditors the largest amount out of the insolvent concern in the shortest time. This receiver has been here since April, 1874, and the affairs of the corporation are no nearer a settlement than when he took charge. I do not attach blame to him, for in May, 1875, he asked the court for instructions as to sale.

Nor am I impressed with the argument that if a sale is ordered now, it will give an undue advantage to the smaller creditors, and enable them to buy the road at a greatly depreciated price. All that these lesser creditors want is their money, and so soon as the property is made to bring enough to cover their claims and the expenses of the litigation and sale, they will be satisfied. It will then be the fault of the six per cent. and seven per cent. bondholders, if they permit any combination with outsiders and those creditors to deprive them of their rights, under the acts of incorporation and the judgment of the court. They must protect themselves, and what prevents them from making a combination to obtain the full value of the property, leaving their rights to be litigated over the purchase money instead of the property, I do not see. The thing is in their own hands, and if they determine to let the property be sacrificed, it will be their own fault. I am not called upon here to pass judgment on the lien of those bonds, but, under the opinion of *the Supreme Court, do not see how there can be doubt on this question. A reference, however, is desired, and it will be so ordered.

*470

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that all the property and franchises of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, included and described in the several deeds and mortgages proved in these cases, and all the property of what kind soever the said company is seized and possessed, be sold by Mr. W. D. Porter, master, at public auction, to the highest bidder, at the post-office in the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, on the first Monday in June next, at twelve o'clock m. So much of the permanent property of said company embraced in any of the liens or mortgages proved, or hereafter to be proved, as lies in the State of Georgia, to be sold subject to such liens as have been or may hereafter be established under the laws of that state.

It is further ordered that the said sale be made on the following terms and conditions — that is to say, cash enough to pay the undisputed claims to be reported by the referee hereinafter to be named, and the costs and fees of the master and referee; the cash to be paid immediately after the close of the bidding, and the master may require of any bidder, during the progress of said sale, to deposit the said sum to be paid in cash, in a bank in the city of Charleston, subject to his order. In case of refusal to pay the cash or make the deposit, the bid to be disregarded and the sale to be proceeded with, as if the same had not been made; the balance of the purchase money to be paid in one year, interest from date, to be secured by the bond of the purchaser, with two or more approved sureties and a mortgage of the property sold; provided that the master have leave to dispense with the personal security, upon a deposit, by the purchaser, with him, of United States government bonds equal to one-half of the purchase money unpaid, as collateral security. * * *

† See [Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co.] 12 S. C. 83.

It is further ordered that, after paying such costs, charges and disbursements of these proceedings, as may hereafter be determined to be a proper charge, the balance shall be applied to the payment of such undisputed liens, claims and demands *as the referee, hereinafter to be named, shall report. Then to such liens, bonds and coupons as the Supreme Court of the state shall or may have decided are entitled to receive the same, ratably; the purchaser to have the privilege of paying the whole of the purchase money in cash, or to anticipate the payment at such time as he may desire. * * *

*471

It is further ordered, if the referee fail to make his report in time for the sale, the cash portion of the same shall be $50,000.

It is further ordered that the master do make a report to this court of all his actings and doings under this order.

It is further ordered that Mr. W. Alston Pringle is appointed special referee to inquire and report:

1. What claims and demands against the Savannah and Charleston railroad are undisputed and entitled to immediate payment.

2. What bonds and coupons of said company, issued under the act of December, 1856, are entitled to priority of payment out of the property of said company, under the principles settled by the judgment of the Supreme Court, filed September 30th, 1879.

3. The amount of bonds issued under the act of March 2d, 1869.

4. The amount of bonds and coupons issued under the act of December 19th, 1856, not entitled to priority of payment.

5. The bonds and coupons issued under the act of March 2d, 1869, endorsed by the guaranty of the state.

6. What coupons of bonds issued under the act of 1856 have been funded under the third section of the act of 1869, the number and value of said coupons, by whom, when, and under what circumstances such coupons were funded.

7. That the said referee have leave to report any special matter.

It is further ordered that the master do tax the costs, charges and disbursements chargeable on the fund to be realized from the sale.

Notices of appeal from this order were duly served, as follows:

*472

*By the executors of Cutting—

1. Because these appellants are the holders of a large amount of bonds secured by mortgage of the Savannah and Charleston railroad and its appurtenances, claiming the first lien thereon; that there are also a large number of other bonds claiming a lien in preference to that of these appellants; that it is not expected or believed that the road can sell for enough to pay both these liens; that a reference has been ordered, to ascertain which of said bonds are entitled to preference, but no report has yet been made or judgment rendered; that it is the duty of these appellants, as executors, to protect the interest of their testator by bidding at the sale a sufficient sum to insure a fair price for the property, but this they cannot do unless it is ascertained to what portion of the sales their testator is entitled; that the sale being ordered in advance of this ascertainment, they cannot bid at all in the interest of the estate, and the said interest is thereby exposed to absolute sacrifice.

2. Because the estate of their testator is stripped still further of protection by the requisition that, in the progress of the bidding, these appellants, if bidders to protect the interest of their testator, may be required, although mere executors, to deposit in cash the amount of any bid made, even though eventually entitled to the whole proceeds of the sale, and on failure to make such deposit, the bid is to be rejected and the sale closed.

3. Because the bridge over the Savannah river and the section of the railroad in the State of Georgia are not embraced in the mortgage or lien of the state, under the act of 1856, and are not within the jurisdiction of the courts of South Carolina, and are now in the hands of a receiver appointed by the courts of Georgia; that the order of sale is erroneous and misleading in extending its operation to those portions over which this court has no jurisdiction.

4. Because the said order is erroneous in directing any distribution of the proceeds of sale before a final adjustment shall have been made of the claims under the various liens, and of the preferences claimed upon the same.

5. Because the State of South Carolina is liable for the six per cent. bonds, as guaranteed under the act of 1856, and for *the seven per cent. bonds, on her representation, made by the act of 1869; that the present suit is at the instance of the said state, and this sale, if carried out, must result in great loss to one or the other of these classes of bonds, for the payment whereof the state is bound; that it is therefore unjust and inequitable that an order of sale should be made at the instance of a plaintiff, before performance by him of his own contracts, in relation to the subject matter of the sale, or any final adjudication fixing the right of one party or the other to reclamation for its loss.

*473

McBurney and others appealed upon the above grounds and the following additional:

1. That the power of the master to require payment in money or a deposit on every bid, of which cash may be required, is arbitrary, unusual and embarrassing, and must chill all bidding at such sale.

2. That there is no discrimination as to undisputed claims, when these claims have several and distinct liens on several and distinct pieces of property, and the sales of the whole road should not be charged with these payments in cash.

3. That the mode of sale is injurious to the interests of all and every party in the cause.

[For subsequent opinion, see 17 S. C. 219.]

Messrs. C. G. Memminger and J. B. Campbell, for appellants.

Messrs. Buist & Buist, T. M. Hanckel and W. H. Brawley, contra.

May 13th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This case was heard before this court upon an appeal from a final decree, (12 S. C. 314,) and decided so far as to determine the relative priorities of the different classes of creditors in respect of the fund to be produced by the sale of the road of defendant corporation. Pending that appeal this court passed an order to the effect that it was practicable and desirable that the railroad of the defendant corporation should be sold, but leaving the Circuit Court at liberty to determine when such sale should be made. The action of the Circuit Court, fixing the *time of sale, was not taken until the judgment of this court had been rendered on such appeal, and the remittitur filed in the Circuit Court.

*474

The sale was ordered for the first Monday in June next, and from that order the present appeal was taken. The appellant urges no grounds of objection to an early sale that did not exist and apply with equal and even greater force at the time when the general instruction for the sale of the road was given by this court. At that time the relative priorities of the various classes of creditors entitled to participate in the fund to be made by such sale were not ascertained, while, at the present time, these priorities have been ascertained. The leading objection to the sale, at the present time is, in substance, that it has not been ascertained what individual creditors are entitled to be admitted to the several classes thus established. We see no reason why the sale should be postponed until all the parties know the precise interest they may have in the fund arising from the sale. It may be that they would, in some instances, be in a better condition to participate in the sale as bidders.

This consideration might have had some weight while the priorities of the respective classes were uncertain, but it would be going to an unreasonable extent to postpone the sale until the various individuals composing these classes had been ascertained by judicial orders. The primary duty of the court is to see that the property is sold at an early day, so as to prevent loss from deterioration caused by delay.

If the court have any concern with the situation of the individual creditors as it regards their capacity to become bidders at the sale, that must constitute quite a subordinate matter. We are satisfied with the conclusion of the Circuit judge that the condition of the road is such that an early sale is indispensable, and that to delay such sale to the prejudice of the fund for the mere purpose of facilitating some of the creditors who may desire to become bidders at the sale, would be without precedent and altogether unreasonable.

Objection is made to that part of the decree of sale that directs "that an amount of cash sufficient to pay the undisputed claims to be reported by the referee," "and the costs and fees of the *master and referees," to be immediately paid after the close of the biddings, and that "the master may require of any bidder, during the progress of said sale, to deposit the said sum, to be paid in cash, in a bank in the city of Charleston, subject to his order;" and in case of the failure to make such payment, the bid of the person so failing to deposit should be disregarded.

*475

The sum to be thus advanced is fixed in another part of the decree at $50,000, in the event that the report of the referee on that subject should not be made in time for the sale.

It is fairly to be presumed, from the amount beyond which the cash advances is not to go, that what was called the "undisputed claims" to be reported, are claims of a character demanding immediate cash payment, upon which time could not properly be allowed. Viewed in this light, the provision for cash payment is customary and reasonable. The fact that this provision may work injuriously to the executors of Cutting, cannot be assumed in the absence of proof to that effect, nor would, if established, afford ground for departing from a proper safeguard against spurious bidding. The personal inconvenience of a bidder, though resulting from the nature of his legal powers, is no ground for disturbing the arrangement looking to the bona fides of the bidding.

We see no reason for authorizing the master to demand a cash advance previous to the close of the biddings. Whatever convenience may result from possessing the means of eliminating spurious bids during the progress of the bidding, may be counterbalanced by a tendency to deter parties from bidding, and thus chilling the bids. The order must be modified by striking therefrom the words as follows: "Of any bidder, during the progress of said sale, to deposit." There is no proof before us that the sum of $50,000 is in excess of the amount reasonably required for the purpose indicated by the order, and no ground exists for interfering with that part of the order fixing such amount.

That part of the order describing the property to be sold follows the decree of this court, under which the sale is ordered.

The sale of the permanent property of the defendant corporation in the State of Georgia, as directed by the order of sale, was *adjudicated by this court in that decree, and this adjudication cannot be disturbed.

*476

The order of sale is not defective in ordering the payment of the undisputed claims to be ascertained, even if it should happen that at the time of such payment there remains unascertained the interests of persons claiming admission to the several classes, provided that such claims, so paid, have a clear priority under the decree in this cause over those classes that remain to be ascertained, as it regards only the persons entitled to participate in them. The order, properly construed, is in harmony with the view just expressed, and no reason appears for disturbing it.

The objection, based on the supposed interest of the state, raised not by the state, but by the non-resident executors of an estate, existing and administered within another state, if properly represented before us, could not have weight, as the state is equally bound with all other parties to the decree under which the sale is ordered.

The exceptions presented in behalf of McBurney and others, and the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, are disposed of by what has already been said.

The order of sale must be modified in the manner hereinbefore stated, and so modified, is affirmed, and the appeal dismissed as to all other matters.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

13 S. C. 476

(Case No. 882.)

CLAUSSEN v. FULTZ.

(April Term, 1880.)

[Attachment ⊜40, 113.]

A warrant of attachment should not be issued upon an affidavit which contains a general charge of fraud, made upon information and belief, but supported by no statement of facts or circumstances, except that defendant is selling his goods as agent, and has acknowledged, in writing, that he was running his business only as agent, so as to save trouble with his creditors until he could pay them.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ivy v. Caston, 21 S. C. 588, 589; Myers v. Whiteheart, 24 S. C. 202; Kerchner & Calder Bros. v. McCormac, 25 S. C. 465; Monday v. Elmore, 27 S. C. 131, 3 S. E. 65; Baum v. Bell, 28 S. C. 209, 5 S. E. 485; Wando Phosphate Co. v. Rosenberg, 31 S. C. 307, 9 S. E. 969.

For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 92, 311; Dec. Dig. ⊜40, 113.]

[This case is also cited in Darby & Co. v. Shannon, 19 S. C. 531, as an example of questioning by motion to discharge attachments irregularly issued.]

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, November, 1879.

*477

*This was a motion to set aside an attachment issued by the clerk of the court upon the following affidavit:

J. C. H. Claussen, the plaintiff above-named, being duly sworn, says:

1. That J. E. Fultz, the above-named defendant, is justly and truly indebted to the deponent in the full and just sum of $621.90, with interest from September 9th, 1879, for goods, wares and merchandise, sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, at his request, and no part of which has been paid.

2. That the said J. E. Fultz is, as deponent is creditably informed and believes, disposing of his property and effects, with intent to defraud his creditors, and that he is now, the more easily to effect his fraudulent purpose, carrying on his business and disposing of his property as agent, without any declared principal, and that the said J. E. Fultz is so doing business as agent with the sole intent to defraud his creditors is fully shown by his written confession and acknowledgment, as follows: "I am running my business only as agent, so as to save trouble with creditors, until I can pay them."

3. That the said plaintiff has commenced an action in this court against said defendant, upon the cause of action above-stated.

J. C. H. Claussen.

Sworn to September 10th, 1879.

The motion was granted by the Circuit judge, and plaintiff appealed.

Mr. J. Ancrum Simons, for appellant, cited Code, § 252; 10 S. C. 469; 34 How. Pr. 66; 17 Ib. 559; 37 Ib. 272; 11 Ib. 221; 5 Ib. 386; 5 Rob. 599; 32 Barb. 604; 3 Seld. 500; 3 Sandf. 703; 1 Deady 469; 3 Bosw. 626.

Mr. Chas. Boyle, contra, cited 6 S. C. 169; 10 S. C. 467; 12 S. C. 122.

*478

*May 17th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This is an appeal from an order dissolving an attachment, on the ground that the affidavit on which it had been granted was insufficient. The affidavit contained the general charge, stated upon information and belief, that the defendant was disposing of his property and effects with intent to defraud his creditors. This general charge, even if made upon positive knowledge, would not have been sufficient ground for issuing the attachment, unless supported by the statement of facts and circumstances warranting such allegation.

As it is only made upon information and belief, it requires the statement of such circumstances in its support as would enable the court to conclude that the causes warranting the issuing of the attachment existed. The only circumstance alleged is a statement claimed to have been made by the defendant, as follows: "I am running my business as an agent so as to save trouble with creditors until I can pay." The proof must bring the case within the provisions of Section 250 of the code to warrant the issuing of the attachment in the present case. The attachment is there allowed whenever the defendant is about to remove any of his property from the state, or has assigned, disposed of, or secreted, or is about to assign, dispose of, or secrete any of his property with intent to defraud creditors. It is not alleged that the defendant has removed, or intends to remove any of his property out of the state. It must then appear that he has either assigned, disposed of, or secreted his property, or is about to do so with intent to defraud his creditors. It must be assumed that the defendant is engaged in mercantile business, and is selling and disposing of his property in the manner usual in the course of such business. The fact that he is acting as an agent of another, whether properly or improperly, does not in itself warrant the conclusion that there is anything unusual in the manner in which he is making sales and deliveries of his stock in trade. The most that can be argued is that he has covered up and obscured his title to such property. The attachment law is designed to prevent parties from placing their property beyond the reach of an execution with the intent of defrauding their creditors. It was not intended to arrest the due and proper *conduct of mercantile or other fair business dealing, although such dealing may have the effect to place property beyond the reach of an execution. The statute looks to an act of fraud consummated by an actual disposition of the property such as to place it beyond the reach of creditors. The mere fact that one who is indebted has covered up and concealed his title to property is not sufficient ground for issuing an attachment against him; it must also appear that the motive with which he is disposing of his property is the intent to defraud his creditors. Even admitting that the evidence contained in the affidavit tended to show that the defendant was using the name of another as a cover to his business transactions, that would not in itself be sufficient. That might well be, and yet the property remain in his hands subject to an execution. The plaintiff must go further and show an actual disposition of the property made, or intended, with intent to defraud his creditors. This, in our judgment, he has failed to do.

*479

The appeal must be dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

---

13 S. C. 479

(Case No. 883.)

McCOMB v. WOODBURY.

(April Term, 1880.)

[Judgment ⇐119.]

Where the time for answering expires after the day fixed for the opening of the Court of Common Pleas, but before such court is actually opened, the case may be put upon docket No. 6, and judgment by default taken upon the call of that docket on the first day of the term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 209; Dec. Dig. ⇐119.]

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, December, 1879.

The summons and complaint in this action were served October 21st, 1879. On November 12th defendant served notice of appearance, but never answered. On November 19th plaintiff's attorneys served upon defendant's attorney a notice that they *would apply for a judgment by default. Defendant objected to the docketing of the cause and to the order for judgment. The other matters and dates are given in the opinion of the court.

*480

Mr. T. M. Mordecai, for appellant.

Messrs. Tiedeman & Marshall, contra.

May 17th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The question submitted in the present case involves the construction of Section 21 of the act of 1873, amending the code of procedure, (15 Stat. 502,) which is as follows: "That after the passage of this act no judgment shall be obtained in the Court of Common Pleas except during term time and in open court; and it shall be the duty of the clerk to place all cases filed in his office, in which there is no defence, upon a docket to be prepared by him for that purpose, to be known as docket No. six, (6,) and this shall be called on the first day of the term," &c.

November 3d, 1879, was the day fixed by law for the opening of the Court of General Sessions for Charleston county. The presiding judge being prevented by sickness from attending on that day, the clerk opened the Court of General Sessions and immediately adjourned it to November 17th, then next ensuing. The Court of Common Pleas did not actually open for the transaction of business until December 5th, 1879, when docket No. 6 was called, the Court of General Sessions having continued from the day to which it had been adjourned until that day. The default of the defendant occurred after the day fixed for the opening of the court, but before December 5th, on which the business of the Court of Common Pleas actually commenced. The case was put upon docket No. 6, and called on December 5th, and judgment taken for the want of an answer.

It is contended on behalf of the defendant that by the true construction of the act of 1873, above recited, the motion for judgment could only be made upon the day appointed by law for the opening of the Court of Common Pleas, and that such day was prior to the day on which judgment was actually entered *and previous to the expiration of the time to answer. It is also contended, as a consequence of this position, that no judgment can be obtained for want of an answer unless such default had occurred previous to the time appointed by law for the holding of the court at which such judgment is demanded.

*481

It is very clear that the statute intended to designate, for the purpose of calling docket No. 6, the day on which the Court of Common Pleas actually commences its business in accordance with the provisions of law regulating its proceedings.

By the act of June 9th, 1877, (16 Stat. 301,) it is provided as follows: "Should the business before the Court of General Sessions at any term be not completed on the arrival of the day fixed by law for the holding of the Court of Common Pleas for any county, the judge presiding may, in his discretion, adjourn the said Court of Common Pleas until the business of the Court of General Sessions shall have been concluded; but, in order to keep the business of the courts separate and distinct, the Court of General Sessions for any county shall be finally adjourned for the term before the opening of the Court of Common Pleas." The effect of this section is to make the final adjournment of the Court of General Sessions the means of fixing the day for the opening and commencement of the business of the Court of Common Pleas. Under that view, December 5th was the first day of the commencement of the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county, and the proper day for calling docket No. 6.

Section 21 of the act of 1873, appears to have but two distinct objects in view. The first is to postpone the entry of judgment for want of an answer until there is a court in session at which such judgment may be taken. The second is to expedite the application for such judgment by assigning for that purpose the first day properly applicable to the business of the Circuit. The defendant reads the statutes as if it had in view a third distinct object, namely, to prevent judgment for want of an answer from being rendered at any time, unless the default on which it is sought to be obtained occurred on a day prior to that fixed for the holding of the court. It is assumed that because it is the duty of the clerk to make up docket No. 6, so that it may be called on the first day of term, that that day is fixed as a means of determining *what cases may be moved at that term for judgment for want of an answer. It is undoubtedly the duty of the clerk to have docket No. 6 in readiness so that it may be called on the first day on which the court enters upon the transaction of its business, but beyond that no specified day is prescribed for making it up. The statute gives no intimation of any intention to limit the right of the court to give judgment for want of an answer to cases where the default has occurred previous to the day fixed for the commencement of the term, nor is such a provision at all essential to carry out the obvious purpose of the statute, which, as has been just said, was to secure but two objects, namely, the granting of such judgment in term time only, and the expediting of such application in term time. On the contrary, the proposition which the defendant seeks to engraft upon the statute, as implied in its terms, is altogether foreign to the objects which the statute has in view, and, therefore, without the range of proper implication.

*482

The judgment appealed from was properly entered, and the appeal must be dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

13 S. C. 482

(Case No. 885.)

WESTFIELD v. WESTFIELD.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐107.]

An order recommitting for further proof a report upon claims presented against a decedent's estate, is not appealable. Semble.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lowndes v. Miller, 25 S. C. 122; Clayton v. Mitchell, 31 S. C. 204, 9 S. E. 814, 10 S. E. 390.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 738; Dec. Dig. ⇐107.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⇐227.]

Under an order calling in creditors to establish their demands against an estate which is being administered by the court, a claim must be presented in the name of the creditor himself, under his oath, that the amount is bona fide due, and that no part has been paid by discount or otherwise. Ex parte Hanks, Dud. Eq. 231, approved.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Crane, Boylston & Co. v. Moses, 13 S. C. 577; Brown v. Brown, 45 S. C. 410, 23 S. E. 137.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 816; Dec. Dig. ⇐227.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇐228.]

[Cited in Branyan v. Kay, 33 S. C. 285, 11 S. E. 970, to the point that any creditor so coming in is a party to the action in every sense.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 819–826, 827½; Dec. Dig. ⇐228.]

[This case is also cited in Crane, Boylston & Co. v. Moses, 13 S. C. 561, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, July, 1879.

This case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

*483

*Mr. E. F. Stokes, for appellant.

Mr. J. W. Stokes, contra.

May 17th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action in the nature of a creditor's bill, brought by the plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of John Westfield, deceased, to call in the creditors and marshal the assets of said estate. Pending the action, creditors were enjoined from suing at law, and were called in by publication, in the usual form, to present and prove their demands against the estate. Among the claims presented, under the call, was one in the following terms:

"$4166.67. On the first day of September, 1860, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of A. M. Hamilton, guardian of E. F. Stokes, four thousand one hundred and sixty-six 67-100 dollars, value received, with interest payable annually from the first day of September last. Witness our hands and seals this ninth day of December, 1859.

"John Westfield. [L. S.]
"Thomas M. Cox. [L. S.]
"Thos. C. Gower. [L. S.]

"Received on the within three hundred and fourteen 33-100 dollars, this May 27th, 1861."

"$4166.67. On the first day of September, 1861, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of A. M. Hamilton, guardian of E. F. Stokes, four thousand one hundred and sixty-six 67-100 dollars, for value received, with interest payable annually from the first day of September last. Witness our hands and seals this ninth day of December, 1859.

"John Westfield. [L. S.]
"Thomas M. Cox. [L. S.]
"Thos. C. Gower. [L. S.]

"Personally comes before me Edward F. Stokes, and makes oath that the above are true copies of notes now in his hands for collection. Edward F. Stokes, Attorney.

"Sworn to, before me, this 25th of June, 1879. J. J. Douthit, Master."

*484

*Upon this affidavit alone, without any proof of the execution of the notes, or who was the real owner thereof, or whether they were subject to payments or discounts, the master, without notice to the other parties interested, who were not present, allowed the notes as proved claims against the estate of John Westfield, and so reported to the court. The plaintiff and other creditors excepted to the report upon the grounds: "First. That it did not establish the fact as to who is the real owner of said claims. Second. That it does not set forth all the credits to which said claims are subject, the fact being, as the plaintiff is informed, that sundry sums, amounting in the aggregate to $3000 or $4000, had been paid on the said notes, &c. Third. That proof to establish said claims was ex parte, and that the plaintiff had no opportunity of inspecting the same or cross-examining the witnesses, no notice having been given of the time and place of holding a reference herein."

On hearing the report of the master, and the exceptions thereto, Judge Aldrich ordered that the cause be recommitted to the master to take the testimony and report upon the questions raised by the plaintiff's exceptions, with leave to report any special matter, and especially that the notes presented by Edward F. Stokes, as attorney, be proved in the name of the real owner within thirty days from date, or, in case of failure upon his part to do so, that he be debarred from setting up the same, and that the master take testimony as to all credits which should be allowed upon said notes."

From this order Edward F. Stokes appeals to this court upon the ground that it was error to make such order.

The order to re-commit, for the purpose of further proof, was not appealable, and we would so hold if a motion had been made to dismiss the appeal. The order appealed from was neither a final judgment nor an order affecting a substantial right made in an action when such order in effect determines the action and presents a judgment from which an appeal might be taken, nor does it involve the merits of the action. "An order to involve the merits must finally determine some substantial matter forming the whole or a part of some cause of action or defence in the case in which the order is entitled."

*485

Henderson v. *Wyatt, 8 S. C. 112; Blakely & Copeland v. Frazier, 11 S. C. 122.

In this case the only matter determined was that the claim should be re-committed for further proof. Such an order is purely administrative. But as the matter is before us, and it is important to recall attention to a practice which is absolutely necessary in all proceedings in the nature of creditor's bills, we will dispose of the appeal.

It has long been well established in this state that in order to prevent multiplicity of suits, and for other good reasons, the executor or administrator of an insolvent estate may, when creditors are numerous, file a bill or a complaint against the creditors to enjoin them from proceeding at law, and to have the estate administered in equity; and when the representative of an estate files such a proceeding the practice is to select one or two of the principal creditors and to bring in the others by publication. None of them need answer formally, except when specially required or ordered by the court, the rest appear and litigate orally, but all are enjoined from suing at law. Thomson, Ex'r, v. Palmer et al., 2 Rich. Eq. 32.

In such case after the creditors have been called in, any one of them who presents his claim under the master's notice, becomes an actor in the proceedings and a party to the decree, and is entitled to any order to speed the cause or carry the decree into successful execution. Boyce v. Boyce, 5 Rich. Eq. 263.

It follows that any creditor so coming in is a party in every sense, as much so as if he had commenced the action for himself and other creditors, or was made a defendant by name, and filed a formal answer. An attorney, whose business it is to represent others, cannot prove a claim by swearing that he has such demand for collection, or in any way except in the name of the real party in interest, as if he were suing upon the same. There cannot be in such case an unknown party, for there could be no judgment for or against such party. The alleged debtor being dead he cannot speak for himself. There may be discounts or counter claims, and it is therefore eminently proper that there should be at least the security afforded by the oath of the proper party—the creditor himself—that the debt is really bona fide *due, and that no part of it has been paid by discount or otherwise. The practice on this subject has long been well defined and clearly stated. We think it should be followed as laid down by the court of equity in the case of Ex parte Hanks, Dud. Eq. 231.

*486

We are satisfied with the rule of practice announced by Chancellor Dunkin, who, in delivering the judgment of the court in that case said: "In the course of the argument of the case at bar it seemed to be supposed that the creditor would not be obliged to make oath to the amount of his demand. According to the course of the English chancery, where assets are to be administered, all claims, including judgments, &c., must be rendered on oath, and this is also the approved mode in this country. A creditor presenting his claim to the commissioner, under notice, should make an affidavit of the debt, and that he is aware of no discount, or if there are mutual demands, a balance should be struck and sworn to. It need scarcely be remarked that this is not intended to supersede the necessity of the ordinary proof of the debt, but is supplementary thereto."

The order below has already been affirmed and the appeal dismissed in accordance with the principles herein announced. Appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 486

(Case No. 887.)

MOORE v. PARKER.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Homestead ⇐150.]

Where a Circuit decree gives a homestead to a widow, this court will not assume that she was not the head of a family, the appeal-brief only showing that she had no children.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Welch v. Gleason, 28 S. C. 249, 5 S. E. 599.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 305; Dec. Dig. ⇐150.]

[2. Homestead ⇐141.]

A widow without a family of her own, is herself the family of her deceased husband, and as such, is entitled to a homestead exemption out of his property as against his debts.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Norton v. Bradham, 21 S. C. 381; Yoe v. Hanvey, 25 S. C. 97; Jeffries v. Allen, 29 S. C. 508, 7 S. E. 828; Moyer v. Drummond, 32 S. C. 168, 10 S. E. 952, 7 L. R. A. 747, 17 Am. St. Rep. 850; Broughton v. Broughton, 93 S. C. 28, 75 S. E. 1027.

For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 262; Dec. Dig. ⇐141.]

Before Fraser, J., Colleton, October, 1879.

*487

*This was a petition by Dora W. Moore to the Court of Probate, alleging that the estate of her deceased husband, R. T. Moore, was insolvent, and praying that a homestead might be admeasured to her out of her husband's lands, and an exemption of his personalty be also assigned her. This was resisted by the administrator, who was also a creditor. The Court of Probate ordered a writ of admeasurement to issue, and the administrator appealed to the Circuit Court.

The Circuit decree is as follows:

This case was heard by me at the term of the Court of Common Pleas for Colleton county, in October, 1879, on an appeal from an order of the judge of Probate, directing that a writ do issue to set off a homestead for the petitioner.

R. T. Moore died intestate, in the year 1878, leaving no children, but the petitioner, his widow, surviving him. The appeal has been taken by James H. Parker, the administrator of R. T. Moore, the intestate. No question was raised as to the jurisdiction of the judge of Probate. The only point made was, that a widow is not the head of the family unless she has children.

An unmarried man is not the head of a family, unless made such by having children, or perhaps other members of a household around him, constituting a family, and is not, therefore, if without a family, entitled to homestead. I can see no reason why a widow, or other unmarried woman, should be entitled to homestead, unless she have children, or perhaps other persons around her constituting a family.

But this disability exists as to the unmarried man only so far as his own debts are concerned; and so a woman who is unmarried, and not the head of a family, cannot claim homestead against her own debt. It is quite a different thing when an attempt is made to subject the property of the husband to his own debts. In this case, the wife, if there are no children, is the family, and if the husband be dead, then the widow is herself the family. The right of exemption attached to the property in the lifetime of the husband, and continues after his death, as well in favor of the widow as of the widow and children.

*488

*The mode of setting off the homestead for the widow is prescribed in Section 83, A. A. 1873, p. 372, and application was properly made to the judge of Probate. It is ordered and adjudged that the order of the judge of Probate be made the judgment of this court, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the same.

From this decree, the administrator, J. H. Parker, appealed.

Mr. T. M. Mordecai, for appellant, cited Thomp. on Homest. 44, 45; 31 Texas 680; 5 S. C. 500; 42 Geo. 406.

Mr. J. D. Pope, contra, cited the statutes upon the subject of homesteads. 2 S. C. 227, 311; 3 S. C. 227; 8 S. C. 97; 11 Nev. 260; 90 Ill. 250.

May 18th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the Circuit Court affirming a decree of the judge of Probate, granting the prayer of the petitioner that a homestead be assigned to her out of her deceased husband's insolvent estate. The judge of Probate states that her claim was resisted by Parker, the administrator and principal creditor, "on the sole ground of the petitioner being without child or children," and the Circuit judge says: "The only point made was, that a widow is not the head of the family unless she has children." In the case as thus presented, there cannot be a question of the correctness of the decision of the court below, as it is strictly in accordance with the decision of this court in the case of Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 3 S. C. 226, where it was held that the fact that a widow is childless is not, of itself, sufficient to deprive her of her right of homestead. The petitioner, though childless, might, nevertheless, have been the head of the family, and, as we are bound to assume that the judgment of the court below is correct until error is shown by the record as presented here, we would, if necessary, assume that it had been shown to the satisfaction of the court below, that the petitioner was the head of the family, inasmuch as the only question made in that court, as appears by the record presented *here, was whether it was necessary, in order to entitle a widow to claim a homestead exemption out of her husband's estate, against his debts, that she should have a child or children.

*489

It is true that the counsel, in his notice of appeal, does state, as his ground for such appeal, that the petitioner "being without children, and not the head of a family," is not entitled to the homestead exemption, and in his argument, says that the only question in the case is whether the petitioner, "the childless widow of R. T. Moore, deceased, with no one—not even a servant—dependent upon her for support, is the head of a family," &c.; but these additional facts—that the petitioner is not the head of a family, and has no one living with her dependent upon her for support—not appearing in the "case," as prepared for this court, are not properly before us for consideration, and certainly should not be allowed to have the effect of reversing a Circuit decision, made, as we must assume, in the absence of such facts. If a statement had been inserted in the "case," to the effect that there was no evidence tending to show that the petitioner was the head of a family, or that she had any one living with her dependent upon her for support, the way would then have been open to consider the question argued by the counsel for the appellant. This court can only review the judgment of the Circuit Court for the purpose of ascertaining whether it has committed any error in applying the law to the facts as presented in that court, and these facts we can only learn from the "case" as agreed upon, or settled for argument here, and not from ex parte statements made by counsel, either in their grounds of appeal or in their arguments.

But, even assuming the facts to be as represented, we are still of opinion that there was no error in the Circuit decision. It appears from the decree of the judge of Probate, that R. T. Moore occupied the premises in which the homestead is claimed as a family residence, up to the time of his death, and since that time his childless widow, the petitioner, has continuously occupied the same premises, carrying on the same business of keeping a private boarding-house. Under this state of facts, there can be no doubt that, at his death, R. T. Moore, as the head of a family consisting of his wife, was entitled to a right of home*stead for the benefit not of himself, but for the benefit of his family. By virtue of such right, his creditors would have been prevented from subjecting the homestead to the payment of their debts, and the same would have been protected from the process issued to enforce the payment of such debts. Does the fact of his death deprive his family, consisting, in this case, of his widow, of the protection which the constitution had secured to him for the benefit of his family? If so, then, upon the same principle, it might be argued that the death of a trustee would destroy the beneficial interests of the cestui que trust, for the protection of which the trust was created. If, as has been held in several of our cases, (In re Kennedy, 2 S. C. 227; Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 229; Ex parte Strobel, 2 S. C. 311), the object of protection which the constitution had in view was the family, the head of it being the mere representative, then it would seem to follow, necessarily, that the true intent of the constitution was, that this right of exemption, which undoubtedly existed in Moore at the time of his death, and which has since been adjudged to have been conferred for the benefit of his family, consisting of his wife, should continue after his death for the benefit of the same person. Such seems to have been the construction placed upon the constitution by the general assembly, at the first session held after the adoption of the constitution, who were required, by the express terms of that instrument, to enforce, by suitable legislation, the provisions relating to homestead; for by the act of 1868 (14 Stat. 20), it was provided that the right of homestead of the head of any family, existing at his death, should continue for the benefit of his family. Any other view would, it seems to us, manifestly violate the intention of the framers of the constitution, and lead to results which clearly were not contemplated or intended by them; for if the childless widow is denied the protection which was extended to her husband for her benefit, it is difficult to see how the same result could be avoided in case of a father dying, leaving no wife and only a single minor child.

*490

As the Circuit judge has very properly remarked, if the claim set up here by the petitioner was a claim to a homestead exemption out of her own property, against her own debts, quite a *different question would be presented. But when she simply claims an exemption which the constitution undoubtedly secured to her husband for her benefit, against his debts, we do not see any ground upon which it can be resisted.

*491

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 491

(Case No. 888.)

COLEMAN v. HELLER.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Exceptions, Bill of ⟸46.]

Exceptions to the orders and rulings of the judge may be taken at the trial, and if so taken, they need not be served within ten days after the rising of the court, as required by the act of 1878. 16 Stat. 698.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Miller v. Newell, 20 S. C. 140, 47 Am. Rep. 833; Fore v. Berry, 94 S. C. 75, 78 S. E. 706.

For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. ⟸46.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⟸274.]

Where the judge is apprised of the intention to rely on the proposition advanced by way of exception, that is sufficient to constitute an exception, although there is no formal request to note an exception. Fox v. Railroad, 4 S. C. 543, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1591, 1592, 1605, 1606, 1607, 1624, 1631–1645; Dec. Dig. ⟸274.]

[3. Parties ⟸63.]

At the trial, the Circuit judge permitted the name of a sole plaintiff to be stricken out and another substituted in his stead, without time given to the defendants to answer such amended complaint. Held to be error.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tarrant v. Gittelson, 16 S. C. 235; Dunsford v. Brown, 19 S. C. 566; Griffin v. Griffin, 20 S. C. 489; Crane, Boylston & Co. v. Lipscomb, 24 S. C. 438, 439; Suber v. Chandler, 28 S. C. 386, 6 S. E. 155; Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 575, 9 S. E. 684; Baker v. Hornick & Co., 51 S. C. 316, 28 S. E. 941; Pope Mfg. Co. v. Charleston Cycle Co., 55 S. C. 541, 33 S. E. 787; Sentell v. Southern Ry., 67 S. C. 231, 45 S. E. 155; Cauthen v. Cauthen, 70 S. C. 171, 49 S. E. 321; Greenwood Loan & Guarantee Ass'n v. Williams, 71 S. C. 425, 51 S. E. 272; Cousar v. Heath, Witherspoon & Co., 80 S. C. 471, 61 S. E. 973; Buist v. Williams, 81 S. C. 499, 62 S. E. 859; Citizens' Savings Bank v. Efird, 96 S. C. 22, 23, 79 S. E. 637.

For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. ⟸63.]

Before Mackey, J., Williamsburg, March, 1879.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court, but it may not be amiss to add that when the Circuit judge ordered the case to the jury, the defendants still declined to answer or defend the new action.

Messrs. Barron & Lambson, for appellants.

Mr. J. A. Kelly, contra.

May 26th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action by George H. Coleman against Philip Heller and sureties on the bond of the said *Heller as treasurer of Williamsburg county. The breach of the bond, relied on for a recovery, was the refusal of the said Heller, as county treasurer, to pay certain county school certificates, amounting in the aggregate to $165, to the plaintiff, George H. Coleman, who, as alleged in the complaint, was the owner thereof. The defendant denied the breach and pleaded payment of the certificates in a settlement with the said George H. Coleman. At the trial it appeared by the testimony of the plaintiff himself that the school certificates, which were the foundation of the action, did not belong to him but to his wife, S. A. Coleman; whereupon the defendant moved for a non-suit on the ground that the plaintiff had not proved his case. The presiding judge refused the motion, but granted an order, moved by the plaintiff, to substitute on the record as plaintiff the name of S. A. Coleman, the wife, for that of her husband, George H. Coleman. Defendants then moved for reasonable time to prepare their defence to the action of the plaintiff, S. A. Coleman, which was refused. The presiding judge announced that he would hold that the defendants could set up the same defence against S. A. Coleman which they had proposed to set up against George H. Coleman. The defendant's counsel insisted that they could not make their defence in the new case without an opportunity for preparation, and still asked for time. The judge ordered the case to the jury, and they rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants moved for a new trial, and, failing in that, within ten days after the adjournment of court, gave notice of appeal, and within thirty days filed specific grounds for a new trial as follows:

*492

1. "Because it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial.

2. "Because his Honor erred in ordering S. A. Coleman to be substituted as plaintiff, a substitution not being in the nature of an amendment.

3. "Because his Honor erred in refusing motion of defendant's counsel for twenty days time to answer the complaint of S. A. Coleman."

The plaintiff made a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no exceptions were taken to the rulings of the presid*ing judge within ten days after the rising of the court by furnishing a copy of such exceptions. He insists that a general motion of appeal, within ten days, was not a compliance with the act of 1878, which requires "copy of exceptions," &c. 16 Stat. 698. This makes it necessary to give construction to that act, and to do so we must look to the law as it stood when the act was passed. According to the code, no error of law in a case tried by a jury could be considered in this court for the purpose of correction, unless it appeared from the record that exceptions, in the matter complained of, had been taken in open court. (§ 288.) But when the case was tried by the court, exceptions could be taken "within ten days, after notice in writing of the judgment, in the same manner and with the same effect as upon a trial by jury." (§ 292.) Abrahams v. Kelley & Barrett, 2 S. C. 238, and many other cases.

*493

The act of 1878 alters and amends the law in relation to appeals from the Circuit Court to the Supreme Court in the following particulars:

The first section allows ten days after the rising of the Circuit Court at which the case is tried "to except to the rulings of the presiding judge by furnishing a copy of such exceptions to the presiding judge, and by serving them on the attorney of the respondent within the time above limited." The only effect of this provision is to allow the same time—ten days—for exceptions in all cases as were before allowed in cases tried by the court. This, however, does not repeal the law requiring exceptions to be made, but merely, in a certain class of cases, extends the time within which they may be taken, and in such cases prescribes the mode and manner in which it shall be done. The section is not mandatory, but permissive. The words are: "Exceptions for the purpose of appeal to the Supreme Court may be taken," &c. The exceptions, as heretofore, may still be taken at the trial, and, if so taken, copy of such exceptions need not be served under the act.

The second section of the act of 1878 does alter the law in relation to appeals by requiring that in all appeals to the Supreme Court the appellant or his attorney shall, within ten days after written notice of the order, decree or judgment appealed from *has been granted, or, if rendered during term time, after the rising of the court, give notice to the opposite party or his attorney of his intention to appeal, and within thirty days after such notice the appellant, or his attorney, shall prepare and serve "a case," unless the judge shall extend the time, &c. This section does not touch the subject of exceptions in any way, but fixes definitely the term within which must be given notice of appeal, and "the case" be prepared and served, unless the judge shall extend the time, &c.

*494

In this case no question arises under the second section of the act, for the notice of intention to appeal was given within the ten days prescribed, and the objection that "the case" was not served within the thirty days required, was not insisted on. The objection is that the first section has not been complied with in regard to exceptions. It is insisted that no copy of exceptions to the rulings of the presiding judge were served within ten days, as required by the act. We have already seen that the first section was only meant to cover the case where no exceptions were taken at the trial. If they were so taken, then service of copy of exceptions under the act was unnecessary. Did the defendant, at the trial, except to the rulings of the presiding judge? To make objections sufficient to sustain an appeal, it is not necessary that the word "exceptions" should be used. The better practice, undoubtedly, is to give the court information at the time that the party "excepts," and have it noted on the record, so that there can be no question about it; but it has been held that "when it appears from the record that the judge was apprised of the intention to rely on the propositions advanced by way of exceptions, that is sufficient to constitute an exception, though there is no formal request to note an exception." Fox v. Railroad, 4 S. C. 543; South Carolina R. R. Co. v. Wilmington, Columbia & Augusta R. R., 7 S. C. 410; Clarke v. Harper, 8 S. C. 257. Here the propositions, by way of exceptions, were positive and unmistakable. The defendants moved for a nonsuit. When that failed they moved for further time to answer, and, after the verdict against their protest was rendered in favor of S. A. Coleman, they moved for a new trial. We think it appears from the record that the judge was "apprised of the *intention to rely on the propositions advanced by way of exception," and that is sufficient to constitute an exception, although there was no formal request to note an exception. The motion to dismiss the appeal is refused.

*495

We will not consider the first ground of appeal that it was error to refuse the motion for a non-suit, as that is involved in the exception as to the substitution of the name of S. A. Coleman, as plaintiff, for that of her husband, George H. Coleman. Upon the subject of mistakes in pleadings and amendments, the code of procedure provides as follows:

"Section 193. Where the variance is not material, as prescribed in the last section, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, or may order an immediate amendment without costs.

"Section 194. Where, however, the allegation of the causes of action or defence to which the proof is directed is not proved, not in some particular or particulars only, but in its entire scope and meaning, it shall not be deemed a case of variance within the last two sections, but a failure of proof.

"Section 196. The court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process or proceeding, by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other obligations material to the case, or when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defence, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved." Gen. Stat. 611–12.

It was in the discretion of the Circuit judge at the trial, in furtherance of justice, to grant an order striking out the name of one person and inserting that of another as plaintiff; but we think a change so fundamental, which, in fact, made a new case, was not merely correcting a variance, but making an important amendment, and could not be made without changing substantially the defence, which, upon the same state of facts, might be good against one plaintiff and not maintainable against another. Cleveland et ux. v. Cohrs, ante p. 397.

These provisions of the code, taken together, do not seem to *give to a Circuit judge greater power than that which was formerly exercised by the chancellors in this state.

*496

In the case of Jennings v. Springs, Bail. Eq. 181, Chancellor De Saussure had granted an order permitting the complainant, Jennings, to amend his bill by substituting the names of the executors of Pressley for his own, the bill having been filed by him as their agent, and his own name erroneously inserted. Appeal was taken, and the Court of Appeals held that it was within the discretion of the court to permit a bill to be amended by substituting the name of a new for an original complainant, even after answer filed, but upon reasonable terms. And they further held, in that case, that it should be upon payment of all costs up to the time of the amendment, as well as of the amendment itself. We think the denial of the terms that the defendants should have reasonable time to answer the case as standing in the name of the new plaintiff, was error.

The judgment is set aside and a new trial granted.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

13 S. C. 496

(Case No. 889.)

COTHRAN v. KNOX.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Arbitration and Award ⟸3, 12.]

An award is not binding upon a party not accepting it, where there is no evidence of a previous dispute between the parties concerning the matters submitted, and it does not clearly appear what matters were submitted, or to whom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 45; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 3, 12.]

[2. Arbitration and Award ⟸64.]

An award will be set aside where the evidence shows that the arbitrators acted with partiality towards one of the parties.†

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 323; Dec. Dig. ⟸64.]

[3. Partnership ⟸253.]

In the absence of special contract, a partner has no right to commissions upon his collections and disbursements in the settlement of the partnership business. Cooper v. Reid, 2 Hill Ch. 549, followed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 550; Dec. Dig. ⟸253.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⟸1022.]

A finding of fact by a referee, reversed by the Circuit judge, sustained upon a review of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015–4018; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 1022.]

*497

*Before Fraser, J., Abbeville, April, 1879.

McGowan, A. J., having been of counsel in this cause, did not sit at the hearing.

This is an action brought in August, 1870, by James S. Cothran, as executor of Joel J. Cunningham, deceased, against John Knox. The pleadings and facts of the case are stated in the report of Ellis G. Graydon, Esq., special referee, to whom it was referred to state the accounts. His report is as follows:

This action was originally begun by complaint on a sealed note dated August 26th, A. D. 1870, whereby the defendant promised to pay to plaintiff's testator one day after the date thereof, the sum of $5091.85, together with interest thereon from January 1st, of the same year, at the rate of ten per centum per annum. The complaint admits a payment of $966.65, made on September 1st, of the same year of its execution, and claims judgment for the balance.

The answer admits the execution of the note with the credit endorsed, and alleges—

I. By way of defence:

That on April 7th, 1873, the defendant and plaintiff's testator submitted their matters to T. B. Millford and J. C. Wosmansky, who made a settlement and delivered a copy to each of them, which settlement was accepted by them as correct and final, and by which the defendant was found to be indebted to the plaintiff's testator on that day in the sum of $749.73.

II. By way of counter-claims—

1. Draft in testator's favor drawn April 14th, 1873, for $60.

2. Draft in testator's favor drawn April 15th, 1873, for $90.60.

3. Note paid to Quarles & Perrin, May 22d, 1873, for $214.48, with interest from January 1st, 1873, at twelve per centum per annum.

4. Account for 1873 for $44.25.

The answer also offers to pay plaintiff $512 and costs in discharge and satisfaction of this claim.

The reply denies all knowledge of the matters set up by way of counter-claims in the answer.

*498

*The plaintiff, subsequently, by leave of the court first had and obtained for that purpose, amended his complaint so as to demand of the defendant an account of the partnership affairs of J. Knox & Co., which firm was composed of the defendant and plaintiff's testator.

The answer to the amended complaint alleges—

1. That the partnership began January 2d, 1868, and ended December 21st, 1869.

2. That soon after the close of the partnership, a settlement was made which adjusted everything relating to partnership matters, except uncollected assets and outstanding debts of the firm, and which resulted in the note for $5091.85 now in suit.

3. That defendant has collected assets and paid debts, and that he has on hand a number of notes and accounts deemed worthless, and that upon a fair adjustment, he thinks his late co-partner will fall in his debt.

4. That the settlement hereinbefore referred to made on April 7th, 1873, by T. B. Millford and J. C. Wosmansky, reduced the note for $5091.85 to $749.73.

5. That the hotel property mentioned in the complaint was held by them rather as joint owners than as partners, and that all matters relating to it had been fully adjusted between them, leaving a small lot of a half acre still unsold.

6. That defendant has paid taxes on said lot, and has been at considerable trouble and expense collecting assets, &c., and claims remuneration for the same.

I am of opinion, after careful consideration, that the defence set up in the answer of settlement and award made by Messrs. Millford and Wosmansky must be overruled for the following reasons:

1. Because of partiality in the arbitrators. They got all the books and papers used by them from the defendant Knox. They were attended by said defendant during the time they were making the settlement, but never summoned the plaintiff's testator to come before them. They allowed the defendant to explain and contradict writings by his unsupported and parol testimony, and after the statement had been made, they signed it together in the presence of the defendant, without giving Cunningham *notice of the time and place of such meeting. Partiality to avoid an award need not be corrupt partiality; it is sufficient if the conduct of the arbitrators has been such as to give either party an advantage over the other.

† The same doctrine has been recently declared by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, September, 1880, in Hills v. Home Ins. Co. See 10 Reporter 698.

*499

2. Because of error apparent on the face of the settlement considered along with the papers on which it was based. In several instances due-bills and notes signed by the decedent and made payable to J. Knox & Co., were charged against him as if they had been made payable to defendant alone, upon defendant's unsupported testimony; that they ought to have been made payable to him, although the defendant still had in his possession the whole of the assets of J. Knox & Co. It was error in the arbitrators to allow the defendant to contradict these writings by parol testimony of any kind, and more especially by his own unsupported testimony.

3. Because the alleged settlement was never acquiesced in by the decedent. It is alleged in the answer that it was, but there is no proof of it, the only witness examined on that point testifying that it was not.

4. Because it professes to be a settlement of individual matters and not to include partnership matters, but includes matters which clearly relate to the partnership. In fact, all the transactions between the defendant and decedent were such as grew immediately or remotely out of their connection as partners.

I am of opinion that it is incumbent upon the defendant Knox, standing as he does in a fiduciary relation to the decedent, to show affirmatively that the settlement was fair and impartial; that it is free from error either in law or in fact; that it was acquiesced in by the decedent, and that it embraces all such matters, and only such, as it professes to embrace. This he has failed to do.

I further find that the counter-claims set up in the defendant's answer are valid claims against plaintiff's testator, and must be allowed as claimed.

I have deemed it best to keep individual matters and partnership matters separate and distinct as far as possible, and I therefore first give a statement showing the amount due on the note in suit. In making the statement I strike a balance on January

*500

*1st, of each year, considering all accounts made with the defendant by the plaintiff's testator during the preceding year as due on that day, and allowing the defendant interest on all notes and due-bills drawn in his favor by plaintiff's testator, and on all sums of money paid by him to or for said testator during the preceding year from their dates respectively to that day. The note is dated August 26th, 1870, payable one day after date, with interest from January 1st, 1870, at the rate of ten per centum per annum, and according to my view of the law I have computed interest on it from January 1st, 1870, to August 27th, 1870, at ten per centum. I then compute interest at seven per centum from August 27th, 1870, on the amount of principal and interest due on that day, and in like manner up to the date of this, my report, subtracting payment as above.

The account will stand as to the note as follows:

[Here follows a statement of accounts.]

In making up the foregoing statement, I have not allowed the defendant credit for certain accounts of S. W. Cunningham for 1870 and 1871, because there is no proof of a promise, verbal or written, by plaintiff's testator to pay them. The letters in the margin of the statement correspond with those made on the documents put in evidence. I next give a statement showing the amount due by the defendant to plaintiff's testator on account of the partnership affairs of the late firm of J. Knox & Co. This statement includes all matters in which the defendant and the testator had a joint interest, as well those not connected with the mercantile adventure as those that were. In making it I have considered it best to treat all moneys received each year as if received on January 1st of the ensuing year, and all payments made during the year as if made on that day. Applying the rule as to trustees, I think it but just that the defendant should have commissions of five per centum on all collections made by him, and I accordingly next allow them. I then divide the remainder, if any, by two, subtract from this quotient any sums of money due by the testator to the firm of J. Knox & Co., and compute interest on the residue to the date of this my report. The account will then stand as follows:

[Here follows a statement of accounts.]

*501

*The claim of plaintiff that the note to Eakin & Knox, marked "A," was included in a former settlement is not allowed. It does not anywhere appear, and the fact that it was still in the hands of defendant raises a presumption, conclusive to my mind, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that it has never been paid. * * *

Extracts from so Much of the Testimony as is Material to the Case Made in This Court.

The award is a bare statement of accounts between J. J. Cunningham and John Knox, below which is written:

The above is a settlement, individually, between J. Knox and J. J. Cunningham. Settlement between J. Knox & Co. and J. J. Cunningham not included in the above.

7th April, 1873. J. C. Wosmansky,
T. B. Millford.

$326.00. June 15th, 1868.

One day after date I promise to pay Eakin & Knox, or bearer, three hundred and twenty-six dollars, value received, with interest from date.

[No. 1 of award.] J. J. Cunningham.

[Copy of note No. 8 of alleged award, with endorsement.]

Due John Knox four hundred and sixty and 21-100 dollars, to pay Dr. Brown on settlement, this 5th May, 1870.

John Knox & Co.,
$460.20. per Evans.

[Endorsement.]

This should have been signed J. J. Cunningham, per Evans, said Evans having made an error, as per statement of J. Knox.

T. B. M.
J. C. W.

[Copy of note No. 5 of alleged award, with endorsement.]

$86.61.

Due J. Knox & Co. eighty-six 61-100 dollars, to pay H. S. Cason for one (1) bale of cotton of J. M. Hudson's, this the 28th March, 1870. J. J. Cunningham, per Evans.

*502

*[Endorsement.]

This should have been made payable to J. Knox, individually, which can be testified by Evans, as per statement of J. Knox.

T. B. M.
J. C. W.

Testimony of T. B. Millford.

The paper marked Exhibit O is in the handwriting of Mr. J. C. Wosmansky, and was signed by Mr. Wosmansky and myself; I recognize our signatures; Mr. Wosmansky is dead.

Mr. Knox first asked me to make a settlement between Mr. Cunningham and himself; I consented to make the settlement if Mr. Cunningham would come and ask me to do so, and both of them would consent for Mr. Wosmansky to assist; Mr. Cunningham afterwards came to me and asked me to make the settlement; I cannot say which selected Mr. Wosmansky first, but it is my impression that both parties agreed to Mr. Wosmansky assisting me; I would say positively that I would not have consented to make the settlement if I had not understood that both parties consented to Mr. Wosmansky assisting.

I think there was only one copy of the settlement, and that was left with Mr. Knox; Mr. Knox acquiesced in the settlement, but Mr. Cunningham never did; Cunningham never did say to me that he acquiesced in the settlement, but Knox appeared to do so—at least he never made any objection to it.

When I asked Mr. Cunningham for his papers he said that Knox had them all; Mr. Knox turned over to me a number of papers belonging both to Cunningham and himself, and the books of the firm, and from these settlement was made up; I cannot say whether all the papers necessary for the settlement were turned over or not.

This settlement was made up from the papers furnished to me by Mr. Knox, and on these data was correct and fair to both parties—I know nothing to the contrary.

I have no personal knowledge that Mr. Cunningham repudiated the settlement made by Mr. Wosmansky and myself.

I do not know what the note ($5091.85) was given for, and did not know of its existence until it was handed to me by Mr. Knox to make up the settlement; the note was included in the *settlement made by Mr. Wosmansky and myself; I know nothing of any settlement made prior to that exhibited, marked Exhibit O; when we made that settlement we allowed both parties such credits, and only such, as in our judgment they were entitled to.

*503

I mean to say that the settlement is correct and fair to both parties, provided the data upon which it was made were correct; I had no other means of judging but from papers furnished.

Mr. Cunningham never acquiesced in the settlement.

I think I can safely say that Mr. Cunningham was never present while the settlement was being made up; I cannot say whether or not Mr. Knox was present at any time while the settlement was being made up, but after it was finished Mr. Wosmansky and myself carried it to Mr. Knox, read it over to him, and signed it in his presence.

J. F. C. Du Pre sworn.

Note produced ($5091.85) in witnesses' handwriting, except signature; credit in Cunningham's handwriting; Knox and Cunningham formed partnership, thinks, in fall of 1867; on January 2d, 1868, articles of partnership; first time they went together included profits of hotel business; witness clerked for Knox & Co.; they gave witness $600 and rent of hotel. [Articles of partnership read and offered in evidence.] Partnership lasted two years, 1868 and 1869; Cunningham sold to Knox in December, 1869; Knox gave to Cunningham a note in August, 1870; settlement and dissolution of partnership January 1st, 1870; settlement included stock of merchandise of all kinds, cash on hand, everything belonging to the firm in the mercantile adventure, and it includes all private claims between the parties up to January 1st, 1870; it left in Knox's hands accounts and notes of firm, and left debts of firm unpaid; full settlement of all matters, partnership and individual; they had not been equal partners in realty, but this settlement made them so; everything was taken into the settlement.

H. S. Cason being sworn, says—

Knew Mr. Cunningham well in his lifetime; knew Mr. Bailey Millford; heard Mr. Cunningham say to Mr. Knox that he was willing to give over all books and papers to

*504

Mr. Millford to *make settlement; Cunningham and Millford were friends; conversation was at Kurz's after fire; thinks Cunningham and Millford were special friends.

Cross-examination.

Down at Kurz's building; don't know now conversation; Cunningham said to Knox, "Knox, Millford is an honest man, and I am willing to turn books and papers over to him to make a settlement between us." Witness did not hear Wosmansky's name called.

To the report of the referee exceptions were filed by both parties.

The defendant, Knox, excepts to the referee's report as erroneous in the following particulars:

1. That he has set aside the arbitration and award between the parties, made in writing by Messrs. T. B. Millford and J. C. Wosmansky, April 7th, 1873, Exhibit O of defendant's answer, which was error, said award being final and conclusive.

2. That in re-stating the accounts between the plaintiff's testator and the defendant, he has incorporated in the settlement of partnership matters a very large amount, over $3500, which had been considered, adjusted and settled by said award, in this way largely increasing, contrary to justice and equity, the liabilities of the defendant.

4. That two accounts embraced in the award against the plaintiff's testator are disallowed in the report, to wit, the accounts against S. W. Cunningham of $183.94, for 1871, and $38.45 for 1872.

The plaintiff excepts to the report so far as the account against John Knox is concerned, upon the following grounds:

1. Because the referee allowed the defendant, John Knox, commissions of five per cent. upon all receipts as survivor, which amount to over $600.

2. Because the referee allowed Knox credit for the Eakin & Knox note ($326,) bearing date June 15th, 1868, which had been settled in the note of John Knox for $5091.85, of August 27th, 1870.

So much of the Circuit decree as bears upon the questions decided by this court, is as follows:

*505

*So much of these cases as relates to the issues between the plaintiff, as executor of Joel J. Cunningham, and the defendant, John Knox, was heard by me at the special term of the Court of Common Pleas, held for Abbeville county, in April, 1879.

The case came up on a report of the special referee, Ellis G. Graydon, and exceptions thereto by the plaintiff and the defendant, John Knox.

The difficulty I have felt in coming to a satisfactory conclusion, especially as to the issues of fact raised by the parties, have been increased by the unavoidable circumstances to which it is due, that so long a time had passed between the hearing and the filing of this decree.

I will consider first the exceptions filed by the defendant, John Knox.

1. The first exception is, that the referee set aside an award made by J. C. Wosmansky and T. B. Millford, which purports to settle various matters between the deceased Joel J. Cunningham and the defendant, John Knox. The validity of an award, like the act of an agent, depends entirely upon the proof of the authority under which one man undertakes to dispose of the property or rights of another, even if everything is conducted fairly and properly by the agent or arbitrators, as the case may be. This proof must be made independently of the act of the agent or the mere statements in an award. The proof, to my mind, is altogether too vague as to what was referred to the arbitrators to justify the court in holding the parties bound by the award. The award professes to dispose of individual matters. The testimony does not show whether individual or partnership matters were referred, or both.

For this reason, as well as those given by the referee, I think the first exception should be overruled, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

2. The second exception falls with the first, and must be also overruled, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

4. I am not satisfied with the sufficiency of the evidence to show that Joel J. Cunningham was liable for the debts of S. W. Cunningham. There should have been some agreement in writing to transfer this liability from the person to whom the credit was *given to any third person, and a copartnership between Joel J. and S. W. Cunningham does not change the position of affairs. This exception—the fourth—is therefore overruled, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

*506

As to exceptions filed by plaintiff.

1. The first exception refers to the allowance of five per cent. on collections to the defendant Knox, the surviving partner, as compensation. If I could find authority I would be willing to allow this as fair compensation. If, however, the personal services of a partner who is winding up the affairs of the firm, can be made a matter of charge against the assets, or the other partner, without some special agreement to that effect, it is easy to see how a selfish partner could very easily absorb, for his own services, a large part of the assets. If entitled to compensation at all, there is no rule to confine him to five per cent. The rule, I take it, is laid down in Beattie v. Wray, 19 Penna. St. 519, (see note, Parsons on Partnership, p. 230,) and is, perhaps, a wise one. This exception is therefore sustained, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

2. Nothing which entered into the settlement which was the basis of the note of August 27th, 1870, for $5091.85, given by John Knox to the deceased Cunningham, ought to enter into this accounting, and this second exception is sustained, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

All questions raised and settled by the said report, except those herein referred to, are reserved; and it is ordered and adjudged that the report of the referee as to the issues between the plaintiff and defendant, John Knox, be recommitted to the referee to be reformed in accordance with this decree.

Defendant's Grounds of Appeal.—The Supreme Court will be asked to reverse the Circuit decree in this case in sundry particulars, on the following grounds:

1. The Circuit decree set aside the award, whereas it should have sustained it. There were no allegations and no proof that it was invalid by reason of partiality, mistake, nonacquiescence by Cunningham, or for any other reason sufficient in law to invalidate it. The death of Cunningham, of the arbitrators, and of Evans, the clerk, so altered the conditions and circumstances *relating to the matters between Cunningham and Knox, and besides depriving Knox of important witnesses, closed his mouth in regard to transactions between them, that the court should require exceptionally strong testimony to impeach the award, and such testimony is wholly lacking in the case.

*507

2. That said decree should have allowed appellant's fourth exception to the referee's report, in regard to the two accounts of Knox against S. W. Cunningham, embraced in said award, amounting to $183.94 and $38.45.

3. That said decree should have allowed five per cent. commissions or compensation to Knox on collections and disbursements of partnership assets, allowed by the referee.

4. That it was error in said decree to refuse Knox credit for the Cunningham note payable to Eakin & Knox, (respondent's second exception to referee's report,) for $326, allowed by the referee. There was no evidence that it had entered into the $5091.85 note; on the contrary, there was evidence that it had not.

[For subsequent opinions, see 17 S. C. 207, 591.]

Mr. Edward Noble, for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. Parker and L. W. Perrin, contra.

July 8th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. Upon all the questions raised by this appeal, except that raised by the fourth ground, we agree with the Circuit judge.

As to the alleged arbitration, we think it lacks one essential feature, which deprives it of the character claimed for it. It seems to us to be essential to the very idea of an arbitration that there should have been an antecedent dispute or controversy between the parties. As is said by Morse, in his work on Arbitrations and Awards, at page 40, quoting from Russell's work on the same subject, "a decision which precludes differences from arising instead of settling them after they have arisen, is, for many purposes, not an award." Or, as is said in Smith v. B. C. & M. R. R. Co., 36 N. H. 458, "if the parties have a difference or dispute, however trivial, or upon a matter however simple, *and in whatever mode the truth is to be ascertained, and they select an indifferent third person to be the judge between them, and bind themselves to abide his decision, that seems to us a submission to arbitration, and the decision to be an award." In the case now under consideration, there is no evidence whatever tending to show that the parties had had any previous dispute or difference, but, on the contrary, they seem to have been the best of friends, the one reposing so much confidence in the other as to leave in his possession a note for a large amount against that other. The most natural inference to be drawn from the testimony is, that so far from there having been any previous controversy between the parties, the only difficulty that seemed to be in their minds was the preparation of an account of their complicated transactions, from books which did not appear to have been kept with much accuracy or system, for the purpose of enabling them to ascertain how they stood towards each other. This would call for the services of a skilled accountant rather than for those of arbitrators, strictly speaking. If this was what was in the minds of the parties, then clearly the account prepared by the so-called arbitrators could at most only furnish the basis for a subsequent settlement between the parties, and, until accepted, would not be binding. So far as Cunningham is concerned, there is not only no evidence of his having ever accepted the statement, so prepared, as correct, but, on the contrary, the evidence tends to show that he never saw it, and never knew anything about it.

*508

But even assuming that the foregoing objection is not well founded, there is another, fatal to the alleged award. While it is very true that a submission to arbitration may be by parol as well as by deed or rule of court, yet it is essential that it should appear clearly from the evidence what matters are to be submitted, and to whom. Here the testimony is defective in both respects. The testimony of Millford is that he was asked by Knox "to make a settlement between Mr. Cunningham and himself. * * * Mr. Cunningham afterwards came to me and asked me to make the settlement;" but what matters were to be embraced in such settlement this witness did not state. The natural inference from the language used would be *that it was to embrace all matters between them, as well partnership as individual accounts, and yet it is not pretended that the partnership accounts were to be embraced, and the arbitrators expressly say that their award embraced only the individual and not the partnership accounts. The testimony of Cason is: "Heard Mr. Cunningham say to Mr. Knox that he was willing to give over all books and papers to Mr. Millford to make settlement. * * * Cunningham said to Knox, 'Knox, Millford is an honest man, and I am willing to turn books and papers over to him to make a settlement between us.'" Here again is the same uncertainty as to what matters were to be embraced in the settlement, and the same inference may be drawn from the language used, that all matters, as well partnership as individual, were intended to be embraced. If, therefore, the intention of the parties was to submit all matters, as well partnership as individual, to arbitration, and the arbitrators have confined their award, as they manifestly have done, to the individual transactions, this certainly would be a fatal objection to the award, because while Cunningham might have been willing to submit all matters, partnership as well as individual, to arbitration, it does not by any means follow that he would have been willing to submit only the individual transactions between himself and Knox to arbitration. For it was possible that an adjustment of the individual transactions might have brought Cunningham in debt to Knox, while if the partnership transactions had been brought into the arbitration, the balance might have been the other way. Be this, however, as it may, the basis of every arbitration is the consent of the parties, and where arbitrators make an award in which certain transactions embraced in the submission have been entirely ignored, such an arbitration cannot be said to have the essential element of the consent of the parties.

*509

There is also the same uncertainty as to the persons to whom the matters were submitted for arbitration. The only evidence tending to show that Wosmansky was one of the persons selected is the vague impression of Millford that both parties agreed that Wosmansky should assist him in making the settlement for certainly the mere fact that Wosmansky signed the paper purporting to be the award cannot be regarded as evidence *that he was one of the persons selected as arbitrators; while the testimony of Cason, the only other witness relied upon to show the submission, not only fails to show that Wosmansky was agreed upon as one of the arbitrators, but, on the contrary, shows that his name was not even mentioned. This testimony is manifestly insufficient to show who were "the judges of the parties' choice," and this, therefore, constitutes another objection fatal to the award.

*510

But, in addition to all this, the alleged award is clearly amenable to the objection that it is partial. As is said by Nott, J., in Shinnie v. Coil, 1 McC. Eq. 485: "When it is said that partiality on the part of the arbitrators is good ground for setting aside an award, it is not to be understood that it must necessarily be a corrupt partiality. Any ex parte proceeding, the effect of which is to give an advantage to one party over the other, is such a partiality as will avoid an award." In this case, while Cunningham was not only not called upon for any statement, so far as the testimony shows, but was not even notified of any meeting of the arbitrators, the other party, Knox, was either present or in some way communicated with the arbitrators, as it distinctly appears that upon his ex parte statement, certainly incompetent as to one of the notes, whether under oath or not does not appear, the arbitrators undertook to change very materially two written instruments—notes of hand—in both instances in favor of Knox. It is difficult to understand how such conduct could be regarded by a fair-minded person as impartial. For when arbitrators not only permitted a bare statement of an interested party to contradict the terms of a written instrument but actually undertook to alter the terms of another note, upon the bare statement of the party interested, that a third person, who was not examined as a witness, could testify that there was an error in drawing the note in the form in which it was written, without giving the other party an opportunity to be heard as to such an extraordinary proceeding, it looks very much as if the arbitration was the result of the mere dictation of one of the parties, without any regard to the interests of the other.

As to the second ground of appeal, it is very clear that there is no evidence whatever which would have justified the referee *in charging plaintiff's testator with the amount of the two accounts against S. W. Cunningham. The fact that Knox and J. J. Cunningham were partners, and that S. W. Cunningham was living on land belonging to J. J. Cunningham, would certainly furnish no evidence that the latter was to be liable for any account which the latter might see fit to contract.

*511

As to the claim for commissions, we are unable to discover any ground upon which it can be sustained. As is abundantly shown in the authorities cited, commissions can only be claimed by virtue of some statutory provision or some contract between the parties. Where, as in this case, there is no statute allowing commissions and no evidence of any agreement between the parties to that effect, they cannot be allowed. But it is sufficient for us to say that in the case of Cooper v. Reid, 2 Hill's Eq. 549, the point has been distinctly decided adversely to the claim of the appellant.

We think, however, that the Circuit judge erred in refusing to give the appellant credit for the note of Cunningham to Eakin & Knox. He seems to base his judgment upon the assumption that this note was embraced in the settlement made by Du Pre in 1870. But we are unable to discover any evidence that such was the case, and, on the contrary, think that the evidence tends to show the reverse. There is no pretence that there is any direct evidence showing that the note in question went into that settlement, but the argument is that it must be presumed to have entered into that settlement, because the giving of the note for $5091.85 raises a presumption that all antecedent indebtedness had been settled. It is very true that the giving of a note furnishes a presumption of the liquidation of all antecedent accounts, yet this is a mere presumption, liable to be rebutted, as is said in Chewning v. Proctor, 2 McC. Eq. 15, "by very slight circumstances," or, as is perhaps more correctly said in Morse v. Ellerbe, 4 Rich. 606, "until explained or rebutted, the legal presumption from giving a note is that all precedent indebtedness of the maker is covered by it." Where, however, the note is given in a different right, it may well be questioned whether there is any room for such a presumption. A note given by Knox to Cunningham would not necessarily raise the presump*tion that a note previously given by Cunningham to Eakin & Knox had been liquidated, for in law they are totally distinct persons, and unless there was evidence showing that at the time the last note was given the first was in the possession and under the control of Knox, the presumption would not arise, for it might be that the first note had become the absolute, individual property of Eakin, and that Knox had thereby lost all control over it. But, in addition to this, the uncontradicted testimony of Knox is that the note in question did not go into the settlement, and all the circumstances tend, in our opinion, to corroborate his testimony. Hence, even if the presumption contended for could arise it is certainly rebutted by the evidence. We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in sustaining plaintiff's second exception to the report of the referee, and that in this respect also the report should be confirmed.

*512

The judgment of the Circuit Court, as modified herein, is affirmed, and the case is remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 512

(Case No. 890.)

ALLEN v. ALLEN.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐120.]

No appeal lies to this court from a refusal by the Circuit judge to dismiss an appeal from the Court of Probate, where the motion to dismiss was based upon the ground that notice of appeal had not been served in proper time upon all the parties to the cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 858; Dec. Dig. ⇐120.]

[2. Wills ⇐770.]

Where a parent advances a portion to a child to whom the parent has given a general pecuniary legacy by his will previously executed, the presumption of law is that the portion advanced was intended as an ademption of the legacy. But no presumption of ademption arises where the bequest is residuary, or in cases of grandchildren or other strangers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1992; Dec. Dig. ⇐770.]

[3. Wills ⇐770.]

General pecuniary legacies to strangers, and a residuary bequest to children or strangers, will be adeemed by subsequently advanced portions, where an intention to adeem is shown to have existed; and extrinsic evidence may be received to prove such intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1992; Dec. Dig. ⇐770.]

[4. Wills ⇐766.]

The doctrine of ademption has never been applied to devises of real estate.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Godbold v. Vance, 14 S. C. 475.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1981; Dec. Dig. ⇐766.]

*513

[5. Wills ⇐758.]

*The doctrine of advancements applies only in cases of intestacy, or where directed in the will.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McFall v. Sullivan, 17 S. C. 512; Gregg v. McMillan, 54 S. C. 380, 32 S. E. 447; Miley v. Deer, 93 S. C. 70, 76 S. E. 27.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1957–1960, 1976, 1977; Dec. Dig. ⇐758.]

[6. Release ⇐13.]

A legatee, upon the receipt of money from testator during his lifetime, executed to the testator and the other legatees a release of all interest in the estate. Held, that the release was without consideration and a nullity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Release, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

[7. Wills ⇐531.]

Where testator directs the residue of his estate to be converted into money and "equally distributed among his heirs-at-law, share and share alike," held, that the distribution must be per capita and not per stirpes.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kerngood v. Davis, 21 S. C. 207; Dukes v. Faulk, 37 S. C. 266, 16 S. E. 122, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745; Brantley v. Bittle, 72 S. C. 183, 51 S. E. 561; Rembert v. Vetoe, 89 S. C. 210, 213, 71 S. E. 959.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1148; Dec. Dig. ⟸531.]

Before Fraser, J., Abbeville, April, 1879.

Petition filed in the Court of Probate for Abbeville county, by Charles P. Allen, as executor of the will of Bannister Allen, deceased, praying a construction of the will, and of other matters connected with the administration. Upon the hearing the judge of Probate rendered his decree, from which notices of appeal to the Circuit Court were given by several of the parties in interest. Notices of appeal, taken by plaintiff and some of the defendants, appear not to have been served upon three other of the defendants; and these last made their motion before his Honor, Judge Hudson, holding court at Abbeville, in September, 1878, to dismiss the other appeals, because of failure on their part to serve the moving defendants with a copy of their grounds and notice of appeal twelve days before the time when the appeal was to be entered in the Circuit Court. Judge Hudson simply ordered "that the motion to dismiss the appeals be denied."

All other matters necessary to a full understanding of the decision of this court are stated in the Circuit decree of Judge Fraser, which is as follows:

This case was heard by me on appeal from the judge of Probate at the term of the Court of Common Pleas held for Abbeville county in February, 1879.

It appears that Bannister Allen, late of said state and county, departed this life on September 4th, 1876, leaving in force a will executed by him on December 8th, 1871, of which Charles P. Allen, the petitioner, is sole qualified executor. Testator left considerable estate, real and personal, and as his heirs-at-law, a widow, and a number of children and grandchildren, all of *whom are parties to this proceeding, and who are all beneficiaries under said will. The pleadings in the case contain a full statement of undisputed facts and a copy of the will and are referred to when necessary for explanation of the statements herein contained. Between the date of the will and the death of the testator, there were various money transactions between the testator and his children and grandchildren, out of which have grown the conflicting claims of the parties now before the court for adjudication. These transactions are substantially as follows:

*514

1. As to Charles P. Allen, son—

The will gives him $1200 in gold.

April 1st, 1874. Charles P. Allen gave testator a paper under seal by which he promised to pay him at one day $1200 in gold, and $1300 in currency, without interest, "in full for that much."

2. As to Byrd O. Allen, son—

The will gives no "special bequest."

July 3d, 1874. Byrd O. Allen gave testator a receipt under seal for $2000 "in full of his distributive share of the estate," and by it renounces and forever relinquishes all claims by inheritance or otherwise to the same.

3. As to James T. Allen, son—

The will gives $1200 in gold.

November 29th, 1875. James T. Allen gave testator a receipt under seal for $3741 "in part payment of his interest" in the estate, and June 20th, 1876, a note under seal for $20 for value received.

4. As to Bannister A. Davis, grandson—

The will gives two tracts of land, in all, three hundred and twenty-three acres, and $1000.

September 12th, 1864. Bannister A. Davis gave testator his note under seal at one day for $100; on December 23d, 1872, his note under seal at six months for $1145, for money received; and May 29th, 1876, his note under seal for $50, for value received, at one day. These notes are all payable to "bearer."

5. As to Ella Lee, granddaughter—

The will gives her $500.

*515

*July 4th, 1874. Ella Lee gave testator a receipt under seal, $1010, "in full of her distributive share" in his estate, and thereby renounces and forever relinquishes all claim by inheritance or otherwise to her part of his estate.

6. As to James B. Allen, son—

The will gives him $500.

October 15th, 1875. Joseph N. Brown, as guardian, received for him, from testator, a note on Stephen McCully, amounting with interest to the sum of $1313.85, and $15 in currency, on this testator endorsed and signed of same, "receipt against my grandson, James Bannister Allen, in full against my estate."

7. As to Indiana Barksdale, daughter—

The will gave her no special bequest.

September 7th, 1870. Indiana Barksdale gave to testator a paper under seal, acknowledging the receipt of $2000 in full of her distributive share of his estate, and thereby renounced and relinquished to the other heirs-at-law, devisees and legatees when their rights shall accrue, all claim by inheritance or otherwise to any part of the estate, and binds herself, her heirs, executors and administrators to the fulfillment thereof, in consideration of the said $2000. Also Indiana Barksdale gave testator, April 8th, 1869, and before the date of the will, a receipt under seal for $525, except four slaves, to stand good against her in the estate.

8. As to Charlotte Ann (Allen) Orr, granddaughter and John Earle Bannister Allen, grandson—

The will gives to each the sum of $500.

October 6th, 1874. John B. Moore, as their guardian, gave testator a receipt for $1000 each, to be managed and accounted for by him as guardian; also without date, and, I suppose, after coming of age, they gave a receipt jointly for $2000 in full of their distributive share and thereby renounced and forever relinquished all claim by inheritance or otherwise to the estate. On December 10th, 1875, Pet Allen Orr gave testator a receipt under seal for $1100 in full of her distributive share of his estate, and thereby renounces and forever relinquishes to the other heirs-at-law, devisees and legatees when their rights *shall accrue all claim by inheritance or otherwise to her part of the estate and binds her heirs, executors and administrators for the complete fulfillment of the above in consideration the said sum of $1100.

*516

And John E. Allen, September 23d, 1875, gave a receipt to his grandfather (the testator) for $1000 in full of all demands against his estate.

Alethia Allen, Charlotte Ann (Allen) Orr and Pet Allen are assumed to be the same person, and John Allen, John E. B. Allen and John E. Allen also the same person.

9. As to B. Bollin Allen, son—

The will gives him a tract of four hundred and fifty acres of land, one mule, and $1200 in gold.

April 1st, 1874, B. Bollin Allen gave to testator a paper under seal, by which he promised to pay testator one day after date $1200 in gold, included in the will, and $1300 in currency, in full for that much, without interest.

10. As to B. Berrien Allen, son—

The will gives him land known as the Carother's and Mecklin's tracts, a horse, one mule and $1200 in gold.

April 1st, 1874, B. Berrien Allen gave testator a paper under seal, by which he promised to pay testator one day after date $1200 in gold, included in the will, and $1300 in currency, in full for that much without interest.

Also note without date, payable three years after date, for $700, for improvements on the "Home Place," including dwelling, ginhouse and other buildings, with the land belonging to them, without interest.

11. As to Mary A. McCalla, daughter—

The will gives the "Harkness Place," containing two hundred and twenty-five acres, and $1200 in gold.

March 18th, 1876, Mary A. McCalla gave testator a receipt for $3800, in part payment of her interest in the estate, and in consideration thereof she relinquishes her interest in the "Harkness Place," given to her in the will.

12. As to Elizabeth or Lizzie Watson, daughter—

The will gives her a remainder, after the death of the widow, *in the "Home Place," a tract of land described in the will, and the sum of $1200 in gold.

*517

April 24th, 1876, Lizzie Watson gave to testator a certificate, under seal, that she that day received of him $200, making in all $4,000, given by him for the "Home Place," willed to her by him.

February 25th, 1876, she gave a certificate that in consideration of $3800, she relinquished all claims given and bequeathed to her by her father in his will; that being for part of the land, "Home Place," willed to her, &c.

February 16th, 1876, she gave him a paper under seal, by which she relinquished all claim to the "Home Place," no consideration being stated.

13. As to James A. Moragne, grandson; Mary Brady, granddaughter; Alice Brady, granddaughter—

The will gives them a judgment against their father, P. B. Moragne, and contains no estimate of its value. The testator gave them nothing after the execution of the will, so far as appears to the court.

14. As to Ann Elizabeth Allen, the widow—

The will gives her the "Home Place" and valuable personal property, consisting of furniture, plantation tools, implements, stock, provisions, &c., for life, with remainder as to the "Home Place" to Elizabeth S. or Lizzie Watson and as to the personalty to the four younger children, Bannister Bollin, Basil Berrien, Mary A. and Elizabeth S., share and share alike. Also, the will gives her $500 in gold absolutely, and directs that the provision made in the will shall be in bar of dower.

It is alleged, and not denied, that a settlement has been made with the widow by the executor and no question has been raised as to its correctness.

The will contains a residuary clause in the following words, to wit:

"It is my will, and I hereby direct that all my estate not hereinbefore disposed of be converted into money by the sale of the real and personal property and by the collection of the debts due to me, as far as possible, and that the proceeds be equally distributed among my heirs-at-law, share and share alike."

*518

*Upon the hearing before the judge of Probate, it was held:

1. That the division of the residuum under this clause should be made "per capita."

2. That whenever the amounts advanced "as shown by the receipts and notes be equal to or greater than the specific legacies, the latter will be wholly adeemed, and in cases where they are greater, the excess shall be thrown into the residuum of the estate and considered as an advancement, the parties accounting for the same in the distribution.

3. "That the relinquishments are not renunciations of the whole interest of the parties who executed the same, but shall stand upon the same footing as the notes and receipts, adeeming the specific legacies when equal to them, and the excess, if any, to be an increase of the residuum of the estate; the parties accounting for the same as advancements in the distribution of the residue of testator's estate, and when the amounts so advanced do not equal the specific legacies, then the ademption will be only pro tanto in the case of all payments."

This decree was made in order to settle the principles upon which the estate is to be divided preparatory to an accounting, which the executor is prepared to make, having a large portion of the funds in bank. The exceptions put in issue every point decided by the judge of Probate and opens the whole case, for adjudication in this court.

Whenever property, by the terms of the instrument by which it is conveyed, is given to a class of persons as children or grandchildren, the distribution is to be made per capita and not per stirpes, but when the court is compelled to resort to the statute of distributions by the terms of the will or deed, for the purpose of ascertaining the objects of the gift, resort must also be had to the statute to ascertain the proportions in which the donees take unless the terms of the instrument itself indicate an intention on the part of the donor that a different rule of distribution shall be pursued. In the case before the court, the testator, in reference to the residuum of his estate, directs that it "shall be equally distributed among my heirs-at-law, share and share alike." The widow, children and grandchildren are the heirs-at-law, and the intention of testator cannot be more clearly *expressed that the distribution shall be per capita. The law has provided two modes by which the estates of decedents may be distributed.

*519

1. By the statute of distributions, when all advancements are to be brought into the distribution and accounted for.

2. By the will of the decedent, when no advancements are to be accounted for otherwise than are directed by the will itself, executed in the presence of three witnesses and with other formalities provided by law. The only exceptions are in cases of parent and child, there is a presumption against double portions, and in other cases "if it appears in any legal manner it was the intention of the testator to have the legacy adeemed."

Devises of real estate cannot be adeemed by transactions in the lifetime of testator.

An interest in the residuum of an estate cannot be adeemed, on account of the uncertainty of the amount, by any payments in the lifetime of testator.

Wherever the legatee is the child of the testator, the law raises a presumption that the legacy was intended to be adeemed by the advancements, and if not in full then pro tanto, no difference of purpose in the object of the gift appearing on the will and the receipts given. 1 Roper on Leg. 409; 11 Redf. on Wills 545.

Whereas in this case, the parties sustain the relation of strangers (grandchildren) to the testator, it is held, with some hesitation, that as the papers, signed by the legatees as receipts and kept by the testator, refer the payments to the legacies, there was the same purpose in both and an intention to adeem, and that the legacies are adeemed. In all cases where the parties, in papers found in testator's possession and set out in the proceedings, promise to pay money to the testator, the same constitute a portion of the estate, and do not adeem the legacies or devises of land; and these promises to pay must be estimated as a part of the estate and adjusted by payments, as the balance may be. Cruise's Dig. 74, (Lord C. B. Gilbert); Ross on Com. Law 302.

"A release of a man's right supposeth that he has a right; for he cannot transfer a right which he has not; if he has nothing, nothing can pass by the conveyance, &c. Hence a son cannot release to his father's disseizor in the lifetime of the father, be*cause he has no right in the land then. And in such case the son might enter on the land against his own release."

*520

Neither the children or grandchildren of testator had any rights in the estate until the death; and at the time the releases to testator were given there was no right upon which it could operate. It is true that where there is a warrant of title this would operate as an estoppel and prevent the warrantor from claiming. In all the cases where there is a simple release there is no warranty, and no title passed.

In the case of Indiana Barksdale and several others, there is a release to "the other heirs-at-law, devisees and legatees" of testator, "when their rights accrue," of "all claim by inheritance or otherwise," in the estate. If a conveyance of an interest in the estate of a living man to another person, with warranty, as in this case, binding "the warrantor, his heirs, executors and administrators for its fulfillment," can, as a matter of public policy, be sustained, there is an objection to them in this case, because of the uncertainty and confusion of the individuals to whom the release is made.

If the conveyance or release is to inure to the benefit of the heirs-at-law, then the widow will take one-third, and the children, grandchildren, will take per stirpes, on the principle laid down in Templeton & Walker, and if it is to inure to the benefit of the legatees, they would take per capita; thus, in different aspects, the same persons would take in different proportions. The uncertainty and confusion would be still more apparent if the testator had gone outside of his heirs for his legatees and devisees. I conclude that all the releases are void and can have no effect as such, while the evident purpose apparent on their face will give them effect to adeem the legacies, not including, however, the interest in the residuum or operating to adeem the devises of real estate or legacies of chattels.

The statement was omitted at the proper time that the endorsement of testator on the letter of Joseph N. Brown shows his intention to adeem the legacy of $500 to James B. Allen, and the gift of note for the payment of money is sufficiently "ejusdem generis" to make it a case of ademption.

*521

*It may be that the note of B. Berrien Allen for $700 has been paid or otherwise discharged by the use of the money for testator's benefit, and testimony may be introduced to show this.

If it is claimed that the same amount of money paid by the testator by way of advancement is covered by more than one of the papers in Exhibit F or Exhibit H, testimony may be introduced to show it in order to prevent a double charge for the same sum.

It has not been deemed necessary to consider whether the legacies which are the subject of this litigation are specific or general, as the same rule will apply to all except the residuary legacies.

The questions raised in this case are very interesting, and the conclusions have been reached with many misgivings as to their correctness. And it is feared that the very unusual condition in which this estate is found, will work more or less hardships under any judgment either of this or the Supreme Court.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that so much of the decree of the judge of Probate as holds that the distribution of the residue shall be per capita, be sustained, and that the balance of the decree be overruled, and that the case be remanded to the Court of Probate to be settled according to the principles herein announced.

That so far as money has been advanced by the testator on promises to pay money, the same shall be accounted for as a part of the estate and the legacies are not adeemed thereby.

That so far as money has been advanced by the testator on receipt of his children and grandchildren, or their guardians, the same shall be considered as ademptions pro tanto of the general or pecuniary legacies, called specific in the decree of the Probate judge, any surplus over such legacies not to be accounted for.

That so far as these receipts contain releases to the testator, or general releases, or to the heirs-at-law, devisees or legatees, of interest in the estate, the same shall be held to be void and of no effect.

That legacies of chattels, and devises of land shall be held as unaffected in any way by transactions in the lifetime of testator.

*522

*That the residuum of the estate be unaffected by these transactions in the lifetime, and shall be divided between the widow, children and grandchildren named in the will per capita.

That testimony may be introduced in the cases and for the purposes above indicated.

From this decree appeals were taken by several of the parties in interest, upon the grounds considered in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. S. Cothran, for appellants.

The term "heirs" is used by the testator to denote succession or substitution, and must be taken in the sense of a legacy to A and his heirs, meaning such person or persons as would legally succeed to the property according to its nature and quality. 2 Wms. on Ex'rs (3d Am. ed.) 950.

The term "heirs" is distinguished from descendants, issue, family, relations, and if either of these latter terms had been used by the testator, instead of the former, with the qualifying words, "equally" and "share and share alike," it is admitted that unless the testator's intention otherwise appear from other expressions of the will, the distribution would be per capita, not per stirpes. Cas. Temp. Tal. 257; 3 Bro. C. C. 367; 3 Beav. 541. But see even where these terms are used and a contrary intent appears, the distribution was per stirpes. 4 Beav. 239; 1 Coll. 6; 2 Cox 187. The qualifying words, "equally" and "share and share alike," are not inconsistent with distribution per stirpes.

If the grandchildren, as heirs, take by purchase under the sixth clause of the will, which we do not admit, but maintain that they take under the act of 1791, and by succession or substitution, they must take per stirpes. * * * 3 Rich. Eq. 552; Ib. 556.

Grandchildren being two degrees removed, have no natural right to any part of the inheritance. They come in ex gratia, are hæredes facti, under Section 3 of the statutes of distributions, which determines at once who shall be heirs and distributees; and it is a logical consequence that the statute must be resorted to in order to ascertain their shares in the subject of the gift.

In strictissimi jure, they are not heirs-at-law, but lineal de*scendants, with rights secured to them, as a class, under Section 3 of the statute of distributions. Nor are they next of kin— next of kin are nearest of kin, and children are nearer than grandchildren. See Roper on Leg., tit. "Next of Kin." It has been declared to be a rule of the affections that children are preferred to grandchildren, and nearer kindred to the more remote. 1 Rich. Eq. 141; 2 Jarm. on Wills 46; 5 Rich. Eq. 29.

*523

In Evins v. Godbold, 6 Rich. Eq. 26, much relied on by some of the counsel in the cause at bar, the effort on the part of the grandchildren of the testator was to obtain the share of their deceased mother, which was denied to them on the Circuit, and this was all that they asked for. It was a devise upon the contingency of the mother's surviving the life tenant.

The releases made and given to the testator in his lifetime by the several legatees who executed the same, being for valuable consideration, are valid and effective. 2 Strange 497; 1 P. Wms. 64; 1 Id. 639; 2 Id. 273. Sed secus, if a mere voluntary release. 1 P. Wms. 399; 10 S. C. 354.

The principle of advancements cannot arise in cases of testacy, and, consequently, has no application here. Bail. Eq. 154; 1 Hill's Ch. 10.

The residuum of the estate is unaffected by any payments or advances of money by the testator in his lifetime; ademption of this is impossible. 2 Wms. on Ex'rs 1144; 1 Roper on Leg. 263.

Messrs. S. McGowan, M. P. De Bruhl and E. B. Gary, contra.

July 13th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. A preliminary question has been raised in this case as to whether due notice of appeal was given by some of the parties from the decree of the judge of Probate, which must first be disposed of. The order of Judge Hudson, refusing to dismiss the appeal of certain of the parties, upon the ground stated, is not appealable (Henderson v. Wyatt, 8 S. C. 112,) but even if it were, we should be inclined to agree with him in the view which he seems to have taken, and we will therefore proceed to consider the case upon its merits.

Most of the questions raised are novel, at least in this state, *and not free from difficulty. The case has, therefore, demanded and has received the most thorough consideration and careful attention.

*524

The object of the action, which was instituted by Charles P. Allen, as executor of the last will and testament of Bannister Allen, against his devisees and legatees, was to obtain the instructions of the court as to the proper mode of distributing the estate under the provisions of the will. Except as to the residuary clause, no question has been raised, and no difficulty is perceived in ascertaining the construction which should be placed upon the terms of the will, but the conflicting claims which the court is called upon to determine arise mainly out of various money transactions between the testator and his devisees and legatees during his lifetime. For a detailed account of these transactions reference must be had to the brief and to the decree of Judge Fraser, who heard the case on its merits, where they are very clearly and succinctly stated. In general terms these transactions may be classified as follows: 1st. Payments of money by the testator to the legatees, evidenced by simple receipts. 2d. Payments evidenced by receipts which are expressed to be in full or in part, of distributive shares of testator's estate. 3d. Ordinary notes given by several of the legatees to the testator. 4th. Papers in the form of notes under seal, by which the legatee promises to pay to the testator, one day after date, "twelve hundred dollars in gold, included in the will paid, and thirteen hundred dollars in currency, in full for that much, without interest," upon each of which is the following endorsement by the testator: "I give of the within note to my son [naming him] in part of my estate of the late will and testament, and dated 8th December, 1871." 5th. Papers in which the legatee signing acknowledges the receipt of a specified sum of money from the testator, "in full of my distributive share of the estate of my said father, and I hereby renounce and forever relinquish to the other heirs-at-law, devisees and legatees of Bannister Allen, my father, when their rights shall accrue, all claim, by inheritance or otherwise, to any part of said estate, and I bind myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, for the complete fulfillment of the above, in consideration of said sum of two thousand *dollars received by me;" the only difference in the papers belonging to this class being that in some of them the interest is not relinquished "to the other heirs," &c., as in the one above set out, but contain a simple relinquishment of "all claims, by inheritance or otherwise, to any part of said estate." 6th. Papers in which Mrs. Watson and Mrs. McCalla acknowledge the receipt of certain sums of money from the testator, in consideration whereof they renounce all claim to the lands devised to them by the testator.

*525

The questions are: Whether these transactions shall operate as ademptions of the legacies given in the will. If so, whether they adeem only the pecuniary legacies of specific amounts, or the interest which each of the legatees may be entitled to under the residuary clause also. What effect the papers purporting to release the interests of several of the legatees shall have, and what effect the papers executed by Mrs. Watson and Mrs. McCalla shall have.

The general rule upon the subject of the ademption of legacies is that where a father or one who has placed himself in loco parentis gives a legacy to a child, or to one toward whom he has assumed such a relationship, he is understood to give a portion, and, in consequence of the leaning of the courts against double portions, if the parent afterward advances a portion to such child, the presumption is that it was intended as a satisfaction of the legacy, either in whole or in part, as the case may be, and the legacy is adeemed pro tanto. But in case of a legacy to a stranger, (and in this respect even grandchildren are regarded as strangers,) no such presumption arises, and unless there is proof showing that the subsequent advance was intended as a satisfaction of the legacy there will be no ademption and the legatee will be entitled to both. Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 140; Richardson v. Richardson, Dud. Eq. 184. The question of ademption is a question of intention; as is well said in one of the cases, "intention is of the very essence of ademption." Thus, where the legacy is from a parent to a child, or from one who has assumed that relationship to the legatee, the intention to adeem is presumed merely from the relationship, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, such presumption is conclusive of the *intention. But where no such relationship exists, then no such presumption arises, and the intention becomes a matter of proof, for which purpose extrinsic evidence may be resorted to, not for the purpose of showing an intention to revoke or alter any portion of the will, but, as is fully shown in the cases, for the purpose of showing what was the intention of the testator in making the subsequent advance or payment—whether he intended it to operate as a satisfaction of the legacy or as an additional bounty to the legatee. Shudal v. Jekyll, 2 Atk. 516; Rosewell v. Bennet, 3 Atk. 77; Kirk v. Eddowes, 3 Hare 509; Richards v. Humphreys, 15 Pick. 133; Gilliam v. Chancellor, 43 Miss. 437, reported also in 5 Am. Rep. 498. The case of Richards v. Humphreys was, in some of its aspects, very much like the case now under consideration, and will be found full and instructive. In that case a brother, by his will, gave a legacy of $500 to his sister, who was a married woman, and afterward, at her request, advanced her something over $400 to aid her in the purchase of land, taking a receipt therefor, in which it was stated "that the money was given in part payment of the dowry given her in his will." The court held that this showed that the payment was made on account of the legacy, and that it was, therefore, adeemed to the extent of the amount paid. In that case the court used this language: "Ademption takes effect not from the act of the legatee in releasing or receiving satisfaction of the legacy, but solely from the will and act of the testator in making such payment or satisfaction or substituting a different act of bounty, which is shown by competent proof to be intended as such payment, satisfaction or substitute." Hence it makes no difference that the legatee was, at the time of receiving the payment, under the disability of coverture or infancy, as the ademption depends solely upon the will of the testator and not upon the ability of the legatee to give a valid discharge. It is very true that it has been held that no presumption of an intention to adeem arises where the bequest is of a residuum or of an interest therein, even where the bequest is from a person standing in the relation of parent to the legatee, and this because a residuum or an interest therein can never be regarded as a portion, strictly speaking, inasmuch as the amount is necessarily *of an uncertain character, and hence the presumption against double portions does not arise. Farnham v. Phillips, 2 Atk. 215; Freemantle v. Banks, 5 Ves. 85. But if, as we have seen, the question of ademption is a question of intention, we are unable to perceive any good reason why, where the proof shows an intention to adeem, not only a pecuniary legacy, but also an interest in the residue, such intention should not be allowed full effect. We have not been able to find any case in which an interest in the residue has been held to be adeemed by a subsequent advance, but we do find that in the case of Lady Thynne v. Earl of Glengall, 2 H. L. Cas. 131, upon a full review of the authorities, it was held that a bequest of a residue will, according to its amount, be a satisfaction of a portion, either in full or pro tanto, as the case may be, and it is difficult to understand how, upon the same principle, we can avoid holding that a portion by settlement or otherwise, shall, in like manner, be a satisfaction of a previous bequest of a residue to the extent that the former may cover the latter. We think, therefore, that where the evidence shows such to be the intention, an interest in the residue, as well as a general pecuniary legacy, may be adeemed by a subsequent advance of money to the legatee.

*526

*527

It would seem that, upon the same principles, devises of real estate ought likewise to be adeemed (if such a term can, with any propriety, be applied to devises) by subsequent payments to the devisees with the intention of producing that result; but it is conceded that the doctrine of ademption has never been applied to devises of real estate, and, in the absence of any authority, we do not feel justified in disregarding the well-established line which has for ages been drawn between real and personal estate, even though we may be thereby compelled to thwart the obvious intention of the testator and disturb that distribution of his property which he thought was proper and just to his descendants. For while the intention of the testator is the cardinal rule of construction of a will, yet such intention cannot be given effect where it is in conflict with the rules of law. A devise of real estate cannot, like a pecuniary legacy, be affected by any subsequent transactions between the testator and the devisee, but must stand until it is revoked or altered in the *manner prescribed by law. The papers signed by Mrs. Watson and Mrs. McCalla cannot, therefore, operate, as they were doubtless intended, as ademptions of the devises to these ladies; they cannot, as we shall presently see, have any effect as releases, and they cannot operate to adeem the interests of these devisees in the residuum, for they were not so intended by the testator, but, on the contrary, are expressly declared to be intended for a different purpose, which, as we have seen, must fail because in conflict with an established rule of law. Nor can they be treated as advancements, for the doctrine of advancements applies only in cases of intestacy, or where, as in Manning v. Manning, 12 Rich. Eq. 410, the testator in his will has directed that property given to his children in his lifetime should be accounted for by them. Here, however, there is no such direction in the will, and to give the transactions evidenced by these papers the effect of advancements would, in effect, be an alteration of the will without the formalities required by law for such a purpose.

*528

The next inquiry is as to the effect of the receipts in which some of the legatees have undertaken to release their interests in the estate of the testator during his lifetime. We agree with the Circuit judge that so far as they purport to be releases of any interest in the estate they are absolutely void, and it is scarcely necessary to add anything to what he has said upon the subject. It may be true that, in equity, a release of a mere naked possibility or expectancy of an heir to his ancestor's estate, or of a legatee of an interest under the will of a person then living, if founded upon a valuable consideration, might be carried into effect after the death of such ancestor or testator as a right acquired under a contract; (2 Story's Eq. Jur., § 1040, b,) but, certainly, without such consideration it would be a nullity. Morris v. Borroughs, 1 Atk. 399. In this case it is not pretended that there was any consideration for the so-called releases as between the parties who signed them and the other heirs, devisees and legatees of the testator, and it could not be said that there was any valuable consideration passing between the testator himself and those who undertook to release, for the testator having, up to the time of his death, absolute testamentary power *over all of his property, could, by a simple stroke of his pen, have effected the very same objects by revoking any legacy or devise in his will. Hence these releases are, in our opinion, absolute nullities, as well those which purport to relinquish "to the other heirs," &c., as those which do not purport to relinquish to any particular person or persons, and can only have effect as acknowledgments of the receipt of so much money on account of interests in the estate. The cases which have been cited to sustain the validity of these releases, Lockyer v. Savage, 2 Strange 947; Ives v. Metcalf, 1 Atk. 63; Blunden v. Barker, 1 P. Wms. 639; Cox v. Belitha, 2 P. Wms. 272, and others of that class, prove, on examination, to be cases arising under the custom of London, by which a man's testamentary power did not extend to the whole of his personal estate unless he died leaving neither wife or child. If he left a wife and children, his personal estate was divisible into three equal parts, one of which, called the orphanage part, went to the children, another to the widow, and the third part was at his own disposal. 1 Wms. on Ex'rs 2, 3; Heron v. Heron, 2 Atk. 160. Inasmuch, therefore, as the father could not, by his will, deprive his child of an equal share in what was called the orphanage part, a release by the child to the parent of his interest in such orphanage part, in consideration of the payment of a sum of money, has been sustained, in the cases above-mentioned, as a transaction based upon a valuable consideration, because there the parent acquired something—the right to dispose of the child's share of the orphanage part—in exchange for the money paid to the child, while here, where there is no such restriction upon the testamentary power, it is very manifest that a parent obtains nothing by such a transaction, and it cannot be supposed that he pays his money in consideration of obtaining a right which he already enjoys.

*529

We conclude, then, that so far as papers of the first class are concerned—ordinary receipts—they will or will not be regarded as ademptions of legacies pro tanto accordingly as the evidence adduced may show the intention of the testator; that as to papers in the second class—receipts which are expressed to be in full or in part of distributive shares or interests in the testator's estate—they will, without further evidence, be regarded as *ademptions of legacies, residuary as well as pecuniary, to the extent of the amounts mentioned therein, as they bear upon their face evidence that such was the intention of the testator; that as to papers in the third class—ordinary notes—they are to be regarded as assets of the testator's estate, to be accounted for by the executor, and not as ademptions of legacies; that as to papers of the fourth class—papers in the form of notes promising to pay $1200 in gold, included in the will, paid, &c.—they are to be regarded as ademptions of legacies, residuary as well as pecuniary, without further evidence, as the terms in which they were written, taken in connection with the endorsements made thereon by the testator, satisfy us that such was his intention; that as to the papers in the fifth class—releases as they, are called—they are nullities, except so far as they acknowledge the receipt of specific sums of money, and that they are to be regarded as ademptions of legacies, residuary as well as pecuniary, to the extent of the amounts so specified; and that as to the sixth class—papers signed by Mrs. Watson and Mrs. McCalla—they are to be regarded as nullities. We think, also, that the endorsement made by the testator on the letter of Joseph N. Brown, acknowledging the receipt of a note and a small amount in currency, as guardian of James B. Allen, is sufficient evidence of the intention of the testator to thereby adeem not only the pecuniary legacy to J. B. Allen, but also his interest in the residue pro tanto, and that the gift of the note was sufficiently ejusdem generis to bring it within the rule as to ademptions of legacies. Richardson v. Richardson, Dud. Eq. 194–5.

*530

The only remaining inquiry is as to the manner in which the residue of the estate is to be divided—whether per stirpes or per capita. The language of the residuary clause is as follows: "It is my will, and I hereby direct, that all my estate, not hereinbefore disposed of, be converted into money by the sale of the real and personal property, and by the collection of all the debts due to me, as far as possible, and that the proceeds be equally distributed among my heirs-at-law, share and share alike."

The general rule is, that where there is a gift to a class of persons, without any direction as to the proportions in which the individuals of the class are to take, all who can bring themselves *within the class are entitled to participate in the distribution, which must be per capita. But where the gift is to a class, the individuals of which can only be ascertained by a resort to the statute of distributions, then the provisions of the statute must also be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the proportions in which the donees are to take, unless, in the instrument by which the gift is made, a different rule of distribution shall be prescribed. Templeton v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq. 543 [55 Am. Dec. 646]. If, therefore, the gift is to a class of persons designated as heirs of a particular person, then, as it is necessary to resort to the statute to ascertain who are the individuals composing the class, resort must also be had to the statute to determine how or in what proportions such individuals shall take. This is upon the presumption that the donor having, by implication at least, referred to the statute as to the persons who are to take, also intended that reference should be had to the statute to determine the proportions in which they should take, unless he expresses a different intention. But when he prescribes a different mode of distribution, then no such presumption can arise, and the distribution must be made in the manner prescribed. Thus when, as in Freeman v. Knight, 2 Ired. Eq. 72, the testator directed that certain personal property "should be sold and the proceeds equally divided between my legal heirs," it was held that though a resort to the statute was necessary, in order to ascertain who were the persons embraced in the class to whom the bequest was made, there was no such necessity to refer to the statute to ascertain the mode of distribution, because the testator had himself determined that by directing an equal division, and hence the proceeds of sale should be distributed amongst the widow and children and the children of predeceased children, per capita and not per stirpes. In the case now under consideration the words are, if anything, stronger, for here the provision is that the proceeds shall be equally divided, share and share alike. It is difficult to conceive what language the testator could have used better adapted to prescribe the mode of distribution, and we do not feel justified in substituting, for the declared will of the testator, a mode of distribution by which one of his heirs—grandchild—should receive only a fractional part of an equal share, when the testator has ex*pressly directed that each of his heirs shall receive an equal share, and that all shall share alike. The case of Collier v. Collier, 3 Rich. Eq. 555 [55 Am. Dec. 653], does not, in our opinion, conflict with these views. There the testator, after giving various bequests to his wife and children by their names, and to his grandchildren by classes, designating them as children of a deceased child, viz.: "To my son John's children," and "to my son William's children," as well as a bequest to his grandson Oliver, who was one of John's children, directed that the residue of his estate "be equally divided amongst all my above-named heirs," and it was held that the residue must be divided per stirpes and not per capita, notwithstanding the word "equally." But this conclusion was reached by the court only because, as they say, "it seems to us that upon the whole will, and particularly by the manner and the amount of the several primary gifts to his son John's children, to his son William's children, to his daughter Margaret, his daughter Sophia and to his other children, and by the phrase 'above-named heirs,' the testator signified his purpose that his 'son John's children' shall be one of his heirs, his 'son William's children' shall be one of his heirs, and each of his own children one of his heirs; and that the words of equality are satisfied by equal distribution amongst those of the same degree, according to the statute. The testator's grandson, Oliver, is represented to be a son of John, and will it be urged that testator intended Oliver to take two full equal shares?" Here there are no such considerations to control the signification of the words "equally" and "share and share alike," and we must, therefore, give them their usual signification.

*531

*532

The judgment of the Circuit Court, except as modified herein, is affirmed, and the case is remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. *533

*(Case No. 891.)

FRASER & DILL v. CHARLESTON.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸438.]

In a creditor's action a decree was rendered which removed the executor from his office for misconduct, appointed a receiver, and determined matters affecting the assets of the estate in the hands of one of the defendants. Afterwards, such defendant became the assignee of two of the legatees, and as such assignee, applied to be made a party, that a third legatee, who was an infant, be also made a party, and that meantime the receiver be restrained from distributing the estate. Held, that the motion should have been granted.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Clyburn v. Reynolds, 31 S. C. 114, 9 S. E. 973.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1775; Dec. Dig. ⟸438.]

[2. Executors and Administrators ⟸438.]

Legatees are necessary parties to a creditor's bill, where the executor has been removed from his office for misconduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1775; Dec. Dig. ⟸438.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⟸122; Receivers ⟸81.]

The receiver of the estate, appointed in the stead of the executor so removed, does not represent the legatees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 495½; Dec. Dig. ⟸122; Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 150; Dec. Dig. ⟸81.]

4. This case distinguished from Rice v. Mahaffey, 9 S. C. 281.

[5. Assignments ⟸90.]

Where legatees make an absolute assignment of their legacies, the assignees become thereby invested with all the rights of the assignors, and are not affected by the motives which induced the assignment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. ⟸90.]

[6. Champerty and Maintenance ⟸6.]

An assignment of a legacy is not maintenance, because that an action at law will be required to set aside a judgment before the legacy can be recovered.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McSwain v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corp., 96 S. C. 173, 80 S. E. 87.

For other cases, see Champerty and Maintenance, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⟸6.]

[7. Wills ⟸872.]

The infant legatee is a necessary party, and the other legatees may require that he should be brought in by proper proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2221, 2223–2225; Dec. Dig. ⟸872.]

[This case is also cited in Gadsden v. Whaley, 14 S. C. 214, as to facts.]

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, July, 1879.

For a full understanding of this case, see the reports of the case upon previous hearings in 8 S. C. 318; Ib. 344; 11 S. C. 486.

It was, in brief, an action brought by certain creditors of Joseph Whaley, deceased, to have his estate administered, and to have certain certificates of city stock, held principally by the city of Charleston, and transferred upon the books of the corporation after the death of testator, adjudged to be the property of testator.

It was held that many of these certificates were not endorsed by the testator; that his signature was forged. The person who passed these certificates was, afterwards, the sole qualified *executor of Joseph Whaley's will. The court removed the executor from his office and appointed a receiver in his stead.

*534

This, together with the Circuit decree, is a sufficient statement of the case in its former stages.

After the decision, as reported in 11 S. C. 486, the city of Charleston procured an assignment from two of the legatees of city stock, as follows:

State of Connecticut.—We, the undersigned, being entitled to two-thirds of a legacy of $20,000 city of Charleston six per cent. stock under the will of our grandfather, Joseph Whaley, and understanding that said stock had been transferred by the city of Charleston after the death of the said Joseph Whaley, by virtue of his signatures endorsed on the scrips thereof; and said signatures having been questioned and decided by the courts, with one exception, not to be genuine; we, therefore, declining to take any benefit or advantage from any decision against the validity of said endorsements; and understanding further, that the endorsements being genuine, the city of Charleston would be justly entitled to said stock, hereby assign, transfer, and set over all right, title and interest which we now have or may hereafter become entitled to in said legacy of two-thirds of $20,000 city of Charleston six per cent. stock to the city council of Charleston, their successors and assigns.

Witness our hands and seals this 2d day of May, A. D. 1879.

Josephine M. Porter. [L. S.]
Sabina Morris. [L. S.]

In the presence of—
Johnson T. Platt.
John B. Reddan.

The city council then filed their information and prayed for an order, as follows:

And now comes the said defendant, the city council, and gives this court to understand and be informed, that since the commencement of this suit and quite recently, to wit, on the ——— day of May, 1879, the said defendant has become the lawful owner, by free gift and assignment of and from Josephine M. Porter and Sabina Morris, of all their interest in and to a part of the estate of the late Joseph Whaley.

*535

*The said interest is created by the second clause of the will of the testator, Joseph Whaley, which is in these words:

"Item.—I give and bequeath unto my daughter, Maria Evans Morris, twenty thousand dollars in the city of Charleston six per cent. stock, to her, her heirs and assigns, absolutely and forever."

The legatee, Mrs. Morris, died before the testator, leaving three children, Josephine and Sabina, above-named, and a son, who also departed this life before the testator, Joseph Whaley, leaving an only child, a son, who is, it is believed, still a minor. Upon the death of Joseph Whaley, the bequest passed, by force of the statute, to his two granddaughters aforesaid, and to his great-grandson; to each one-third part of the above-recited bequest, and such were their rights and interests in the subject of this suit at its commencement, and they were each one of them necessary and indispensable parties to this cause, because that they had "an interest of such a nature that a final decree cannot be made without either affecting that interest or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final determination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience." See 6 Wall.

That the city council of Charleston is entitled to stand and be in the place of the testator's granddaughters, and though already a party defendant in another right, the said city council respectfully asks permission to intervene for the rights of the said Josephine M. Porter and Sabina Morris, and to prove the allegations made in respect thereof, in the notice to Mr. Bacot, receiver, which is hereunto appended. To the end that their estate may not be destroyed without an opportunity to defend it.

Proposed Order.

On hearing the statement and petition of the city council, and argument of counsel for all parties before the court, and it appearing that the legal representatives of Maria Evans Morris, namely, Josephine M. Porter, Sabina Morris and ——— Morris, are and were, from the commencement of this suit, necessary parties materially interested in the subject matter, and in the object thereof, and that the city council, already a party defend*ant, has succeeded to the rights of the said Josephine M. Porter and Sabina Morris.

*536

It is ordered that the city council have leave to intervene for the rights and interests of the said Josephine M. Porter and Sabina Morris, as if the complaint were amended, to make them parties, with leave to contest the claims of claiming creditors, and by all lawful means to establish their just rights.

And it is further ordered that plaintiffs do amend their complaint, making ——— Morris, the grandson of Maria Evans Morris, a party defendant.

The receiver in this cause, T. M. Bacot, Esq., is hereby ordered and directed to abstain from the distribution of any part of the fund about to come into his possession, until the further order of this court.

The decree of the Circuit judge was as follows:

The above cases came before me at the regular term of the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county, ending July 11th, 1879, upon (1) a motion to pay out funds to creditors, and, after argument had been heard on the same, upon (2) a motion to allow the city council of Charleston, as assignees of certain legatees of Joseph Whaley, to intervene for the purpose of contesting the claims of certain creditors; and also on (3) a suggestion of counsel that it is the duty of the court to order new parties to be made.

Joseph Whaley, the testator, whose estate is the subject of controversy in these cases, died January 26th, 1872.

The complaint in the principal cause was filed July 13th, 1874, and was a proceeding on behalf of creditors against William Whaley, as executor of last will and testament of Joseph Whaley. Neither heirs, devisees or legatees, were made parties to the proceedings. On April 13th, 1875, G. W. Dingle, special referee, made a report in the case, in which, among other things, he found:

That certain city stock, amounting to $86,342, constituted a part of testator's estate.

The report also contained a statement of judgments, and other claims against the estate, with the amounts due on each, besides other matters not necessary to be here stated.

*537

*This report was confirmed by Judge J. P. Reed, by order, dated June 29th, 1875.

From this order there was an appeal to the Supreme Court, in which the only question raised was as to the ownership of said city stock, and involved a question of evidence.

The order of the Supreme Court remanded the case to the Circuit Court, for the purpose of allowing the city council to offer evidence of their right to the stock, or to show how he, Joseph Whaley, may have been divested of his title thereto; the respondents to have the right to offer evidence "in rebuttal."

The order of Judge Reed, June 29th, 1875, above referred to, directed the sale of the plantation on Edisto island.

William Whaley, the executor of Joseph Whaley, who had not answered the complaint on behalf of himself and the remaindermen interested in the real estate, made an application to Judge Reed on November 8th, 1875, for leave to open the decree heretofore made, and this motion was refused.

On appeal to the Supreme Court, the ruling of the judge was sustained, but the court, of its own motion, made an order that the remaindermen, grandchildren of testator, interested in the real estate, should be made parties to the proceeding.

Thus the case was remanded to the Circuit Court with the decree of Judge Reed, modified only as to the claim to the city stock, and with the sale of the real estate suspended until the remaindermen could be made parties, and present their objections, if any. The case was re-opened before the referee as to the city stock, and on the coming in of his report on the testimony taken by him, as directed by the Supreme Court, the case was heard by Judge W. H. Wallace.

In the argument of the case before Judge Wallace, it was urged, as appears from his decree, that if the signatures of Joseph Whaley, on the transfers of city stock were not genuine, then the signatures of Joseph Whaley on notes, which were the foundations of some of the judgments proved in this case, were not genuine.

Judge Wallace by his decree of April 8th, 1878, held that a large amount of the city stock belonged to the estate of Joseph Whaley, to be administered as a part thereof, and that the re*ceiver to be appointed should have leave "to institute such proceedings as he may be advised may be proper and necessary to try "the validity of any claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, and defend such proceeding as may be instituted against him."

*538

From this decree there was an appeal to the Supreme Court, the same grounds being urged in the Supreme Court as to genuineness of the notes covered by the judgments, as were urged in the Circuit Court before Judge Wallace.

The Supreme Court refused to disturb Judge Wallace's decree, and in reference to these judgments uses the following language:

"To set aside what has already been fixed by judgment and not appealed from, or by consent of parties, can only be done by proper proceedings, for which the Circuit judge has made ample provision."

By proper proceedings, to which no exceptions have been taken, Thomas W. Bacot has been appointed receiver, and given his bond as such. In pursuance of an order made during this term of the court, to which the city council consented, a large part of the stock has been accounted for to the receiver, and the balance is to be turned over to him when some additional legislation can be made to authorize it on the part of the council.

W. D. Clancy, one of the masters, having, in pursuance of an order made at this term of the court, submitted his report, an order was made July 2d, 1879, directing the receiver to pay the fees of G. W. Dingle, referee, a counsel fee to the attorneys for plaintiffs, and certain other expenses. This order was made without notice to the corporation counsel, but in open court and by consent of the attorneys of all the creditors who had proved their claims.

W. D. Clancy, one of the masters, in pursuance of an order of reference, submitted a report on claims, dated June 19th, 1879.

While a motion to confirm this report and to pay out the fund to the creditors was under consideration by the court, two motions were made by the counsel for the city council above referred to, to wit:

1. That the city council have leave to intervene as the assignees of Josephine M. Porter and Sabina Morris, grandchildren *of Joseph Whaley, entitled under the will to two thirds (2-3) of a general legacy of $20,000, given in the will to their mother, Maria Evans Morris, with a view to impeach some of the judgments reported in the master's report, as valid and entitled to payment, and thereby save the legacy for the council as assignee, the assignment bearing date May, 1879.

*539

2. That the matter having been brought to the attention of the court, an order should be made calling in all the legatees of Joseph Whaley as parties interested in the fund in court, and entitled to a hearing before any distribution is made. These motions were made without notice to counsel for creditors, but with notice to counsel for the receiver, and without any affidavits in support of them.

The order of the court above referred to, under which the funds have been turned over to the receiver, was made on the ——— day of ———, 1879, during term time, and some time after the date of the assignment from the two legatees to the city council, and it is now too late to set up any claim to this fund then held by the city council. Rice v. Mahaffey, 9 S. C. 281. But if this difficulty were out of the way, and such a right as this—a right to impeach judgments for fraud were assignable, (Story's Eq. Jur., § 1040, g,) the city council can stand on no higher ground under their assignment than the legatees themselves. Are they, then, necessary parties to this proceeding?

All the cases to which reference has been made by counsel and which are accessible, show that all parties interested in a fund before the court for distribution, are necessary and proper parties, when their rights are traced to a common source—as where all parties claim under a deed or under a will. Creditors and legatees do not claim from a common source; the latter claim under the will, and the former claim against it. The rights of creditors are paramount to the claims of legatees, whether specific, general or residuary. It is true that where the heir or devisee is interested, he should be made a party, because in this state the legal title to the real estate is in the heir or devisee. It is for this reason that in this case in Ex parte W. Whaley, 8 S. C. 347, remaindermen have the legal title in the realty. The legal title to the personalty is in the executor or *administrator, and no such reason exists. A decedent has no right to embarrass and jeopardize the rights of creditors by dividing his estate amongst a number of persons, who can never be entitled to it until the debts are paid. The administrator stands in his shoes, and if he commits a devastavit, his surities can be held responsible, and the executor stands in the same relation, and it is the misfortune of those who are the objects of the testator's bounty if they are the victims of his misplaced confidence.

*540

The personal representative of deceased debtor or testator, is the regular representative of all the persons who are entitled to the personal assets, and bound by his bona fide acts, so far as third persons are concerned. Story's Eq. Pl., § 140, note 4, § 141.

Where the real estate of the decedent is made by statute, personal assets for the payment of debts, the heir is not a necessary party to a suit for the administration of assets. Story's Eq. Pl., § 163. See Curtis' Eq. Prec. 46, 47.

I conclude, that in no point of view are these legatees, who have waited seven years after death of testator, and five years after the commencement of these proceedings, necessary or proper parties to them.

There has been simply a repetition of the arguments and views presented to the Circuit and to the Supreme Court, without any new showing on their part, and I do not think it necessary to call in the legatees or give any further direction to the receiver, than is given in the decree of Judge Wallace, which has been affirmed by the Supreme Court.

If the legatees have any rights, there is nothing in this case to prevent them from pursuing the proper remedies.

The motions to permit the city council, as assignee of two of the legatees, to intervene and to make a general order calling in the legatees of Joseph Whaley, are refused, and it is so ordered.

As to the distribution of the fund. The only estate applicable to the payment of creditors is that which remains after the payment of the necessary expenses of the administration, and I see no reason in this case why there should be any apportionment of these expenses amongst the creditors. They should be paid out of the fund, and then the balance distributed according *to law. By law, the order of payment of debts of a decedent is fixed, and is different from that which prevails in the lifetime of the debtor.

*541

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that after paying the fees and expenses heretofore ordered, the receiver do pay out the funds now or hereafter to come into his hands to the creditors entitled to the same. First, to the specialty creditors; and then after they are paid in full, that he do pay the simple contract creditors out of the balance pro rata, all necessary expenses, including commissions of the receiver, and fees for his counsel assigned by the court, be properly provided for before the final distribution of the fund; and that the receiver have leave to apply for an order of reference, to ascertain what sum is proper for these purposes.

From this decree the city council of Charleston appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor, Judge Fraser, erred in holding that Josephine M. Porter, Sabina Morris and George Morris, the legal representatives of Maria Evans Morris, were not, from the commencement of this suit, or from the date of the order displacing the executor and appointing a receiver herein, necessary parties to the same.

2. Because his Honor erred in refusing to allow the city council of Charleston, successors to the rights and interests of the said Josephine M. Porter and Sabina Morris, to intervene for such rights and interests, and by all lawful means to establish the same in this cause.

3. Because his Honor erred in not ordering George Morris, grandson of Maria Evans Morris, to be made a party defendant.

4. Because his Honor erred in refusing to enjoin the receiver in this cause from distributing the funds to the creditors, then about to come into his possession, until the rights of the parties to the same could be fully determined.

[For subsequent opinion, see 19 S. C. 384.]

Messrs. G. D. Bryan and J. B. Campbell, for appellants.

Messrs. E. McCrady, Jr., C. R. Miles and S. Lord, Jr., contra.

*542

*July 17th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This is an appeal from an order refusing a motion, submitted by the city council of Charleston, to allow them, as assignees of certain of the legatees of the testator, Joseph Whaley, to intervene for the protection of their rights as such assignees, and to require that another legatee be made a party, and that in the meantime, and until the further order of the court, the receiver be restrained from distributing the funds in his hands belonging to the estate of said testator.

The first question presented is whether these legatees were necessary parties. This is a creditor's bill, and there is no doubt of the general rule that to such a bill legatees are not necessary parties. This, however, is because the executor, being the representative of the legatee, is supposed to be capable and willing to protect their interests, and, therefore, there is no necessity for the presence of the legatees. Story's Eq. Pl., §§ 140, 141, 150. Where, however, the executor is insolvent, the rule is different, (Calvert on Parties 26,) and especially where, as in this case, the executor is not only insolvent, but has been removed from office, as it were, upon the ground of misconduct, and has been thereby declared not only incompetent, but has been rendered incapable of representing the legatees. The reason of the rule ceasing, the rule also must give way, and the general doctrine that all persons having an interest in the object of the suit ought to be made parties becomes applicable. As long as there was any one before the court capable of representing the interests of the legatees, no necessity existed for making them parties. But when there is no such representative before the court, and especially when, as in this case, the person appointed as such representative—the executor—has been declared unfit to be entrusted with the administration of the assets of the testator, not merely upon the ground of negligence or want of capacity, but upon the allegation and proof of the grossest fraud, he certainly cannot be regarded by a court of equity as the representative of the legatees, one of whom is a minor, and, therefore, peculiarly entitled to the protecting care of the court. In such a case the legatees must necessarily represent their own interests, and, for this purpose, must be brought before the court as parties. The receiver, though *invested with many powers, and charged with many of the duties of the executor, cannot be regarded as the representative of the legatees. He is "the mere hand of the court." As to persons not parties to the case, even the court cannot, by any order it may make, affect their rights. The legatees, deriving their rights under the will, must, of course, take them subject to any restrictions or conditions contained in the will, and, therefore, when there is an executor duly appointed and qualified, the legatees take their rights subject to the right and duty on his part, derived from the will, to represent their interests. Where, however, he is displaced or otherwise rendered incapable of representing them, they must then represent their own interests, as there is no power, without their consent, authorized to appoint a person to represent them.

*543

What steps they may or ought to take for the protection of their interests, after they have been made parties, we regard it premature to discuss now. Whether they may, under these proceedings, contest the validity of some or all of the claims brought against their testator's estate, or whether it will be necessary for them to institute separate proceedings against each of the judgment creditors, or whether they may not apply to the court for an order directing the receiver to contest some or all of such claims, as he was permitted to do by the decree of Judge Wallace, affirmed by this court, are questions which are not yet before us in a practical form, and cannot, therefore, properly be now considered. The legatees, undoubtedly, had a right to be let in as parties, and to have the receiver restrained from distributing the fund until they could have an opportunity of asserting their rights in such a form as they may be advised.

We do not think this motion comes too late. It may be true that it would now be too late for the city council, in its original character as one of the defendants, to interpose the objection of a want of proper parties, (Clark v. Tompkins, 1 S. C. 119; Featherston v. Norris, 7 S. C. 472,) but, as assignee of the legatees, it is a totally different person, in law, and entitled to the rights of its assignors, who, never having been made parties, never had the opportunity to make the objection. We are unable to perceive how the case of Rice v. Mahaffey, 9 S. C. *281, applies; for there the defendant sought, by a new action, to obtain the benefit of a defence which he had neglected to interpose to the previous action brought against him by the plaintiff, and the court held that this could not be done by a separate proceeding. But so far from holding that the desired relief could not be obtained in the original action, language is used which implies that, in a proper case and upon a proper showing, such relief might be obtained in the original action. The language referred to is: "If by any mistake he may have suffered injury, the court has extensive power, and, upon motion, can grant relief by leave to amend or otherwise, according to the nature of the case. Such proceedings are not separate, but are in their nature supplemental, and are part of the original action." The whole point of that case, therefore, is that a separate proceeding was not the proper mode of obtaining the relief desired, but, if obtainable at all, it must be sought under the original action.

*544

It is said, however, that though the legatees might have had the right to be made parties for the purpose of contesting claims against the estate of the testator, yet the city council, as their assignees, have no such right. First. Because the assignment was not intended to give such right; and, second, because, if it did, it purports to assign a right to institute legal proceedings to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud, and such an assignment would be void "as contrary to public policy, and as savoring of the character of maintenance."

According to the view which we take of this matter the motive which induced the legatees to make the assignment cannot affect its validity. They may have been prompted by the best or the worst of motives; the fact, nevertheless, appears that it is, in effect, an ordinary assignment of their interest in a legacy, which, not being impeached for fraud, want of consideration or anything of the kind, must have the effect of an ordinary assignment of a legacy. It may be, and doubtless is, true that these ladies, actuated by consideration for the memory of their deceased uncle, highly creditable to them, would not have been willing, for the sake of mere personal gain, to engage in a contest which would render it necessary to cast discredit upon a loved though erring relative, and yet, from consideration for an *innocent third party who had suffered heavy losses by the misconduct of their uncle, they might have been willing to enable such third party, as far as lay in their power, to repair losses thus occasioned. At all events, they have made an absolute assignment of their interests under the legacy to the city council, who have thereby been invested with all the rights of the assignors.

*545

Nor do we think that there is any ground for the position that the assignment is void as "contrary to public policy and as savoring of maintenance." The argument to sustain this position is based upon the assumption that the thing assigned was the right to institute proceedings at law to set aside a judgment for fraud, but according to our view, such an assumption is without foundation, for the thing assigned was the legacy, or the interests of the assignors (two-thirds) in the legacy, given originally to Maria Evans Morris, and we are unable to see why such an assignment is not just as valid as the assignment of any other chose in action. The fact that it may become necessary for the assignee to institute legal proceedings to protect the thing assigned from unjust claims brought against it does not invest the transactions with the character of maintenance, for the thing assigned is not the mere right to bring an action to set aside a judgment for fraud.

We think, also, that the grandson of Maria Evans Morris, who is entitled to the remaining third of the legacy originally given to her, is a necessary party, and that the motion requiring the plaintiffs to make him a party should have been granted. The fact that no motion to that effect has been made on his behalf cannot affect the question, for, when it is brought to the attention of the court that any person who is a necessary party, in order that a complete determination of all the matters involved in an action may be had, has not been made a party, the court may, of its own motion, require such person to be made a party in order that there may be a complete and final disposition of all matters involved in the case, (Neeley v. Anderson, 2 Strob. Eq. 262,) especially where, as in this case, the absent party is an infant.

*546

*The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary in conformity with the principles herein announced.

WILLARD, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 546

(Case No. 892.)

STATE v. WILLIAMS.

(April Term, 1880.)

[1. Courts ⟸90.]

This court will not follow a former decision standing alone, without regard to the grounds upon which such decision was based. The principle of stare decisis stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 314; Dec. Dig. ⟸90.]

[2. Criminal Law ⟸93.]

The Court of General Sessions has jurisdiction of cases of petit larceny, as the punishment therefor provided by law is not limited to a fine of $100 or imprisonment for thirty days. Const., Art. I., § 19.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. McKettrick, 14 S. C. 352, 353; State v. Padgett, 18 S. C. 319; State v. Jenkins, 26 S. C. 122, 123, 124, 1 S. E. 437; State v. Cooler, 30 S. C. 109, 8 S. E. 692, 3 L. R. A. 181.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 161; Dec. Dig. ⟸93.]

3. State v. Harper, 6 S. C. 464, overruled.

Before Hudson, J., Chesterfield, February, 1880.

The defendant, Jacob Williams, was convicted of petit larceny, under an indictment charging him with the larceny of two wagon wheels and two taps, of the value of $22, in October, 1879.

The report of the presiding judge is as follows:

There was conflicting testimony upon the question of the value of the property alleged to have been stolen, as well as upon the question of the guilt of the defendant. The weight of the testimony was, in the opinion of the court, in favor of a valuation above $20. The jury, however, being the sole and exclusive judges of the testimony, under full instruction from the court as to the law of the case, and the distinction between grand and petit larceny, rendered a verdict against the defendant for the latter. Whereupon his attorney moved the court in arrest of judgment and to discharge the defendant, upon the ground that the Court of General Sessions is without jurisdiction of the crime of petit larceny, and without authority to pronounce sentence *upon the defendant in this case. After full argument by the solicitor and counsel for the defendant upon the motion, it was overruled, and the defendant was sentenced to six months confinement in the state penitentiary at hard labor.

*547

In support of the judgment, I assign the following reasons: The case of State v. Harper, 6 S. C. 464, is relied upon by the defendant's counsel as conclusive of the law of this case. I am aware of the grave responsibility I have taken in disregarding that case, but I know that there is widespread dissatisfaction among the lawyers of the state with the law as therein announced, and a general desire that it be reviewed and re-affirmed or overruled. In no way can this be effected, so far as I can see, unless it be by appeal from a Circuit judgment in conflict with it. Such a judgment I have rendered in the present case, because the law of that case (State v. Harper) has never carried conviction to my mind, and is a fruitful source of embarrassment in administering the law of larceny in the state. After a careful examination of the constitution of the state and the law of the land, I can find nothing which prohibits the Court of General Sessions from pronouncing judgment upon a verdict like the one rendered in this instance. It is a well-established doctrine of criminal law and practice, that if one be charged with a grave offence, which includes one of an inferior degree, the jury may discharge the defendant of the higher crime and convict him of the less atrocious, and judgment will be pronounced for the lesser crime so found, unless authority so to do is denied the court by clear and binding negative enactment. Neither in the constitution nor the statute law does it appear that to the Court of General Sessions is jurisdiction of the crime of petit larceny denied; Section 18, Article IV. of the constitution, gives to it "exclusive jurisdiction of all crimes not otherwise provided for by law." Clearly, then, if the jurisdiction of a crime is otherwise provided for by law, the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions would be taken away, but not its jurisdiction; that would remain and be concurrent with that of the other tribunal, unless to the inferior tribunal exclusive jurisdiction should be given, or unless to the superior tribunal all jurisdiction should be in totidem verbis, denied. The Court of General Sessions retains exclusive juris*diction over any and all crimes, unless jurisdiction thereof be conferred upon an inferior court, in which event the two would hold concurrent jurisdiction. But if, in the enactment, jurisdiction is entirely denied to the Court of General Sessions, or exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the inferior courts, then, and not otherwise, does the Court of General Sessions lose its authority.

*548

A statute, which simply confers jurisdiction of a crime on an inferior court generally and not exclusively, cannot be construed to deprive the Court of General Sessions of its jurisdiction, but the jurisdiction would remain concurrent with that of the inferior court. The language of the constitution in Section 18, Article IV., is broader and more comprehensive in preserving a general criminal jurisdiction to the Courts of General Sessions, than it is in Sections 15 and 16 of the same article, in conferring a general civil jurisdiction upon the Courts of Common Pleas, yet the Supreme Court has not hesitated to declare that the latter court has concurrent civil jurisdiction of contracts, in which jurisdiction has, by the constitution, been given to justices of the peace, and by statute to trial justices. See Burge v. Willis, 5 S. C. 212.

The reasoning of the court in this case is pithy, satisfactory and conclusive, and is in harmony with the uniform tenor of decisions of the courts of England and America in similar cases.

It accords with the judgment of our own Court of Appeals in State v. Walker, 14 Rich. 37, and State v. Sullivan, 14 Rich. 282, and the cases therein cited; and also accords with the reasoning and judgment of our Supreme Court in State v. Simmons, 4 S. C. 72. All these cases were relied upon by Attorney-General Melton in his able argument in State v. Harper, but they are summarily disposed of by the chief justice in the conclusion of the judgment, by the declaration that they have no application to the point presented in State v. Harper. These cases and the cases from England, cited by the court, all hold the doctrine as one unquestioned, that "nothing shall be intended to be without the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which specially appears to be so, and nothing shall be intended to be without the jurisdiction of an inferior court but that which is expressly alleged." In Burge v. Willis, it is declared that when a court is vested *with general original jurisdiction under the constitution, it cannot be divested of that jurisdiction by the legislature establishing another court with the same or a like jurisdiction. "Unless there be that in the constitution of the state which deprives the Court of General Sessions of jurisdiction of the crime of petit larceny, or which empowers the legislature to do so, it is clear, upon authority, that the jurisdiction remains. The most that can be said is, that the constitution, by Section 19, Article I., confers exclusive jurisdiction upon justices of the peace, or other officers authorized by law (to wit, trial justices,) of 'offences less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of one hundred dollars or imprisonment for thirty days;' and in Section 22 of Article IV., jurisdiction of prosecutions for assault and battery and other penal offences less than felony, punishable by fine only."

*549

It certainly cannot be successfully contended that the crime of petit larceny is embraced in either of these sections, nor has the legislature, since the adoption of the constitution, by any enactment, so defined the crime of petit larceny, and limited its punishment as to bring it within the category of offences set forth in either of said sections. From a proper construction of the acts of the legislature in connection with the strong language of the constitution in Article IV., Section 18, I am more inclined to the opinion that courts of trial justice are entirely without jurisdiction of the crime of petit larceny, than I am to the opinion that they have exclusive jurisdiction of that grave offence, separated, as it often is, from the felony of grand larceny, by a distinction scarcely perceptible, and sometimes infinitessimal. For the crime of grand larceny, to wit, the stealing of goods of the value of $20, a convict may be and often is punished by confinement at hard labor in the state penitentiary for years, while, under the law of State v. Harper, one guilty of stealing goods of the value of $19, under the most aggravating circumstances, cannot be punished by imprisonment exceeding thirty days in the county jail, nor by fine exceeding $100, which fine, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is nugatory, because of the poverty of the convict. It would require the law to be so written in the most explicit terms to convince a rational mind that the legisla*ture or the people in convention assembled, intended that it should be thus. A distinction so utterly at variance with common sense and justice, cannot be rectified by the law-making power of the land too soon, if it exists in the constitution or in the statute law. We are constrained to think that a correct interpretation of the constitution and laws of the state will remove this anomaly and bring order out of confusion, regarding the crime of larceny.

*550

To justices of the peace represented by trial justices, the constitution gives jurisdiction of the crime of assault and battery, yet the Courts of General Sessions are constantly trying accusations of this offence. Original jurisdiction in cases of bastardy is also conferred upon this inferior tribunal, and yet numerous cases of bastardy are being tried in the superior court; and so of the whole catalogue of misdemeanors, except this most aggravated of all, petit larceny, and for its commission a premium is held out by making the punishment thereof a mere farce.

Chief Justice Moses, in delivering the opinion of the court in State v. Harper, on page 471, in speaking of the intention of the framers of the constitution, says: "Their purpose, it may well be supposed, was to create, by Section 19, Article I., of the constitution, an exclusive jurisdiction of such offences, less than felony, in regard to which the general assembly might, from time to time, annex as a punishment a fine not to exceed $100, or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days."

But this is just what the legislature has not done as to petit larceny, and having failed so to limit and define its punishment, it remains an offence cognizable by the Courts of General Sessions.

The grounds of appeal by defendant were upon the grounds that the motion in arrest of judgment was improperly overruled; that the court was bound to follow the decision in State v. Harper; that the Court of General Sessions had no jurisdiction to try or punish the offence of petit larceny, jurisdiction being exclusively vested in courts of trial justices; that the verdict was equivalent to an acquittal; and that the conviction was improper, as the indictment charged a common law offence.

*551

*Mr. W. L. T. Prince, for appellant.

1. The common law does not confer jurisdiction upon any particular courts, but merely makes an offence indictable, and the constitution and statute law fixes the forum before which it is to be tried.

2. The constitution vests the whole judicial power of the state in a Supreme Court, a Court of Common Pleas, a Court of General Sessions, a Court of Probate, and a Court of Justices of the Peace, at the same time authorizing the general assembly to establish such municipal and other inferior courts as may be deemed necessary. Art. IV., § 1.

3. To the Court of General Sessions which, by Article IV., Section 1, has "criminal jurisdiction only," the constitution gives "exclusive jurisdiction over all criminal cases which shall not be otherwise provided for by law." Art. IV., § 18.

The only jurisdiction, then, conferred by the constitution upon the Court of General Sessions, when, by that instrument, it was meant to distribute among the different courts the judicial power of the state, may be stated thus: "It shall have none other than criminal jurisdiction and that shall be exclusive, but its jurisdiction shall be restricted to cases which shall not otherwise be provided for by law."

4. Original jurisdiction in "penal offences less than felony punishable by fines only" is conferred on justices of the peace, and, therefore, are not cognizable by the Court of General Sessions. Art. IV., § 21.

5. Already jurisdiction had been given to "justices of the peace or other officers authorized by law" to try summarily "all offences less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100, or imprisonment for thirty days," and of such offences the General Sessions could have no jurisdiction. Art. I., § 19.

Here the constitution, having conferred no other criminal jurisdiction on the Court of Sessions than an exclusive jurisdiction in cases not otherwise provided for, and having

"otherwise provided" for cases less than felony, &c., ceases to speak, and we must turn to the statute law and the rulings of the Supreme Court to ascertain further and more certainly the extent of the *"criminal jurisdiction only," meant to be conferred upon the Court of General Sessions by Article IV., Section 1, and the subjects of the "exclusive jurisdiction" conferred by Section 18 of the same article of the constitution.

552

6. In 1866, before the adoption of the constitution, the general assembly had declared the simple larceny of property below the value of $20 to be a misdemeanor, and considered a petit larceny. 13 Stat. 407.

7. By authority of Article IV., Section 1, of the constitution, the general assembly did establish the inferior court of trial justice with "jurisdiction of all offences which may be subject to the penalties of either fine or forfeiture not exceeding $100, or imprisonment in the jail or work-house not exceeding thirty days." Also to "have jurisdiction of larcenies * * * if the property stolen does not exceed $20 in value." The jurisdiction of the Court of Sessions in no case being concurrent with any other court, but always exclusive, this legislation deprives it of power to hear and determine such causes. 14 Stat. 402–3.

8. Trial justices are the "other officers" referred to in Article IV., Section 1, of the constitution, and have all the jurisdiction conferred upon justices of the peace. State v. Fillebrown, 2 S. C. 404.

9. If the Court of Sessions had jurisdiction of petit larcenies, the constitution has taken it away by conferring it on another court, for where a new forum is created for the trial of offences which belonged to another, the old tribunal is deprived of authority. Righton v. Wood, Dud. 167; McIver v. State, 2 S. C. 1; State v. Fillebrown, 2 S. C. 408; State v. Harper, 6 S. C. 464.

10. The statute having created a misdemeanor of what was before a felony, the old law is gone, and the offender must be indicted under the new, and, of course, before the court to which jurisdiction of the new offence is given. State v. Wright, 4 McC. 358; Burton v. Watkins, 2 Hill 674; 1 Bish. on Cr. L. 210, 638; State v. Raines, 3 McC. 533.

11. The indictment should have been under the statute to warrant a conviction for petit larceny which is now only a statutory offence. 1 Bish. on Cr. L. 210, 638; 1 Bla.

*553

89; *State v. Ripley, 2 Brev. 300; State v. Wright, 4 McC. 358; Burton v. Watkins, 2 Hill 674; State v. McLain, 2 Brev. 443; State v. Fleming, 2 Strob. 470; State v. Gray, 14 Rich. 174.

12. There can be no conviction for a misdemeanor under an indictment for a felony. This is the well settled principle in English law. Otherwise a defendant might be deprived of privileges and advantages allowed in charges of misdemeanor, which are not allowed in cases of felony, and the charges are repugnant. 1 Bish. on Cr. L. 814–15–87. See, also, State v. Wheeler, 3 Vt. 344; State v. Smith, MS., Dec., 1813; State v. Fant et al., Brev., [MS.]; State v. Howe, 1 Rich. 260.

This common law rule is overturned by statute in some of the states, but not in this. It is only where there is a court for a misdemeanor as well as for a felony, that convictions for the former in the same indictment have been sustained; and before the cases of State v. Boise & Stuke, 1 McM. 189; State v. Posey, 7 Rich. 490, it was held in this state that felonies and misdemeanors could not be charged in the same indictment. State v. Smith, State v. Fant et al., State v. Howe, above noted.

13. To argue that because the greater includes the lesser offence, therefore, in this case, the defendant might be convicted of petit larceny, is to ignore the very question of jurisdiction which was raised before the Circuit judge—for want of jurisdiction may present an obstacle to such conviction. State v. Raines, 3 McC. 533; Nelson v. State, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 518; People v. Abbott, 19 Wend. 192; State v. Nutting, 16 Vt. 261; 1 Bish. on Cr. L. 820.

14. The verdict was an acquittal of the offence charged as it did not conform to the indictment. State v. Lohnman, Riley Cas. 72; 3 Hill 67; Phil. Ev. 56; 1 Bish. on Cr. L. 814–15–20–87; Freeman on Judg. 318.

15. Judgment cannot be pronounced as written by the court. One convicted of misdemeanor for which no specific punishment is provided is only liable to fine and imprisonment without hard labor. Russ. on Cr. 92; Stephen's Dig. Cr. L. 15; Rex v. Dunn, 12 Q. B. 1041. The penitentiary is for the confinement of all offenders who shall have been convicted and sentenced according to law, to the punishment of solitary imprisonment or confinement therein at hard labor. 14 Stat.

*554

92. The judgment *is erroneous, being for a punishment to which defendant is not legally subject. 1 Bish. on Cr. L. 213, 711.

Mr. Solicitor Sellers, contra.

July 20th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The appellant was convicted of petit larceny in the General Sessions upon an indictment for grand larceny and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, at hard labor, in the penitentiary. An appeal is taken from the refusal of the General Sessions to arrest this judgment. The question involved is whether the General Sessions had jurisdiction to pronounce sentence upon the conviction of petit larceny. As the indictment charged grand larceny there is no question of its proper pendency before the Court of General Sessions. It is contended on the one hand, that, under the ruling of this court, in State v. Harper, 6 S. C. 464, the General Sessions was without original jurisdiction in cases of petit larceny and could not give sentence upon a verdict of guilty of petit larceny.

In behalf of the state, it is claimed that the General Sessions has jurisdiction in case of petit larceny, and, at all events, after an indictment for the higher offence of grand larceny, could receive and act upon a verdict of guilty of petit larceny.

It is unquestionable that State v. Harper stands as an authority for reversing the judgment appealed from, and it becomes necessary to examine the validity of the ground on which the judgment in that case was rendered. When the court is asked to follow the line marked out by a single precedent case it is not at liberty to place its decision on the rule of stare decisis alone, without regard to the grounds on which the antecedent case was adjudicated. There are three elements that enter into the authority of a case claiming to stand as a leading case on the general principles of the law: First, the unanimity with which its judgment was pronounced; second, the fact that it has been followed; and, third, the duration of time during which it has been openly followed or tacitly assented to. As, then, the authority of such a case is distinctly fortified by the next succeeding case, it is obvious that in the decision of the latter the *solidity of the grounds of the former conclusion should be inquired into, for it is only where resort is had to the original sources and a concurring result obtained that the first decision can be said to be fortified by that which follows it. An original case could not possibly gain authority by a mere perfunctory following on the principle of stare decisis. No less careful scrutiny is demanded by the nature of questions that involve the distribution of public authority among the principal agencies of government and the establishment of the limits of judicial authority. To misconceive the fundamental principles that underlie the great structural features of the government is attended with at least as great evils as a misconception of the principles of the law; for while the latter may be connected in the ordinary course of legislative action the former demands organic changes in the government itself; and, although the frequency with which such changes have been made in our country in the past has tended to inspire the opinion that little danger or inconvenience attends structural revision of the government, yet there is reason for believing that the instability that must inevitably result when frequent resort is had to the authority alone competent to revise that structure is an evil to be carefully guarded against. The present question involves a construction of the constitution, claimed to have the effect of depriving the Court of General Sessions of part of the jurisdiction which it has always exercised and which has been exercised by the courts of common law, from which the Court of General Sessions was derived. We feel bound then to re-consider the correctness of the conclusion reached by the court in the State v. Harper.

*555

The decision in State v. Harper was, in effect, that the offence of petit larceny was defined and the punishment applicable thereto prescribed by Section 5 of the act of March 1st, 1870. 14 Stat. 402. That under the proper construction of that act, the punishment in case of the larceny of goods of or under the value of $20 was not to exceed a fine of $100 and imprisonment for thirty days. That cases of petit larceny were, under the operation of that act, within the meaning of Section 19, Article I., of constitution, cases to be tried summarily before a "justice *of the peace and other officer authorized by law" on information, under oath, without indictment, and of which a trial justice has exclusive jurisdiction, from the circumstance that he is the only officer authorized by law for that purpose, no provision having been made by the legislature for the election of justices of the peace. Under this conclusion the court held that the General Sessions was excluded from jurisdiction in all cases of petit larceny.

*556

The section of the act of 1870 which was construed in State v. Harper is identical with the provisions of Section 12, Chapter XXV., of the general statutes, subsequently enacted. Gen. Stat. 195. That section is contained in the chapter prescribing the powers and duties of trial justices, and is as follows: "They shall have jurisdiction of larcenies by stealing of the property of another, of money, goods or chattels, or any bank note, bond, promissory note, bill of exchange, or other bill, order of certificate, or any book of accounts for or concerning money or goods due, or to become due, or to be delivered, or any deed or writing containing a conveyance of land or any other valuable contract, release or defeasance, or any writ, process or public record, if the property stolen does not exceed $20 in value." No punishment is prescribed by this section; but, apart from the correctness of the view presented in State v. Harper, that will be presently considered, this seeming omission is supplied by another provision of the general statutes, taken from the act of 1866, (13 Stat. 407,) which is as follows: "Any simple larceny of any article of goods, choses in action, bank bills, bills receivable, chattels, or any article of personalty, of which, by law, larceny may be committed; of all domesticated animals, and animals feræ naturæ, which have in any degree been subjected to the control of any owner, of all growing crops, or parts thereof, of all annual products of the soil, whether severed from the soil or not, and of all such fixtures and parts of the soil as were severed from the soil by an unlawful act, below the value of $20, shall be a misdemeanor and considered a petit larceny." Here the designation of the offence as a misdemeanor makes applicable to it the punishment provided by law in case of misdemeanors. It is clear that, so far as the *cases contained in these two sections are identical, the two sections are to be read in pari materia, and, such being the case, independent of the effect of any other statute or constitutional provision, the offence of petit larceny is to be considered a misdemeanor, punishable in excess of the quantity of punishment contemplated in Section 19, Article I., of the constitution. If any case can arise under Section 12, Chapter XXV., that cannot be brought under Section 12, Chapter CXXIX., such a case is not presented by the present appeal, and was not presented in State v. Harper, and need not be considered.

*557

The conclusion reached in State v. Harper, arose from reading Section 12, Chapter XXV., as enacted with special reference to the provisions of Section 19, Article I., of the constitution. The last named section is as follows: "All offences less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100, or imprisonment for thirty days, shall be tried summarily before a justice of the peace or other officer authorized by law, without indictment or intervention of a grand jury, saving to the defendant the right of appeal; and no person shall be held to answer for any higher crime or offence unless on presentment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval service, or in the militia, when in active service in time of war or public danger." It was thus held, in substance, that the intention of the act that the offense of petit larceny shall be brought within the jurisdiction of a trial justice is the key of the construction of the act, and, as that intent could be effectuated in no other way than by adjusting the provisions of the act to correspond with the intention of Section 19, Article I., of the constitution, that such an adjustment was demanded by sound principles of construction. That adjustment consisted in looking to Section 19 as the means of fixing the maximum of punishment for petit larceny, and as that section limited the jurisdiction of the inferior courts proceeding summarily to punishment not exceeding a fine of $100 and imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, these limits were to be taken as the proper limits of punishment in all cases of petit larceny.

The principle of the method of reasoning employed in State v. Harper to reach the conclusion just indicated is that the limit *of the powers of the legislature must be regarded as an implied limit to their intention in order to give their purpose efficacy within the limit of their powers. In construing a statute enacted by a legislative body of limited powers, such construction should undoubtedly be aided by the presumption that in its passage the legislature was looking to the terms limiting its powers. Where the language is doubtful this consideration should have weight in determining a preference for that interpretation that is agreeable to the restrictions of the fundamental law. It is quite a different matter to read such a statute and the clauses of the constitution affecting the legislative powers in pari materia, as was done in State v. Harper. Where enactments, separately made are read in pari materia, they are treated as having formed, in the mind of the enacting body, parts of a connected whole, though considered by such body at different moments of time and under distinct and separate aspects of the common subject. Such a principle is in harmony with the actual practice of legislative bodies, and is essential to give unity to the laws and a consistent embodiment in a connected system. It is difficult to see how this principle can become the means of connecting, for the purpose of construction, clauses and provisions of a constitution established by an authority distinct from and independent of such legislative body, and proceeding by different methods with the enactment of a strictly legislative body. As the two bodies cannot in their nature unite to carry out a common purpose, it is difficult to see how their independent enactments can be treated as if they had such capacity and intention.

*558

If the design and intention of Section 19, Article I., was to fix the punishment due to the offence of petit larceny, or to any class of offences to which that crime appertains, that effect would be accomplished independently of the statute, and even though it expressed an inconsistent intention. But it is not possible to construe that section as having any such intention. It is possible that a law may be so framed as to practically embody in it the language of some clause or provision of the constitution, and thus to permit such language to take an effect beyond that intended by its use in the constitution. In that case the clause *of the constitution so embodied would, for the purpose for which it was intended by the legislature, become a part of the act as effectually as if its language was recited as part of the act. It would no longer take effect merely as part of the fundamental law, but as the language of the statutory law. Independently of such a case the whole effect of a clause of the constitution must remain that which the framers of the constitution intended for it. The question then arises: "Has the legislature so embodied Section 19, Article I., of the constitution, in the act conferring jurisdiction on trial justices as to give it effect beyond that intended by the framers of the constitution, and such as it could only have by being enacted as part of the language of a statute?" Unless this question can be solved in the affirmative, no ground exists for reading that section in pari materia with the statute, as was done in State v. Harper.

*559

To answer the question just stated in the affirmative, it is necessary to find in the statute an intention that it should be construed as if Section 19, Article I., was embodied in it. It will not be contended that there is in the statute an expression of such an intent. Can it, then, be implied? The argument in State v. Harper is, in effect, that there is an omission in the statute that ought to be supplied from some source, and, as no competent source appears but Section 19, that resort should be had to that to supply such deficiency. Assuming, for the present, that there is a clear omission in the statute, the obligation on the courts to supply it is not absolute. If it is a defective omission they cannot supply it without supplementing the legislative will, which is beyond their competency. If it is an omission intentionally, looking to a particular source from which the supply may come, all the courts can do is to follow that intention, and, by means of it supply such omission.

But the conclusive view of this subject is that there is no omission in the statute. At the time of the passage of the act conferring jurisdiction in cases of petit larceny on trial justices, that offence was defined by the statute law as a misdemeanor, and certain penalties attached to it. The measure of punishment prescribed was in excess of that within the competency of trial justices under Section 19, Article I. If it had been the inten*tion of the legislature so to reduce the measure of punishment in cases of petit larceny as to bring all such cases within the competency of trial justices, they would naturally have repealed the pre-existing law that stood in the way of such a result. They did not do so, but, on the contrary, both of these acts were reenacted as part of the general statutes. It was, therefore, the clear intention of the legislature that they should stand together, and, such being the case, they must be read together, and so we find the offence fully defined, and its proper measure of punishment indicated by placing it in this class of misdemeanors. There is, therefore, no omission to be supplied.

*560

It is said that there was a clear intent that trial justices should take jurisdiction, and that could not be unless the measure of punishment, as thus fixed by law, should be reduced. On the other hand, as we have seen, there was an equally clear intention that the antecedent statute penalties should not be reduced, evidenced, as we have seen in the first place, by failing to repeal the previous law; and, in the second place, by re-enacting it side by side with the act conferring jurisdiction on trial justices. How this incongruity is to be explained, is a matter of speculative opinion merely; possibly it was thought that Section 19 was a mere limitation upon the power of punishment by trial justices and not a strict test of their jurisdiction, and thus, practically, two grades might exist in the offence of petit larceny—one dependent on the statute, and the other on the measure of punishment within the competency of trial justices. This matter we cannot determine, but it is clear that we cannot raise an implication in favor of embodying the provisions of Section 19 in the statute without violating a much clearer implication—that they intended to leave standing the measure of punishment prescribed by the antecedent statute. This is conclusive of the question whether any ground exists in the intention of the statute for reading Section 19 in pari materia with it as part of the expressed will of the legislature.

It is clear that the trial justices have, by Section 19, Article I., no exclusive jurisdiction of cases of petit larceny, and thus there is no ground for excluding the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions.

*561

*The sentence of the Court of General Sessions is free from objection, as it was conformable to the punishment imposed in cases of misdemeanors under the operation of the act of March, 1878. 16 Stat. 453.

The judgment of the Court of General Sessions must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 561

(Case †No. 912.)

CRANE, BOYLSTON & CO. v. MOSES.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Creditors' Suit ⇨46.]

Where a creditor obtained judgment against the executor of his debtor, and then instituted a creditor's action, setting forth his judgment in the complaint, upon which an injunction was issued, and the answers did not deny the indebtedness, and the judgment was proved at the hearing—Held, that the claim was sufficiently established. This case distinguished from Westfield v. Westfield, ante p. 482.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brown v. Brown, 45 S. C. 410, 23 S. E. 137.

For other cases, see Creditors' Suit, Cent. Dig. § 182; Dec. Dig. ⇨46.]

†This case and the two cases following, are inserted out of their place in the order of filing, so as to complete, in this volume, the cases of November Term, 1879.

[2. Executors and Administrators ⇐308.]
Executors who, after having duly advertised for creditors, and having no knowledge of outstanding debts, pay legacies more than two years after testator's death, are not guilty of a devastavit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1263; Dec. Dig. ⇐308.]

[3. Executors and Administrators, ⇐84.]
Executors having no knowledge of a debt due by their testator, are not chargeable with notice of such debt from papers in their possession as executors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 323; Dec. Dig. ⇐84.]

[4. Executors and Administrators ⇐308.]
A creditor has no cause of complaint, if executors turn over pecuniary legacies to those who are entitled to hold for life only, upon the unsealed releases of the remaindermen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1257, 1258, 1263, 1263½; Dec. Dig. ⇐308.]

[5. Trusts ⇐384.]
A surety upon a bond conditioned to hold negroes upon certain trusts, cannot be charged with a balance due by the trustee, as stated in his returns on file in the proper office; the breach must be judicially declared in action against the principal, and upon this subject the surety has a right to be heard.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Fellers v. Davis, 22 S. C. 429.

For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 623; Dec. Dig. ⇐384.]

[6. Trusts ⇐234.]
A trustee having received confederate money in June, 1863, deposited it upon interest with bankers of high standing, and entered the Confederate army soon afterwards and died in March, 1864, and the bankers failed soon after the war—Held, that the trustee was not liable for the loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 342; Dec. Dig. ⇐234.]

[7. Trusts ⇐221.]
A trustee having received money for the *562
trust estate in 1860 and 1861, *deposited it upon interest, with his individual funds, with bankers of high standing, and died in 1864, and the money was lost by the failure of the bankers after the war—Held, that he was not liable. McIver, A. J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gary v. People's Nat. Bank, 26 S. C. 547, 2 S. E. 568, 4 Am. St. Rep. 733.

For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 318; Dec. Dig. ⇐221.]

[8. Executors and Administrators ⇐227.]
[A judgment creditor need not establish his claim against his debtor's estate by affidavit, where he has made proof of his judgment.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 814; Dec. Dig. ⇐227.]

Before Hudson, J., Sumter, September, 1879.

The questions brought up by this appeal relate to claims of creditors of the estate of one deceased. The nature of those claims are fully stated in the opinion of the court, it being proper to add only, that the moneys received by Phillips, as trustee for Rose B. Quinn, were as follows: $4681.54, in January, 1860, and $1254.95, in February, 1861; and that the remaindermen, in 1866, by a paper not under seal directed the executors to turn over to Emily and Ellen Phillips, the moneys and other property left to those ladies for life by the will of N. Phillips, releasing the executors from all liability for so doing, and agreeing to look only to the life tenants for their interests in remainder. All other matters are fully stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

The plaintiffs obtained judgment against F. J. Moses and M. Moses, executors of the last will and testament of N. Phillips, deceased, on October 11th, 1871, for the sum of $1566.31 principal, besides interest and costs. Fi. fa. was issued on the said judgment (which was the result of a trial by jury and verdict rendered in regular term time), and lodged with the sheriff of Sumter county on October 19th, 1871. A certified copy of said judgment was duly lodged in the clerk's office of Marion, and execution issued thereon. Levy was made on certain lands of the said N. Phillips, deceased, in the said county of Marion, but no sale was made thereof, by reason of some order restraining the sheriff, obtained in some manner not now made known to the court; but which must have been irregular, since it appears that no notice thereof was ever given to the plaintiffs or to the executors of Phillips, and no legal proceedings have ever been taken on which said order could have been granted. The plaintiffs then filed the complaint in this action, and obtained an order of injunction in the usual form on March 12th, 1872, which order provided, in the third clause thereof, that all persons having any *claims against the estate of the said N. Phillips do file and prove such claims under these proceedings. The executors were also called and required to account for their administration of the said estate, and suing creditors restrained from further proceedings, except under this case.
*563

On May 19th, 1873, an order was taken out in the cause, extending the time for creditors to prove their demands until January 1st, 1874. The judge of Probate of Sumter county was ordered to take and state the account of the executors, and the issues, both of law and fact, were referred to him. The defendants (executors of N. Phillips) were both upon the bench at that time, and no accounting was had.

On January 18th, 1877, an order was obtained in the said cause transferring the reference to the judge of Probate of Marion county, with the powers and duties of referee as above. The judge of Probate of Marion county undertook to assume the entire disposition of the subject matter of the suit, holding that the Court of Common Pleas for Sumter county was without jurisdiction over the cause; and in accordance with the view, he entertained a petition of one Richard Jordan against F. J. Moses and M. Moses (which petition was filed on January 9th, 1877), for an account from the executors and sale of the real estate of the said N. Phillips, etc. On August 2d, 1877, the said judge of Probate, John Wilcox, filed his decree upon the petition of the said Richard Jordan, who styled himself trustee for the estate of Rose B. Quinn and Margaret McNeill. An appeal was then taken from this judgment to the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Marion, and on November 5th, 1877, the whole proceedings were set aside and quashed by the judgment of the Hon. A. J. Shaw, who held that the said Court of Probate had no jurisdiction over the subject matter, by reason of the pendency of this action in the Common Pleas for Sumter county; in which county both executors resided at the time this action was commenced. An appeal was taken from this judgment of Hon. A. J. Shaw, and he was sustained by the Supreme Court and his judgment confirmed. 10 S. C. 431. Thereupon the said John Wilcox, judge of Probate for Marion county, filed a copy of his judgment above referred to, as his report under the authority of the order of ref*erence, made to him in this cause on January 18th, 1877, hereinbefore referred to. Counsel for plaintiffs and defendants in this cause both excepted to this report, and on March 30th, 1878, his Honor, Judge Pressley, made his order in the cause, after hearing argument from all parties, whereby he rescinded all the former orders of reference in the cause, and ordered that neither the said report of the judge of Probate of Marion county, nor any of the papers or testimony accompanying the same, be held as part of the proceedings in this cause; also referring the issues of law and fact in the cause to T. B. Fraser, Esq., who was also instructed to take and state the account of Montgomery Moses, as executor of N. Phillips, deceased—his co-executor, F. J. Moses, having died pending this action. The Hon. T. B. Fraser having been elected judge before the reference was held, an order was made on January 15th, 1879, by his Honor, Judge Mackey, whereby he rescinded so much of the order made by his Honor, Judge Pressley, as appointed T. B. Fraser, Esq., referee, and all issues of law and fact in the cause were referred to Charles Mayrant, Esq., master in equity for Sumter county, who held references—on September 8th, 1879, filed his report; and this cause came on to be heard before me on exceptions filed to the report of the said Charles Mayrant, Esq., master in equity for Sumter county.

*564

To the proper understanding of the issues involved, it may be proper to state a few facts, as collected from the evidence submitted.

N. Phillips died March 4th, 1864. His executors named in his will were F. J. Moses and M. Moses. M. Moses seems to have acted mainly in the management of the estate. Legal advertisement was made by the executors very soon after the death of N. Phillips in 1864. None of the creditors now before the court gave notice of any claims. The plaintiffs obtained judgment against the executors October 11th, 1871. As before stated, December 4th, 1871, they sold, by the sheriff of Sumter county, the law library and some parlor furniture under their execution, which brought a small sum. The plaintiffs commenced this action for the settlement of the estate on March 11th, 1872. C. C. Law had then brought suit on a note, said to have *been lost, and which was made to one R. B. Fladger, and due on November 15th, 1863. No notice was given and no action taken on the claims said to be due to the estates of Rose B. Quinn and Margaret McNeill, until the year 1877.

*565

The plaintiffs, Crane, Boylston & Co., except to the report of the referee (master):

First. Because the master has found, as matter of law, "that the liability of Fairlee having been established and in no way discharged, by payment or otherwise, it subsisted against the surety, Phillips, at the time of his death, consequently against his executors as a specialty debt." These words are quoted from the master's report. In the testimony reported it is difficult to perceive how the master has reached the conclusion that the liability of Fairlee had been established and in no way discharged by payment or otherwise. In fact there seemed to have been no evidence of any effort to collect the sums which are claimed to have been due by Fairlee, either from him or his estate, which, it is shown, has been under settlement in the court of equity for Marion county for a number of years past.

Before the estate of Phillips can be properly charged with the debt of Fairlee, it will be both proper and necessary that proof be made before the master that the liability of Fairlee existed at the date of the reference, and had not been paid or discharged, either in whole or in part, and this proof must be made by the party who brings forward the claim and seeks to establish it under these proceedings. It would be a proper part of such proof to show that the demand had been established against the estate of the principal debtor now in the course of settlement in the court of equity, and that no part of the same has been paid. The plaintiffs in this action have but one fund out of which they can be paid, to wit, the estate of Phillips; the creditors of Fairlee, upon his trusteeship have two or more funds—those of the principal debtor and those of his two sureties, severally.

It is a well established rule of equity, that when one creditor has two or more funds out of which he can be paid, and the other creditor has but one, the first shall proceed first to exhaust that fund upon which he alone has a claim, before proceeding against the other, in which both are interested. In the absence *of sufficient evidence as to this claim, I deem it best and safest to re-commit it to the master, with instructions to have further testimony taken upon it. The creditor plaintiffs, as well as the executor, who is before the court, insist that before the estate of Phillips can be properly charged with a breach of the trust bond of Fairlee, there must have been an account had against the principal and a decree made against him. In Lining, Ordinary, v. Giles, 2 Tread. Const. R. 720, it is held that a surety to bond of administrator cannot be held liable until the administrator is cited and decree made. See, also, Ordinary v. Williams, 1 N. & McC. 587; Ordinary v. Powers, 2 N. & McC. 213; Anderson v. Maddock, 3 McC. 237; Harrington v. Cole, 3 McC. 509.

*566

There is proof before the master that the estate of Fairlee is now before the court of equity, and that assets will come into the hands of his executors at the death of a Mrs. Shaffer, if there be none now; and there is no proof that this demand or claim has ever been rendered in as against his estate. For these reasons, so much of the report as is covered by the first exception of the plaintiffs must be referred back to the master for further testimony, and an additional report thereon.

The second exception of the plaintiffs charges error, both of law and fact, in this, "that the master has found as matter of law that the liability of Phillips, established by his own returns, has not been discharged, but that having retained the money, or deposited it along with his own, the question of imprudent or prudent investments or deposit does not pertain to the case, but that he was liable at the time of his death for the balance charged against him, as a specialty debt, consequently his executors, so far as they had assets, to the estates of McNeill and Quinn." In the report of the master just previous to the ruling above quoted, are to be found the following words: "The only facts testified to by the defence, for the purpose of discharging Phillips from this indebtedness, are those of his investments in Confederate bonds and his deposit with Kirkpatrick." "It is shown by the affidavit of Kirkpatrick that a considerable amount of money ($8182.79) was at Phillips' credit on July 1st, 1863, besides which he had invested $5000 in Confederate bonds. Indeed, I do not understand this to be disputed." Then fol*lows the conclusion to which exception has been taken, as stated above. It will thus be seen that in the opinion of the master, if a trustee retains money, or deposits it along with his own, no matter under what circumstances, no question of prudent or imprudent investment or deposit can be made. For example: if the master be correct, a trustee who had received for his cestui que trust £1000 sterling, and at the same time had on hand £100 of his own money, and who deposited both funds in the Bank of England until a safe investment could be found, would be liable to his cestui que trust if the bank should fail, provided the two funds had not been separated in some manner. I cannot assent to this proposition to the extent to which it is carried by the master.

*567

Let us see what are the facts of the case at bar. And first, as to the estate of McNeill. There was but one fund collected for that estate by Phillips, the deceased trustee. That was the sum of $1800, received by him in Confederate currency, on June 20th, 1863. No blame is attached to him, either in evidence or argument, for having received that sum in the currency named. It is shown that on the next day he invested a large sum in bonds of the Confederate government; and that his cash book being in evidence, and his correctness of habits admitted, the sum so received must have been included in such investment, for the reason that he did not have sufficient for such purchase without including therein the sum collected for the estate of McNeill, as stated above. Nor did he draw from Kirkpatrick (who were his bankers)—and with whom he deposited all of his funds, whether his own or held by him as attorney or trustee—the sum to make such investment in Confederate bonds, or any part thereof. It is clear, that unless the sum of $1800 was so invested, it must have been retained in the currency in which it was received. It it was so held—if it had remained in his possession from June, 1863, until his death in the following spring of 1864—he would not be liable to his cestui que trust for its subsequent loss, a reasonable time being allowed him to invest. If invested in the bonds named, with no ear-mark or positive proof that such investment (if made) was for the use and benefit of the estate of McNeill, *the law would have protected him from liability for the loss thereof.

*568

Now, as to the estate of Rose B. Quinn. In this estate Phillips received the bulk of the fund in the year 1860. It is shown by his cash book and by the account of J. & J. D. Kirkpatrick, his bankers, that the money was sent to them and deposited with them at seven per cent. interest, subject to his check and in his own name; that it was not separated from his other deposits, but went to the general credit of his account. It is shown that for five years he had deposited all his own funds with those gentlemen, who were factors of the city of Charleston of high standing and credit, and that he had, in that period, had large sums of money in their hands. Was this deposit of these trust funds a breach of trust? The law allowed him a reasonable time in which to make an investment. Where were the funds to remain in the meantime? It is a matter of public history that at that period all the banks of the state were in a condition of suspension of specie payments. After a year had passed, when the duty of the trustee to make a proper investment would have existed, the state was convulsed by war, and no more prudent course was open to Phillips than to leave the fund in the place of deposit in which it had been first lodged, until the return of peace might enable him to secure a safe investment. Before that time arrived he was dead, and the house in whose hands he had placed these funds survived that catastrophe which involved every bank in the state. The house of Kirkpatrick was a banking-house for the deceased, Phillips; they received deposits, allowed seven per cent. interest, and permitted checks to be drawn on them. It is shown by the testimony of C. H. Simonton that they were in good credit up to 1868, when the executor obtained judgment against them. On March 11th, 1871, they took the benefit of the bankrupt act, and the debt was lost. It is also shown by the evidence that in 1863, Phillips was drafted into the second class of reserves of the Confederate army. That he made his will at that time, and that he required his bankers and factors to purchase for him $5000 of Confederate states bonds. That these bonds were found after his death among his personal assets. That this was *about the sum that would be due to the estate of Rose B. Quinn. That the state and Confederate government had both made the purchase of these bonds legal on the part of the trustees. The true rule is, that in all cases in which the fiduciary relations exists, the law requires the exercise of bona fides and discretion on the part of those who have the interest of others in their charge. Prudence and good faith are demanded; and where these appear, from all the circumstances of a case, equity will not enforce penalties upon those who have been unfortunate without fault. The rule that a trustee must not mix up the funds of his cestui que trust with his own, is one which arises from the custom of some fiduciaries to use trust funds for their own purposes; to speculate with them, to put them in their own business or trade, with a view to making profit therefrom. In all such cases, the trustee is held liable for the loss, if loss ensue. But it by no means follows that a trustee who deposits his trust funds and his own in the same place of safe deposit, and does not withdraw or use the trust funds so deposited, or reap therefrom any gain, would be held liable for a loss which should result from no imprudence on his part, either in making the first deposit, or afterwards in not removing it, provided that his good faith is clear, and his prudence and discretion apparent.

*569

Under the facts of this case, I am constrained to sustain the exceptions of the plaintiffs to the ruling of the master, and to hold that the estate of Phillips is not liable for the loss of the funds of either the estate of McNeill or Rose B. Quinn. The true rule is, that a trustee is answerable only for losses resulting from acts or omissions, such as a prudent man could not do, or omit, in his own affairs. Taveau v. Ball, 1 McC. Ch. 464; Bryan v. Mulligan, 2 Hill's Eq. 361; Glover v. Glover, McM. Eq. 153; O'Dell v. Young, Ib. 155; Rowth v. Howell, 3 Ves. 565; Powell v. Evans, 5 Ves. 839, show that a trustee or executor should manage funds committed to his care with the same care and diligence that a prudent man would bestow on his own concerns. In the case of Rowth v. Howell it was held that the executor was justified in employing the customary means of safely keeping funds in his hands, and the trust funds having been lost by the failure of the banker with whom they were *deposited, the executor was free from responsibility, not having been charged or being chargeable with any want of due care. See also Boggs v. Adger, 4 Rich. Eq. 408. In Nance v. Nance, 1 S. C. 209, the court uses this language, referring to the fifth ground of appeal: "This proposition is not distinctly stated, but amounts to a claim that the investment made by a trustee for the joint account of two wards, without distinguishing their several interest in the same, are for this reason to be disallowed. We know of no principle from which such a conclusion can be deduced. If the estate has sustained a loss for any such reason, and that loss can be traced to culpable negligence on the part of the trustee, such a state of facts should be presented directly. It cannot be made out argumentatively in the absence of such a statement." In Twitty v. Houser, 7 S. C. 164, effort was made to charge the administrator with the loss of a fund, by him deposited in the Citizens' Savings Bank branch at Orangeburg. The court held that he was not liable for such loss, and use the following language: "To make the administrator liable for loss which followed from no fault on his part, would inflict on him a punishment for not foreseeing what others, having better opportunities, failed to perceive in time to save them from a consequent loss. And again, the proper inquiry is, was the act of the administrator, under the circumstances, induced by that reasonable care with which prudent men, looking to their own benefit, usually conduct their own business?"

*570

In Fitzsimons v. Fitzsimons, 1 S. C. 413, the court say: "The sixth ground of appeal objects to the allowance of the credit to the defendant for a deposit in the Palmetto Savings Institution of the funds of the estate. This institution appears to have been in good standing until about the close of the war, when it became insolvent. It appears by the account stated by the master, that the administratrix was credited March 2d, 1860, with a check for the amount deposited in the savings institution." The court disallowed the exception taken, and discharged the defendants from payment even of interest on the annual balances. The court say, on page 414: "It does not appear that the administratrix received actual payment by way of interest on the savings deposit, and it must be assumed, as the *case stands, that the interest was, from time to time, credited by the bank on account, and that the accumulations of interest have been lost, with the rest of the deposit, by the failure of the institution. The complainant therefore is not entitled to the allowance of interest, forming the second ground of appeal." In Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C. 394 [7 Am. Rep. 26], the chief justice says: "When a trustee is not limited or directed by the instrument under which he acts, and is left to the discretion of his own judgment, our cases hold, that his discretion must be exercised with the same care and diligence that a prudent man would bestow on his own concerns." And again, on same page: "The principle which is to be extracted from the cases in this state consists with what is said in Hovenden on Frauds 486. "He is bound to manage the property for the benefit of the cestui que trust with the care and diligence of a prudent man. What will constitute care and diligence thus exacted will depend on the attendant circumstances."

*571

In West v. Cauthen, 9 S. C. 60, the court say: "It appears that the executor converted the Confederate currency in his hands, belonging to the estate of his testator, into interest bearing Confederate notes. The decision of this court in Hinton v. Kennedy, 3 S. C. 459, was in a case precisely parallel to the present, as it regards the claim under consideration. In accordance with that case, we must hold that the executor was guilty of no breach of the trust on such a change of securities. It fully appears that the entire estate, subject to the payment of the legacy to Milly West, was lost through the depreciation of Confederate securities. As it is not made to appear that the executor was at fault in retaining in his hands such securities down to the time when, by the course of public events, they became valueless, there is no ground for maintaining the complaint. The decrees of the Circuit Court and Probate Court must be set aside and the complaint dismissed."

Was the conduct of Phillips in sending the funds of the estate of Rose B. Quinn to his bankers, J. & J. D. Kirkpatrick, and placing them there on deposit, a prudent and proper act, under the circumstances surrounding him at the time? I think it was, nor can I perceive any breach of trust in his leaving them there; *when the state of the country is taken into consideration, as it existed at the end of the year, which is allowed him, in which to find investments. In accordance with these principles—

*572

It is adjudged and decreed that the estate of Phillips is not liable for the amount of $1800 received from Fairlee's executors on June 20th, 1863, in Confederate currency for account of the estate of Margaret McNeill, and this conclusion is reached without reference to the question of investment in Confederate bonds, since the court is of opinion that if no such investment was made and the money was merely kept on hand, or left with Kirkpatrick and subsequently lost, in neither event has there been shown that want of care and prudence which would render the estate of Phillips liable to pay to the estate of McNeill such sum or any part thereof.

It is further decreed that the estate of Phillips is not liable for the loss of the funds received by him for the estate of Rose B. Quinn—the deposit with J. & J. D. Kirkpatrick of said funds being regarded as the act of a prudent man, and certainly as no breach of trust; and the subsequent failure of the house of Kirkpatrick in 1871, was not in any way evidence of their not having been fully responsible in 1860, when such deposit was made. There is evidence that in 1863, Phillips was drafted in the reserves of the Confederate army; that he caused his bankers, J. & J. D. Kirkpatrick, to invest $5000 in Confederate eight per cent. bonds, which bonds were found with his assets on hand after his death. It is contended on the part of the plaintiffs that these bonds represented the Rose B. Quinn estate. There is no positive proof that said bonds were purchased for the said estate. They were not marked in any way to designate such purpose. The similarity in the amount purchased and held to the amount due that estate, together with the fact that such investments were sanctioned by the law, are relied on as evidence to prove that they were so intended. It is also in evidence that Phillips did not invest his own funds in such bonds, as he had not much faith in them, and it is contended that this is another proof that the bonds held were as a protection to himself against the balance reported by him as being due said estate. It will not be necessary for me to decide this question, because I hold *that as it is not denied that the funds of the estate of Quinn were remitted to and deposited with Kirkpatrick when received, the estate of Phillips is not liable for the loss thereof by the subsequent failure of Kirkpatrick, even if the funds were not invested in the bonds named; a fortiori said estate was not liable if so invested.

*573

The executor excepts to the report because, he says, that the master has erred in charging the said executor with the value of the law library and furniture sold by the sheriff, and also because the master has not given credit to the said executor for the sums paid by him to Ellen and Emily Phillips, legatees under the will of the testator. It is not denied that the executors duly advertised for creditors, and that payments to the Misses Phillips were only made two years after the death of the testator. The authorities seem to be clear upon the duty of persons having demands upon an estate to make known such demands within the time allowed by the statute in which it is made the duty of executors to settle the estate. No exception is made in favor of minors, nor of other persons under disabilities. It is in evidence that none of the demands now set up under these proceedings were put in suit or brought to the attention of the executors until after the payments of the legacies had been made, although Margaret McNeill, as heir of her deceased children, was fully able to have made her demands at any time from the death of Phillips. It is contended that whilst no actual notice of the demands now made was given to executors, the possession of certain books of deceased and of a bond which was due the estate of Rose B. Quinn, were sufficient constructive notice to the said executors of the demands set up under these proceedings in favor of Rose B. Quinn's estate and that of Margaret McNeill. It is stated positively by the executor that he had no notice of these demands until 1876, ten years after the legacies had been paid by him. It is no where shown that the memorandum book or other evidences of those demands were known to the executors before the legacies were paid in 1866. The bond referred to bore no ear-mark of belonging to the estate of Quinn. It was assigned to N. Phillips, and nothing on its face showed that it *belonged to any other person. It was in the hands of Dozier for suit, and was assigned to Jordan, trustee, after the present action was brought.

*574

Was it the duty of the executors to hunt up these claimants, or their duty to seek them? Let us see what the act says, (5 Stat. at Large 111): "That every executor or administrator shall give three weeks' notice by advertisement in the state gazette, or at three different places of most public resort in the parish or county for creditors to render an account of their demands, and they shall be allowed twelve months to ascertain the debts due to and from the deceased, to be computed from the probate of the will or granting letters of administration; and creditors neglecting to give a statement of their debts within the time aforesaid, the executors or administrators shall not be liable to make good the same." See, also, Sebring v. Keith, 2 Hill 340. An administrator, as against a creditor who has not rendered a statement of his debt within the time directed by law, is entitled to retain for his whole debt, if the assets are sufficient to pay all. See, also, Adam Walker v. Sam. Gill, Adm'r, 2 Bail. 105. A creditor having notice of the death of his debtor, and of the grant of administration, is bound to render a statement of his demand in twelve months, although the administrator may have neglected to advertise for creditors to render in a statement of their demands conformably to law.

It is contended that because the records show that Phillips was appointed trustee of the estates, such was constructive notice to the executor of this indebtedness. The conclusion does not necessarily follow the premises. I am therefore brought to the conclusion that the executor is entitled to credit on his account for the sums paid to Ellen and Emily Phillips, legatees of the testator, and

It is ordered and adjudged that the account of the executors be remanded to the master; that he allow credit thereon for the legacies paid to the aforesaid legatees; and that the value of the law library and furniture be stricken from the accounts, as I am of the opinion that the executor is not responsible for the low price which they brought at a public sale by sheriff under execution.

*575

*The claimant Jordan also excepts to the report of the master, because he has allowed the claim of the plaintiffs, without their oath being attached thereto. And, also, because he has allowed the claim of M. Iseman, when, as he insists, the proof before the master was that the claim was paid, or, if not paid, that the statute of limitations would apply thereto and bar the same. These questions were not seriously urged at the argument, as they seemed to be regarded as of minor importance. With reference to the claim of the plaintiffs, it would seem that if they had not a demand against the estate of Phillips, these entire proceedings would have to be dismissed, as the plaintiffs would be without right of action, since their status would be taken away, for this action is one which they only can take, being creditors of the estate which the complaint is filed to settle. Without doubt the defendant executor would cheerfully accede to this view, and the whole proceedings would fall through.

The plaintiffs set up in their complaint the judgment against the executor, and exhibit to the master the verdict of a jury in the case, followed by their judgment and the writ of execution, which shows the amount now due to the plaintiffs. In the opinion of the court the record of the judgment was proof of the debt, and the execution of the sum due. The case may be different if the judgment was against the testator, for such judgment might have been paid or satisfied, in whole or in part, without such payment being known to the parties in this cause. In the case at bar, if the demand of the plaintiffs was disputed, the defendants could have denied it in their answer, and had their day to disprove it in court. I am of the opinion that the judgment against the executors established the debt. See Van Wyck v. Norris, 6 S. C. 305. As the whole matter must be referred back to the master, the plaintiffs may, if they deem it proper, supplement the proof of their judgment by the filing of an affidavit, showing the amount now due and unpaid on their judgment.

With reference to the small claim of Iseman, I find no proof made before the master and referred to by him. But such proof must have appeared, because the master reports in favor of the claim. I will therefore refer this claim back to the master, with instructions to report the proof made upon it, and with leave to *claimant to supplement such proof with any that he may be advised is necessary thereto.

*576

The creditor, Richard Jordan, trustee of Rose B. Quinn and Margaret McNeil, and administrator and guardian of children of Mrs. McNeill, appealed upon the grounds considered by the court.

Messrs. Walsh & Evans, for appellants.
Messrs. Moise & Lee, for plaintiffs.
Mr. W. W. Harllee, for the executor.

September 1st, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This was a complaint in the nature of a creditor's bill to marshal the assets of the estate of Napthili Phillips, deceased, against F. J. Moses and M. Moses, executors, the legatees, and C. C. Law and other creditors. Phillips, the testator, died in March, 1864, leaving a will. He died in Marion county, where he lived, and where his property was situated, but the executors lived in Sumter county, where these proceedings were instituted.

The history of the litigation, including a claim of exclusive jurisdiction in Marion county, would be long, but all the facts are so fully and clearly set forth in the Circuit decree that it will not be necessary to restate them here. The plaintiffs are judgment creditors, having obtained their judgment in 1871, against the executors upon a demand due by Phillips in his lifetime. They levied and sold personal property of small value—law library, furniture, &c.—but, finding obstacles in the way of collecting their debt, they filed this complaint in 1872 for an account against the executors, to sell land, pay debts, and to marshal the assets. The questions were referred to a referee, who stated the account and reported in favor of certain other claims presented. The Circuit Court rendered a decree, and the case comes up on exceptions.

One of the exceptions makes the point that the judgment of *the plaintiffs was not sufficiently proved for lack of an affidavit of plaintiffs as to the amount due. This is the claim upon which the complaint (which, as it asked for an injunction, must be presumed to have been sworn to,) is based, and if the objection is well taken the whole proceeding must fall to the ground. There is no allegation that the debt is not due, nor is it denied that it has gone into judgment against the executors, but the objection is that, as matter of proof, the claim was not established by affidavit, which it is insisted was necessary. This court has lately held, in the case of Westfield v. Westfield, ante p. 482, that "a creditor presenting his claim to the commissioner or master, under notice, should make an affidavit of the debt, and that he is aware of no discount," &c.; but the practice indicated in that case was intended to protect the estate of an insolvent debtor against claims presented under the call for creditors, and does not necessarily include the demand upon which the proceeding is instituted, especially when that is a judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury. This claim of plaintiff was specifically set forth in the pleadings. The complaint, which, as we have seen, must be presumed to have been sworn to, charged that there was such a judgment, and set forth particularly the amount of it. The answers did not deny the statement, and, therefore, by the rule of the code, without further proof, "it must be taken as true." Besides, both the referee and the Circuit judge held that there was sufficient proof of the judgment which was obtained against the executors after the death of the testator. This exception is overruled.

*577

In reference to the exception as to the alleged devastavit of the executors in paying legacies to Ellen and Emily Phillips, leaving debts unpaid, the general facts are as follows: "The testator died in 1864, having given his entire property to his executors in trust for his sisters, Ellen and Emily, during their lives, and the survivor of them, and after the death of both of them then over to his surviving brothers and sisters. The testator seems to have considered that he owed no debts, as his will makes no reference to debts; but that omission could not excuse the executors as to their first duty of providing for creditors. The executors qualified immediately, M. Moses, March 11th, *1864, and F. J. Moses, April 1st, 1864, and advertised according to law for creditors to present their demands. It seems that no claim was presented, and the executors, having assets in hand, made payments to the legatees, as follows: To Ellen and Emily Phillips, $2500; to same, September 29th, 1866, $1500; to same, December 20th, 1866, $1990; to Henry M Phillips, December 2d, 1867, $1000; and to Ellen and Emily Phillips, May 14th, 1869, $1000, making the aggregate sum of $7990. At that time the assets were ample for the payment of any debts of which they had knowledge or which were likely to come against the estate. The judgment of plaintiffs was not recovered until 1871, and this suit was not instituted until 1872. Were these payments wrongfully made, and should the executors be required to account for the same as assets to pay creditors whose claims have since come to light? No question is here made as to the right of the creditors to pursue the legatees who received the money. We have only to consider whether, in making such payments, the executors committed a devastavit, and are liable to account for the same. The law allowed the executors twelve months, reckoning from the probate of will, to ascertain the debts due by the testator. Within that time they were required to give three weeks' notice, by advertisement, for creditors to present their demands duly attested. "If any creditor shall neglect to give in a statement of his debt within the time aforesaid, the executors or administrators shall not be liable to make good the same." Gen. Stat. 457. The proof shows that when they made the payments, no claim of any creditors had been made, although the notice had been given, and several years had elapsed before the first payment was made. We think the executors are not liable for the legacies paid, and the account should be corrected accordingly. If the executors were now sued on their legal liability as the personal representatives of the testator, the plea of "plene administravit" could be maintained to the extent of these payments. Walker v. Gill, 2 Bail. 105; Sebring v. Keith, 2 Hill 340; Lanier v. Griffin, 11 S. C. 581.

*578

The executors would be liable if they paid legacies with a knowledge of outstanding debts, even if those debts had not been *rendered under the act; and it is insisted that these executors had at least constructive notice of the trust claims represented by Jordan, trustee. It is said that, as executor, they had possession of the papers of Phillips, from which they might have ascertained the existence of at least the alleged trust debts. It is more than doubtful whether they could have done so from the papers in the possession of Phillips. If they saw the cash book and papers referred to, they might well have supposed that the account had been discharged by investment, as now claimed, or in some other way, especially as no claim in reference thereto had been intimated to them. But, be that as it may, the surviving executor states positively that the executors had no knowledge of these claims until years after the payment. It is not the duty of executors to hunt up doubtful claims against the estate which they represent. The law makes it their duty to advertise for creditors, and, when presented, to make provision for their payment, but makes it the duty of the creditors themselves to present their claims duly attested.

*579

It is further urged that as the legacies to Ellen and Emily were for life only, with limitation over, the executors had no right to pay them more than the interest, reserving the corpus for the remaindermen, and that the release which the remaindermen executed of all their interest, not being under seal, was void. Assuming that some such question might possibly arise between executors and beneficiaries under the will, it is not perceived that it touches the point under consideration here. This exception is overruled.

Under the call for creditors, made in the proceedings in this case, Richard Jordan, as trustee, guardian and administrator, presented these claims against the estate, which he insists are valid bond debts, and entitled to priority as such. If these claims are established they will absorb all the assets which remain. They are as follows:

First. One George M. Fairlee was appointed trustee in regard to certain negro slaves belonging to Mrs. Margaret E. McNeill and her children, and gave bond July 21st, 1860, to C. D. Evans, Esq., then commissioner in equity for Marion county, in the penal sum of $8000, conditioned for the performance of cer*tain duties as such trustee, and upon this bond N. Phillips and Elly Godbold were sureties. Fairlee died in 1862. It is said his estate is being settled in the court, but neither his personal representatives nor any one interested in his estate are parties in this case. The referee could take no account of the estate of Fairlee or his liability as trustee, yet he charged as a bond debt against the estate of Phillips, one of the sureties, the whole amount claimed to be due by Fairlee, trustee, as taken from his returns, viz., $4067.95. The Circuit judge ordered the claim to be recommitted, and the creditor excepts.

*580

It is doubtful whether that part of the decree which ordered the claim recommitted is appealable, but as it has been earnestly argued, and will have to be considered below, we will entertain it. The obligation on which the claim is founded is not an ordinary money bond, in which the terms are, we or either of us promise to pay a certain sum of money, but an official bond for the performance of certain acts. "Now the condition of the above obligation is such, that if the above bound George M. Fairlee shall hold the property (negroes) upon the trusts as above described, &c., * * * then this obligation to be void and of none effect, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue," &c. The penalty is for a sum certain, but that is not to be paid as such, but was only intended to secure the performance of the covenants. The sureties promised to pay no sum of money, but that their principal would perform the duties specified in the bond, or, if not, that they would pay the damages which might result from his failure to do so. That is the extent of the undertaking of the sureties, who are in no way responsible until it appears that the principal had failed to perform the duties he had assumed. Originally it was held, in this state, that a surety upon an administration bond could not be sued until a breach of the bond had been shown; until the principal had been held to account, had been found to be in default, and had failed to pay the judgment. "Sureties on administration bonds are in no respect to be considered as trustees or accountable in this court (equity) as such. They are only parties to a law undertaking, and to be held responsible in damages for the default of their principal. They can be sued only after default of their principal *has been established." McBee v. Crocker, McM. Eq. 488; Glenn v. Conner, Harp. Eq. 267; Teague v. Dendy, 2 McC. Eq. 209 [16 Am. Dec. 643], and other authorities in the Circuit decree. Even after judgment had been rendered against the principal, the surety, when sued, in certain cases had the right to surcharge and falsify the account stated against the principal, upon the ground that he was not a party to the proceeding. To avoid this seeming double litigation, and for other reasons, it was subsequently held in the case of Taylor v. Taylor, 2 Rich. Eq. 128, that in a suit for an account against the principal the surety might, and for certain reasons should, be included as a party, so that he might defend himself, and if a recovery was had, that the decree might run against both in the first instance and avoid the necessity of a second examination of the same accounts. We understand that the case of Taylor v. Taylor established the practice in equity that upon bonds for the performance of covenants the surety may be included in the original suit for account against the principal; but we know of no authority for going further. Phillips undertook that Fairlee should do certain things in regard to certain property. It does not appear that he failed to do his duty; that can only appear by an account against his representatives. There may be some defence to that account, and the executors of Phillips have a right to be heard upon that subject. No breach of the bond has been made to appear in that conclusive manner which is necessary before the estate of the surety will be charged with any amount. It is premature to hold that any debt has been established against the estate of Phillips, as one of the sureties of Fairlee. We concur with the Circuit judge in ordering this claim to be recommitted.

*581

Second. George M. Fairlee died in 1862, and the testator, Phillips, was appointed his successor as trustee of Mrs. McNeill, and entered into bond to C. D. Evans, Esq., commissioner, in 1863, which was substantially a copy of the bond of Fairlee. Jordan, trustee, claims that the executors must account for the actings and doings of Phillips as trustee, and that this account is a direct liability covered by his bond. In this respect this claim does differ from the one just considered. But an objection is made to it that there is, in fact, nothing due under this bond.

*582

*Phillips was appointed trustee in 1863, and never received anything from any source, except one item of $1800 in Confederate money. Soon after it was received he was conscripted into the Confederate service, and died in March, 1864, less than a year from the time he received the money. He committed no breach in receiving the money. He was entitled to a reasonable time to invest, and, in the midst of war, it was difficult, if not impossible, to invest Confederate money. He deposited the money, along with his own, with J. & J. D. Kirkpatrick, factors of good character in Charleston, who had been used by testator as his bankers, and, soon after testator's death, it was lost, not from any negligence or want of care on his part, or the subsequent failure of the Kirkpatricks, but for the reason that the currency itself became worthless. We do not know any principle of equity which requires that the estate should be charged with this money, whether the Kirkpatricks exchanged it for Confederate bonds or not. In either case the result of loss would be the same. Waller v. Creswell, 4 S. C. 353. If the testator had used the Confederate money in his own private business, the estate would be properly chargeable with its value at the time it was so received and so used. But there is no such allegation. The money, or Confederate bills, were never used in any way except to deposit them. This exception is overruled.

Third. Rose B. Wheeler entered into a marriage settlement with John F. Quinn, of which E. B. Wheeler was trustee; afterwards, Phillips, the testator, was appointed in his place, and gave bond, in 1860, to the commissioner, conditioned for the performance of his duties. Some of the property had been sold by order of the court, and the proceeds were paid to Phillips, the testator, in the year 1860. The Circuit decree states that it was "shown by his cash book and by the account of J. & J. D. Kirkpatrick, factors of Charleston, that the money was sent to them and deposited with them at seven per cent. interest, subject to his check, and in his own name; that it was not separated from his other deposits, but went to the general credit of his account. It is shown that for five years he had deposited all his own funds with these gentlemen, who were factors of the city of Charleston of high standing and credit, and that he had, in *that period, had large sums of money in their hands. It is also shown by the evidence that in 1863, Phillips was drafted into the second class of the reserves of the Confederate army; that he made his will at that time, and that he required his bankers and factors to purchase for him $5000 of Confederate States bonds, which were found after his death among his personal assets. J. & J. D. Kirkpatrick appeared to be solvent until 1868, when the executors of Phillips sued them and recovered a large judgment for money in their hands, but they went into bankruptcy and the entire debt was lost. Upon this state of facts, should the estate of Phillips be charged with this fund?

*583

This is not a case where the trustee has caused loss to his cestui que trust by calling in good and safe securities and accepting for them a depreciated currency. What he received was a payment on account of the trust. There is no breach of trust in receiving the money. We regard it established that he deposited the money with the Kirkpatricks, who were in good standing and continued so until after the testator's death. The question must be determined by the inquiry whether that deposit, under the circumstances, was a prudent and judicious act. The money was received January, 1860, and February, 1861, when the war was imminent. The investments required in such cases could not then be promptly or safely made, if they could be made at all. The trustee had a reasonable time to make the effort, and before that time expired, the country was in the midst of war. As was said by the court in the case of Waller v. Creswell, before cited: "A civil war was raging fierce and devastating, when or how to terminate, human foresight could, with no approach to certainty, determine. Even if successful to the Confederacy, which was waging it, years of deprivation, toil and industry must probably have been endured to repair the broken fortunes of its people. Can we then say the act in question was an incautious or imprudent one?" So we say here, was the deposit with the Kirkpatricks, under the circumstances, whether we regard them as acting bankers or merely as factors in good standing, an incautious or imprudent act? The times made ordinary investments impracticable, and what was he to do with the money? Even after the event—looking back at this *distance of time—it is difficult to conceive how he could have acted more prudently. If he had placed the money in bank as was done in the case of Fitzsimons v. Fitzsimons, 1 S. C. 413, and, also, in the case of Twitty v. Houser, 7 S. C. 164, the failure would have come only sooner. The proof is that Phillips was a good business man, and he placed this money where he placed his own. We cannot resist the conclusion that this loss was one of the inevitable consequences of the war, and should not be shifted from the owner to the mere agent, who was without fault in causing the loss.

*584

It is urged that the trustee mixed the money with his own. That would have charged him if he had used it in his own business and ventures, and that use had caused it loss. But that is not charged. His only use of it, mixed with his own, was the single act of deposit. It is said he did not keep it separate as trust property, and return it as such. As was said in the case of Nance v. Nance, 1 S. C. 209, "the failure to report the security is not in itself conclusive; it is only a circumstance to be considered among others."

This court concurs with the Circuit judge. The decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

McIVER, A. J. As I cannot concur in so much of the opinion of the majority of the court as exempts the estate of Phillips from liability for the money received by him as trustee for Mrs. Rose B. Quinn, deposited with the Kirkpatricks, and subsequently lost by their bankruptcy, I propose to state, very briefly, the ground of my dissent.

It appears from the return of Phillips that much the larger part of this money was received by him in January, 1860, long before the war between the states commenced, and that the balance of it was received by him in February, 1861, several months before the actual commencement of hostilities. As trustee, it was his duty to seek a proper investment for the fund as soon as practicable; and while he might have been justified in depositing this money for safe keeping where he was *in the habit of depositing his own money for a similar purpose, and allowing it to remain there for a reasonable time to enable him to look around for a suitable investment, I do not think he was justified in allowing the trust funds to remain on deposit for so great a length of time without some proof that he had made unsuccessful efforts to find a suitable investment.

*585

As I concur fully upon the other points considered in the opinion of this court it is unnecessary for me to say anything as to them.

Appeal dismissed.

13 S. C. 585

(Case No. 924.)

CLARK v. SMITH.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Bonds ⟸116; Clerks of Courts ⟸65.]

The clerk of the Court of Common Pleas is the proper party to bring action upon a bond payable to the former commissioner in equity of his county, and also to foreclose the statutory lien upon lands sold for partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Cent. Dig. § 148; Dec. Dig. ⟸116; Clerks of Courts, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. ⟸65.]

[2. Husband and Wife ⟸138.]

A wife's share in the purchase money of land sold for partition, was paid in 1863 by the purchaser to the husband, who gave his receipt, which the commissioner in equity refused to receive as a voucher, unless the wife gave an order in writing requiring him to do so, whereupon the wife, without consideration, gave an order directing payment to the husband —Held, that the wife had waived her right to a settlement and that her share was paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 524–537; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 138.]

[3. Guardian and Ward ⟸4.]

Money due to an infant was paid to her father, who was generally believed to be her guardian. Upon action brought by the infant after attaining her majority, against the original debtor, there could be furnished no proof that the father had ever been the guardian—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to a recovery.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Beard v. Stanton, 15 S. C. 167.

For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[4. Payment ⟸47.]

And moneys paid by such father to the daughter after she attained her majority, could be properly applied by her as credits upon other indebtedness of her father to her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. ⟸47.]

[5. Partition ⟸104.]

The mere purchasing and taking possession of land covered by the lien of a mortgage, does not constitute adverse possession, which would give currency to the statute of limitations; and the same principle applies where there exists the lien given by statute in cases of partition. Daniels v. Moses, 12 S. C. 130, recognized and followed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sullivan v. Latimer, 35 S. C. 431, 14 S. E. 933.

For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 351; Dec. Dig. ⟸104.]

[6. Vendor and Purchaser ⟸229.]

A purchaser of property, which is covered by a statutory lien, of which he has no actual knowledge, is not a purchaser without notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 477–494; Dec. Dig. ⟸229.]

[7. Limitation of Actions ⟸72.]

In an action on a bond given for the purchase money of land sold for partition, it appeared that the purchaser had paid over a minor's share in the proceeds of the land to her father, who was believed to be her guardian, and acted as such, taking in return his receipt, which was filed with the bond. Held that, as 20 years had not elapsed, the minor's share should be considered as still unpaid, in the absence of evidence that her father had been appointed her guardian.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 390; Dec. Dig. ⟸72.]

[8. Husband and Wife ⟸9.]

[Where, in an action on a bond given for the purchase money of land sold for partition in 1860, it appeared that in 1863 the purchaser had paid over a married woman's share in the proceeds of the land to her husband, whose receipt was accepted by the commissioner who made the sale, on his producing an order from his wife to make payment to him, the bond should be credited with her share as paid, though there was no proof that she ever received the money or any consideration for her order.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. ⟸9.]

[This case is also cited in Smith v. Smith, 24 S. C. 305, as to facts.]

*586

*Before Wallace, J., Marion, April, 1879.

In this case Hon. B. C. PRESSLEY, judge of the First Circuit, sat in the place of Hon. HENRY McIVER, associate justice, who had been of counsel.

Action commenced September 22d, 1876, by Robert K. Clark, clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Marion county. The facts and pleadings are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court. The conclusions of law by the referee are as follows:

The lands in question were sold under proceedings in partition and for division amongst the distributees and heirs-at-law of the late Samuel Smith; and by the provisions of the act of 1791, (5 Stat. 164) stand pledged for the purchase money, and the lien must be enforced unless there be something in the grounds of defense set up by the defendants. Messervey v. Barelli, 2 Hill's Ch. 575; McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq. 152; Allen v. Richardson, 9 Rich. Eq. 53.

This lien is denominated in the last two cases a statutory mortgage, and in the first (Messervey v. Barelli,) Chancellor Johnston regards it better than a mortgage; and the doctrine is there announced that the court can, by no order, deprive the parties of the statutory lien and security thus acquired. This adjudication puts an end, therefore, to the position of defendants' counsel, that the order of the court that the commissioner should take a bond and mortgage, and a confirmation of the sale on his report that such had been complied with, substituted the bond and mortgage for the statutory lien. The referee holds that the lien for the purchase money was complete at the time of the sale; that it was a legal and valid security to the parties interested conferred by the statute, and could not be defeated by any order of the court.

The defences relied upon are:

1. Adverse possession for the period required by the statute of limitations, by which the lien is barred so far as this land is concerned. It is as well at once to say that with the exception of George W. Smith, R. Vampill and George W. Harrelson, there has been no such adverse possession by any one of the *parties as would entitle them to hold by the statute of limitations before the commencement of this action; that as to them the statute is no protection. And the defence of the statute as to them is overruled.

*587

With respect to the three first named, to wit, George W. Smith, R. Vampill and George W. Harrelson, there is no question as to their possession for the statutory period before suit brought. But can this possession avail them under the circumstances of this case? The case of Drayton v. Marshall, Rice's Eq. 373 [33 Am. Dec. 84], is relied upon by the defendants, but the mortgage in that case was before the act of 1791, by which the mortgage was held to be a security merely; whereas, prior to that act the mortgagee was the owner of the legal title to the land, and authorized to sue after condition broken. In Thayer v. Cramer, 1 McC. Ch. 395, it was held that a mortgage was a mere security for the debt; that the mortgagor was a trustee for the mortgagee, and persons holding under him could occupy no better position. This authority is recognized in Drayton v. Marshall. In Wright v. Eaves, 5 Rich. Eq. 81, it is held that "to a bill filed to foreclose a mortgage of land against one who holds, through intermediate conveyances under the mortgagor, the statute of limitations is inapplicable, although the defendant and those under whom he claims have been in possession for more than ten years." In this case, Thayer v. Cramer is recognized, and the court say that that case and Smith & Cuttino v. Osborne, [1 Hill's Eq. 340.] may be regarded as law.

In the recent case of Norton v. Lewis, 3 S. C. 25, these cases are recognized, and it is there held that a purchaser holding possession for the period of ten years, with notice of the mortgage, cannot avail himself of the defence of the statute of limitations in bar of the right of the mortgagee to foreclose. In this case the mortgage was recorded in proper time. This notice was constructive merely by the recording of the mortgage, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to a foreclosure of the mortgage, notwithstanding the adverse possession.

It is insisted here, however, by defendants' counsel, that these *defendants had no notice; that the decree for sale for partition in 1860, was not required to be recorded, and is not sufficient to fix defendants with notice; and that their adverse possession is a valid defence. If, as has been supposed by the eminent jurists who have discussed the question as to the statutory lien, that it is equivalent to if not a better security than a mortgage, it is difficult to perceive how its efficacy can be impaired, and though not required to be recorded more than the proceedings of the courts, but open to all and binding all concerned, (Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 60; Pettus v. Clawson, 4 Rich. Eq. 92,) how it should afford less protection than a mortgage recorded. It appears to the referee that such a conclusion would make the provisions of the act of 1791 defective and illusory. But how stand the facts with regard to notice? Stephen Smith, to whom the land was sold by his brother, S. S. Smith, the purchaser at the commissioner's sale, was a party to the proceedings in the court of equity for the partition of the lands, and is fixed conclusively with notice of the lien. But assuming that one purchasing without notice from a vendor who had such notice may acquire a valid title, how is it with these three defendants? As to George W. Smith, it would be difficult for any one to conclude that he had not notice. He did not say he had no notice that Samuel S. Smith had purchased this land at the commissioner's sale, or that he was not aware that it was sold as the property of his grandfather for partition; and certainly a knowledge of these facts would deprive him of the defence of want of notice, for it is a well recognized doctrine that notice of a fact which put one on inquiry, where he could learn the truth as to the title, is sufficient to fix notice upon him. But waiving this, is there not other evidence of notice in this case? The cause under which this land was sold was upon the docket of the court of equity, and the Court of Common Pleas after 1858 to 1869, and when these defendants became purchasers. True, the contest of title to this land was not pending, but it was the subject matter, amongst other matters (the accounts of the executor to the will of Samuel Smith, who acquired these lands subsequent to the execution of his will, which made them subject to distribution as intestate property.) This land was a portion of the subject matter of pro*ceedings, which were acts done in a public office, open for information, notice to all parties concerned. Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 60; Payne v. Harris, 3 Strob. Eq. 42; Pettus v. Clawson, 4 Rich. Eq. 92; Green v. Slaytor, 4 Johns. Ch. 38. Lis pendens is notice to the world, and binds the interest of all who purchase after suit brought and while pending. Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 567; Heatly et al v. Finster & Muller, 2 Johns. Ch. 159. And the referee holds that the proceedings in the cause referred to continuing on the docket of the court as mentioned, was such lis pendens as fixed constructive notice on these defendants; for though the title to the lands was not litigated, there was evidence of a sale and the statutory lien, and also evidence that the bond was not paid, or the fund not distributed. It is not every ignorance of title or facts which would put purchasers on their guard to protect them from the consequences of implied notice. A purchaser is bound to ordinary diligence in making inquiry as to the source of title which he is purchasing. All of these defendants, instead of resorting to such, seem to have relied on their warranty of title; and to this they must look for their indemnity in this case. Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 576. Stephen Smith, from whom all these parties purchased, was a party to the proceedings in partition. He thought the bond paid, and that all was right, he said in his testimony, but the suit was as before, still pending when he sold. The order of sale, the report of sale, the terms of sale, were matters of record; the objects of the bill had only been partially obtained. The accounts of the executor, and the proper distribution of the proceeds of sale, where there was an infant without guardian, were matters still open before the court, when these purchases were made of Stephen Smith; and for the purpose of enforcing this lien, the cause was again docketed in 1876; and it is not deemed necessary to do more than to refer to the authority of Lord Hardwicke, cited by Chancellor Kent, 1 Johns. Ch. 587, where he says: "A purchaser pendente lite was bound by the decree in the suit. The pendency of the suit was itself notice." And he observed "that the rule was to prevent a greater mischief that would arise by people's purchasing a right under litigation." Goeth v. Ward, 2 Atk. 174; Warsely v. Scarborough, 3 Atk. 392. Lord Camden, in

*588

*589

*590

Walker v. Small*wood, Ambler 676, enforced the same rule. See, too, Bishop of Winchester v. Payne, 11 Ves. 194. It is deemed unnecessary to follow the mass of authorities on this point. Enough have been cited with their reasons to show the necessity of such a rule, and the importance to persons purchasing who wish to look beyond their warranty of title, making inquiry as to the title, which in these was easy of access, and the facts as to the encumbrance patent to any one inquiring to learn them. Besides this, the bond was in the possession of the court. It could not properly be sued for collection without its order or direction; and to hold the parties interested barred of their rights of foreclosure may be to bar their right of recovery of the bond itself. This result would be to impute to the court such laches as would destroy the security procured by its machinery; a consequence that is not consistent with law or justice.

2. The second defence relied on is, that the defendants are purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, and are, therefore, entitled to protection in this action.

This defence applies to all of the defendants, whether holding adversely for the statutory period or otherwise. And it is not intended to say more on the subject of notice than what has been stated above. The statutory lien in this case stands upon the footing at least, both in law and equity, as a mortgage, made by act of the parties. In that particular it has been held, as before stated as a statutory mortgage. And to a bill for foreclosure of a mortgage, it has been held in many cases that a purchaser cannot set up the defence of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. It was so ruled in Finch v. Shaw, and Collier v. Finch, 19 Beav. 500; referred to in notes to 2 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 59; Collins v. Archer, 1 Russ. & M. 284; and Sir John Romilly and Lord Cranworth held, that when there was a legal right which had to be enforced by an equitable remedy, such right would be enforced, notwithstanding the party purchased for valuable consideration. This was a case of a mortgage where the defence was set up, but the foreclosure ordered.

It has been before held that the lien given by statute was a legal lien. The court of law had the right to sell for partition as well as the court of equity by the act of 1791, and it can in *no way be distinguished, so far as the right or remedy is concerned, from an ordinary mortgage; and it is only necessary to refer to the case of Blake v. Heyward, Bail. Eq. 208, and the authorities there cited, where it is held "that the plea of purchaser for valuable consideration cannot avail against a legal lien," etc., etc. So, here, the defendants purchased subject to a legal lien, and are liable to be divested by a sale. The fact that on account of the change of possession of the lands the equitable remedy has to be resorted to to enforce the lien, does not, in the judgment of the referee, alter the legal rights of the parties, or subject them to other defences than if the remedy was pursued at law.

*591

The referee, therefore, holds the defence of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, inapplicable in this case. On this point the cases of Snelgrove v. Snelgrove, 4 Desaus. 274; Donald v. McCord, Rice's Eq. 330; Schultz v. Carter, Speers' Eq. 542; Dillard v. Crocker, Ib. 26; Bush v. Bush, 3 Strob. Eq. 134 [51 Am. Dec. 675]; Zorn v. Railroad, 5 S. C. 90, are referred to as in consonance with the doctrine announced in Blake v. Heyward, from which extracts are above made.

The referee, therefore, holds that plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount due upon the bond, to wit, $4082.58, on January 2d, 1878, as per statement of the same accompanying this report; out of which sum Mrs. Elizabeth Allen and Mrs. Sarah F. Mullins are entitled, &c.

To this report exceptions were taken, all of which were overruled, and report confirmed by the Circuit judge. Defendants appealed upon the grounds considered by this court.

Messrs. W. W. Sellers and C. P. Townsend, for appellants.

Mr. W. D. Johnson and C. A. Woods, contra.

September 6th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. Samuel Smith died intestate as to part of his property in 1858, leaving as his heirs-at-law his widow, Sarah, and children and grandchildren, John L.,

*592

Stephen S., *Samuel S., William H., Elizabeth, wife of Joseph W. Allen, Mary, wife of R. Q. Roberts, Jincey Ellis, widow, and a granddaughter, Mary Frances Moody, now Mullins, whose mother had pre-deceased. There was a will which disposed of part of the estate, of which John L. Smith was executor, and he filed a bill against the heirs, among other things, for partition of so much of the estate as was intestate. At the February Term of the court of equity, 1860, the court ordered the intestate lands sold, and they were sold by C. D. Evans, Esq., commissioner in equity, April 1st, 1860, and purchased by S. S. Smith, one of the distributees, who executed to the commissioner a bond for $2750, with E. J. Moody and William H. Moody sureties, received title for the same, and executed mortgage as required of the premises to secure the purchase money. The sale was confirmed by the court, and we suppose that at the same time the usual order for distribution was made, but it is not in the brief, and we are uninformed whether, if made, it was in the usual form to pay to the adult parties, to the guardians of minors, and the shares of married women, upon the joint receipt of husband and wife.

The mortgage, taken as required, was not recorded until January 6th, 1876. In the meantime, the purchaser undertook to pay the parties in interest their respective shares and to lodge their receipts with the commissioner, instead of paying directly to him. Several receipts were thus delivered to the commissioner, who, wishing time to make calculations, did not credit the bond, but placed the receipts in the record. The purchaser produced receipts in this way to about the amount of the bond, and he states that he thought it was paid in full.

Before the mortgage was recorded, and after it was supposed that the bond was paid, S. S. Smith sold the land to his brother Stephen, and he conveyed different parcels of it at different times to other persons who are in possession and have been made parties. The action was brought on the bonds in the name of the clerk of the court against S. S. Smith, obligor, and the parties in possession of the land to foreclose a statutory lien alleged to exist and for judgment on the bond for any balance after applying the proceeds of the land. It does not appear, *precisely, when the action was brought, but the order of court authorizing suit bears date March 22d, 1876, and it is supposed the action was brought soon after. The defendants all resisted the recovery on various grounds. They demurred, denying that the plaintiff was the successor to the commissioner, and that he had not legal capacity to sue, or, if so, that he had not the right to foreclose the statutory lien, and that these two separate causes of action on the bond and to foreclose the mortgage, were improperly united. If the demurrer should be overruled they insisted that there was no statutory lien in the case, that having been superseded by the mortgage required and actually executed but not recorded. That the bond had been settled in full by the payment of their respective shares to the distributees. That the persons for whose benefit the suit was brought were barred by laches, lapse of time, and the statute of limitations; and that the defendants in possession of the different parcels of land were purchasers for value without notice, and that they had title by adverse possession for more than ten years.

*593

The issues of law and fact were referred to W. W. Harllee, Esq., as special referee, who overruled the demurrer and the pleas of purchaser without notice, and of the statute of limitations; found that all of the distributees had been paid except Mrs. Elizabeth Allen and Sarah Frances Mullins, the latter claiming her mother's share, and, also, the share of her grandmother by assignment, and that for these two shares, judgment should be rendered on the bond for the sum of $4082.51, with interest from January 2d, 1878, and, if not paid, that all the lands should be sold under the statutory lien. This report was confirmed by the Circuit judge, and from his order the appeal comes to this court.

The referee's report is so full as to make it unnecessary to state at length the arguments and authorities upon which the different questions are determined.

The first question is whether the clerk of the court had legal capacity to maintain the action to foreclose a statutory lien under the act of 1791. That act is now repealed, but these transactions occurred while it was of force, and this case must be considered as if it were still on the statute book. The bond *was made payable to the commissioner or his successor in office.

*594

Upon the abolition of the office of commissioner, 1869, the bond was transferred to the custody of the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, and was under the control of said court. Judge Townsend ordered the clerk to place the bond in the hands of the attorney of Mary Frances Mullins for collection. That, itself, would seem to confer the authority to sue in the name of the clerk. The statutory lien, the existence of which is not controverted by the exceptions to the order of the Circuit judge, notwithstanding the execution of a mortgage, was only a security for the bond, and, as an incident, went with it. The authority to sue the bond carried with it the right to foreclose the lien. Billings v. Williamson, 6 S. C. 122; Code, §§ 134–136. The act of 1791 did not direct who should enforce the lien thereby given, but simply declared that the "courts shall direct a sale to be made on such credit and on such terms as to them shall seem right and proper, and the land so sold shall stand pledged for the payment of the purchase money." As the bond for the purchase money was payable to the commissioner or his successor in office we must consider that the pledge was to him in the same way, and that both were transferred to the clerk of the court, who was the proper person to bring the action. Daniels v. Moses, 12 S. C. 130.

Upon the subject of the alleged payment of the bond, the Circuit judge sustained the referee in holding that the share of Mrs. Elizabeth Allen, paid to her husband, Joseph W. Allen, according to her order, should not be considered a payment, for the reason that there is no proof that she received the money or other consideration for her order in favor of her husband. The referee reports as matter of fact that most of the distributees were paid, but "with respect to the amount due Mrs. Allen, wife of Joseph W. Allen, there is more difficulty. The proof by S. S. Smith was that he gave to C. D. Evans, commissioner in equity, the receipt of Joseph W. Allen, with others, in full of the bond, but it was not received, as the wife's signature was not on it. [So as to the receipt of R. Q. Roberts.] He states that the commissioner told him to get the order of the married *women, and he produces the order of Mrs. Allen (the only one contested) in these words:

*595

"Mr. C. D. Evans, please pay to Samuel S. Smith all my interest in the depot lands.

(Signed) "Elizabeth Allen.

"April 13th, 1863."

"The referee concludes as fact that the order was signed by Mrs. Allen, but she then received no money for it. He also would hold that he did get Mr. Allen's receipt, and as he is fully sustained by the then commissioner in his account of the whole transaction he would hold that if he had a right to receive the money that that distributive share was paid. But Mr. Allen had no such right, and there is no evidence that any money was paid Mrs. Allen. She was under the disability of coverture at the time. Her order was not sufficient in the judgment of the referee to authorize the commissioner to credit the bond with such a payment or compel satisfaction for the amount due her unless it could be shown she received the amount."

Accepting this statement of the referee, we are to inquire whether his conclusion of law is correct; that no order or consent of Mrs. Allen that her husband should receive her share would authorize him to give a receipt and legal discharge for the same, unless Mrs. Allen received the money or some other valuable consideration for her consent. This must be determined by the law as it existed at the time. The constitution of 1868 secures to a married woman her separate estate in all respects as if she were sole and unmarried, but such was not the law in South Carolina before that time. By the old law, marriage imposed certain duties upon the husband, and in consideration therefor conferred on him some interest in all the property of the wife not settled to her sole and separate use. That interest was not the same in all kinds of property, realty and personalty, in possession and in action, but he did not stand as a stranger to any part of her property. As it was expressed by Chancellor Johnson in the case of Durr v. Bowyer, 2 McC. Eq. 372: "By the common law all the chattels which belonged to the wife before marriage, or to which she becomes entitled in *her own right, are vested in the husband absolutely with respect to things in possession, and he may dispose of them as he pleases; but with respect to things in action, although the right to reduce them into possession is by law vested in him, the courts of equity have built up a system founded in good sense and common justice, which is intended to secure to the wife a suitable possession for her support and maintenance."

*596

The interest which the wife has in choses in action, which belonged to her at the marriage, constitutes what is technically called the wife's equity, with respect to which it may be laid down as a general rule that if it be within the reach of the court it will not be permitted to be removed out of that jurisdiction until an adequate provision is made for the wife, unless she has already been sufficiently provided for, or on her own personal examination she thinks proper to waive the benefit of the provision. McCauley v. Phillips, 4 Yes. 17; Clancy's Rights of Married Women 188. When the land was sold, Mrs. Allen was divested of her interest in it and became the equitable owner of the money. This did not belong to her husband until he reduced it into possession. The commissioner had no right to pay it upon the single receipt of the husband, but it was the privilege of the wife not to insist on her equity, or to waive it. Such waiver, when made, even if she received no valuable consideration for it, was sufficient to authorize the husband to receive the money and give a legal discharge. Waiver did not depend upon consideration paid, but upon its being actual, bona fide and without undue influence. To secure this, the practice at first was to subject the wife to personal examination. Later it was held that the court would not volunteer to set up the wife's equity, and it was finally settled that it was a discharge to pay the wife's money upon the joint receipt of husband and wife, and the chancellors generally ordered that it should be paid upon such receipt. It was considered sufficient evidence of the waiver of her right to join her husband in a receipt "or to do some equally significant and unequivocal act." Ex parte Geddes, 4 Rich. Eq. 302 [57 Am. Dec. 730]; Yeldell v. Quarles, Dud. Eq. 55; Edgerton v. Muse, Ib. 179; Gillett v. Powell, 1 Speers' Eq. 150.

Here the facts, as found by the referee, are that nearly twenty *years ago, Samuel S. Smith purchased at commissioner's sale a tract of land, in which his sister, Mrs. Allen, had an interest. Her husband, at the time, received her share from the purchaser, and gave his receipt. The commissioner refused to take that receipt unless the wife of Allen would signify her assent by giving an order in writing for the payment to her husband. She gave that order in writing. This was a compliance certainly with the requirement of the commissioner and with the order of distribution, if one was made in the usual form, and, we think, was a waiver of her equity in favor of her husband by "an act equally as significant and unequivocal" as if she had signed a joint receipt with her husband and he had drawn the money upon such receipt. The bond should be credited with the share of Mrs. Allen as paid.

*597

The interest of Sarah Frances Mullins in the estate of her grandfather arose in two ways: first, her share in the land bond, which is claimed in this suit, and the other funds relinquished to her in the same way by the other distributees, which are not involved here. When these transactions took place she was of tender years, and lived with her father, E. J. Moody, who was believed by all parties to be her regularly appointed guardian. He acted as such. The commissioner in equity treated him as guardian, and to him, as such guardian, S. S. Smith paid the full share of Sarah Frances in the land bond, viz., the sum of $1100; took his receipt for the same in full and delivered it to the commissioner, who filed it in the office with the bond. The matter stood in this condition until Sarah Frances attained full age, married and brought this suit, when it was discovered that E. J. Moody was not her appointed guardian, or at least no evidence of the appointment could be found. Under these circumstances it is insisted that the court should presume that Moody was appointed guardian of his daughter, and that the payment to him should operate as satisfaction to that extent of the land bond. It seems that he held himself out as guardian, and that both Smith and the commissioner acted in good faith and were deceived; but in the absence of all proof of its existence, and as against one, then an infant, the court could not, from mere lapse of time, less *than twenty years, presume that E. J. Moody was appointed guardian of his daughter, Sarah Frances.

*598

Besides the money paid to him, as above stated, by S. S. Smith, E. J. Moody received for his daughter other sums, given to her by the other distributees of the estate. This latter fund he also received without proper authority, by giving receipts in the following form: "Received of John L. Smith a conditional gift to my daughter, Sarah F. Moody. The conditions are as follows: If Sarah F. Moody lives to have lawful issue, and Samuel Smith's will is not protested or broken, then final," &c. The conditions were performed. It seems that after the marriage of Mrs. Mullins, E. J. Moody paid her in part of the money he had received from her, viz., about the sum of $2800. Clearly this should be a payment upon her claim against her father, and as he is unable to pay the remainder it becomes important to ascertain to which part of the money in his hands it should be credited—that received from the land bond, or the donation fund. The referee holds that the whole payment should be credited on the donation fund, and that no part of it should be set down to the money received for the land, upon the ground that, as to the donation fund, he had made himself "a self-constituted trustee to pay to the daughter," &c., while the appellants insist that the payment should be considered as made first from the land fund, or at least that the payment should be credited to both funds in proportion to their respective amounts. The whole evidence is not before us, but from what appears we can discover no error in the decree in this respect. The principle is well settled that the owner of the money—the debtor—has the right at the time of payment to direct the application, but if he does not make the application the creditor has that right. Heilbron v. Bissell, Bail. Eq. 430; Williams & Co. v. Vance & Mosely, 9 S. C. 348 [30 Am. Rep. 26].

Mrs. Mullins had a claim against her father, originating in two distinct sources, entirely different in character. One was a contract by which he assumed a trust, cognizable as such in equity, at the instance of the cestui que trust. The other was a payment by mistake, to her father as her assumed guardian, and as to which the only obligation imposed was to refund the sum to those from whom it came. By that wrongful payment no in*debtedness arose from Moody to his daughter which she was bound to recognize and set up. To have done so to any extent might have imperilled her recovery against those who were her debtors. If the erroneous payment to Moody made him the debtor of his daughter, as it would have done if he had been in fact her guardian, the payment would have discharged those making it. Moody had the right to pay the money back to those who made the payment, which is inconsistent with the view that the payment itself made Moody the debtor of his daughter. Did the parties making the wrongful payment have the right to insist that the daughter should take a new debtor in discharge of them? If Mrs. Mullins were bound by any rule or principle of law or equity to receive part of the money on one account and part on the other, then we might hold that she received the money under that rule, and the credits should be applied to both in proportion to their respective amounts; but we know of no such rule, unless the parties have a right to say to her, you shall take your father as your debtor in our place. Not being under any such restraint by the law, she declares that it was Moody's money due her as a cestui que trust. She had a perfect right to say to her trustee, as you have not indicated how it shall be applied, I receive the money on account of the trust. As against the trustee she has the right to say so now; and we know of no equity to control that right upon her part as creditor. This exception is overruled.

*599

It appears that at least three of the parties, George W. Smith, R. Vampill and George W. Harrelson, had been, at the time the suit was brought, in possession of their respective parcels of the land purchased from Mr. Stephen Smith more than ten years, and they insist that they have title under the statute of limitations. We agree with the referee and Circuit judge that this defence cannot avail. The lien bound the lands in the possession of S. S. Smith, and also that of Stephen Smith, as they, being parties, had actual notice. They conveyed and the purchasers took no higher right than they could give. They purchased property subject to an encumbrance, and their possession, like that of the vendor, was not adverse, unless, by some act or declaration, they gave notice that they did not hold subject to, but *adversely to, such lien; and we do not think that merely receiving title and holding possession without anything else, would be enough to prove such possession adverse. The case of McRaa v. Smith [2 Bay 339], relied on by the defendants, was the case of a purchaser from defendant in execution, in whose possession before the sale the land was bound by the lien. The principle on which that case is placed is not clearly perceived, as the statute of limitations refers in terms to title claim for the land itself, and does not expressly include the case of a lien or mere power. But the case has been recognized and we do not propose to disturb it. We are not, however, disposed to extend that construction of the statute beyond the actual case.

*600

In reference to a purchase from a mortgagor, a different doctrine has been held and sustained by a long line of decisions from Thayer v. Cramer, 1 McC. Eq. 395, down to Gillison v. S. & C. R. R. Co., 7 S. C. 181. We think the correct doctrine is stated in the case of Wright v. Eaves, 5 Rich. Eq. 81, where the court say: "To a bill filed to foreclose a mortgage of land against mortgagor, the statute of limitations is not applicable, although the defendant and those under whom he claims has been in possession for more than ten years." It was also held in the late case of Norton v. Lewis, 3 S. C. 25, that a purchaser holding possession for the period of ten years, with notice of the mortgage, cannot avail himself of the defence of the statute of limitations in bar of the right of the mortgagee to foreclose."

But it is urged that a statutory lien is a secret lien—that it is never recorded, and in such case parties cannot be chargeable with constructive notice. The declaration of the statute, of which all are presumed to have knowledge, and the record in a public office open to all, taken together, are considered equivalent to recording. McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq. 164. This precise question was decided in the case of Daniels v. Moses, before cited in which Judge McIver, as the organ of the court, says: "We do not see how a purchaser of property, covered by a statutory lien of which he has no express notice, can stand in any better position than the purchaser of property covered by a formal mortgage duly recorded, of which he has no express notice. In the former case no recording is required, the pro*ceeding under which it arises being regarded, doubtless, as a substitute for such recording, and which, therefore, operates as notice, just as the formal recording does in the other." This, also, disposes of the alleged laches on the part of the commissioner as the agent of the parties in interest.

*601

The only remaining exception is "because the referee erred in overruling the plea of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice." We have already determined that the defendants had the knowledge of such facts as should have put them upon inquiry, and, therefore, were not without notice. The statutory lien must be considered on the same footing as a regular mortgage, which, although generally enforced by proceedings equitable in their character, gives a legal right, and it is so well settled that against such right the mere equity of a purchaser for value cannot prevail; that it cannot be necessary to do more than refer generally to some of the authorities upon the subject. Finch v. Shaw, 19 Beav. 500; 2 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 59; Collins v. Archer, 1 Russ. & M. 284;

Blake v. Heyward, Bail. Eq. 208; Donald v. McCord, Rice's Eq. 340.

The judgment of the Circuit Court, except as herein modified, is affirmed, and the case is remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

WILLARD, C. J., and PRESSLEY, A. J., concurred.

---

13 S. C. 601

(Case No. 925.)

GODBOLD v. GODBOLD.

(November Term, 1879.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇐416.]

A, administrator of his father's estate, was indebted to three of his brothers for their shares in said estate, and the three brothers died intestate, leaving A one of their distributees, and afterwards A died insolvent—Held, that his interest in his brothers' estates was exhausted by his indebtedness to them, and was not distributable among his creditors generally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1652; Dec. Dig. ⇐416.]

[2. Wills ⇐832.]

A legatee can be required to refund only to the extent of the value of the property at the time of action brought, and cannot, therefore, be held liable for slaves received where the suit is commenced after the emancipation of the slaves in 1865.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2139; Dec. Dig. ⇐832.]

*602

*Before Townsend, J., Marion, March, 1876.

In this case the Hon. B. C. PRESSLEY, judge of the First Circuit, sat instead of Hon. HENRY McIVER, associate justice, who had been of counsel in the cause. Chief Justice WILLARD was present at the hearing, but his term of office expired before the opinion was filed.

The facts bearing upon the points decided are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court. Ann Godbold, mentioned in the opinion, was the widow of Thomas Godbold. She first administered upon his estate, and upon her death Asa Godbold, son of Thomas, became administrator de bonis non. The action was for a general accounting and settlement of the estates of Thomas, Ann and Asa, and of the three brothers of Asa, who had died intestate after their father.

Mr. W. W. Harllee, attorney for the administrators of Thomas Godbold and of Asa Godbold.

Mr. W. D. Johnson, contra.

October 5th, 1880. The opinion of the court was delivered by PRESSLEY, A. A. J. The plaintiffs applied to the Probate judge of Marion for settlement of the estate of Thomas Godbold, and of the shares therein of his three sons, who died after him, leaving their brother Asa one of their distributees. He administered on the estate of his father, and received its income, for which he is in debt to the other shares more than his share in the estates of his father and deceased brothers. He died insolvent, and his creditors claim that his share in said estates are to be applied pro rata to his debts and not exclusively to the amount due by him on the money received from his father's estate. The Probate judge decided that the money so received exhausted his share in the said estates. The Circuit judge sustained that decision, and the creditors of Asa Goldbold appeal.

This court decides that the money so received and not distrib*uted by the said Asa, was retained by him in his right as a distributee of said estates, and so exhausted his shares therein.

*603

Ann Goldbold died intestate, bequeathing slaves to each of five of her children. They received and kept said slaves until they were emancipated, which happened before this suit commenced. The remainder of her estate failed to pay her debts, and her other legatees claim that those who received said slaves must, in that behalf, contribute to such payment. The Probate judge decided that they were not so liable, but the Circuit judge overruled that decision, and the legatees, who received said slaves, appeal.

This court sustains the decision of the Probate judge, and holds that a legatee who receives property is liable to the creditors of the testators only for the value of the property at the commencement of the suit. The language of our court in McMullin v. Brown, 2 Hill's Ch. 457, is that "he is liable only for the legacy in specie." Before that decision, Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Backhouse v. Jett, 1 Brock. 516 [Fed. Cas. No. 710] held that a voluntary donee of slaves from an insolvent donor was not liable to his creditors for the value of some of said slaves who died before suit, and he expressly assigns as the reason of his decision that it had always been so ruled in cases of property received by the heir from an ancestor whose other property failed to pay his debts.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that this case be remitted to the Probate Court for settlement of said states according to this decision.

McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

THE LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY
D 000 455 518 1